Chuckling half-heartedly, Sirius looked down at his lap. Remus wanted so badly to take his hand—to trace the soft pads of his palm, the ridges of his knuckles—but there were things unsaid between them.

“I'm not mad,” he said again, “but that doesn't mean I've forgiven you.”

“Okay,” Sirius murmured.

“What you did was…" Remus sighed. "It just made things harder.”

“Seems to be all I'm good at.”

“That's not true. You set a piano on fire in front of your entire family —that takes real talent.”

Another smile touched Sirius' lips. "I'd been saving that one. It felt good to watch that hunk of wood burn—worth every punishment that witch could come up with. I just wanted it to feel like a husk. Like everything else in that house..."

Looking down at the piano keys, Remus swallowed thickly. “Do you remember last year when I picked that fight and you threw out that list of everything you knew about me?”

Sirius nodded in recognition; “Yeah why? Looking for volume two?”

“No, wanker. I only meant to say that I never told you that I have a list too.”

“Oh? For me?”

“Mhm. It’s alphabetised, even.” Remus held his hands out and spread them apart as though he were reading off a giant billboard. “Starts with, ‘absolute dickhead’. Shitty wanker's a bit further down.”

“Ha. You know me so well.”

Lowering his hands, Remus nudged Sirius with his shoulder. “Seriously though. I do know you. You can cause bad, but you also do good sometimes too."

"Nah. I like to deny it, but I'm a Black through and through, Moony. I'm stained black, even in here." Sirius tapped his chest.

"No," Remus shook his head. "Could a stained person, make people smile even on their worse days? Could they start a conversation with a stranger and end it with a friend? No one's good all the time, Padfoot, but that doesn't mean you don't have good parts. Like... how you always give everyone your undivided attention when you’re talking to them, even if it’s just to be a sarcastic asshole."

"I have a reputation to protect," Sirius supplied cheekily.

"Yeah, well you’re loyal to a fucking fault too—don't I know it—and you can't sleep when you know others might be crying. You say you hate school, but you come anyway and you still manage to get all the teachers to like you."

"Mm, some more than others."

"You hate reading for class but secretly enjoy reading for yourself—"

"I like the 'happily ever afters' what can I say?"

Remus smiled. "I know you’re really good at crosswords and that you work hard, even if you’d prefer to pretend that you don’t. You whistle when you think nobody’s around and sing when you know they are—you're a wicked-hot musician. And you call James' parents 'mum and dad' because you know he likes hearing it!"

Sirius chuckled a bit at that. "I like it too."

"I know. I also know you don't let anyone tell you off for the nail polish or make up or jewelry, and I admire that, and…" Remus smiled lazily down at the piano keys; "and you do care about school. You like school."

"I like my friends," Sirius amended. "I can like anywhere, as long as we're together."

"Anywhere, huh?"

"Anywhere."

"Am I your friend?"

Sirius' head shot up. "You actually need to ask me that?"

Yes, Remus thought, but am I only your friend?

"Sorry…" He murmured, coming back to himself; "I was being stupid."

"You're never stupid," Sirius said. He looked away, back to the keys that might bite him, and Remus began to feel the familiar hammering of his heart in his ears.

"My mum used to play the piano, you know," he said plainly, to drown out the noise. "She was really good—classically trained like you. Before she got sick, she was always saying how she would teach me, but I don't think I would've made a very good piano player anyway. My posture's too shit."

Out of the corner of his eye, Remus saw Sirius crack another smile. "We should've got you on something long, like the bassoon. Put your lanky git body to good use."

"In that case I'm getting you a ukulele."

"Do it. I'll bash ya in the knees with it, you giant."

Remus chuckled weakly, and his eyes caught his own reflection in the piano's silky surface. "Sometimes at night... it's as though I can hear her playing."

“Like... in a dream?”

“Must be. I don’t think I have any real memories of hearing her play, even though I know she must’ve. She got tired easily, and the pills made her hands shake. It was hard for her so she sort of just… sat by the window of the music room. She used to just watch the piano for hours, staring at it like it was some sort of living thing that might come alive and, I dunno… hurt her." He looked back at Sirius. "Kind of like you’re doing right now...”

Sirius tightened hold of his hands, crushing his fingers in his lap until they went white. "I know it shouldn't be this hard, it's just..."

"You don't want to play?"

"I dunno... It hurts in a way. Remembering."

"I understand," Remus told him. "It hurts because it was their job, but instead they put all their shit on us, didn't they?"

Sirius ran a nervous hand through his hair. "You're... You're startlingly self-aware sometimes, Moony."

"It's part of the guilt-complex."

"God. Not the guilt-complex..."

Remus smiled again. It was easy around Sirius. “You can play if you want, Padfoot,” he told him, “you just have to make it for you.”

Sirius released his strangled fingers and for a moment it looked as though he might stretch them toward the piano keys, but he choked, hesitating long enough to let out a frustrated sigh.

“I can’t.”

Sighing softly, Remus reached up to rub the back of his neck. As his hands came down, he stopped to stare at them, and then glanced back at his friend. “Well, do you trust me then?”

“Yes,” Sirius said, without hesitation.

Nodding, Remus took a nervous breath and set his own fingers on the keys. He pressed the first note, a high little ding that echoed out around them like a cry, and looked to Sirius for approval, but Sirius was only staring at his hands on the keys, forehead creased in concern. So, Remus kept going.

He pressed another key, then another, until his fingers were clumsily hopping across them one at a time. When he reached the last he hit it several times; dun-dun-dun-dun-dun-dun-dun-dun and then proceeded to fly back up to the other end, reaching past Sirius with a cheeky grin. Eventually te was slapping the keys—hammering them—drawing noise from the instrument in every unfathomable way he could. Beethoven would've been appalled, Mozart would've had him drawn and quartered—he didn't care. It was noise and neither of them could bear silence—never could, never would.

"Okay, okay! I get it, you really can't play!" Sirius laughed eventually, catching him by the wrists and choking out his sinner's symphony.

"Guess you're going to have to teach me!" Remus grinned, pushing past him to reach a few more notes.

"I can't!"

DUH-DUN; "You must!"

"No, I really can't!"

DUH-DUH-DUNNN! "Then we suffer!"

"You're such an idiot, Moony!"

Yes, oh yes, Remus thought, his face overtaken by a grin. "I think my fingers are possessed, Padfoot! I need an idiot's instruction!"

Sirius laughed some more, and it was more beautiful than any song. The best composer in the world couldn't have matched it.

"Bloody—Alright!" he said finally. "Give the ivories a chance to breathe first!"

With a final; DUH-DUH! Remus sagged against him, laughing as he drew back. Sirius shoved him lightly.

"That was a total train-wreck."

"I'm a beginner," he said shamelessly, "I've never been shown what to do."

"Clearly." Sirius licked his lips and raised his hands, actually letting them hover over the keys. If Remus looked close enough he could see his own muddled face reflected in their polished ivory shine. He wondered what Sirius saw.

“Hey,” Remus said, leaning in until he could see both of Sirius’ eyes. “Do you trust me?”

Sirius looked to him, jaw clenched, and nodded.

“Okay then.” Slowly he drew up off the bench, giving Sirius enough room to stretch out and reach every key. He stood behind him, holding his breath, and Sirius did the same, almost frozen. “You can do it, Padfoot,” he urged him. “You don’t have to be the Sirius that played before. You can start anew.”

Looking back at him, Sirius opened his mouth. It would’ve been so easy for Remus to lean forward and kiss him.

“Okay,” Sirius breathed quietly, before straightening up on the bench. Even his back looked beautiful, and Remus was nearly lost in the image of him alone, but the moment Sirius began to play, he was truly transported.

Sirius needed no sheet music, instead the notes flew out of him by either muscle memory or pure invention. The song was beautiful and terrifying all at once. Light and airy like a summer breeze blowing through sheer white curtains, but just beyond that, distant thunder clouds rolled closer and closer. It made goosebumps rise over his entire body. It made Remus want to flee the room. It made him remember the sound of his mother crying when she could no longer get out of bed on her own. The clatter of pill bottles as her shaky hands spilled them across the floor. The emotion that came with seeing her blue eyes well up with frustrated tears.

But it was also those nights Hope would leave the radio on, and they’d dance around the parlour until they were laughing so hard they had to sit down. Of sitting in Giles’ lap and watching him turn the paper and pointing out the pictures. Of hearing Tonya say I love you. Of being hugged by Tomny. Of seeing James and Peter smile. Of hearing the girls laugh.

Of Sirius' everything.

Remus wasn’t sure what the song was named—probably something French—but if he'd have gotten to choose, it would've been 'Memory'.

He was still miles away by the time Sirius finished the song, and he came back to himself to find his friend breathing so hard his shoulders were trembling. Remus heard a sniffle, and swallowed, afraid that he’d made a mistake in pushing him.

“Sirius…”

“God,” Sirius said, “I fucking hate Bach. Mum used to make me play the Partitas for hours, yelling or hitting me with this fucking stick—a real narrow one, like a whip—every time I played too fast or hit the wrong key. Sometimes I would do it on purpose too, just to have a real reason to glare at her—then she’d scold me again because, ‘how dare I look at her that way’. But she looked at me, Moony! She looked at me and it was never enough—it’ll never be enough. Why can’t I play for myself? For only me?”

Sirius sagged inwards like he was trying to make himself appear very small and Remus surged forward, sliding onto the end of the bench and catching him as he began to break down. He squeezed, so tight that he could feel Sirius’ trembling in his own bones. “I hear you,” he told him, “I hear you.”

“It just fucking sucks,” Sirius whimpered. “I hate all of it. It was horrible. I sounded horrible.”

“No, it was beautiful. You were so beautiful.”

“Not beautiful enough.”

“What’s enough?" Remus swore. "Who decides when anything’s enough?”

Through his choked sobs, Sirius laughed bitterly. “The audience, I suppose.”

“Well fine, but right now I’m your only audience and I say it was enough, Sirius.”

Sirius reached up and clung to him, holding his arm so tightly it should’ve hurt. Remus barely felt it.

“I won’t play for her anymore. Not any of them,” Sirius told him, head hung. “But I’ll play for you.”

Remus squeezed even tighter. “I’d like that.”

Neither of them said anything for a while, and slowly Sirius' breathing began to even out again. He sniffled a few times, and Remus didn't even mind if he was wiping snot on his shirt.

“Remus…?”

Chills. Sirius hardly ever called him by name.

“Yes, Sirius?”

“I meant it, you know—what I said before... You’re glorious.”

“… I’m just happy you’re here, Sirius.”

With his face pressed into Sirius’ shoulder Remus couldn’t be sure, but he thought that Sirius just might be smiling. They hugged one another for a long time still, an awkward jumble of limbs that were too long and yet not long enough. Briefly Remus began to wonder what it was he was doing—you're too close! Get away now before it ends badly!—but the thoughts left him the moment Sirius shifted and he let go. They turned to look at one another, grey eyes and brown, and for a moment the world almost made sense, but then Sirius looked away.

“That was embarrassing,” he murmured, wiping his face on his sleeve.

Remus tipped his head back to look at the roof of the music room—anywhere but Sirius’ mouth—and shrugged. “Not as embarrassing as watching you hop around with cow shit stuck to the bottom of your foot.”

“Or showing your bare arse off to the entire school.”

“And just how does our gym class equate to the entire school?” Remus demanded, looking back to him. Sirius grinned guiltily. Remus sighed happily.

Then for a split-second, Sirius’ eyes darted downwards. Remus didn’t miss it. An explosion could’ve been happening right over his shoulder and he still wouldn’t have looked away. He didn’t, not even to see for himself how Sirius’ pinky was now brushing up against the side of his hand as it rested on the piano bench. He almost shivered, but then Sirius bit his lip and leaned in ever-so-slightly. Remus did the same, and suddenly they were closer than they’d ever been...

No! We can’t!

Fuck that—yes! Yes! Yes! Yes! Ye—

“YES!" James shouted from the music room doorway. "Told you we’d find ‘em, Pete!”

Sirius whipped around so fast the ends of his hair swatted Remus in the face as he flew backward, nearly toppling off the piano bench. He caught himself on the keys, making a dreadful twang of noise as James and Peter skipped into the room.

“You jammy bastards!” Sirius cried, forcing a stilted laugh. “You just about scared the living daylights out of us!”

“Not as if we were sneaking,” James said. “What were you even doing?”

“Playing piano,” Remus answered quickly. Sirius glanced at him, and he noted with relief that his cheeks were also red.

“You were actually playing the piano? I thought you hated the thing, Sirius,” Peter said in surprise.

Sirius stretched his arms out sheepishly. “Yeah, well... someone convinced me to give it another go.”

Remus blushed harder. Fuck me, really.

“That’s great news, mate!” James cried. A second later he was bouncing across the room and grappling Sirius in a hug from behind. It almost made Remus jealous to see James do it so easily.

“We totally missed hearing you play,” Peter agreed, coming to join them.

Lightly shoving his best friend off, Sirius spun around on the bench. “So what are you two doing here—come to practice?”

“Nah,” James waved, “we were looking for you actually.” He looked at Remus pointedly, brows raised. “Does thisss... erhm... mean you and Moony have made up then?”

“Well—”

“Yes,” Remus answered. Sirius turned to him, looking hopeful, and bit his lip over a smile. It was irrational, but in that moment Remus had never resented James and Peter more. Curse their eternal friendship. Curse their horrible timing more.

James clapped his hands together. “Brilliant, now we can tell you our good news!”

“What good news?” Sirius asked.

Peter cleared his throat. “We talked to McGonagall about our schedules for next term, and she approved it. We're gonna switch a few classes around.”

“You can do that?” Remus frowned. “They made us choose weeks ago.”

“Yeah, well, we sorta realised that next year’s our last year at school—all of us in the same place—and who knows what’s gonna happen after,” James said kindly; “So Pete and I figured, might as well make the most of the time we’ve got left.”

“You make it sound as though we’re all gonna hop the twig the moment we leave school,” Sirius smirked.

“No, nothing like that—but life is unexpected right, so we thought that—”

“That we’d switch into music with you!” Peter announced.

Both Remus and Sirius were stunned. “Like take music with Sheila?” Sirius eventually echoed. “In class? With us? The two of you?”

“No,” James grinned, “the four of us.”

“It’s just a spare. Might as well make it fun,” Peter shrugged.

Remus was utterly slack-mouthed; “But Pete, what about your art lessons?”

“Meh, not like I was gonna do anything with it anyway. I can still draw on my own time, and Madame Aubert's already said I can use the art room whenever I want.”

He whirled on James. “And you, you’re just gonna give up gym?”

“I can run during breaks. S’not as if I’m gonna suddenly lose all athleticism by sitting in here for a few hours a week. Who knows, maybe I'll learn something.”

"Like how to read sheet music," Peter snorted.

While James shouldered his friend, Sirius shot to his feet, almost glowing with excitement. “This is brilliant! Albeit a bit unexpected, I'll give ya that—but still, absolutely fantastic!”

“Thought you’d be happy!” James cried.

“Of course I’m happy!” He grabbed his best friend by the shoulders. “This is a real chance—we can actually make something out of Marauders now! We could even perform!”

Peter blanched a bit. “Hold on, we’re hardly the Hawkings’ Philharmonic Orchestra."

“Bah, orchestras are just glorified cover bands anyway.” Sirius turned back to the piano, almost breathless. The look he gave Remus was pure happiness. “This is amazing, isn’t it, Moony?”

“Yeah,” Remus said, “it really is.”

Chapter End Notes

'Hop the twig' is a euphemism for dying.

I don't normally like getting sad in these comments, but it took a lot just to get this chapter out on time. Something happened to my computer and a portion of the notes I would've been using to write upcoming chapters were lost (along with many tears), so if you would be so kind as to share your thoughts/some love in the comments/kudos I would really appreciate it, as my motivation really took a hit this week cries

On the bright side—next chapter (posting on Christmas! Eeee!) is the last chapter in this term! Keep looking out for the summer chapters after that, I promise they won't disappoint :')

Chapter 64: Crescendo

Chapter Summary

It the Marauders' final day of the 1976-1977 school term, and they're going to celebrate.

Chapter Notes

You guys were literally so sweet in the comments on last chapter. I actually cried while reading some of them cries again. Thank you so much for enjoying this story. Hearing that people want to read these words is truly the best motivator.

Now, without further ado... on with the show!

CW: Drinking. Cringing. Friendship and... more?

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I don't mind other guys dancing with my girl,
That's fine, I know them all pretty well;
But I know sometimes I must get out in the light,
Better leave her behind with the kids, they're alright…

- "The Kids Are Alright" The Who, 1966

Thursday 16th June 1977

When Professor McGonagall asked him to come to her office on the eve of their last night at school, Remus assumed it was because she'd finally decided on his punishment for almost sending Barty to an early grave. After two weeks with no word on the matter, he'd almost let himself believe that she'd forgotten the whole thing, which was laughable. Their Headmistress had a memory like an elephant and a penchant for justice much stronger than any London police officer. That, combined with her calling him in to the main office so close to summer holiday could mean only one thing: that he was not going to be returning to Hawkings Independent School next term.

It was pleasing at least, to look up at the glass cabinet behind McGonagall's desk and see the shiny new first place trophy the boys' football team had earned at their end-of-year tournament. James had been ecstatic over the win and arrived back at school the day before, waving the thing over his head while the whole team cheered. He'd spent the rest of the day touring the grounds with it and accepting praise from all the teachers before promptly passing out for a nap that was now going on eighteen hours long. Peter had stopped packing a few times just to make sure James was still breathing and afterwards Sirius had gotten the bright idea of sticking a pair of tampons up his nose to see if they'd make him snore even louder. (Where he'd gotten the tampons, Remus had no idea, but his hypotheses was correct; by the time Remus had left the dorm, James was snoring like a chainsaw.)

In the time since, Remus had started his walk over to Castle Hall, resolving not to tell any of his friends about his sure-to-be expulsion while they were still at school. He didn't want to be the one to ruin their last night together; instead he'd write them each a letter once he was home. At least that way they'd have the summer to forget about him. Only, Remus hadn't been counting on McGonagall's personal peculiarities, and unbeknownst to him, was walking into a much stranger conversation.

"You want me to do what?" He demanded.

Professor McGonagall gave him a tight-lipped smile. "It's very simple, Mr. Lupin. I want you to spend your final year at Hawkings as a school prefect."

Oh Christ.

Remus slapped his forehead. "You've got to be joking."

"Oh, but I assure you, I am not."

"But I thought you were going to expel me—I punched a kid!" Two, if he were being honest.

"Do you still wish to be expelled, Remus?"

Quickly, he shut his mouth. "No…"

"Then I assume this is an arrangement that works for both parties."

"But I am not prefect material!" Remus blabbed. "Prefects are—are—smart!"

McGonagall cracked another smile, this one of the snide sort that said she knew everything. “You are very intelligent, if your marks this term are anything to go by. In fact I believe congratulations are even in order, good show. Are there any other prefect-like qualities you don't claim to adhere to?"

“Yes! They care about things like—like extracurriculars, which I do not—no offence. They're like professional babysitters, and I'd probably kill a baby as soon as it looked at me."

"I assure you, there will be no babies," McGonagall chuckled. "Only your fellow classmates."

"Okay, but—but prefects are just so uncool—and they're also stuck-up and bossy!”

“Is Ms. Evans stuck-up and bossy?”

“Well, she’s certainly bossy but she…” Remus trailed off, caught up in his own web. With nothing left to do, he let out a heavy sigh and leaned forward to beg. “Please, Professor McGonagall, can’t you just give me detention? Or assign me lines to do over the summer? I'll post them to you and everything!”

“I could, though I’m not sure the message would sink in properly come September, but if you were to have something constructive to fill your time, like becoming an acting prefect, where you’ll be expected to uphold the school rules rather than break them—then I’m sure it’ll stick.”

Remus used to think that all gym teachers were sadists. Now he was coming to the conclusion that the assumption extended to Headmistresses as well.

“Mr. Lupin,” McGonagall started again, “I stand by what I told you when you arrived here nearly two years ago, we here at Hawkings do not admit lost causes. You are a prime example of a student who has flourished under proper tutelage and the creation strong bonds between yourself and your peers. Now I implore you to use your final year at school to think on what it is you’d like to do with yourself in the future, and how you might best go about it. You have had many successes here—even if those successes were dotted with a few brow-raising complications.” She punctuated the statement with a brow-raise of her own, and Remus avoided her gaze guiltily. “But... I expect that you will have many more to come."

“Complications?”

“Successes.”

“... As a prefect.”

McGonagall nodded, a clever smirk on her face, and Remus let out another long sigh.

“Fine...”

“Excellent. As you may know, you will be required to arrive at school on August thirty-first in preparation for the other incoming students to arrive the following day, but apart from that, I hope you have a very happy summer, Remus.”

“Thank you professor,” he said, standing, “... you too.”

Remus left the office feeling conflicted. He didn't want to be a prefect, he wanted to be left in peace. Okay, so maybe the prefects weren't all of the things he'd said they were, but they certainly weren't made up of kids like him! Ugh, it was all so messed up.

By the time he'd made it back to House Lane, Remus had moved past the 'denial' stage and had gone straight to bargaining, attempting to look on the bright side, of which there were three main points:

1. His friends were going to have a heyday when they heard the news, but at least he wasn't going to be expelled.

2. As a prefect, he would be able to give them detention for said heyday.

3. He would at least have Lily. Having her by his side would be better than nothing, and with Snape finally out of the picture, perhaps they could even be prefect partners.

By happenstance, Remus ended up stumbling upon Lily first, as she was just getting out of her end-of-year prefect party. She'd been making her way up the lane toward the boys' dorm when they met up, and was wearing a pretty violet dress with matching ribbons in her hair.

“You look nice,” he said, and she beamed at him.

“Thank you! The dress is actually from James’ mum. She made it for me for Christmas—apparently there isn’t anything that woman can’t do.”

She gave a little twirl and he clapped for her, before shoving his hands into his pockets as they finished making their way back to the dorms.

“I met with McGonagall today," he confessed. Better to tell Lily first than anyone else. "She's decided on my punishment for hammering Barty."

"Oh no. What'd she say?"

"She's asked me to be a prefect."

Lily gasped; “She did?”

“Well, more like told me.”

“That’s brilliant! You’ll be so good at it!”

“You’re mental. She only wants me to do it so she can claim that I’ve been ‘reformed’. The shitty kid with a bad track record and facial scars is now top of the school—'imagine what the board’ll have to say'.”

Lily smacked his arm playfully, practically bouncing up and down on the pavement next to him. “Who cares what the school board will think—this is a big deal, Remus! It’s recognition for all your hard work.”

“Feels more like an unpaid job I don’t want.”

“But it is paid.”

Remus’ head shot up. “It is?”

“Just a small stipend,” Lily amended. “But still, it’s something. And you’ll get an extra period in your timetable to study for A-levels.”

“Oh sure, that is when I’m not busy with me ‘prefectly duties’.”

“Those aren’t all the time. If you're lucky they'll give you a permeant position somewhere, like the library! I did that my first year, and I got to study all I wanted during the down-time."

"Yippee..."

"Just think of the other benefits though—you can give Black a detention every time he pisses you off!”

He had thought of that, but it was funny to hear Lily try to sway him.

“In that case he'll have so many detentions, you’ll never see him again.”

Lily giggled. “I’m going to miss that free period actually. Did I tell you I switched some classes around?”

“Oh? Did you suddenly find an interest in music too?”

“No, law actually. To prepare for university.”

“I thought you wanted to do psychology in university," he said, clearly surprised.

Shyly, Lily began staring down at her shoes as they walked. “Hm, yes, well, I’ve been thinking about it for a long time now, and there are plenty of ways to help people within the field of psychology, but none that really call to me. For so long I thought being a lawyer was unrealistic, but now I feel as though it might be something that I could actually be good at. You know... helping others when the law won’t.”

Remus looked up at the great expanse of blue sky above them, and suddenly felt very thoughtful. “You’d make an amazing lawyer, Lils.”

“You think?”

“I know.” He glanced at her. “You win almost every argument.”

Lily took his arm affectionately. “Almost every argument. I know a few stubborn jerks who are hard to crack.” She pinched him, and he jumped but didn’t shake her off. Instead they kept walking, arm in arm.

“So what kind of law?” Remus asked, when they were almost back at Godric.

“Civil litigation I think. I’d like to defend labour workers and women —maybe even medical malpractice. Somewhere I can really make a difference for those who might otherwise get walked over.”

Remus gave an impressed whistle. “You and James just gonna take over his dad’s firm together then?”

“I don’t know about that. Let’s just get into university first.”

“Ah, but you gotta aim high, Evans. Sirius’ll need all the help he can get, springing himself from whatever lockup he ends up in.”

“You’re all hopeless,” Lily sighed happily, shaking her head. They’d made it back to his dorm, and were walking up the front path together when Remus spotted Jillian waiting by the front steps. She perked up immediately and waved at him, making Lily cock her head curiously, a cheeky look on her face.

“What’s going—”

“Don’t say a word,” Remus ground out, as Jillian raced up to them.

“Hi ya, Remus!” She smiled.

“Oh, h-hey Jillian...”

“I was hoping to catch you! Do you have a moment or are you… busy?”

Jillian looked pointedly at the way Lily was holding his arm, but Lily just dropped it innocently. “ ‘Course he has time!” She trilled. “I was just on my way in to see the lads. He’s all yours, Jill. I’ll see you inside, Remus.”

Remus watched as Lily shot him a pair of finger-guns before flouncing up the dorm’s front steps in her purple dress, utterly abandoning him to his fate.

“Maybe you should give corporate law some thought,” he called after her, “I’m sure with your icy heart it’d be a walk in the park!”

Lily only waved, while Jillian gave a little giggle. “You’re so funny, Remus. I get why Lily likes you.”

“Ah. Thanks...”

“Are the two of you… I mean, she’s still dating James Potter, right?”

“ ‘Course,” Remus frowned. “Why, has anyone said otherwise?”

“No, of course not! I just…” Jillian bit her lip over a smile. “Remus, I was wondering if you wanted to exchange phone numbers to, you know, keep in contact over the summer?”

Remus’ stomach tightened. No, no, please no.

“Ah, well—you see Jill, I—uhm... I don’t actually have… a… p-phone…”

“You don’t... have a phone?”

“We—Well I-I do, it’s just I… erm... took a vow of silence?”

“Wouldn’t that mean you’re not supposed to talk at all?” Jillian asked, blinking at him.

“It’s er—well, it doesn’t start until the summer, actually. Yeah, that's right—not a single word the moment we arrive home. All us guys are doing it, in fact. It's... a political thing—sociopolitical! You know—fight the power and all that...?”

“So what’s your stance? Starving kids in Africa or something? Poor factory workers' conditions?”

He felt bad for lying to the poor girl, but they only had one day of school left—there was no way that whatever this was, was going to persist throughout an entire summer, so he winced and gave another crappy excuse. “Sorry, it’s kind of a personal thing so... it’s hard to explain.”

“Oh, alright,” Jillian said kindly; “In that case, could I write to you instead—like a pen pal? Or does your vow of silence extend to letters, too?”

Remus forced a laugh. “Ha... ha... Don’t be silly," he said through his teeth, "of course you can write.”

“Brilliant. What’s your address?”

With no other excuses left in the vault, he gave it to her, regretting every choice that had led him to that point.

Ha! You're so weak.

Shut up.

Can't even say no to a girl. It's your funeral, mate.

With his address tightly fisted in her grip, Jillian finally left him on the dorm’s front steps, waving goodbye and hurrying up the lane as though she were afraid he would turn around and snatch it back again. Feeling like an utter idiot, he watched her go before dragging his feet the rest of the way inside, only to find that Lily had been watching them through the door’s window the entire time.

“You’re evil!” He wailed, as she burst into laughter in the dorm's foyer.

“But Remus, it was so cute!”

“It wasn’t cute, she’s bloody everywhere! I swear to god, yesterday she was waiting for me outside the toilet!”

Lily bent forward, howling and cradling her stomach. “Why haven’t you just told her you’re not interested then?"

“It’s not that easy!”

“Of course it is, you’re just a chicken!”

Groaning, Remus turned away and leaned his head against the public post board next to the phone lines. “She has my address now—what if she actually looks me up over the summer? Oh god, what if she shows up at my house?”

Finished with her laughter, Lily wiped the tears from her eyes and pat him on the shoulder. “She's only a girl, Remus. You may be popular, but you’ll have to work a bit harder than that if you want to claim you have your own stalker.”

“I’m not popular,” he grumbled, “James and Sirius are popular.”

Lily gave a great sigh. “Oh Remus, sometimes you can be so thick.”

* * *

Baby, I’m amazed at the way you love me all the time,
And maybe I’m afraid of the way I love you;
Maybe I’m amazed at the way you pulled me out of time,
You hung me on the line,
Maybe I’m amazed at the way I really need you…

- “Maybe I’m Amazed” Paul McCartney, 1970

Their last night at school was finally upon them, and being the loud, obnoxious seventeen year-old’s they were, they’d tried pushing for an end of the year party, but Kenny was adamant. After an entire keg of mulberry wine had split over the common room rug on James’ birthday, the dorm monitor had sworn off all partying for the rest of the school year.

“He’s such a nark,” Sirius complained, hauling his packed trunk toward the door in preparation for their early departure the next morning. “The carpet was already red, it barely stained!”

“What about the clogged toilets on the first and second floor?” Lily asked from James’ bed.

"And the mattresses that ended up on the front lawn?" Remus pushed.

“And the curtains those eighth years set on fire!” Peter added.

“It was just the trim,” Sirius scoffed, ignoring the rest of them, “and they were god-ugly anyway. Glad someone finally did it.”

“Well,” James started, from his place next to the record player, the only thing Sirius had yet to pack up, “you’ll be glad to know that I don’t have anything against a bit of split wine—or arson.”

A gasp went up around the room.

“Does that mean you got it, Prongs?” Remus asked, still busy peeling his Queen posters down off the wall. To answer him, James turned around, rubbing his hands together.

“That’s right, lads—and lady—you’re looking at the next Godric dorm monitor. McGonagall sent the notice over this morning.”

“Fuck yeah!” Sirius cried, ditching his trunks to smack his hand against James’ in congratulations.

"The Headmistress is definitely going to regret that one!" Peter snorted.

“That's not all, Remus got prefect too,” Lily added, because she absolutely couldn’t help it.

All three of his friends turned their wide eyes on him, and Remus groaned inwardly.

“Moony, you didn’t!” James exclaimed.

“It’s my punishment for laying out Barty,” he said quickly. “It was either that or she’d probably have had me expelled.”

“This is so great!” Sirius proclaimed. “A dorm monitor and a prefect under one roof—who's gonna stop us now?"

"Maybe I will," Remus said smugly, "if you continue to annoy me, that is."

"Ha."

The bedroom door opened and Mary stuck her head in. "We come bearing gifts!" She sang, before opening the door and revealing the several bottles of booze she'd hidden under her shirt on the way up. Marlene and Lottie came after, all of them wearing big smiles and casual clothes instead of their usual uniforms. They quickly made themselves comfortable, falling across the boys' beds as Sirius and James popped the top of every bottle they'd managed to sneak in.

"Dorm monitors say no parties, so fine," Mary declared, "we'll just have our own."

While Sirius set an album on the turntable, Remus quickly finished putting his posters away and shut his trunk before accepting his first drink of the evening from Lottie. After pushing the beds aside, they made a large circle on the floor and fit in together, each of them simply content to spend their final night in each other's presence. James had laid back on the rug with his head in Lily's lap and she began curling her fingers through his dark hair while Sirius sat next to them, Andy's guitar propped up on one knee. Remus found himself tucked in between him and Lottie, who'd begun to draw on his arm in pen. He let her, slightly bemused by the skull and crossbones she'd already doodled on the inside of his forearm. It was almost sad to see their room looking so barren, but with eight bodies filling it up it didn't feel nearly so empty.

Eventually word of his and James' promotions came to light and afterwards Marlene announced that she had news of her own. Apparently her summer plans included spending the entire month of August away in Morocco, where she'd be volunteering with a non-profit charity organisation to feed homeless women and children. This came to a great surprise to all of them, most of all Mary, who'd been banking on having Marlene come stay with her in Paris so she could avoid her family.

"I told you about it," Marlene reasoned.

"Yes, but you never said you were actually gonna apply!" She whined.

“Well, I didn’t think I would be accepted either. You should’ve heard how long it took to convince Mum and Dad to let me go.”

“Why Morocco?” Remus asked.

Marlene grinned, the excitement clear on her face. “Mr. Durrin has a friend who teaches English there and he connected me with a recruiter in London.”

“So they speak English?” Lottie interjected.

“Some do, but it’s mostly Arabic and French.”

“That’s insane,” Sirius said. “You’re gonna fly there—on a real plane?”

“Yeah, but I’ll still be around for a while. We don't leave until mid-July.” She looked at Mary, who had puckered and turned away, picking at the rug. “Don’t be like that, Mary. I thought you’d be happy for me.”

“You didn’t even mention it…” Mary pouted. “You don’t even speak French!”

Reaching over, Marlene took her hand. “Guess you have the next four weeks to teach me, then.”

Mary glanced down at their interlaced fingers, and sighed before squeezing back tightly and leaning her head on Marlene’s shoulder sadly. Remus knew exactly how it felt, anticipating how much she would miss her best friend after her departure.

“Now I suppose our summer plans pale in comparison, huh, Pete?” James said, nudging Peter with his foot.

“I believe you’re coming to visit me this summer,” Lily said, pulling her fingers out of James’ hair.

“Oh—not that! I just meant the summer house in Devon. I told you we were going there after I visited you, yeah?”

Lily smirked and bent down to kiss him on the forehead. “Yes, you did.”

“Jesus—get a room!” Lottie teased, finishing up several swirling lines on the inside of Remus’ wrist. He watched her, lifting a mug of whisky to his lips before glancing to his left and catching Sirius’ eye.

“You want one?” He smirked. “I warn you though, my tattoo artist is in very high demand right now.”

Lottie giggled but Sirius only gave a quiet smile. He had a drink in one hand and was quietly fiddling the guitar's tuning keys with the other. “What are your plans for the holiday then?”

“Got none,” Remus answered. “Unless you count avoiding my dad. I figure it’ll just be me, Giles, and the dogs mostly.”

“And us!” James chirped. “Nice try, but you’re not getting away this summer, Lupin. Mum says you can still come to Devon too—there's plenty of room!”

“Okay, Prongs,” Remus smiled, before looking back at Sirius. “I promise to write, though," he told him.

“Oh really?” Sirius casually sipped his own drink. “Songs or letters?”

“Dunno yet. Maybe both if you’re lucky.”

Sirius chuckled, before tucking his pick between his teeth and looking down again, strumming lightly on the guitar’s strings. He was wearing both nail polish and eyeliner today, probably because he knew he wasn’t going to have either while at home. The thought suddenly struck Remus, and he felt bad all over again. He'd tried more than once to bring up the odd things Regulus had been ranting about outside the dining hall, but ever since that day in the music room, Sirius had been dismissing any and all mention of his mother. Remus supposed it was because he didn't want to ruin the time he had left by discussing her, but it was still worth worrying.

“Sirius..." he started lowly, so only the two of them could hear over the stereo's music; "about that thing Reg said to me...?"

Instantly Sirius’ smile was gone. "I thought I told you not to worry about it."

"You did—twice. But if you could just tell me what Regulus meant, then maybe..."

"I told you already, I don't know what Reg was on about. He was probably just spewing shit because he was pissed off."

"No, no—it was before the prank. I think it was a warning. And after, that's when he was ready to make up with you."

"Yeah right. I think hell will freeze over first."

"Sirius."

"Remus."

Remus sighed. "Alright. But you're absolutely sure everything's gonna be fine?"

"No," Sirius snorted. "I'm going home—it's never fine. That's what makes it all so 'exciting'. Heh."

“You jackass—doesn’t that worry you at all?”

"Nope."

"Why not?"

With suddenly finality, Sirius clapped a hand over the strings, looking up at him. “ 'Cause Lupin... if I stopped to worry about every little threat my mum spat out, I’d never feel brave again.”

Remus' throat suddenly felt very tight. He held Sirius' cool gaze a moment longer, before finally breaking eye-contact and looking down at his lap. “Oh. I’m… sorry.”

“Don’t be. You worry too much, Moons. And you’re so much cuter when you’re smiling.” Reaching out, Sirius clapped him gently on the back before returning to the guitar. If he noticed the way Remus’ eyes were watering in embarrassment, he didn't say anything. Finally Remus let out a heavy breath; unable to look at Sirius anymore, and turned to Lottie.

“Lottie... why is there a cartoon dinosaur on my arm?”

Lottie beamed down at her handiwork. “Because it’s cute and you’re cute!” She bopped him on the nose with her finger, but in comparison to Sirius, his reaction was rather null.

Still tucked up between his friends, Remus focused on polishing off his drink—and then a second—until the turntable finally clicked off, giving him an excuse to leave the circle and change the album.

“Remus put on ‘Goodbye Yellow Brick Road’!” Mary called as he stood.

“No, that’s way too sappy,” James said, “go for ‘Moondance’ instead.”

“Try reading the room guys.” Sirius turned around and pointed to his bed. “Moony, I left ‘Electric Warrior’ right there.”

“The one who gets up off his sorry arse gets to pick the music,” Remus answered, before picking up A Day at the Races and showing it off. Sirius smirked, obviously satisfied, but Mary gave a moan.

“This is blatant favouritism.”

Setting the needle down, he joined the circle once more while the album’s long intro gave way to one of his favourite guitar riffs of all time.

‘Ooh, ooh yeah, ooooh yeah,
Get your party gown;
Get your pigtail down,
Get your heart beatin’ baby;
Got my timin’ right,
Got my act all tight;
It’s gonna be tonight, my little school babe!’

As Remus rejoined the circle, Sirius reached an arm out and looped it around his neck, drawing him so close he could smell the whisky on his breath. “Favouritism or no, you gotta admit, Moony has taste.”

"I wish there was actual room to dance," Lottie complained. "Potter when you're dorm monitor, I expect at least one party every week."

"You can't afford a party every week, what with the way you drink," Peter said.

"Ugh. Really, do you always have to be such a milksop, Petey?"

“I know what we can do! We should play a game!” Mary announced, before covering her mouth to hide a rather unladylike belch.

“Noooo,” Remus laughed immediately. "Please, not again. I can't play another silly truth or dare game."

“I don’t see why not,” Marlene teased, “after all, it is our last night together.”

"Yeah, c'mon Moons," James pushed. "Just one round."

“It doesn’t have to be truth or dare,” Lottie said comfortingly.

“Yes! It can be a drinking game,” Mary said. “I learned this fun one from Calvin and his friends last week—”

“Wait, I thought you broke up with him like a month ago,” Lily started.

“I did, we weren’t actually playing, he just told me about it over dinner.”

“You’re still having dinner with him?” Marlene frowned. "I thought you said—"

“Everyone just shut up so she can tell us about the damn game!” Sirius cried, flapping his arms and setting his guitar aside. “Go ahead, Dusty. The floor's all yours.”

Shooting Sirius a sharp scowl for the nickname, Mary cleared her throat and raised her cup. “The game’s called ‘Cheers Governor’, and it goes like this. We go around in a circle, counting from one to twenty-one—only, the numbers seven and fourteen are switched. Whoever messes up the order has to finish their drink.”

“That doesn’t sound too hard,” James said, sitting up from Lily’s lap.

“But that’s not all,” Mary grinned, “whoever says twenty-one gets to make up a rule.”

“What kind of rule?” Peter asked.

“Any kind—as long as it has to do with a number. Like, instead of saying the number five, you have to make an animal call instead.”

“Oh you mean like—” Sirius leaned into James, rolling his tongue and purring into his ear. James immediately collapsed into Lily’s side, shrieking and shivering as the rest of them exploded with laughter.

“Exactly!” Mary shouted in delight. “This is gonna be so much fun. Okay, everyone come forward so you’re in the circle and make sure you got enough for a shot in your cup!”

Obediently, they passed the liquor around, topping everyone up before Mary kicked the game off; “One.”

“Two!”

“Three.”

“Four.”

“Five!”

“Six.”

“Seven—oh shit, fourteen!”

“Ah, ah, Lily,” Mary grinned, “you ballsed it up, so bottoms up!”

Sighing, Lily took a deep swig of whisky. “Okay,” she coughed, as James refilled her glass; “Now what?”

“Now we start over. You say one.”

“One," she said.

“Two.”

“Three!”

On and on it went, until finally the round finished with Lottie, who clapped her hands together; “Twenty-one!”

“Now we cheers!” Mary announced. “Everyone say ‘cheers gov’na!’”

They all raised their glasses, knocking them together in the centre of their circle; “CHEERS GOV’NA!” before downing the shot of liquor and shaking off the puckered grimaces it came with.

“Lot, you gotta make up a rule now,” Mary said; passing a bottle of gin around for each of them to pour another shot. It was hard not to imagine the hangover they were all surely going to have on the train tomorrow.

Lottie thought for a moment; “Hmm... Alright! Whoever says the number sixteen has to… say a dirty word instead!”

“Yes! Okay, you heard her. Lottie start us off!”

They all got going again, Marlene almost tripping up over ‘fourteen’, and Peter impulsively wailing ‘CUNT!’ before clapping his hands over his mouth when the number sixteen reached him. They all laughed, James nearly in tears, but they managed it a second time without screwing up, and when Lily shouted out twenty-one they all cheersed again and drank once more. Remus could already feel the booze going to his head, but there was enough music and noise that he no longer felt worried about anything—except for perhaps how close Sirius had gotten after they’d all shuffled in to make a better circle. Now their knees were pressed together, and Sirius, unable to sit still as always, was drunkenly rocking back and forth between him and James, nearly leaning on them both.

“Number seventeen has to kiss the cheek of the person to their left!” Lily declared.

“But I’m sitting next to my sister!” Peter protested.

“It’s just my bloody cheek!” Lottie said. “If that’s so revolting then guess you’re drinking!”

It didn’t matter anyway. After James had screamed ‘BOLLOCKS’, Lily paid the price herself and leaned over to plant a loving smooch on Marlene’s cheek.

“I think we’re getting good at this,” Sirius said, “but how is it we always end with Lottie?”

“Who knows,” Lottie purred, “but now whoever lands on six has to switch shirts with the person across from them.”

“That’s ghastly,” Mary said. “I love it! Go ahead, Lot.”

"One!"

"Two!"

Remus thought this was all quite funny, until he did the math and realised two numbers early that Marlene was number six, and he was the one sitting directly across from her.

“Go on, Moony,” Sirius cackled, “it’ll look great on you!”

He looked Marlene up and down. She was wearing a rainbow-coloured t-shirt which she whipped off with zero hesitation, leaving herself only in a bra. It might've been the alcohol, but he'd never seen Marlene so bold.

“Oh shit—McKinnon!” Sirius gasped as Peter clapped his hands over his face to hide his eyes and a grin. Bursting out laughing, Lottie shoved him.

“My brother the gentleman!” She sneered.

“Little does he know we girls stroll topless through our dorm on the daily,” Mary bragged.

James whirled on Lily; “You do?!”

She smacked him; “Of course not!”

“Oh, just give me your shirt already, idiot!” Marlene shouted at Remus, throwing hers across the circle.

“Don’t yell at me with your shirt off!” Remus laughed, catching it.

“S’not like it’s anything you haven’t seen before! Now hand it over!”

The boys rallied; 'Oooooh! Moony's a slag!'

“Shut up!” He laughed, pushing Sirius as he pulled his t-shirt over his head and tossed it at her. To no one’s surprise, it turned out much too big on Marlene’s narrow frame, but Mary immediately grabbed the front of it, pulling the fabric to her nose.

“It smells good!”

“Remus always smells good,” Marlene said haughtily, lifting the collar to get a whiff for herself.

"Oh yeah, it's that two-in-one he uses," Sirius ragged, "makes him smell like spearmint toothpaste. Like a leprechaun's ball-sack, really."

"Okay, Farrah Fawcett," Remus said, rolling his eyes playfully as he tugged the tight girls t-shirt over his head. He wasn’t particularly broad in the chest or shoulders, so he got it on, though there wasn’t room for much else.

“I told you it would look good,” Sirius sniggered, leaning towards him. “Guess rainbow’s your colour.”

“Just keep counting,” Remus huffed, pushing Sirius away by the cheek.

“It’s Mary’s turn!” Sirius grunted.

“Seven!” Mary shouted, then; “Oh shit!”

The game went on and on and by the time it took the record to finish its first side, they’d all taken so many shots that it was clear they’d be hammered for the rest of the night. No one had their own shirt on by the end, and Remus was distinctly reminded of his sixteenth birthday as he watched Sirius squeeze into Mary’s cherry-red tube top. When it was James’ turn to kiss Lily’s cheek, he went in for a smooch and instead licked up the side of her entire face, making her shriek and push him off while they all howled with laughter.

They didn't get very many rounds in after that anyway, only able to drunkenly trip over the numbers. Peter ordered that you had to bark instead of saying the number twelve and James declared that everyone must strike a stupid pose in place of the number three, but it was Sirius' rule of switching directions every time one of them messed up really became the kicker. Then, just as it seemed like they were going to actually finish a round, James screamed 'FUCKFACE' in place of sixteen and Sirius turned to Remus, eyes alight as he grabbed his face and pulled him in for that kiss on the cheek. Only Remus was still laughing at James, and the eager grab surprised him so badly that he turned at the last moment and Sirius' lips hit him full on the mouth.

The instant their lips connected, it was like a bomb had gone off. Everyone screamed, even them, and Remus shot backwards, nearly toppling into Lottie's lap as he gaped at his friend.

Did that really just—

Yup.

Fuck!

I think you mean, fuck YEAH!?

As Remus was busy coming apart at the seams to the sound of his own internal monologue, Mary stomped her feet on the ground and squealed in delight; "Oh my god! OH MY GOD!"

"You kissed him!" Marlene shrieked after her.

Sirius laughed too while rubbing his lower lip which he had banged sharply on Remus' upper tooth. "Damn, Moony, if you wanted a real smooch you could've just asked."

Did he really just say THAT?!

"F-Fuck off!" Remus gasped. "It was your fault!"

"Nuh-uh! You turned!"

"You grabbed me!"

"It was part of the game, you numpty!"

Remus came up short again and held a hand to his mouth, as though he could still feel Sirius' lips there.

“Remus, your number!” Lily laughed suddenly, making him scramble.

“Er—nine—twelve? Shit!”

“Nooooo!” Everyone moaned in laughter, and Lottie forced his drink back into his hands for his failure. Remus took it and downed the shot without hesitation. He could hardly believe it—Sirius’ mouth had been on his mouth. Sirius’ Black’s mouth had actually been on his mouth. Remus didn’t know if he wanted to laugh, cry, or throw up. Maybe all three at once.

“One more round?” James asked, but Mary shook her head, turning the last empty bottle upside down.

“No more booze,” she said sadly.

“Ah, party’s not over yet though. Let’s have a song, shall we?” Hopping up from his place in the circle, Sirius crossed back to the turntable, flipping the record and resetting the needle. Remus watched his back, muscles standing out against the tight tube-top, and was struck by the sudden urge to reach out and wring his perfect neck.

You're really going to kiss me and pretend it didn't happen?! You bastard—why I oughta...

"Can I get a drumroll please?" Sirius called, Immediately everyone but Remus was drumming on their thighs or the floor, and when the noise reached its peak, he finally dropped the needle. A second later the stereo kicked on;

‘Caaaaaan anybodyyyyy!
Find meeeeeee!
Somebody toooooo—’

On ‘love’, Sirius turned around and pointed directly at him, and Remus felt his stomach not only flip, but start an entire circus in his gut. Marlene and Lottie continued to clapped, all of them oblivious to the world-ending event happening to him right in front of them.

“Oh, get a look at this shameless tosser!” Mary cried, but Sirius was not to be stopped. He danced toward them, not only mouthing the words but singing along, swaying drunkenly but somehow still so enrapturing that Remus couldn’t have looked away even if he wanted to. It was embarrassing—it was mortifying—it was positively entrapturing.

“Ooh, each morning I get up I die a little,
Can barely stand on my feet!
Take a look in the mirror and cry,
Lord, what you’re doing to me!
I have spent all my years in believing you,
But I just can’t get no relief, Lord!
Somebody—”

Sirius pointed at the girls, who each screamed a ‘somebody’ back at him.

“Ooh somebody—!”

“SOMEBODY!”

“Can anybody find meeee—

Somebody to loveee…”

Jumping forward, Sirius grabbed James’ forearms with his own, and suddenly they were belting the entire song out to one another.

“I work hard!”

“He works hard!”

“—Every day of my life,
I work ‘til I ache in my bones!
At the end—”

“At the end of the day!”

“I take home my hard earned pay, all on my own!
I get down on my knees,
And I start to pray—”

“Praise the lord!”

“ ‘Til the tears run down from my eyes—
LORD—somebody!”

“SOMEBODY!”

“Oooh, somebody!”

“PLEASE!”

"Can anybody find meee—
Somebody to LOOOOOOOOOVE?”

It was heaven and hell watching them. Everyone stood, and Marlene took Remus’ arm, pulling him up with them. They danced around in their circle, screaming and belting the words. No one was really singing anymore, but the sound was beautiful enough anyway. On each ‘YEAH!’, his friends thrust their fists into the air and Remus did too. He was delighted, but his eyes never left Sirius. How could they? He loved him. He was sure as the guitar solo that was echoing in his ears, that he loved him.

"Got no feel, I got no rhythm—
I just keep losing my beat!
I’m okay, I’m alright—”

“He’s alright!”

“I ain’t gonna face no defeat!”

Sirius spun around, so close Remus could’ve touched him if he just reached out. But as if he could hear his thoughts, Sirius touched him instead. With an iron grip he grabbed his arm, pulling him in close and wailing the lyrics;

“I just gotta get out of this prison cell,
Someday I’m gonna be free, LORD!”

Sirius held on. They began to chant;

“Find me somebody to love—
Find me somebody to love—
Find me somebody to love—!”

Remus grabbed hold of his other arm. They began to stomp;

“Find me somebody to love—!
Find me somebody to love, love, love—!
Find me somebody to love—!
FIND ME SOMEBODY TO LOVE!”

They were friends. And still Remus was in love.

“Somebody—SOMEBODY!

Somebody—SOMEBODY!
Somebody, find me somebody—
Find me somebody to love!
CAN ANYBODY FIND ME—”

And this was it. Sirius looked at him like he never had before. Smiling as he always was, but somehow different.

“SOMEBODY TOOOOOOO—LOOOOOOVE…!”

The cymbals crashed, the tempo dropped, and each of them sagged with the effort of their singing. The girls swayed, Lottie hugged her brother close, James lifted Lily in the air, and as though he knew exactly how badly Remus wanted to touch him, Sirius fell forward onto him, hugging their chests together as the song’s crescendo flooded the room around them.

Sirius was so warm, so hot. He could the heat of him through his shirt like a scalding iron—feel that Sirius Black heartbeat in his own chest. Remus wanted to drown in it—drown the feeling of him. But then Sirius pulled away, breathing hard and looking just as tipsy as the rest of them. Remus didn't have time to get a word in—Sirius was already turning to James.

No, no—more, please more! Somebody!

“That was bloody amazing,” James panted, Lily still wrapped happily in his arms.

“That was rock and roll, mate,” Sirius answered, "now imagine doing it for the rest of your life.”

Chuckling, James released his girlfriend long enough to come forward and give Sirius a firm clap on the back. As he did, Marlene appeared at Remus’ elbow, smiling and flushed like the rest of them.

“Are you okay, Remus?” She asked, pushing her hair back from her face. “Your cheeks are really red. Are you burning up or something?”

She began to reach for him and he dodged her hand, shaking his head quickly. “Nah, jus’ drunk. M'gonna go use the toilet.”

She nodded and he slipped past her, suddenly desperate to put as much space between himself and Sirius before he could do something they’d both regret. Kicking the bathroom door shut behind him,

Remus bent over the sink and turned on the taps, gathering a handful of cool water and splashing it up onto his face and neck. The rushing water helped drown out some of his friends' frantic noise, but the music still cut through loud and clear behind him. His skin was radiating heat—Sirius' heat—but he'd only just noticed how hot it'd gotten in their bedroom. And it wasn't just the dancing.

"Oh goddammit—fuck offffff," he moaned to himself, clutching the sides of the porcelain sink with his head hung low. "Just stop it, you idiot. Stop. He's not—he's just your friend, he can't be—"

"Moony?"

"BLOODY FUCK—!" Remus shot upright and to find Sirius' reflection staring back at him in the mirror. "God!" He hissed, turning around as his heart shot into his throat.

Did he hear me? Please just kill me if he heard me.

"Sirius," he breathed, "you shared the shit out of me. What do you—"

Sirius surged forward, grappling him by the neck and suddenly—just like that—they were kissing.

It was as though Remus' brain had reset. He was absolutely frozen, back pinned to the sink while he scrambled for what to do next, but then Sirius opened his mouth and there came his tongue, wet and hot and wonderful.

Remus couldn't take it.

Grabbing him back, he cupped his hands around Sirius' neck like it was the only thing he knew how to do, squeezing tight until Sirius sent breathy gasp hurdling into his mouth. It was clumsy and probably hurt but Sirius never stopped him. In their urgency they fell backwards into the bathroom door and Remus distantly heard the wood groan under their weight. It didn't matter, the music outside was far louder than any of their noise, and even if someone had noticed Remus doubted he could stop now. They were too busy scrambling, desperate for any taste of each other that could be had. Sirius' hands were in his hair and Remus could feel the faint teenage stubble along his jaw. His skin was on fire but nothing about it was uncomfortable.

Yes! Don't stop. Please don't stop!

His entire body hummed as their lips slipped against each other's, desperate and hungry. For a moment Remus thought he heard the other boy say his name, but then Sirius' knee came up against the inside of his thigh and brushed against him. Instantly Remus dropped an arm to take hold of Sirius' leg, pinning him against the door until he could feel the beginnings of what could've been an erection through his trousers. Sirius gasped again and Remus took the chance to slide his tongue deeper, tasting the sour alcohol on his breath. In an intoxicated rush Sirius wrapped his arms around his neck, cradling his head and locking them together as Remus stroked his thumbs across his jaw. Then Sirius moaned around his tongue and he was finished.

Yes—yes, yes, yes, yes!

He might've never bothered to come up for air had Sirius not broken away from him, still pinned up against the door. He looked down, eyeing the guitar pick Remus had given him with the chain he'd given in return. If Remus were thinking straight he might've felt embarrassed by the fact that he was still wearing Marlene's rainbow t-shirt, but Sirius was in a tube top anyway and they'd both just done something they couldn't take back.

"Shit," Sirius said, almost breathless, "wonder where that came from, huh?"

Or maybe they could.

"You…" Remus trailed off, losing his grip on Sirius' leg.

"Yeah…" Sirius breathed, lips swollen and red. They looked so good that, for the first time since the night started, Remus began to feel afraid again. Afraid of what it meant for them as friends, but also what it meant for just him. What it made him.

"Sirius, I-I don't—" he stuttered; "I-I mean, that I'm not a—"

"S'fine, me neither," Sirius murmured just as fast, shifting quickly and making Remus jump away from him. Sirius kept his eyes trained on the ground. "Not really, like it's just—uhm… Sorry, m'just pissed. Utterly gassed actually. Just... forget about it… please?"

"Yeah sure," Remus promised, crumbling at the pain in Sirius' voice. "We're both drunk, so... no worries..."

"Still best mates?"

"Huh? Oh... yeah, course!"

Sirius gave him a sad smile. “Cool."

Fuck.

"Cool..."

"Okay, so I’m just gonna—well…” Jutting his thumb out behind him, Sirius turned away and slipped out of the bathroom like a shadow.

“Moony okay?” He heard James ask as the door fell closed.

“Sure—fine, totally,” Sirius answered. “Bastard’s—erm... He's just bent over the toilet. Nasty mess. Wouldn't go in if I were you.”

“That doesn’t sound fine,” Lily said, then a knock came from the other side of the door, making Remus flinch; “Remus, are you okay?”

“I told you he’s fine, Evans!”

"Remus? Do you need me to come in?"

“No!" He croaked; “Sirius' right, m’fine. Don't need any help, just—just stay where you are. I'll... be out in a sec.”

“Alright. I'll be waiting for you though,” Lily said kindly, and then the music got even louder. "Ooh, Black—really? Turn it down before you wake up the whole bloody dorm!"

Almost wincing at the noise, Remus leaned back against the sink to really take in the dull throbbing that'd become present in his chest. His mind was a mess, his thoughts whizzing by like flashing neon lights. Sirius playing the guitar, Sirius singing Queen, Sirius dancing around the room. Then the bathroom, where he'd kissed Sirius—or actually, where Sirius had kissed him.

Oh god, that mouth, those lips, that TONGUE?!

That kiss was all he'd been wanting for months, so why did everything suddenly feel so horrible? Perhaps it was because Sirius was actually drunk, and he hadn't really meant to kiss him—Remus was just the first person he saw. But then why not choose one of the girls? Why not Mary or Lottie or anybody else? Maybe it was supposed to be joke, but the punchline just hadn't stuck. Maybe it was all just a stupid, drunken mistake... Maybe Sirius hadn't meant for it at all.

Wow, a voice said, that sucks.

Lashing out, Remus kicked the bathroom door hard and slammed his toe against the wood. Immediately pain laced up his leg, and he had to swallow a moan that was more frustration than anything. Tilting his head back and burying his palms in his eye sockets, he began to focus on the sound of his own heart beat in his ears. He wanted Sirius to come back—to kiss him again and never stop. But they were friends, and they were all just about to leave for the summer, and he was afraid. And Sirius, he... he'd told him to forget about it.

In the grand scheme of things, Remus Lupin didn't know much, but if there was one thing he understood for sure—it was that he was never going to be able to forget kissing Sirius Black.

* * *

Remus didn't remember much of what happened after the kiss. He'd doused himself in water a few more times to cool off, but how he'd kept his face clear of all emotions when he finally emerged, he didn't know. He'd gone along with the 'getting sick over the toilet' story, so his friends had probably just chalked his grim mood up to the sudden onset of nausea, but it probably helped that they were all severely knackered themselves. Miraculously, Remus did manage to sleep some, but he couldn't remember getting into bed—or stacking his trunks by the door for that matter, either. But when James' alarm went off and they all rolled out of bed, moaning, Remus recalled enough to not look Sirius in the eye.

On the train, all of them mirrored the same despairing chant—Thank heavens for Lily Evans. She'd been the only one among them sensible enough to pack water for the ride home, and though Remus felt too sick to even entertain the idea, she had also made up a hearty supply of sandwiches as well. Having quickly realised how sweltering it was in a train car with seven other hungover teens, Peter opted to ride with Moira and her friends. And then somewhere between Edinburgh and Berwick-upon-Tweed, Mary and Lottie had also disappeared from the compartment. That left just five of them crammed in together as the train jostled along, which Remus was grateful for. The heat was terrible, even with the window open, and Marlene had taken to fanning herself with one of Mary's fashion magazines while chattering with Lily about her plans for Morocco. James dozed steadily with his head on Lily's knee and his legs draped over Sirius' lap. Perhaps the illest out of all of them—he never could quite hold his liquor—James had already fled to the toilet three times, and was still looking a bit green in the face, but at least he was able to sleep some of it off.

Remus was not so lucky.

He'd hoped to get a seat on the bench beside from Sirius, rather than across, so at least that way he wouldn't have to avoid looking at him, but the moment they'd boarded Sirius had grappled onto James and Lily and that had set the seating arrangements for the duration. Now, with four hours down and still several more left to go, Remus was running out of things to keep himself preoccupied. Reading was a bust—his head hurt just looking at the page—and in his tiredness he couldn't keep up with the girls' conversation enough for it to be of any help. He'd managed to choke down some tea from the trolly cart, but that provided little distraction and staring at the window just made him woozy. Finally he'd settled on just pretending to sleep. The jostle of the train hid his movements every time he needed to readjust, and at least this way he could quietly spy on Sirius through the squinting cracks of his eyelids without him actually realising that he was staring.

Sitting across from him, Sirius had propped Andy's acoustic up on James' legs and was gently plucking the strings. He'd been keeping them muted with his palm so there'd be no noise, which almost felt disappointing. Even when they were at their most furious with each other, Remus always liked listening to Sirius play. But he didn't dare tell him that—didn't dare tell him a lot of things. After nearly four hours plus breakfast and the bus ride to the station (for which Remus sat with Marlene and Sirius sat with Lottie), they'd still barely made eye contact. It was obvious that neither of them were about to bring up what had happened in the toilet the day before. It made Remus wonder if it might be different had they been in the compartment alone and not surrounded by their closest friends.

"I still can't believe you're going to be in Africa for six weeks," he heard Lily say.

"Me neither, actually. I've never even been on a plane before. Mary said they aren't that bad—but it's just a tin box flying through the air. With my luck we'll go down before we're even flying over Madrid."

"Oh my—Don't say that! … Blimey. So are you all fit to go then?"

"Almost. I go for my vaccinations right when we get back. Then it's just a bit of immigration paperwork and voila—Morocco, here I come."

The girls kept chatting, but Remus tuned them out. What did he really have planned for the summer? James and Peter had invited him to tag along with them to their families' summer homes in Deven, but that wasn't until the end of July, and honestly, hanging out with his friends' parents didn't sound like his idea of a good time. He usually would've gone straight to Tomny's, but that plan was dead in the water. So it appeared that his summer was shaping up to look like a whole lot of nothing. It was depressing until Remus reminded himself that his version of nothing was still better than Sirius'. Once they reached Kings Cross, James would take Andy's guitar with him for safekeeping, and Sirius would continue on to Bath, where all he had was a big house filled with people who made no secret of hating each other. There would be no music, no laughter, for two and a half long months. And that was truly nothing.

Thinking about it, and watching Sirius soundlessly strum through his eyelashes, Remus thought back to the Christmas prior, when he and Sirius had parted on less than promising terms. He'd had a great holiday, but Sirius had felt so trapped he hurt himself just trying to get away, and that had only taken three weeks.

What are you thinking inside that big fat, genius brain of yours? Remus wondered. Are you just putting on a brave face for the rest of us? Why don't you just follow James or Peter home? Why keep going back—is she really so scary?

And why did you bloody kiss me?

Remus wasn't sure Sirius had those answers, but if he could take his mind off of it for even just a little while, then he wanted to try.

It took until they'd left Newcastle for him to work up the nerve to reach out and nudge Sirius with his foot. Sirius looked up immediately, still looking tired and rough after a night of boozing. He didn't smile or anything, but at least he wasn't ignoring him entirely.

"Thought you were sleeping."

“I was. Or—I was trying to," Remus said. When he spoke he sounded as though he had a frog in his throat, but a quick cough settled it well enough. "You never told me what your summer plans were."

Sirius had the gall to crack a lazy smile. “I didn’t? Hm, that’s right. Actually I was thinking Bulgaria. The people there are supposed to be very strong—even the women. I’ve always fancied me a wife that could throw me over her shoulder like it was nothing. Imagine the possibilities in the bedroom. Plus I hear they've got great yogurt."

"You can't ever take anything seriously, can you?"

"Nope."

Remus sighed and looked down to his hands, only to feel Sirius nudge him back.

"Hey, don't you worry about me," he told him, "it's just a few weeks. Then we start our musical take-over with you as Mr. Perfect-Prefect and principal song-writer of Marauders."

"That's quite the upgrade from someone who was just collecting royalties."

Sirius smiled, and then turned his gaze to the window.

"Yeah well, I like you, so…"

Remus felt his breath hitch.

Sometimes Sirius could be so cruel.

Chapter End Notes

The song Remus puts on is "Tie Your Mother Down", the first track off of Queen's 'A Day at the Races' album. Sirius promptly follows it up with "Somebody to Love", which is the first track off of the album's b-side.

HAPPY CHRISTMAS!!!! And if you don't celebrate, then warm and cozy wishes from me to you <3

I really hope this felt worth the wait. Only took >350 thousand words—LOL
The pinning is far from over (I mean, obviously. Have you met Remus Lupin???) this is truly just the beginning.

This chapter marks the end of my holiday posting schedule, as I (again—OBVIOUSLY) wanted to release this chapter on Christmas for a reason ;)))) No news yet when next chapter will be out (it'll be our first summer chapter of 1977, and there are a handful this time!), but hopefully before the New Year! Depends on how many assignments I can grind out before then, lol.

As always, feel free to leave me your thoughts or reach out on other social medias, and yes, feel free to spam bc ily <3

Chapter 65: Summer's Start, 1977

Chapter Summary

For Remus, this summer is completely unlike the last. He doesn't know what he's doing, he even fumbles his other relationships, but maybe it's not all bad.

Chapter Notes

CW: 'F' slur in smoking context. Violence, though nothing explicit.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The tax man's taken all my dough,
And left me in my stately home,
Lazing on a sunny afternoon;
And I can't sail my yacht,
He's taken everything I got,
All I've got's this sunny afternoon…

- "Sunny Afternoon" The Kinks, 1966

Dear Padfoot,

I hope your summer's going well so far—or as well as it could be in boring old Bath. You'll be pleased to know that I finally accepted I went out with Wormtail and Prongs the other day. We went to Piccadilly Circus. It was sorta It was fun. I haven't been in years. They mostly shopped for the girls, but we found this great new music store too. They had this guitar on the wall—a '69 Strat that the sales guy said had once belonged to David Gilmour. Sounded like a load of crap to me but it is London so I guess you never know.

I'm sure he's already told you, but Prongs' dad picked up this crazy steel-string acoustic for him from a jumble sale. It's an old model, but apparently he kept going on about how "all real musicians have to start rough". You'd have probably ate it up. Anyway, so now Prongs refuses to change the strings on account of this ' bluesy twang' it's got. Don't tell him I said this, but it really just sounds like someone took a hammer to it. He did bring the thing to Regent's Park when I saw him last though, and I gotta admit that it does look half-way decent. Has Prongs told you what he's started doing with his hair? He's using moose now. (Moouse? Mousse?—

Not the dessert, but the weird hair stuff that girls use.) Lily told him that it makes him look a bit like James Dean. Of course he loved it. You should watch out, otherwise he might just rob you of your title of handsomest maraud Wormtail's been trying to persuade his parents to get him his own kit for his birthday. He says they're being stingy—you know, the noise and all—but Prongs said the Simeon's all for it. And Sim's pretty convincing. With his foot in the ring they might just go for it! How great would that be, hey? Though I doubt Wormtail could get it to school. Try sending a bass drum through the Scottish post. As if.

I still hate this letter-writing nonsense by the way, but I'll do it for you it's not all that bad I guess. I've also been going through the stuff of yours I brought back with me. I was looking for "Sticky Fingers" but I think Wormtail's got it. I'll have to trade him for it next time.

You've been pretty quiet Prongs says you've been quiet, which is strange because we both know you can't resist yammering our ears off even when we're guaranteed a ten week break from you. You don't have to post me back, but at least write him. He misses you.

Moony.

* * *

Dear Padfoot,

Went to the cinema with Marlene yesterday. You'll never guess who was the lead—Bowie ! Toff was playing some alien too, just like in those songs of his. The movie was decent—stupid long (I sorta fell asleep in the middle) but I'll bet you'd have liked it, Marlene did. She's really taking this whole 'sci-fi' thing to heart. I never knew she was so into it. Also apparently there's this big film that came out in America this year called 'Star Wars' . Dumb name, I know. It's not even out over here yet, but she's over the moon for it. (Thought you'd appreciate the pun.)

I took the car out with Giles for the first time the other day. And yes, you sarcastic ass, it went just fine. Giles might not agree, but he ain't writing the letter.

Are you doing alright? Prongs is getting really worried that you haven't responded to any of our letters. Lily phoned me yesterday and even she's nervous. Are you getting them? If you are, write us back before they start looking for your obituary in the papers. Though that sounds just like the sort of stupid dramatics you'd love anyway.

Moony.

* * *

Dear Padfoot,

I feel like I'm writing to empty air here. This whole bloody letter business was your idea in the first place. Did the ancient and most noble House of Black suddenly pick up and move? Or did you just forget to pay the postboy?

My dad's been home a lot lately, which sucks because I have too. You already know why. Even worse though, he wants to talk. Lots of crap about 'the future' and what university I'm going to go to after we finish upper sixth. I think he's about this close to applying in my place. I haven't mentioned the prefect stuff and before you ask, no, I haven't said anything about the band either. I like fighting but not that much. Let him think I'll do what he wants while we figure out what we want, hey? We got a year to do it. Feels like enough time.

I know you can read my handwriting, so write us back.

Moony.

* * *

Dear Padfoot,

I think my dad might be seeing someone. I snuck a peek at his organiser the other day and it was full of things like 'dinner with S' and 'meeting with S'. I suppose this 'S' could just be some random colleague like a 'Stephen' or a 'Sean'—but since when do you meet your colleagues for dinner at Le Gavroche? It's fucking weird. I mean like, MY dad? On a DATE? I sorta thought he'd lost all feeling below the waist years ago and that's why he never bothered—fuck, now I'm thinking about it. Eugh.

If it is a woman, then she must be blind. Or deaf. Or just plain stupid. Who could possibly find him interesting? All he talks about is work and the dogs, and neither of them in a fond sort of way. What about your dad? What does his mistress find appealing about him? I mean, besides the size of his wallet. (That was a joke.)

I had this dream the other day that you jumped out another window I was reading this book about a guy who fell out of a window and died. He didn't die right away, instead he had to lie in a hospital bed for three days, ruminating on his life while he bled out internally. Felt like such a shit way to go. I mean, if you're gonna jump out a window and die then you might as well die quickly. Though, I don't think he really meant to die in the first place. He just leaned a bit too far. I don't know why I'm telling you all this. It wasn't a very good book. Maybe just don't try jumping out any more windows, okay?

I know things are a bit weird right now, but it'd be really great if you could post Prongs or Wormtail back. They still worry. Though they'd probably do that anyway.

Moony.

* * *

Dear Shit-toes,

This is getting a bit old. Are you actually ignoring us on purpose? If you are, then that's a real shit thing to do. Everyone's worried! Prongs said that you've gone radio-silent before just to be an ass, but this is a new low. You're not my own personal diary, you know. I've got better things to do than sit and recite my day on paper to keep you entertained. You think I wait around all day just wondering when I'll get a scrap of news from the Great Sirius Black? Not bloody likely. No, you've really pissed me off. How hard is it to write a letter? Anything—just 'hey, I'm alive. Still a complete tosser though!'

You probably think it's hilarious—letting everyone panic. But that's not how life works, Padfoot. We're not all just going to pine after you forever like a field of love-sick daisies.

Are you trying to punish me? Cause you're the one who kissed m

Write us back.

* * *

Padfoot,

I'm sorry, alright? For that last letter and everything. It was a bad day and I let my dad get to me. But if all of this is about what happened that night in the bathroom then you can just forget about it—really! I already have, and I swear I won't tell anyone. Not James or Peter or Lily. We can keep it a secret. No one has to know. We were just being drunk idiots anyway, and we're best friends, and best friends do stupid shit with each other all the time. I'll bet you've kissed Prongs loads of So you don't have to worry about anything, I swear. I'm still the same Moony, and you're Padfoot.

Just write us back, mate. Please.

Moony.

* * *

Sirius,

It's been too long. The others are freaking out. I am too.

Where are you?

* * *

21st July 1977

"Break—the break! USE YOUR BREAK!"

Remus let out a bark of laughter as he slammed on the Roll's brake pedal, the car lurching to a halt just ahead of the estate's driveway. Still clinging to the door handle for dear life, Giles tugged the cap from his head and used it to dab the sweat from his receding hairline. They'd been driving up and down the back roads around the estate for nearly a month now, and Remus was quite pleased with his progress, even if Giles was more cynical.

"You are going to be the death of me," he cursed.

"C'mon Gil, it wasn't that even bad!" Remus said, throwing the car into park.

“Oh really? Try telling that to that lead foot of yours. I think you all but murdered that bush of rhododendrons back there.”

“Eh, they’ll grow back.”

“But the paint on the Rolls won’t!”

Grinning, Remus drummed his fingers on the steering wheel. “Whadda'ya say—one more whip around?”

Giles shook his head, unbuckling himself from the seat. “Sorry lad, I've got to get the car cleaned up to take your father to his next meeting."

"You mean his next date."

"Don't be a snot."

"Why won't you tell me where he's been going? Who's 'S'? I saw it written down in his calendar for tonight. 'Dinner with 'S'—seven o'clock'."

"Dammit, Remus—I thought I told you to stop going into his office? Your father's books aren't for you to stick your smarmy nose in."

Remus shrugged, unbothered. "I wasn't trying to stick my nose into anything—I was looking for his whisky. He always keeps some in the bottom drawer, and the bar cabinet was looking a bit dry."

Giles reached over and swatted him upside the head.

“Ow! What was that for, ya old fart?! You can't just hit me anymore, I'm not a kid!"

"Having to say that you aren't a kid just proves that you are, you little fart. Now c’mon, turn us around and let’s get this thing parked. Tomorrow I’ll take you out in one of the other cars, teach you on a manual."

“I’d rather drive to China,” Remus grumbled, sliding the gear shift out of park.

Giles chuckled; “This sort ‘a steel don’t float, son. And besides, a man’s got to be able to drive a manual else he can't call himself a real man.”

"I thought I was just a 'kid'."

"Yes, one that's too smart for his own good. Now let's get going."

After he'd crept the car back up the estate's drive, Remus shut the engine off, handed Giles the keys, and got out. The air around him smelt of clean breeze and freshly mown grass and the warm July sun immediately began to beat down on the back of his neck as it got ready to set over the horizon. It was like any other summer afternoon, except that Remus was angry. He didn't want to be there, and yet he couldn't find the right excuse to leave. The driving lessons were only a short reprieve from his every day, which were spent doing pointless things like marching up and down the lawn with Dusty, or reading books that he immediately forgot the moment he shut them, or listening to the same albums over and over and over again. He'd left the house enough times, mostly to go to the record shop and brush up on all the music he'd missed over the last school year. As a result he'd accumulated quite the collection for himself, but without Sirius to write to, or the flat as an escape, he had no one to share them with. Of course there was Marlene, though she'd left for Morocco a week ago. James and Peter were there too, and he'd already gone out with them a handful of times, but they were always trying to get him to come over to their houses for this or that—mostly band practice. Eventually Remus had grown good at giving excuses to avoid visiting. After the fiasco with Marlene's family on Easter he was too hesitant, not that he believed that anyone who could raise a James Potter could be all that bad.

No... really, it just came down to wanting to spend all of his time wallowing and feeling sorry for himself. Outside of that, all he wanted to do was go out and get utterly pissed. He wanted to run the town as he once did, smashing bottles and knocking over rubbish bins—just become that great idiot without a care in the world. He wanted to wake up hungover on a dingy sofa only to stumble to the toilet, throw up the entire contents of his stomach, before choking down some eggs and waiting for that second wind so he could do it all over again. He wanted to go back to the flat. But that wasn't an option anymore.

At least Giles was happy. It was the first holiday in years that he wasn't driving around the city at all hours, picking Remus up off of random street corners. He didn't have to wait by the phone anymore—a fact that made Remus feel guilty when he realised how often he'd done it. Nope, now Giles was free to play nursemaid, which he did passionately—never allowing Remus to sleep past noon. More than once Remus had found himself wanting to snap viciously at him for it, but he had so few people left in his corner... and chasing off the one man that had been around longer than he could remember didn't seem like the best course of action.

So, he put up with it. But sticking around and accepting Giles' badgering also came with a few more annoying stipulations.

"How did it go today, Giles?" Lyall asked, standing at the top of the estate's stairs, busy adjusting the cuffs on his suit jacket. It was so hot, Remus couldn't wrap his head around how he stood it.

"Good!" Giles called. "I figure he'll be ready for the roadway soon, though he's gotta work some on his stop-and-go. Still a bit sharp, that. Wouldn't want someone to ram into him from behind."

Lyall shifted his measuring gaze to Remus as he made it to the top step. "And how do you feel it went?"

Remus scoffed lightly; "You mean you're actually asking me?"

"Don't be dramatic. Just say if you're not ready."

"It's fine."

"Hm." Lyall stopped fiddling with his cuffs. "I'm going out tonight. Tell the cooks when you're hungry. And clean up your room, it looks as though an animal lives there, not a boy."

"Sure thing. And you have fun on your 'date'. That's what it is, right?"

It might've been a trick of the light, but Remus could've sworn he saw the corner of his father's eye twitch. But then he'd turned away, marching down the front steps and down the path toward the dog house. "Giles, I'll be with the dogs until we leave. Call Sebastian or Jeffrey and send them over to the kennels."

As his father kept on, Giles nodded and flashed Remus a friendly wink before heading in the opposite direction, toward the staff's quarters. Remus just glared after his father.

"Hope you stink all through dinner," he muttered, pushing open the front doors and marching grumpily inside. He'd just reached the main staircase when a butler intercepted him and presented a letter. For a moment Remus was elated—was this finally it?!—but then he turned it over the envelope, revealing Jillian's bubbly handwriting and the kiss mark she'd left in red lipstick.

His heart sank. Jillian had been writing to him at least twice a week since the summer holiday had started, and yet there hadn't been so much as a postage stamp from Bath. It made Remus want to tear his hair out. Every novel-length letter from his ex-biology partner could've been confirmation that Sirius was fine and not in fact upset over what had happened between them on their final night at school. After so long without any word, Remus had half a mind to jump on a train just to shake some sense into Sirius himself. Always a step ahead where his friends were concerned, James claimed to have already bought the damn ticket—but somehow Lily and Peter had convinced him not to go. If Sirius couldn't write, then it must've meant he was already in deep shit, and having his 'no-good, prankster friends' show up on his family's doorstep wouldn't help nullify that.

"This is Sirius Black we're talking about," Peter insisted, the last time Remus had seen them, "he's basically indestructible. He's always been able to take what his family threw at him and shove it right back tenfold. Just you wait, he's gonna show up at school even more smug than before. He'll probably even ask for a medal of valour. Sirius will be just fine."

You're wrong, Remus had thought arrogantly, none of you know what I know.

Pfft, you don't even know what you know.

This better not be what going crazy feels like. If I'm to listen to a stupid, unhelpful inner voice for the rest of my life, then can someone please just off me now.

Everyone's got an inner voice, mate. Some are just louder than others.

Sirius Black was not indestructible. He was vain and easily-influenced, and sensitive and brash. He went about his days not caring what anyone thought of him, while simultaneously caring far too much. But he also wasn't afraid to cry, had a penchant for justice—no matter how misguided—and never let anyone get down on themselves when he could help it. And he was so soft. So fucking soft...

Damn it.

Remus missed him. He couldn't help it. Missing Sirius came as easily as breathing. He just wished that it made more sense; how he could miss Sirius as he had been—want him like he did—and yet not be queer. The thought had crossed his mind countless times that perhaps he was just in denial, but every time he was out with Marlene he felt giddy to be by her side. Would that cute girl across the shop think he was desirable because he was out with her? Would those pretty university birds sitting on the public library's front steps look twice at him because he was tall and had another girl on his arm? He liked the attention, though none of them were Sirius, so the desire to act on it was simply not there. Or maybe it was, since he'd made plenty of moves already and none of them on a man—it was complicated. But the girls got his heart racing the same way Sirius did, and the more it happened, the more Remus began to realise that it was the same feeling—Sirius just invoked it more often.

Maybe it would've been better if he was queer. Certainly would've answered a few questions. He liked girls because they were generally kind, and he found them pretty. Sirius was pretty too, but Remus had never looked at another bloke and thought that they were handsome or that he wanted to be with them. For him, Sirius was the exception. He was set apart from the rest—othered. Not a girl, but not like other blokes either. Remus wondered if this 'othering' of his best friend made him a bad person. He knew intrinsically that he liked girls, but liking Sirius wasn't a choice, it was just a part of being human. He was so beautiful that people naturally gravitated toward him, whether because they wanted him for themselves or because they hoped some of his beauty would rub off on them. Remus didn't want to be gravitationally beautiful, so he supposed that it only left the former.

Thoughts like these made Remus want to do something drastic—an urge he'd already acted on several times since summer's start. It almost always involved dragging James or Peter along to some pub or elsewhere, but they were seventeen too, and short of cheating on their girlfriends, they were willing to do almost anything to have a good time.

It'd all started with that girl they'd met in that corner pub in Bethnal Green. She'd had grey eyes like a storm cloud, and knew about Queen and Deep Purple and Neil Young. Remus hadn't been anticipating going home with her, but he was already four pints in by the time she'd introduced herself. After her it was the girl he'd met while watching James play a round of scrimmage football out in East Finchley. Her name had been Mei, which she'd said meant beautiful. He only remembered because he'd used it as a cheesy pick-up line straight after, which he honestly hadn't expected to work. As it turned out he only met up with Beautiful Mei that one time, and then a week later it was that freckled brunette who'd approached him by the bally-hole tables. She'd seemed a bit squirrelly at first but she'd had the loveliest hands. Remus had been showing her how to use the machine's knobs to score a proper shot when the next thing he knew they were kissing.

Kissing girls was easy now. He'd done it enough times that he'd already sworn to himself that the next time he saw Marlene he'd apologise for being so frigid while they'd dated. But as easy as it was to sweet-talk his way into an evening of trivial fornication, and as beautiful and as pretty and as soft as the girls were, they were never Sirius.

Later that evening, after his father and Giles had left for the meeting with 'S', Remus called James up and invited him out. James had just gotten back that morning after spending two weeks at Lily's in Liverpool, and was obviously still tired from the train, but after a quick nod over on Peter's line, he phoned Remus back and said they were both in. Since his friends lived all the way in Finchley, Remus agreed that they should meet up in the middle, and hopped a cab over to the nearest tube station where he rode the line all the way into Westminster. It was just getting dark by the time he arrived, but it was still hot out so he rolled the sleeves up on his t-shirt and strolled confidently into the pub. The place was more of a hole in the ground than a restaurant, but Remus had come to like the set-up thanks to its penchant for playing live music and the fact that the bartender only ever bothered Peter over his age. As promised, a band was playing as he walked in, and he found James and Peter already set up at a table with a pint each and one more for him.

"Hey lads."

"Hey yourself, stranger," James said, raising his glass as Remus sat. Remus took the pint Peter slid toward him, sipping it as he watched the band. They didn't look all that much older than they were, and they had no singer, which meant their music was ornamental to the pub at best. They were playing a Beach Boys cover, but it wasn't one of their more-known hits so they were having trouble capturing the audience's attention. Remus thought condescendingly that they could've played in every grimy pub from there to Newham and would probably still never get anywhere.

"So... how was seeing the girlfriends?" He asked, his entire attitude rather lacklustre.

"Great," James answered. "We had to sleep in separate rooms, obviously, but Lily's parents are real friendly. Her older sister... a bit less so."

"Yeah, but you already knew that going in," Peter teased. "I got lucky. Moira's an only child. And her house is massive."

"Hm. Sounds nice."

James sipped his beer, before setting the glass down and wiping his mouth. "What'd you get up to then? You seem... different."

"Yeah, looking a bit beefy there, Moony," Peter razzed. "You going to the gym now? Jazzercise maybe?"

"Piss off, ya dickhead," Remus chuckled. "Giles has got me working around the house a bit. Yesterday I helped him rebuild part of the fence that'd fallen in. Mostly I just faffed around."

"Get any of your summer homework done?" James asked.

"Nah. Might not do it, to be honest."

"But you're a prefect now," Peter said. "Are you allowed to just not do your homework?"

"Guess we'll find out..." Feeling suddenly restless among all the noise, Remus cast his gaze around the room. He spotted on a girl sitting by her lonesome at the bar top. She wasn't looking at him, but after a few seconds she reached for a napkin further down the bar and caught his eye.

James leaned in; "So, uh… have you given any more thought about coming to Devon with us at the end of the week?"

"Mm... yeah, no—totally."

"Christ, whatchu looking at now—" James turned around in his seat. "Oh. I see the appeal."

Remus smirked slightly, but the girl had looked away. Blimey, that's a short skirt.

"We just got here," Peter complained. "And what's this one supposed to be, number sixteen? Does Marlene know how lively you've become these last few weeks?"

"Marlene's in Africa," Remus snapped; "And besides, we're not dating."

Peter raised his hands in defeat. "Could'a fooled me, what with how often you were seeing her before. Exes get back together all the time, just saying."

"We're friends, Wormtail, that's all..." Remus glanced back to the girl.

She was watching him now—in that way girls did when they wanted to be noticed but didn't want it to seem obvious that they were the ones doing the noticing. "You guys feel like another pint...?"

James looked down at his not even half-empty glass. "Fuck, just go talk to her then, numpty."

"Yeah, see you in an hour," Peter scoffed. "Or more."

"I'm coming back… But just in case I don't." Smiling, he slapped a few quid down on the table for the beers, before standing up and unweaving himself from the table.

The pub was busy, but not so busy that Remus had trouble making his way to the bar. He stopped on the far end, two stools away from the girl, who'd quickly turned back into her drink. It was a martini—a far cry from the drinks normally served in places like this one—and he watched out of the corner of his eye as she began stirring it with the olive skewer. When the bartender approached him, Remus ordered another pint of whatever they had on tap and stopped to wait, quietly drumming his hands on the bar top. He feigned interest in the band for a while, and when he got his drink he paid and turned lazily back the direction he'd come. He hesitated at the last second, and turned to the girl, leaning in ever so slightly.

"Is the music always this bad here?" He asked.

She looked up, a small smile playing at her lips. "No. Normally it's worse."

"Oh shit."

"You're pretty tall, you know."

Remus almost smiled. They always said he was tall. "Thanks. That's a nice top."

She peeked down at the flouncy shirt she was wearing. It was jewel-blue and cut deeply down the middle, tying off just above her waist. "Guys don't normally notice my clothes," she said, sounding amused. "How old are you?"

"Nineteen," he lied. "I'm Remus."

He extended a hand and she took it, smiling. "Remus... Never heard that sort of name before. Is it a family name?"

"Not really."

"Oh. Well, I'm Lucy."

"Like the Beatles song?"

"The what?"

"You know, 'Lucy in the Sky with...' Never mind." Remus cleared his throat. “Say, don't the girls who normally come here just get a beer or something? I didn't even know they made drinks like that." He slowly began to close the gap between them, stopping until only a single stool separated them. Lucy watched every move with blue eyes the same colour as her top.

"Guess I just like to stand out." She raised the olive spear from her martini glass and held the olive between her teeth, slowly sliding it off the toothpick before chewing. "You here with your mates then?"

"What? Oh... yeah."

"They seem interesting."

"Nah, they're just—" Remus peeked back at James and Peter, only to find the pair of them staring openly over the rim of their pints. He straightened up, shooting his friends a nasty look—cut it out!—to which James and Peter just laughed and turned back around.

"Funny too," Lucy chuckled.

"More like funny looking."

"Well, your one friend does have a lot of gel in his hair."

"It's just something he's trying out. Pretty sure he wants to look like Elvis."

"You should tell him to wash it out. I'll bet it looks way better natural. Sorta like yours." Smoothly, she reached up and gently pawed at one of Remus' curls, her gaze never leaving his face.

Remus swallowed thickly. "Are you here with anyone?"

Lucy's eyes wandered slightly, but then she shook her head. "I know a few people in the back, but they're all busy playing cards."

"You don't play?"

"Not really. Never been very good at it so they left me behind. S'just me tonight, I'm afraid."

"Do you want to grab a booth together?"

"Hm... Buy me another drink first?"

Remus had never ordered a martini before, so he simply told the guy to remake Lucy's last drink and drop it off at one of the booths near the back. The lights were purposely dimmer there, and as he and Lucy cuddled together on one of the padded benches, Remus found that the dizzy feeling had returned.

"You're a really good kisser," Lucy said between bouts of snogging.

For some reason the compliment stung. "Worth kissing more than once...?"

She gave him a funny look, and answered with more tongue. Remus didn't mind; she was a good kisser too. And she smelt good—like vanilla. Her lips were slightly salty from the martini, but the rest of her was sweet. She had long black hair that she kept having to sweep out of her face like a curtain and her grip felt solid and real on the side of his neck. She kept herself flush against his thigh, occasionally slipping a hand down his chest and lower. It was just so easy to get lost in it, even the band's piddling music faded away; no silly counting games, no Marauders, no secret kisses in the toilet—certainly no Sirius.

Remus was just considering asking Lucy to leave with him—as if he could've actually brought her back to the estate—when a furious grip came down and latched viciously along the collar of his t-shirt. His throat made the most pathetic choking sound as he was yanked backward and out of the booth, missing his feet completely and crashing to the floor on his back. Before he'd even had time to breathe, a thug wearing a plain white singlet and a pair of track pants was screaming at him.

"WOTCHER THINK YOR DOIN' WIV YOR TONGUE DOWN ME GIRLFRIEND'S THROAT, YOU LITTLE PRICK?!"

Remus was stunned. As he finally got his feet under him and managed to stand, the skinhead kept screaming at him, wailing his obscenities while Lucy shot up from the bench, shrieking and grappling her boyfriend by the arm. "Matty! Matty, please! He's just some stupid kid!"

"I'LL KILL YA!" He barked, taking a swing that Remus had to jump back to avoid. "I'LL BREAK YOR LEGS, YA CHEEKY FUCKER!"

"I didn't know she was your girlfriend!" Remus shouted. “She—!"

The guy took another swing, this one barely missing by a hair. Remus had to throw himself back onto an empty table just to evade it, which only made Matty angrier. Brushing Lucy off, he advanced on Remus, who scrambled to get back on his feet again.

"GET OVER 'ERE, YOU RAT-ARSED BASTARD! I'LL GIVE YOU—"

"WOAH—WOAH! Just hold on a second!" James cried, getting between the two of them. "Look mate, I think this is all just a big misunder—"

Matty's fist came up deadly-quick, catching James in the side of the jaw and making his head snap back painfully. As Lucy screamed blue murder, James crumpled to the floor with Matty standing over him and barking his insults again.

"LIKE SUM 'A THAT, BITCH?!"

Other people around the pub were already moving. Obviously used to the havoc, the bartender had emerged from behind his booth, while several old codgers who had just stopped in to enjoy themselves a beer were on getting to their feet. They might've done something about it, had he given them a chance to do so, but Remus had just seen one of his friends take the fall for him. Instantly his ears thrummed with blood. He wanted a taste of it too.

With only that driving him, Remus threw himself at their attacker head-on. Now, Remus Lupin may have been tall, but he was still only about ninety pounds sopping wet. Despite that fact, he mustered all the force he could manage and grappled the skinhead around the middle, forcing him back against the edge of booth's table with a nasty thump. The surprise shot had succeeded in stunned him temporarily, but the moment Matty recovered he began wailing down on Remus' back with both fists, knocking the air straight from his lungs. After that a knee came up, slamming painfully into his cheek as he held him. Body screaming in pain, Remus released the thug's middle on instinct only to take another shot to the ribs. He couldn't hear anything over Lucy's screams, but as long as he was the one getting hit then it meant James was safe.

In the end he got a few decent shots in—one just below the chin that left the guy's teeth rattling, and a few in the chest and shoulders, but by the time the pub's staff was hauling them apart and tossing Remus out onto the street, it was clear he'd just had his arse handed to him. Ushered by Peter, who was nowhere to be found during the actual brawl, he and James stumbled down street after street. They kept going until they were sure no one had followed them, making sure to stick to the more brightly-lit corners until they finally made it back to the station.

"D-Don't want to get jumped just as we're a-about to get on the t-train," Peter stammered, pacing nervously back and forth in front of the entrance to the underground. "James, a-are we going then? I think we should g-go."

"Yeah, one second," James sighed, before turning back to Remus. His cheek had swollen up to the side of a golf ball on the way from the pub, and Peter had been yammering about how badly his mother was going to lose it when she saw, but James had been quiet the entire way. "Moony—"

"I am so sorry, mate," Remus started immediately. "I didn't mean for all that to happen."

"I know you didn't, and I'm not upset."

"But your cheek... and your glasses!"

James raised the mangled eyeglasses meekly. Sometime during the scuffle they'd gotten knocked off of his face and trampled under boot. "S'fine. I got a spare back at home."

"Your mum's still gonna kill you," Peter murmured.

"Thanks, Wormtail." James let out another long sigh. "Moony, are you sure you're okay?"

Remus straightened up, swallowing a wince. His back ached, but he wasn't going to whine in front of the friend who'd just taken a beating for him. "Oh yeah. Don't think it should be too bad—dick barely got me."

"Tell that to your black eye," Peter said.

"Pete." James shoved the busted frames into his pocket. "Moony, I just mean are you okay-okay? 'Cause you haven't been acting like yourself for a while now, and... We're worried."

"Don't you worry about me, Prongs. I'm fine."

"You don't seem it. Is this about Sirius? 'Cause you said it yourself, that he's gonna be—"

"It's not about Sirius!"

Both James and Peter flinched back when he shouted, and Remus instantly felt more foul than he had all summer. Good going, fuck-head, even the friends that are here are freaked out by you now.

"I'm just trying to be less like myself," Remus swore. "You know, to make things easier on you guys."

"Why would we want that?"

Remus hugged his arm. Why, indeed.

"I think you should come to Devon with us," James said. "It'll be good to get away. Get some fresh air—walk along the beach a bit. There's plenty for you to read, and Mum's a great cook. We can make trips into town whenever we want, and even take the canoes out when the tide's in. It's nice."

"I dunno... I just don't think that stuff's for me. It's your family."

"You're our best friend, Remus," he sighed, then; "At least promise that you'll think about it."

"... Alright."

James gave him a tight smile, before reaching out and fondly patting him on the shoulder. Remus winced when he did it, and they all began to laugh—even Peter.

"You're sure you're okay getting home?" James asked later, as he and Peter started for the open doors of their train.

"Yeah. I'll be good. S'not that far."

"Kay. We'll call you tomorrow then, see about Devon."

Remus waved goodbye as his friends' train pulled away. He only had a few minutes until his own would be by, but when it came roaring down the tracks, it was as though his feet had frozen to the tile. He didn't want to go home. But he couldn't go where it was that he really wanted to be, so instead he just walked.

First it was aimless, just up and down the borough's dark streets—into Mayfair and back. It wasn't cold, even without a jacket, and the humidity kept up even with the late hour. A few cabs stopped along the road thinking he wanted a ride, but those stopped once he'd crossed over into Lambeth and began to take the backstreets. It occurred to Remus then that he was in the prime position to be mugged, but either thanks to whatever luck he maintained or because anyone he passed determined that he didn't have anything worth taking, no one bothered him.

It was close to one in the morning when he realised that he'd drifted south into Peckham. All the shops were shut up for the night, and when he stopped for a much-needed fag, he managed to spot a few kids tagging a shop's metal window covers with spray paint. The sight made him a bit nostalgic, and he watched until they'd finished and moved on to tag something else.

Well, here you are. Out on the town, running the streets again. Feel good?

Fuck off.

And where would I go? I'm you.

Remus knew any sane person in his position would've hailed a cab or found the nearest phone booth and called their personal driver, but if he couldn't be Moony of Marauders or Lu of the East End, then he certainly didn't want to be Remus Lupin.

He spent the night on a park bench in Deptford, like a true bum, and was awoken early the next morning by the rising sun and the sound of cars as parents arrived to drop their kiddies off at the nursery across the lawn. Feeling a lot like he'd been hit by a bus, Remus hauled himself to his feet and stumbled the rest of the way home. He was just checking his pockets to make sure no one had robbed him of his zippo and fags as he'd slept—they hadn't—when the front door flew open and Giles was dragging him inside.

"And just where have you been all night?!" He howled.

"Nowhere—stayed over at James'."

"You mean to say that you stayed out at your friend's place all night and then came flouncing home at seven in the morning? I think not!"

Remus bristled, snatching his arm away with an indignant grunt. Honestly, you start coming home every night for a few weeks in a row and everyone begins to think it's the new normal.

"What's it matter?" He snapped. "I'm back, aren't I?"

"You've been fighting—don't deny it, you're beat to shit and you're walking like you spent all day hunched over in a coal mine. Now where were you?"

"I told you, at James' house!"

"Did you fight with him?"

"Fuck—no! Now will you piss off, Giles?!"

Giles frowned deeply, and Remus wanted to swear at him again. He'd thought a night out on the streets would leave him less angry when he'd returned. Apparently not.

"Honestly, son... I thought that this 'staying out all hours' business was behind us. What's there possibly to go back to around Aldgate?"

"I didn't go back there," Remus growled.

"Then how'd you get so beat up?"

He couldn't do it anymore. He didn't want to hear Giles' speech about how it'd felt to pick him up half-dead after he'd been jumped in the alley with Tonya last summer—he'd been there! He was the one who'd gotten utterly curb-stomped and beaten to a pulp in the first place! Why was it that other people made it so easy to feed him their pain, but never stopped to consider his?

Practically snarling, Remus shoved past the old man and headed directly for the stairs. He didn't want to think about Tomny, or the flat, or any of it! Fuck... he just wanted to sleep.

"Hold on there, young master," Giles called after him. "Your father wants you on the hunt today. It'll just be the two of you, and he's been waiting until you returned."

Remus whipped around again—fast enough to make his back twinge. "What—why? He hasn't wanted me to go with him in years."

"Maybe it's for some father-son bonding then. Lord knows the two of you could use it."

"I can't go trouncing around some bleedin' forest right now, I'm hurt."

"How hurt? Do you wanna talk about it?"

So it was a punishment then.

Fuck it.

Remus turned, carrying back up on the stairs and stomping with his every step.

"I've already laid out your things!" Giles hollered. "Shower fast and get changed, or I swear you won't leave your room for a week!"

It hurt to shower, hurt even more to maneuver himself into the stupid get-up and heavy bush boots that Giles had set out for him. Remus was at least sure nothing was broken—a small silver-lining—but as he made his way back downstairs and found his father and Giles waiting for him by the front door along with another swath of servants, every twinge became a throbbing ache.

"Since when is July hunting season?" He grumbled, refusing the gun case that was held out to him.

"I've a colleague who has given me leave to shoot on his property out near Tonbridge," Lyall said, busy inspecting each rifle as it was set in its case.

"Is that even legal?"

"No, not that one... the Remington model—yes, that's it... Well, Remus —" Lyall paused, staring openly at the bruise that'd bloomed just above his son's cheek bone. "What's happened to your face?"

"Got in a fight," Remus said finally, with an air of superiority.

"Did you win?"

He didn't answer right away and immediately regretted it as Lyall turned away. "Pointless then, wasn't it? Anyway, I think you'll find that the closer you study the law, Remus, the easier it is to work around it."

Remus rolled his eyes. Typical.

They didn't take the Rolls, not wanting to mar its tires on the dirt roads, and so instead Giles drove them in a Chrysler which he coveted for its rear-wheel drive. They were followed by a small lorry that was carrying the dogs, who Lyall would've never gone hunting without, and Remus spent the entire ride glaring out the window, leaving as much space in the back seat between himself and his father as possible.

"Can we at least put the radio on?" He'd complained.

"No," Lyall answered straight away, too busy flipping through some document for work to even look up; "It won't kill you to have some silence."

"Do you ever stop working?" Remus said, scowling at the papers.

"It's called having a work ethic, Remus."

"That what you tell your girlfriend?"

Lyall didn't so much as blink. "I said silence, didn't I?"

Remus resumed his window-brooding.

When they finally reached their destination, a crop of forest surrounding a vast man-made lake, Remus piled out of the sedan and rushed over to the lorry, where all of the dogs were already busy barking their heads off. They could obviously sense that they were in a new place, and when he and the driver opened the back hutch, five large coonhounds came rushing out.

"Return for us in two hours," Lyall instructed, taking his rifle and ammo pack from Giles. He didn't bother giving one to Remus, who hadn't shot anything in years, and instead forced him to carry the game bag. Remus did so, squirming only slightly when he remembered that the bag would soon be full of dead waterfowl. After that they set off into the trees, the dogs so close they were nearly underfoot. Padfoot and Seabiscuit were the senior dogs now, having already sired litters of their own and calmed down some in their old age, but the puppies, Ruffian, Red Rum, and Eclipse, raced in and around Remus' legs as they made their way from path to path, noses pressed to the earth as they searched.

"Why didn't you bring Sebastian or one of the other trainers with you?" Remus asked eventually.

“I wanted it to be just the two of us today,” Lyall answered.

"Why?"

"You're my son. Do I really need a reason to want to spend time with you?"

"You've always needed one before."

Apparently Lyall didn't have much to say to that. He stayed quiet for a while, simply plunging on ahead through the trees, eyes trained above and below for any sign of a pheasant or grouse. "How are things at school?" He asked finally.

"Fine."

"And your marks?"

"Wonderful."

"Good. You're smart, even if you'd like to pretend otherwise."

Remus mumbled out of the corner of his mouth; "Only around you..."

"How do you feel about the school as a whole?" Lyall asked. "Is it worth your time? I wonder sometimes, what with you so far away."

"It's a great school," Remus said firmly. "Better than anything in London. Our exam marks are top of the country, and the teachers are good too."

"That is good to hear. And your free time? How is that spent?"

"Studying... and with friends..."

"Like that boy—James Potter? Giles was telling me, and so I had him looked into. His father runs his own firm, is that right? It's impressive. They've obviously done well for themselves, especially for immigrants. Who are the rest?"

Remus couldn't believe that Lyall had actually looked into his friends' families to ensure he was mingling with the proper sort. Or he could—he just wasn't sure which made him more angry.

"The rest of your friends, Remus," Lyall prompted. "What are their names?"

"Peter Pettigrew... a few girls..."

"Girls? I do hope you're behaving."

"I am!" Remus said, suddenly embarrassed. He'd never once talked about girls or dating with his father before, at least not aside from the general "don't be foolish" lecture. That had all been done with Giles. "And there's also another... his name's Sirius Black."

Lyall whipped his face around. "A Black? As the Blacks?"

"You know them?"

"There isn't a person of substance in all of England who doesn't know that family." Lyall's cool expression returned and he continued on, leaves crunching beneath his boots. "If he's really who I think he is, he could be worth having around. Be careful not to upset him. You're the last person who should be dealing with the wrath of that family."

Remus scowled. It bothered him that his father could even consider that he might have the faintest idea of who Sirius was, purely based on his family's name. It was the same reason Barty thought he knew anything about their family when his father started gossiping. Pure rubbish.

As he followed, Red Rum began snapping at Remus' ankles in attempts to get him to play. He brushed the pup off at first, but the baying was too cute. Cracking a small smile, he bent down to pat him.

“Do NOT—!” His father roared suddenly, making Remus flinch and rip his hand back.

"It's a bloody dog! He's bound to want to—"

“They’re working—learning to be obedient," Lyall scolded, before clicking his tongue in distaste. "I see you’re still just as soft with them, uncaring whether your ruin progress someone else has worked hard at. Here, make yourself useful and plant these for the pups to find.”

He passed Remus the bag of already dead fowl, freshly killed that morning at the estate, and lifted a whistle to his lips. Its silent sound drew every one of the dogs to him with utter compliance and when he was sure they were at attention, Lyall turned and set off through the trees, not even bothering to check whether the dogs were following. They did of course, with their tails upright and wagging the entire time.

"That's not obedience," Remus hissed to no one in particular, "that's brain-washing."

Taking the bag, he began marching in the opposite direction, stopping every time he found a downed tree or root hovel he should shove some dead fowl into. He tried not to gag as he pulled them from the bag, stuffing their limp bodies into the hiding spots for the puppies to "hunt". It was a disgusting task—some of the birds were still wet and they stunk to high-heaven—but it was a thoughtless one. Every now and then he'd hear a shot followed by a flurry of barking, but it was always a long ways off.

When Remus had finally managed to rid himself of the last game bird, he started back the way he'd come, following the distant sound of barking until he finally made it to the edge of the property's lake. There he found Lyall peering through the scope of his rifle, with Seabiscuit and Padfoot sitting loyally at his side, both panting in the July heat. Across the water, perhaps a hundred or so yards away, was a large family of ducks, swimming about innocently, completely unaware of the predators eyeing them from the shore. The puppies were nowhere in sight, probably already hunting down dead bird carcass.

“We’re going to be having a guest for dinner tonight,” Lyall said, without looking at him or lowering the gun.

“So that’s what you wanted to talk about,” Remus said dryly. "Knew it."

“Your behaviour of late has been satisfactory. I expect it to continue throughout her visit.”

“Her?” Remus could hardly believe it. He'd been right?! His own miserable father was actually seeing someone and now she was coming to their house?! He couldn't even remember the last woman he'd seen at the estate that wasn't a part of the staff. Probably some dippy wife of a random government official there on business.

“Her name is Sandra," Lyall said. "She's a good woman. She only wants to meet you. And you will behave yourself.”

“So what’s she to you?” Remus demanded. "Is she really your girlfriend or something?"

This time Lyall did look at him, sideways and measuring. “She's important.”

“Ha, I get it. You’ve finally cracked—realised that not even you can stand your own company.”

“Say what you wish now, but you will not embarrass me."

“As if I cared enough to make embarrassing you a hobby.”

Bringing it to his lips, Lyall gave a short blow on the whistle and both dogs at his side barked viciously, instantly scattering the waterfowl. As the birds took to the air he let loose a single shot, its bang echoing out across the forest like the crack of thunder. The downed duck smacked the lake’s surface and Padfoot was gone instantly, racing into the water to fetch it for his master.

Lyall lowered the gun, already squinting into the morning sun. “Maybe that’s the problem, Remus. You don’t care.”

* * *

He wanted to hate her—god, did he want to—but even Remus could deny it.

Sandra was nice.

She wasn't spectacular or even particularly loathsome like he’d hoped she would be, she didn't even mention the black eye—she was just nice. It sucked.

Rather than letting Lyall send Giles or someone else to fetch her, she'd driven on her own, in a fancy midnight-blue Bentley that made the Rolls look like a matchbox car. When the car pulled up, he'd found himself expecting some great beauty queen with hair big enough to block out the sun, but Sandra's hair wasn't big at all. It was combed modestly and perfectly coif, and her smile as she shook his hand was genuine. It was all certainly a surprise, but what had ended up shocking Remus the most was not her car or hair or generally pleasant disposition, but how—well—how old she was.

She wasn't old old, but she certainly wasn't young. And wasn't she supposed to be young? Was that not the main draw for a man who decides to date again so late in life—that said date would be fresh enough out of the baby bassinet that her youthful energy would surround everything and leave him feeling spry and virile again? Every other coffin-dodger with money refused to chase girls who weren’t young enough to be their daughter, but Sandra couldn’t have been that far off from Lyall's age at all. She had blonde hair that was streaked with the faintest signs of white and lines at the corners of her mouth and eyes that meant she must've smiled a lot. She even showed up to dinner wearing a fitted pantsuit and loafers. She was the complete opposite of everything Remus had been expecting.

It was still awkward, especially when she went to shake his hand, but Lyall had already threatened to take away his driving lessons if he didn't make it through dinner without incident. So, while his father and Sandra sat at one end of the table, Remus sat at the other and ate without objection.

"Remus, your father tells me you go to school in Scotland," Sandra said, trying to be personable despite the stilted atmosphere. "Hawkings College, right? I had a cousin who went there before transferring to King's Canterbury."

Remus nodded, wordlessly chewing on his braised spinach.

"Is it a good school?"

"... Yup."

"Lots of fun things to do?"

"Oh yeah, loads."

"Like what?"

Remus set his jaw and looked up. "My friends and I recently recreated a scene from a horror film."

"Oh?"

"Yeah. Made a real mess too—blood everywhere. A few students even passed out seeing it."

A look of pure fury flitted across Lyall's face, but Sandra remained unfazed. "Was it for a school play?"

He considered keeping up the nastiness, but Lyall's warning gaze was deterrent enough. "Yeah... something like that..."

"That sounds great then. I'd have loved to read the script. Do you like to read, Remus?"

"Sometimes."

"It's all he does," Lyall amended. "Even when I'm trying to get him to do other things, he always has his nose in a book. It's where he gets all of those spunky retorts of his."

Sandra beamed. “So you’re a bookworm then?”

“No, not really," Remus ground out.

“Oh, but if you were—I should let you know that my family has a wonderful library on our property. You could borrow whatever you liked.”

“My school's library is fine, thanks.”

“I’ll bet. Hawkings is older than dust, isn’t it?”

“Some of the teachers are too.”

She smiled again, though Remus hadn’t really meant the quip in a friendly way. He began stuffing his mouth with baby potatoes, eating around the steak on his plate. It was too easy to picture the way the game birds had flopped around in his hand earlier that afternoon.

“Your father also tells me you’re fond of dogs,” Sandra started.

Remus looked up, meeting his father’s reproachful eye across the table. “Wow, guess he really has been chatty.”

Lyall’s upper lip twitched, but Sandra blazed past it. “I love animals too. My family actually breeds race horses—it’s how I met your father. There's plenty of crossover between the hounds and horses. I could even take you to one of the races sometime. The biggest ones happen during the fall and winter, but there’s always something going on. And perhaps when you’re back for Christmas we could make a day of it?”

Remus almost choked on a potato. Christmas?! She expected to be around for that long?

Elsewhere in the house, the phone rang and Remus felt suddenly apprehensive in his seat. Swallowing, he shook his head. “No thanks, Sandra, I’m not the biggest fan of horses actually.”

“Oh, that’s too bad," she said. "Would that mean you wouldn’t be interested in joining me for a ride sometime? I promise we don’t have to race if you don’t want to.”

“No—”

“He’d love to,” Lyall answered for him. “It’ll get him out of the house.”

“That’s funny considering you had an issue with how often I was gone before,” Remus shot back.

“Watch your temper.”

“It’s okay he doesn’t have to,” Sandra said kindly, before turning back to him, “but I can promise, Remus, that it won’t be like any ride you’ve had before.”

Rather than answering her, he leaned back in his seat and sipped his wine—it was the horribly bitter kind his father insisted on having with all meals. Before Lyall could object to his stubborn silence, a butler appeared in the room, bowing his head lightly.

“Who was on the phone then, Carsten?” Lyall asked, running his tongue across his teeth. “Was it McCarron with those stats I asked for?”

“Actually sir, the phone call was for the young master.”

Remus perked up in his seat and Lyall regarded him from the end of the table. “One of your school friends again, I expect,” he said sourly. “You’d think they’d have respect for proper meal times. You may call them back later.”

“Please let me take it,” Remus said stiffly, “Dad.”

“No, it can wait until after supper."

"But I told them I was going to call, and we were out with the dogs all day. I should get it now, it could be important."

"You're children. What could possibly be so important for children?"

"Please—"

"I've already said no. Now you’re being rude to our guest.”

Sandra reached out and covered Lyall’s hand with her own. “I don’t mind, love. Remus and I can talk again tomorrow, perhaps... on that ride of ours?”

It was sneaky and he didn’t like it, but Sandra was smiling broadly and he knew he was caught. Finally he nodded and Lyall raised his head before bringing his wine glass to his lips.

“Fine, you’re excused.”

Jumping up from his chair, Remus all but ran from the room, passing the butler in the hall and making his way to the salon to pick up the line.

“Hello?”

“Hey Moony, it’s me,” James’ cheery drawl echoed through the phone.

“God, you don’t know how good it is to hear your voice,” he moaned into the receiver.

“Miss me that much, do you?”

“Family dinners suck, mate.”

“Ha. I get that. But you know where you wouldn't have to sit through any of those? In Devon."

Remus sighed. "Prongs, you know I love ya, but I just don't think that..."

"I understand," James said. "It'd be a month away from home, and we only just got back from school. I don't like that you'll be on your own though. Maybe if Marlene weren't away in Africa, and Mary weren't in Paris—"

"Hey, I'll be fine. Besides, if Sirius could last every summer on his own out in bum-fuck Bath, then how hard could it be for me here?"

"Hm. Promise you'll come over when we're back then? Mum and Dad won't bite."

"Cross my heart and hope to die, stick a needle in my—!"

"Alright! I believe you..." James let out a big sigh, and Remus got the distinct feeling that there was more to be said.

"Prongs...?"

"I wasn't just calling to talk about Devon," James said all at once. "There's something else too. It's got to do with Sirius."

Remus' breath caught, and he switched the receiver to the other ear.

"Have you heard from him then? Has he said—"

"No, Moony," James mumbled, “it's my letters. They've bounced—they were sent back. 'Return to sender' stamped all across the front."

It was as though the bottom had dropped out from Remus' stomach. He fell into the lounge chair by the phone, pulling the chord so taunt he nearly toppled the entire thing. "But—But I haven't gotten any of my letters back."

"Maybe they just haven't come yet..."

"You don't think they could've actually moved do you?"

"No way. His family's lived in that house for generations. Most likely they're keeping him shut up and he can't get to the mail anymore."

"Fuck." Remus bit down on his thumb nail. "Reckon he's alright?"

"Yeah, but I've got a bad feeling..."

“He’s brave, Prongs," Remus said quickly, suddenly determined to be optimistic enough for both of them; "He’ll be okay. Sirius said so himself—just a few more weeks and we’ll be back at school. Then he'll turn eighteen, get his inheritance from Alphard and he’ll never have to go back.”

“You’re right,” James said grimly. “You’ll still let me know if he contacts you though? I can’t be sure that he’d remember to write to the summer house.”

“I’ll call the second I hear from him. Cross my heart."

“Thanks Moony, I’ll see you in a few weeks then. You can come over for a barbecue or something—see Pete’s new drum kit, too.”

“Blimey, it’s not even his birthday!" Remus said in awe. "His parents actually went for it then?”

“Yeah, surprised him with it today. Pretty sure it was mostly thanks to Simeon, I guess he can be pretty convincing when he wants to be. The kit looks great though—a Premier five piece.”

“Nice. Can’t wait to jam.”

“Me neither.”

“Cool… I’ll see you then?”

“Okay... Bye, Moons.”

James hung up and Remus sat there, listening to the dial tone and twisting the receiver in his hands. When it came to Sirius it was easy to put on a brave face for his friends, but he couldn’t help but spend every other waking moment fretting through his teeth. If they'd always been able to get word through before, but now suddenly letters were being sent back, then what had changed?

That night Remus wrote two more letters. One being to Jillian—a short, polite thing since he’d neglected to answer the last four that she’d sent, and the other to Sirius, begging him to send word. In it he told him that they’d accept a smiley face scribbled on the back of a gum wrapper, anything that would tell them he was okay. Anything that could tide them over until September. He wasn't even sure Sirius' letter would get through, but when he handed the letters off to Giles the next morning to be posted, he sent with them all of the positive karma he'd managed to accumulate in his brief seventeen years of existence. He prayed it would be enough.

Only... Remus did not expect what would come next.

* * *

Sandra hadn't been kidding when she said her family raced horses. After arranging for Giles to drop him off at her family’s track, which boasted stands big enough to seat over fifty-thousand people, she'd waited personally for Remus to arrive, standing out front of the stadium with a grand smile on her face. Apart from the two of them, the only other people inside the racecourse was the team of construction workers he and Sandra had passed on their way inside.

“We’re doing some reconstruction over the summer so everything will be ready for the fall season,” she explained, while pointing out different parts of the building as she went. “I’m going to have an atrium put in the South wing with a glass ceiling, that way people can take the air even when rain hits.”

Remus just nodded along, entirely overwhelmed just being there, but as they made their way out onto the top of the stands, it occurred to him that Sandra wasn’t exactly dressed for horseback riding. She had boots on, but other than that she was wearing jeans and a simple blue button-up. He hadn't dressed for the occasion either, but only because he'd planned to stay as far from the horses as possible under the guise of 'just wanting to watch'.

"Well, here we are," Sandra said, smiling over the track, which might've been beautiful had the green not been ripped up and left as dusty brown dirt instead. "We're resurfacing the turf," she said as if it was a funny joke, "but I figured this would be perfect for our ride."

She started down the stairs toward the top of the stretch, and Remus scrambled after her. "Sandra, I think this is the part where I tell you that I don't actually know how to ride."

"Oh, that's fine, dear."

"Yeah, I know all proper boys would've known how to ride back in your day but—"

" 'Back in my day'? Wow, thank you so much for that, Remus."

"Sorry! I just—I-I don't know what my dad's told you but I've never ridden—actually I hate horses!"

"That won't be a problem."

"Really I'm terrified of them! I piss my pants every time one so much as looks me in the eye."

"Ha! This isn't a punishment, you know, Remus."

"I know—!" He babbled. "It's just—no offence, but I only came because—"

"Because your father told you to. I don't mind, honestly."

"I swear, Sandra—I'll probably just fall off and break something! Or everything. I've done it. Just like a few days ago, even."

They'd reached the bottom of the stands, and Sandra whirled around, still grinning broadly. "I don't think you'll have any issues with falling unless you want to stick your head that far out the window."

Temporarily stupefied by the sentence had just been strung together for him, Remus simply blinked at her, and Sandra began to laugh before pointing just down the track. He followed it, and instead of finding a starting gate lined with horses, he saw only a fancy sports car waiting in the middle of the track, with its chrome freshly shined and cherry red paint-job glinting in the sun.

“I told you,” she said, “it’s not like any ride you’ve ever had before.”

And that was how Remus ended up strapping himself into the passenger seat of a Jaguar E-type sports car. He had never really been much for cars, but seeing the thing up close and feeling the purr of the engine beneath them had him positively giddy.

“Turf’s no good for cars,” Sandra said from the driver's seat; “but dirt? That’s what drag racing was made for.”

Remus gasped; "Yeah mean we're actually gonna race this thing?"

"Only if you're not worried about making a mess of your pants. Because that might ruin the leather."

He laughed, and shook his head. Maybe Sandra was cool. She raced cars, and she didn't even care about messing up the paint!

“How fast can it go?” He asked, peeking at the speedometer.

“How fast do you want to go?” Sandra said, before pulling a pair of sunglasses from the visor and passing him a white handkerchief. “Drop that out the window when you’re ready.”

“Why?”

She put on the sunglasses and shrugged; “It’s symbolic.”

Hiding a smile, Remus turned and threw the handkerchief out the window. Before it'd even had time to hit the ground, Sandra let loose a wild cry—WOO-HOO!—and slammed her foot down on the accelerator. Instantly Remus found himself slammed back against the seat as the back wheels of the car spun into a fishtail. He almost thought they'd never go forward, but then the rubber caught on soft earth and they were off—speeding down the track like lightning. With the windows down, the stagnant summer heat slammed him in the face mercilessly, but as they hurdled toward the first bend, Remus had never felt so exhilarated. When they hit the curve he slid against the door, clinging to the window’s edge as a mixture of terror and delight was ripped from his throat. Sandra was clearly an expert; she allowed the car’s rear to drag just long enough to kick up the dust before levelling everything out and leaving them to fly down the straight faster than any horse ever could.

In less than thirty seconds they'd hit the second corner and rounded onto the home-stretch, as wind ripped through Remus' hair and euphoria sang in his veins. When Sandra finally pulled the car to a skidding stop just past the start line, Remus was thrown against his seat belt and smacked back into the chair behind him while his heart still thrummed wildly in his chest.

“So,” she said, lifting her shades, “what’d you think?”

Remus let out a heavy breath, nearly panting. “I think that Giles is going to be so jealous!”

Sandra threw her head back and laughed. “I know, right? Don’t get me wrong, I love horses—have since I was a little girl—but there’s nothing like driving along with the wind gently blowing through your hair.”

“You call that gentle?”

She laughed again, light and happy. “I’m glad you came with me today, Remus. Thank you.”

The air suddenly felt heavy with unsaid promises, and Remus shifted uncomfortably in his seat. He almost wished they were driving again, but Sandra just sat there watching him until it was obvious that she wasn't going to make another move. The ball was in Remus' court now.

“So…" he pandered, "how long have you known my dad...?”

“Ah, I was waiting for that question actually.” Sandra put the Jaguar in park and stretched her arms out ahead of her. “I’ve known your father for quite a few years, in fact. He was a business consultant for my late husband, Paul, who passed just over a year ago. Lyall was a great friend to him.”

“There’s a first,” Remus mumbled out of the corner of his mouth.

“Ah, I have heard that you and your father find it hard to get along,” Sandra said lightly, “and I know it’s not any of my business, but I can’t help but be a little jealous. Paul and I never had any children. We were each other’s only family beyond our parents, you see.”

“You didn’t want kids of your own?”

“Oh, children? No, nasty little buggers.” She smirked. “I’m only kidding. I can't have children actually. But Paul and I were happy on our own for the most part. Saved time for other things. This was his car, in fact."

Remus trailed his hand across the window edge, feeling the soft white leather under his fingertips. "S'a nice car."

"Yes, it is. He didn't get the chance to take it out much before he passed, so I always make sure I have the most fun I can while driving it."

"That's too bad. Nice of you, though."

"Thank you. Does that mean you want to go again?"

Remus raised his eyes to Sandra's in an instant. "Hell yes."

"I was hoping you'd say that," she beamed, grabbing the gear shift. "And who knows, maybe if you're lucky I'll let you take her for a few spins yourself."

Remus looked from her to the track as the engine revved. Then they were off again and it was pure bliss. He'd never felt so weightless.

After that they spend the entire afternoon just sailing around the track —Sandra could even do the circuit in reverse. Remus never got tired of it, not for a second. He could've lived with the wind in his hair and the roar of the engine dulling each of his senses. There was no space to worry or panic while the car was moving, and it was the most relief he'd felt in months.

Sandra was true to her word in the end and even let him take a turn behind the wheel, which practically vibrated under his grip. It was intimidating at first, having that much power under his thumb, but all it took was a single lap for Remus to find that same euphoric thrill as when Sandra was driving. Every loop brought more confidence, until eventually he was pushing almost one hundred miles an hour on the straight-aways. Once they'd managed to reduce most of the petrol in the tank, Remus' found that his hearing was severely diminished but he didn't even mind. He'd even agreed to call Sandra 'Sandy'—at her insistence of course.

On the way home Remus found himself excited all over again. He couldn't wait to tell his friends. The ringing in his ears felt the same as it did after seeing that band play their first year together. He knew Sirius would've absolutely loved it of course, and he imagined the pair of them whipping around the track together after they'd finished school. Sandra had told him that they redo the turf regularly to combat wear on the turf, perhaps then.

Dusty waylaid him on the way in the door, slobbering across the front of his trousers; not that he cared much—they were already covered in a fine layer of dirt and grim from the track. As Remus bent down to scratch at the dog's stomach, he heard the phone rang distantly. He waited for his father or someone else to answer, but then a butler appeared—Gregory, he thought his name was.

"The phone, sir," the maybe-Gregory said.

"Who is it?"

"Another young man. He's asked for you by name."

It was James again then. Remus got to his feet with a nod.

"I'll be right there," he told him, before patting Dusty on the stomach and watching as the hound turned over. "C'mon boy! Let's go get the phone—let's go get the phone!"

He raced Dusty to the salon and they skidded in together. Though not as nimble as he once was, the old dog turned at the last moment, upsetting a small end table with his tail and nearly knocking a vase of flowers to the ground. Diving to the ground, Remus caught it at the last second—a save that would've left even James impressed—and sighed as Dusty congratulated him by licking his face.

"This is what they mean when they say animals resemble their owners," he grumbled, before righting the vase. "Sit," he told him. Dusty didn't, but that was more Remus' fault than his anyway.

"Dozy dog," he muttered, before walking to the phone and picking up the receiver where the butler had left it sitting off the hook. "Prongs, I'm so glad you called! You'll never guess what I just did. Dad's girlfriend, Sandy, she—"

"Moony."

Remus' knees nearly buckled. He had to sit down before he could speak again, clutching onto the receiver with both hands.

"Sirius… is—is that you?"

“Yeah, s’me.”

For a second he didn’t have a single thought in his head at all, apart from how tired Sirius sounded. Each syllable was stretched, like it took every ounce of his energy to get them out. Remus cleared his throat, suddenly more nervous than ever.

“We… We haven’t heard from you in weeks!” He chittered. “Blimey, are you okay? Where are you—who’s phone is this?”

“Moony,” Sirius said again, like he was begging, “I just really need your help…”

Chapter End Notes

David Gilmour is/was the lead guitarist for the band Pink Floyd.
A 'jumble sale' is like a place to sell or buy second-hand goods. Like a garage sale.
The movie Remus and Marlene went to see was "The Man Who Fell to Earth" (1976) and yes, Bowie really does play an alien.
Star Wars (A New Hope) didn't come out in the UK until December 1977.
Le Gavroche is an uber-posh Michelin-starred restaurant in London.
Bally hole is/was a type of pinball machine popular in the 70s.
'Coffin-dodger' is derogatory slang for old people. I wouldn't use it on my grandmother, lol.

*Read the note at the top if you're still at all confused about Remus' sexuality, lmao. Or drop me a comment!

Also, HAPPY NEW YEAR’S EVE! To all of those who celebrate this time of year as their new year ^^ I'm really excited to get into these summer chapters. They're going to be so fun, hehe. :^)

Chapter 66: Per Aspera Ad Astra

Chapter Summary

Honestly, these boys. What are we to do with them?

Chapter Notes

CW: References to abuse and neglect as well as smoking.

A/N: Gotta be honest, I was NOT expecting such a reaction from that cliff-hanger, hah! I suppose it might be because I don't commonly feature them within this fic, but ya'll were reeeeeeeling. Naturally, I loved it ofc, but I swear I wasn't trying to edge you with this long wait!
PS: Thank you for the outpouring of love this fic's gotten recently. You loves are seriously so amazing cries lovingly

See the end of the chapter for more notes

How can I try to explain?
When I do he turns away again,
It's always been the same, same old story;
From the moment I could talk,
I was ordered to listen;
Now there's a way,
And I know that I have to go away…

- "Father and Son" Cat Stevens, 1970

When Sirius called and asked for his help, Remus made the split-second decision that he would go to the ends of the earth to reach him. Luckily he only had to go as far as Dover.

The little port town was just over an hour from London, which meant he could leave and meet him before it even got dark. There was only one problem.

He had no way of getting there.

Sirius hadn't divulged much, but he did admit to swiping another passenger's ticket to get aboard the ferry across the Channel, unable to pay the ticket fee himself. Remus could tell he felt bad, but his current lack of funds meant that hopping a train into the city wasn't an option on his own. The attendants would catch him and since he wasn't legally an adult, he would be held until his parents came to retrieve him. Sirius didn't need to extrapolate further. Remus considered taking the line down himself with enough fare to pay both their ways back, but it'd twice as long, and something in Sirius' voice had made him exceedingly nervous—like if he didn't reach him as soon as possible, he'd never see him again.

It stung later, mostly when he was being shouted at, but he hadn't even stopped to consider asking Giles for help. It would take too long—would mean too many questions. Sirius needed him and he needed him now. Going from the phone, to his bedroom, to the car, had taken less time than it took for Giles to polish off his evening brandy. Remus didn't even remember swiping the keys off the parlour table—it was all a blur. The Roll's front seat felt a lot bigger without the old driver sitting in there with him, but he didn't hesitate to turn the car on and begin rolling it down the rocky driveway. Flashing his high beams so the gateman wouldn't recognise him, Remus did his best to look bulky under Giles' jacket and cap, which he'd stolen off one of the pegs by the kitchen door. He'd always maintained the opinion that he wasn't a thief, but for Sirius he'd be anything.

The nerves didn't really set in until he was driving down the M20 motorway, white-knuckling the steering wheel and trying not to drift out of his lane. As wildly anxious as he was for Sirius, he couldn't bring himself to drive any faster than the speed limit. Getting himself pulled over wasn't going to help Sirius anyway. Most cars just sped on past, not paying the Rolls any mind, and Remus was almost able to relax until a lorry triple his size ran up from behind and gave a honk so blaringly loud that he nearly launched himself into the sedan's roof.

What are you doing, a voice said, you don't even have a driving license!

Without room for reason, he pushed back; I ain't eighteen either but that didn't stop the bloke in the bar from serving Pete, James, and me those pints two weeks ago.

A Ford raced past him in the next lane, so close they could've kissed mirrors and Remus struggled to not veer into the barrier.

You're gonna die, you stupid fucking idiot!

"Oh shut up," Remus grumbled, flicking on the radio.

The music helped some—soothed him at least—but even if he were a seasoned driver he still would've been distracted. Sirius' short phone conversation replayed over and over again in his head, becoming more terrifying with each iteration. Remus struggled to stay calm. Sirius wasn't dying, he just needed help, and now help was coming. He'd been calm too—tired-sounding, mostly—but still eerily calm.

"I'm in Dover," he'd said, after asking for his help.

"Dover?" Remus had exclaimed; "What the bloody fuck are you doing there?"

"You know where it is then?"

"Yes, I know where fucking Dover is!"

"Good. Can you come get me?"

"Can I... Of course I can come, but what—"

"I'm at the port, the one with all the ferries. Can you find that?"

"Yes, but Sirius—you have to tell me what's going on!"

"Can't," Sirius sighed; "there's too much to tell. I dialled your number wrong the first time, and I already had to bum the money to pay for this one. If you come, I promise to tell you everything once you get here. You can get here, right? Just you?"

"Just...? Aw, fuck Sirius—"

"—Please insert two pound fifty for another three minutes."

There was a bang, like Sirius had punched the machine. "Damn tourist rates."

"Sirius," Remus tried again, "are you sure you're okay?"

Sirius was quiet for a few precious seconds, but finally he answered, low and more tired than before; "I will be once you get here."

Then the line had cut and Remus' life had gone from leisurely morning drives to unhinged grand theft auto. Lyall was going to have him strung up when he found out. Probably cut him up and feed him to the dogs. And Giles might just let him—there was no way he hadn't noticed the absence of his vexing ward and precious car.

It doesn't matter, he told himself, Sirius called, which means he's not dead in a ditch somewhere. And it means he wasn't ignoring your letters. Maybe.

A sharp ding echoed from the dashboard, knocking him free of his thoughts, and Remus looked down to find the petrol meter had fallen into the red.

You dickhead—you didn't even stop to check if you had any gas?!

Nervous all over again, he took the first exit off the motorway and limped the car long until he managed to find a fill station just off the side of the road. He pulled the Rolls up to an empty pump and turned the car off, taking a moment to compose himself before making his way inside the station. Wiping his sweaty palms on the sides of his trousers, Remus waited in line for his turn at the counter, keeping a careful eye on the Rolls through the window.

"Next," the station attendant called lazily, as the man in front shambled off. Remus jumped to, stepping up to the counter and pulling his his wallet out of his pocket. He nearly fumbled it, but when he looked up at the attendant he found him scratching his neck and yawning disinterestedly. Really, he couldn't have been much older than Remus was, judging by the amount of acne across his forehead.

"Ten on pump five," Remus said, as casually as he could.

The guy began to ring him up. "Nice car," he said over a second yawn, gesturing lazily to the window.

Instant panic. "It's, uhm—it's a rental," Remus stammered.

"Hm. You said you wanted ten on five?"

"Er—yes."

The attendant hit a few more buttons on the register, which popped open with a dull clatter, and Remus passed him a ten pound note before looking down at the large sweets display across the counter's front.

"These too," he said quickly, dropping several chocolate bars on the countertop.

The guy raised a brow, but took the sweets. Remus swallowed.

“And a pack of Embassy Number One’s.”

* * *

Remus streaked down the pavement, dodging the crowd as they mulled from the ferry terminal toward the bus loop and car park. The last boat had just gotten in, bringing with it the smell of salt and sea, with just a hint of summertime and rotting fish. Remus had never been to the sea before; seeing its vast waters as they stretched out all the way to the horizon made him feel calm at first, but also like he was running out of time.

Just beyond the docks the sun was setting, lighting up the entire sky with a bright orange glow. Seagulls crooned overhead and the leaving ferries blared their loud horns, but Remus paid no attention to any of it. He was too busy scanning every face for a hint of familiarity; a cheeky smirk, a straight nose, a pair of storm-grey eyes. Instead all the noses were too wide or too curved, the grey eyes without that tell-tale glint of mischievousness. He went as far down the wharf as he could, throwing himself at the railing and staring out over the ocean as people unloaded from the ferry. No one so much as paid him a second glance.

With Sirius nowhere in sight, Remus finally stopped a ferry attendant, patting him hurriedly on the shoulder while nearly out of breath.

“Have you seen a guy—a—a boy. My age, about this tall—with long black hair?”

The attendant reached up to scratch beneath his cap, beads of sweat dripping down his temple. “ ‘fraid not son. You see lots of people on the wharf, gets too hard to distinguish 'em all. Have a look around if ye' want, but best be getting on soon. Terminal’s closing in a few minutes.”

Huffing, Remus spun away and scanned the crowd again. It was thinner now, most people having moved on, but there was not a hint of raven-black among them.

"C'mon Sirius..." He moaned under his breath. "Where are you?"

He circled the wharf once more, and then checked all the bus stops. Even tried swinging over the rail to get a peak at the barnacle-covered rocks below, thinking Sirius might have slipped away to avoid being noticed. Nothing.

"I swear to god, if you let yourself be kidnapped because you thought it'd make a funny joke, then I'll..."

There.

Remus thought he might throw up. The relief was immediate—all that had happened was a single man with a briefcase stepped aside and he finally caught a glimpse of someone sitting alone on a stone bench, head tipped back and feet crossed at the ankles. He didn't see his face —Remus didn't have to. He would know Sirius Black anywhere.

“Sirius!” He shouted, starting forward. Sirius’ head snapped up, blinking in the evening light until finally he noticed him. Almost stumbling on the pavement, Remus raced to him. Sirius was slow to get up, but it didn’t matter. He reached him in a few short strides and clapped his arms around him, squeezing so tight that Sirius gave a little gasp.

“You crazy tosser!” Remus wailed. “What’s happened to you?”

An echo of a sigh brushed his ear, but Sirius still hugged him back. “Hey, Moony.”

He pulled away, glaring at him while his eyes began to burn with unshed tears. “ ‘Hey’? You're gonna 'hey' me now? Sirius, what are you doing here?”

“Oh, jus’ went for a little vacation, s’all,” Sirius said, giving him a smile that didn’t reach his eyes. Most of his hair was tucked up in a cap and he had a faint bruise on his left cheek, with dark circles under both eyes. The clothes he was wearing were unsettling—a stiff grey button-up that looked itchier than hell and matching slacks. The whole thing made him looks as though he'd just gotten out of prison. Blimey, maybe he had.

“Where were you?” Remus pushed.

“France. Belgium before that.”

His eyes bulged. “Belgium? Bloody—why?!”

“It’s a long story.”

“You promised you’d tell me.”

“I know, but can we do it somewhere else? Please Moony, I’m really tired.”

With a pang in his chest, Remus sighed and looked around. Hardly anyone was left on the wharf, and those who were, were bustling by with bags in hand, not paying them any mind. Sirius had no bags, just the clothes on his back.

“Okay,” he said. “C’mon, the car’s this way.”

Leading the way back to the carpark, Remus opened the Roll’s door for Sirius and watched as he stood back and raised an eyebrow.

“Don’t tell me this is yours?”

“No, it's not,” Remus scoffed. “So bloody get in before a bobby starts sniffing around.”

Sirius looked at him and Remus saw the briefest hint of a smile on his face as he slid into the front seat. Lord how he'd missed that smile. Stomach in knots, he closed the door after him and went around to the driver’s seat, strapping himself in and starting up the car. It was immensely hard—like holding back an atom bomb, really—to not just simply explode on Sirius with all his questions, but doing that would probably just make Sirius retreat further. As they pulled out of the car park and left the port behind, Sirius kept his head to the window, watching it until everything passed out of sight. Only then did he finally look relieved.

They drove in silence for the first bit. Remus tried hard to focus on the road, but if there was only a single distraction in the world, then it was going to be Sirius Black. What with his quippy jokes, bobbing leg, snapping or strumming fingers—except now Sirius wasn’t doing any of it. Utterly still and silent as a grave, it was like all the life and energy had been drained out of him. Remus was reminded of last January, when Sirius had returned to school cold and distant. Now the twilight reflected poorly off his pale skin, turning him as grey and muted as his clothes.

As the evening road lights of the M20 began to flicker across their faces, Remus remembered the chocolate bars and smokes he’d picked up from the petrol station. Licking his lips, and he gestured to the glove box.

“There’s some chocolate and smokes in the glove compartment.”

Sirius looked back from the window, blinking a bit. “Chocolate and cigarettes? How much more ‘Remus Lupin’ can you get?”

“Just eat. Chocolate might be a bit melted now though.”

Bending forward, Sirius opened the glovebox and pulled out a bar and the pack of Embassys. Always the dramatic, he went for the cigarettes first, popping the top of the carton.

"I see you didn't bother to wait," he smirked, putting one of the remaining cigarettes between his teeth.

"I paid for them. And 'sides, you still owe me for the last round."

"Mhm. Don't worry, I'm good for it. I mean, look at me—simply dripping in wealth."

Remus smiled a bit, reassured by the joke. With one hand on the wheel, he shimmied his lighter out of his pocket, holding it up and flicking the flame to life. Sirius came forward and lit his smoke, before cracking the Roll’s window and exhaling in relief.

“God, that’s better,” he moaned, ripping open a chocolate bar and taking bites between puffs. “You’re actually quite good,” Sirius said over a full-mouth, once he’d gotten some energy back. Remus looked to him in question and Sirius gestured to the road with his cigarette.

“What? Oh, you mean driving. Yeah, told you I was getting lessons.”

“No, you didn’t.”

“Yeah, I did. Said so in my—”

Remus stopped abruptly, remembering how he hadn’t gotten a single written response from Sirius all summer. Sirius, clever as he was, caught up easily. He swallowed a mouthful of chocolate and caramel and carefully licked the stickiness from his fingers before pulling another drag.

“If you wrote me any letters, I never got them,” he said, exhaling.

“Figured as much,” Remus mumbled. He sounded disappointed, but really it was a relief. He’d been so worried that Sirius wasn’t writing to him because of what had happened in the bathroom on their last day of school, as though things had suddenly changed between them —that they weren’t friends anymore. His only reassurance that he wasn't the only one being frozen out had come when Sirius hadn't responded to any of James or Peter's letters either, though that had hardly been cause for celebration.

"Do you want to tell me what you were doing in Belgium now?" Remus asked.

Sirius kept his face to the window. "It was mum's idea, I think. I couldn't tell what it was, but things were different when I got back."

"Different how?"

"Different like... they didn't notice me. At first I thought it was a punishment—the ignoring. Mum's never been able to do it before, she always wants the last word, but this time it was like I... wasn't even there anymore. None of them talked to me for the first two weeks."

"Not even Regulus?"

"He did... a little. I tried apologising for the prank, but he didn't care. Not that he should have to. It was... bad. You know, what I did to him... Pretty sure mum told him not to talk to me too. I didn't realise it then, but she was cutting ties—just waiting for everything to be ready." Sirius laughed dryly. "For the fucking paperwork to come through."

"I don't understand..."

Sirius took another drag, but he must've inhaled straight into his lungs because it left him coughing. "Guess she'd—" cough; "—She'd heard about this school that supposedly could straighten out even the worst benders." Cough, cough; "... She probably thought it would work on me too."

Remus stared at him in alarm, before snapping his eyes back to the road. Benders?

"You mean she knows about you and—er… other… guys?"

"Ha—" Sirius paused to clear his throat. "I just mean she wanted her problem solved—me solved. I turn eighteen this year, so they had to send me away before then if they had any chance of getting me committed."

"Committed?!"

“I know, right? Turns out crazy runs in my family too. We’ve so much in common, you and I.” Sirius laughed half-heartedly, then frowned very deeply. “Sorry… Didn’t mean that.”

Remus hardly cared. If there was a time to be mad at Sirius Black, it wasn’t now.

“So weren't they… gonna let you come back to school?” He asked.

“Nope. The school runs all year round, and if you're really good—summers too. Hah... Guess we know now what Reg was on about when he talked to you before.”

Putting two and two together, Remus grew suddenly furious. “You mean the little bleeder knew that they were gonna send you away and he still didn’t say anything? At all?!”

“Can't hardly blame him,” Sirius said, uncharacteristically apathetic. “I was a right bastard, and he was just trying to save his own skin. Probably figured that he’d get sent away too if he tried saying anything against it.”

That’s no excuse, Remus silently seethed. Sirius was right, Regulus had no loyalty to anyone.

“So how’d you end up in Dover then?” He asked finally.

“The school—they call it a school, but it’s more like an institution. Kids from all over, most of us didn't even speak the same language, not that they allowed much interaction. It's all about 'healing' or some crap. 'Healing the mind through constraint of the body'—pretty sure they got their slogans from the Mansons... So it goes like, you've got your crazy kids—I'm talking the kind that use their own shit to draw on the walls. Then there's your 'problem kids', like moi for example, though I'm pretty sure I was small fry in comparison. A couple of them had already been to prison, though none of them could roll a joint like you."

"You had weed with you?"

"There's a mule everywhere, Moons. But yeah... got the strap for that one. And everything’s grey—the clothes, the beds, the walls, and there’s bars on most of the windows. It's like a real prison. It was in Ghent. I’m still not exactly sure what part—didn’t stop to ask—but at least it was in the city and not in some nowhere part of the countryside. Then I would've been really fucked.”

Remus stared at the road. He hated the Blacks. Who could do that to their own son?

“And... how long were you there for?”

“A week, maybe? What’s the date anyway?”

“It’s the twenty-second.”

Sirius swore. “Almost two then.”

“Fucking—How could you not know what day it was?”

“They have an ‘isolation room’. You get sent there if you lip off too much. Guess I was in there longer than I thought.”

Remus’ hands tightened on the wheel. “Jesus…”

“Yeah, but you should’a saw it when I started swearing at them in German—then French! They understood that, ha. They probably thought I was just some dumb English prat—they got all angry and nasty and this big woman—I’m talking built like a fridge, bint was massive—she screwed up her face real and tight and she… well, she…” Sirius trailed off. “Doesn’t matter. When they let me out I managed to sneak out through a second floor window when one of the crappy matrons left her office open. Thought they’d know better actually.”

“You and bloody windows.”

Sirius smirked and held up his hands. “No injuries this time, promise. Anyway, after I got out I hitchhiked across the border into France with this old farmer. He only spoke Dutch, but seemed nice enough. Kept showing me this picture of his wife he kept in his wallet. I think she was dead. But he got me all the way to Calais, and I walked the rest of the way toward the ferry.”

“Fuck... Hitchhiking...?" Remus took a breath. "Mary’s in France, why didn’t you just call her?”

Sirius grimaced slightly. “I thought about it, but explaining everything to her with her family around sounded horrible, and besides, Paris is south of Calais. I wanted to go north.”

“Did you even fucking sleep at all?”

“No, but it’s fine now, you’re here.”

Remus pressed his lips together in a thin line. He wished they had the radio, but this part of the highway was like a radio dead-zone. At least it was finally dark out, and eventually the yellow road lamps had fallen away. The only light came from their headlights and those of passing cards on the other side of the motorway.

“Want me to take over for a while?” Sirius asked casually.

“Do you even know how to drive?”

“No, but it can’t be that hard. You’re doing it.”

“Sod off. I’m fine,” Remus said. “You should sleep. There’s a jacket in the back you can use for a blanket if you want.”

Flicking his cigarette stub out the window, Sirius turned around and pulled Giles’ jacket over him, settling back against the car door. Remus watched him subtly, and Sirius’ eyes eventually slid closed.

“… Moony?”

“You’re supposed to be sleeping.”

“I know, it’s just… Don’t crash.”

Remus smiled to himself. “Sleep.”

He heard Sirius chuckle, but turned quiet after that, too tired to keep his eyes open any longer. Remus drove on in silence, occasionally sneaking a glance to his right. As always, Sirius looked best in the moonlight. No longer grey, but luminous again. Funny how friends and laughter could do that. The flat cap he was wearing still hid most of his hair but a thick lock had come loose just behind his ear, draping down his neck like a curtain.

Around twenty minutes later, as they were nearing Bexleyheath, the radio gave a crackle. Picking up the station he’d lost on his way to Dover, it cut into a song mid-way and suddenly the radio was playing the Beatles over the Roll’s dull roar;

‘—comes the sun, do, do, do,
Here comes the sun,
And I say, it’s alright…’

Not wanting to wake Sirius, Remus reached out to turn the volume down, when suddenly a voice croaked out; “Don’t.”

He froze, glancing between the road and Sirius, who was peering at him over the shoulder of the jacket.

“It’s okay,” Sirius murmured, “I like it.”

Slowly, Remus pulled back and gave a nod; “Alright, then.”

Sirius smiled, and when the next verse picked up again he began to sing along, more than a weak murmur than anything else. Remus loved it.

‘Little darling, the smiles returning to the faces,
Little darling, it seems like years since it’s been here;
Here comes the sun, do, do, do,
Here comes the sun,
And I say, it’s alright…’

Remus relaxed in his seat, leaning one arm against the window as he drove. By all accounts he’d had a good summer so far, but now that Sirius was there, all else paled in comparison. That was what love was, he supposed—even if Sirius had asked him to forget all of it, he couldn’t. It would’ve taken everything he had to do that.

But it took nothing to sing along, so as Sirius murmured the lyrics, sleepy and finally at peace, he did too.

* * *

He knew Giles was going to be mad, but this was something else. At nearly midnight, Remus had pulled up to the Lupin estate’s front gates in the Rolls. Sirius had already squeezed himself into the foot space between his seat and the glove compartment, and with the jacket draped over him it was as though he weren’t there at all. The gateman still gaped at Remus as he pulled up, but he just held a finger to his lips and the guy eventually let him in.

“The Latin on the gate,” Sirius said, flipping the jacket off of him after they’d driven through; “ ‘Homo homini lupus est’—does it mean what I think it means?"

"Oh you mean you don't know? Thought you were taking Latin for an A-Levels."

Sirius gave him an unimpressed look and Remus smirked.

"It means, 'a man is a wolf to his fellow man'."

"Ew. That your family motto?"

"Guess so."

"Well, I suppose it's still better than mine."

Remus made sure to pull up tightly to the house, next to the kitchen entrance and just out of view from the main windows. "What's yours then?"

" 'Toujours pur'—always pure."

"Damn French people."

"D'accord."

Releasing their seat belts, they got out together and briskly scuttled up the front steps, careful to remain as inconspicuous as possible. There were no lights on inside, which made for some relief, and using Giles' keys Remus was able to open the front door and let them inside.

"Wow. Guess you Lupins do pretty well for yourselves," Sirius said, gazing around at the grand foyer. "Hard to believe a bloke as hard as you grew up in a place like this."

Remus pushed him toward the stairs. "I know you're just saying that, and I hate you for it. Now move on already."

Sirius opened his mouth to make another jab, but instead all that came out was a; "HAVE YOU LOST YOUR GODDAMN MIND?!"

"Crikey!" Sirius gasped, as they both practically fell over in shock. More quick to the draw, Remus shoved him the rest of the way up the stairs and then promptly stumbled back down them on his own, ready to head Giles off as he stormed out of the hallway. The old driver appeared not half a second later, face red up to his hairline, with his fists raised as though he were about to go several rounds with Muhammad Ali.

“STEALING A CAR?” He roared, halting in the middle of the foyer. “YOU ACTUALLY STOLE THE CAR?”

“Have you told my dad?” Remus asked automatically.

“HAVE I—no, but I bloody well should have! I thought I’d raised you better! I mean, really—what were you THINKING?!”

I wasn’t, Remus told himself. And it was true—it had all been about getting to Sirius. Not that he could tell Giles that. As good as Giles was, he couldn’t trust that he wouldn’t try and send Sirius back home. Adults were like that, always assuming they knew best. Well, he was the one who knew Sirius best.

“I’m sorry,” he said honestly. “Would you believe me if I told you it was important?”

“What could be so bloody important that a seventeen year-old has to commit grand theft auto?!”

“I…” Remus looked down, then his eyes slid to the second floor, where Sirius was still hidden out of sight. “… I can’t tell you.”

“Can’t you at least lie then?” Giles snapped.

“You really want me to lie?”

“Of course not! Might make me feel better though!”

“And here I thought you’d raised me better than that.”

“Ooh, you cheeky…” Giles sucked in a deep breath, growing big in the chest and puckering his mouth like a balloon ready to explode. “So what?” He grunted. “You’re not gonna tell me where it is you were?”

It hurt, but no, he couldn’t. Remus shook his head. “I didn’t go to the End though,” he added quickly, “I swear.”

“I bloody-well know you didn’t go to the East End! If you had, the Rolls would be down a tire and its back window would be smashed in!”

“But they’re not!” He agreed. “So that means everything’s okay…?”

“Everything is most definitely NOT OKAY!”

Remus winced. “Alright, I can tell you're mad—"

"Try FURIOUS!"

"—But can you at least wait to punish me until tomorrow? I promise to do whatever you say without any complaints."

It wasn't enough, not by miles, but the old man had clearly run out of steam. He deflated with another unsatisfied grunt and thrust out his open palm. Remus stared at it a moment, before understanding. Quickly, he stepped forward and handed over the keys. Giles snapped them up like hot coal and promptly dropped them into his pocket.

"Fine, go," he lashed; "Get to bed before I put you over my goddamn knee. And for your sake, you best haven't put a scratch on 'er!"

Remus couldn't help it; he threw his arms around Giles and squeezed tight. "Thanks, Gil. Knew you'd understand."

For all his anger, Giles did not push him away. He did, however, sputter a bit in surprise; "Er—don't think this means you're suddenly fancy-free! I'm gonna work you for all you're sodding worth, starting first-thing tomorrow!"

"Whatever you say," Remus said, not the least bit bothered.

Once the hug had long overstayed the usual Remus' level of welcome, Remus let go and started up the stairs, an extra spring in his step.

"Don't you forget—tomorrow morning, seven AM!" Giles called after him. "You're going to scrub that car until I can pick my teeth in its bumper!"

"Oh goodie, so I only have to scrub enough for three teeth then?"

"What'd you say?"

"Nothing!"

"Yeah, just get going, ya little blighter! And be quiet already, it's bleedin' midnight!"

As Giles fell away behind him, Remus obediently raced up the rest of the stairs and swung himself around the banister. He was aiming for the hall, ready to tell Sirius that they'd actually gotten away with all of it when he nearly tripped over him instead. Sirius, who was crouching behind the railing like a spying child, looked up at Remus as he skidded to a halt just before his shins.

“So that’s Giles,” Sirius sniggered; “Seems like a decent enough bloke.”

“You’re a dirty eavesdropper,” Remus said lightly, before reaching down and taking his arm. Hauling Sirius to his feet, they quietly scuttled down the hallway to his bedroom, and soon enough they were both slipping inside.

“Sorry for the mess. I mostly tell the maids not to come in here,” Remus said as he got the lights. They came on all at once, illuminating the scattered piles of books, records, and unfinished summer homework, as well as all of the laundry and dishes he’d neglected to clear away. Among them was a breakfast tray from several days ago, still sitting by the door and now looking decently mouldy. Snatching up a dirty t-shirt from the floor, Remus quickly covered it while Sirius watched him from the corner of his eye, looking amused.

“Nah, s’fine,” he said, taking the room in and appearing almost mesmerized by the grand space. “Though I’d be lying if I said I weren’t surprised. You’re so neat at school.”

Remus put his hands in his pockets and shrugged. “This ain’t school, I guess…”

“Got that right.” Sirius stopped to right an old tea mug, which had fallen from atop a stack of books at the foot of his bed. “Your room's pretty huge though. You could fit like… thirty marauders in here.”

“You’re telling me yours ain’t bigger?”

“No, it is.” Sirius kept looking around. At the heavy velvet curtains, the dour wallpaper, the ancient rugs. “I dunno, maybe it’s me, but it just doesn’t feel like you…”

“It's a stranger’s room,” Remus agreed, following him in. “I know. Never cared for it much myself.”

“Mine neither,” Sirius said, looking at him softly. Remus returned the look, and suddenly the urge to kiss him was so great he could feel his mouth begin to water. Luckily Sirius was too enamoured by the room to notice. He’d already moved away again, spotting Andy’s guitar, which Remus had left leaning up against the far side of his bed.

“This I remember,” he grinned. “Thought James took it for the summer?” Throwing himself over the bed, Sirius reached for the instrument and sat up, slinging it across his lap. He took a moment to pluck a few strings before wincing. “Ooh, out of tune.”

“Well, that would be my fault,” Remus said, coming forward to lean casually against the bedpost. “James actually got his own. He lent me yours so I could try practising on it, but I’m not very good.”

“He got his own guitar?” Sirius echoed with delight. “And you’re playing now?”

“I only gave it a shot, yeah, but it’s really James you should hear. He’s been practising every day—oh, and Pete got his own drum set!”

“Actually?”

“Yeah! I haven’t seen it myself but James says it’s positively ace. Guess there’s a lot you gotta catch up on, Padfoot. Heh.” He’d meant it as a joke, but Sirius looked down to the guitar, gently patting its body with his hand and Remus knew it’d been the wrong thing to say.

“Sirius, I didn’t mean—”

“No, it’s okay,” Sirius said quickly, “s’normal… the summers. Used to suck more when we were kids, but ya get through it. Like Christmas. I'd rather you catch me up anyway.”

“Y-You would?”

“Yeah, James and Pete take forever to tell a story, but you’re much more streamlined. And besides, they’re off at the summer house anyway, right? I don't think I can handle listening to them go on about the same damn beach. It's always the same—sandy.”

“Oh yeah, right. Heh...” Remus bit his lip over a smile. “We should tell them that you’re here actually. And what happened. They’re really worried.”

“Nah, it’s late,” Sirius said, shaking his head adamantly. He was still wearing that ugly cap. “Besides, I don’t want to ruin their holiday.”

“You wouldn’t ruin it. They’d be thrilled—not the Belgium part, the part about you being alright…”

“Yeah, they’d be thrilled, alright. So thrilled they’d hop the first train back to make sure you’re telling the truth. Trust me, I know James.”

“So… what? You just want to wait until they get back? That’ll be almost a month from now.”

Sirius looked up at him in earnest. “Would that be a problem? I just… Sorry... I know you didn’t exactly ask your family if I could visit.”

Remus was quick to correct his mistake; he didn't want Sirius to think he was unwelcome. “Shut up. Do you really think I ask permission to do things?”

Sirius chuckled quickly. “You’re right. I think tonight is case in point enough. But I still don’t want to intrude.”

“Why? Intruding’s never bothered you before.”

Sirius shrugged, then played a few more sad notes.

Almost frowning, Remus reached out and grabbed hold of the head of the guitar. “I’m kidding—it’s fine, Sirius. You can stay here. For… For as long as you want.”

Sirius looked to his hand on the guitar, licking his lips. “Thanks, Moony.”

“Don’t thank me anymore, you would’ve done the same.”

“Obviously.” Sirius smiled and Remus sheepishly let go of the guitar.

“Are you… Are you hungry then?”

“Nah, jus’ tired. I could use a shower though.”

“Yeah, you do smell a bit like a sewer.”

“Ow. A sewer of roses, maybe.”

Remus pointed to the far wall. “Toilet’s there. Should have everything. Use whatever you want, just make sure you lock the other door. Sometimes the maids make night rounds for the dirty towels and they’re pretty shite at knocking.”

Setting the guitar aside and popping to his feet, Sirius wiggled his eyebrows suggestively. “Oh, I dunno… Maybe I’ll just leave the door open a crack. See who wanders in.”

“I wouldn’t. Most of them are old enough to be your grandmother. And you're supposed to be hiding.”

Sirius laughed, then reached out to put a hand on Remus’ shoulder. “You’re a real friend, Moons. Don't know what I did to deserve you.”

That makes two of us.

Taking a breath, Remus nodded and then watched while Sirius turned and slipped into the bathroom. As the door clicked shut, a puzzled feeling fell over him, and he glanced at the guitar suspiciously. It almost felt like he'd missed a punchline. Was his comedic timing off? No, never. Not unless…

"Wait…" he murmured as the shower turned on, "did he mean leave the door open in case… I wandered in?"

The guitar said nothing, and Remus suddenly felt very, very stupid.

"AUGH!" He cried, smacking the bed covers like a tantruming child. "What the hell?!"

Missed your shot, did ya, Romeo?

"What?! No! No way! Ugh—there is absolutely no way he could've actually meant me."

He was looking at you when he said it, wasn't he?

"Yeah—and he was joking!"

Believe it or not, but I don't actually think that toilet conjugal visits are beyond him.

"But he called me a friend! A bloody friend!"

Hey, I'm on your side here. Get it in already or fucking get out, ya moron.

Remus scowled. I hate you.

Determined to stifle the infernal voice in his head, Remus set off to do the thing he should've gotten out of the way days ago—cleaning. Collecting all of the dirty dishes, he snuck out and carried each armful down to the kitchens, trying his best not to make too much noise as he left them to soak in the sink. While he was down there, he grabbed a few day-old scones for Sirius and filled up a large glass of water before making his way back upstairs. No one bothered him, it being so late, and he could still hear the gentle rush of the shower as he walked inside.

You could try the door, see if he left it open.

Ugh… Sod off already, why don't you!

Gathering up his dirty laundry, Remus threw it all into the hamper next to the bathroom before fighting with his bed covers and shoving them in too. He was still a seventeen year-old boy, which meant he hadn't changed them since returning for the holiday, but he thought Sirius might appreciate some clean sheets after what he'd been through. The books and records he left alone, because Sirius would also appreciate them.

Just as he had finished tucking the blanket's corners in, the man of the hour finally emerged from the steaming bathroom. Sirius was still wearing the trousers he'd arrived in, but his chest was bare, and he had a towel over his head which he used to rub the dampness from his hair.

"I'll get you something to sleep in!" Remus called, trying not to make eye contact with his half-naked roommate as he rushed to the wardrobe. "Bed's clean, by the way. You can take the left side. Or the right—doesn't really matter to me."

Sirius looked up, keeping the towel around his head. "It's fine. I'll take the sofa over there."

Remus froze. "Oh! Er…"

"Sorry," Sirius said, quickly padding over to the small chaise lounge that sat in the corner of the room. "It's just… It's your bed, innit? And I really don't want to be any more of a bother."

"You wouldn't be! But—ehm…" Remus bit down hard on his tongue as he slowly pawed through the clothes in his wardrobe; "Sorry, I just assumed, but… Sorry… It's fine. Just um… here." Picking out a pair of winceyette pyjama bottoms, he crossed the room and awkwardly handed them over.

"Thanks," Sirius said, taking them. He reached up to remove the towel, before stopping midway and gesturing meekly to the trousers. "Sorry, do you mind?"

"Oh! No, go ahead." Remus cleared his throat. "I'll just… get you a blanket." Streaking away, he snatched the fresh quilt off of his bed and began bunching it up in his arms. He hadn't been able to avoid looking at Sirius' scars—the shiny, pink layers of skin that pulled taut over his shoulder like wax—but they'd hardly mattered. It was really everything else that had intrigued him so badly. Not that any of that was a good idea. Stupid, stupid, stupid!

“Can I take one of these, then?” Sirius said, appearing at his elbow with the towel still hanging over his head. He’d really only been gesturing to the pillows, but it still made Remus leap about a foot into the air. “Jesus! You feeling alright?”

“Er—yeah!" Remus winced. "Sorry, just tired too. You go ahead. My casa or whatever…”

“Cool.” Sirius plucked a pillow off his bed. “Oh and by the way, it’s ‘mi casa’.”

“… What?”

“The saying—‘mi casa, es su casa’.”

“Oh. Right.” Remus swallowed thickly, before handing him the blanket. Sirius took it, and his fingertips brushed the back of Remus’ hand, making goosebumps sprout all the way up to his shoulder.

Stop being such an idiot, you sleep in the same room for most of the year, don’t you?

This is different. He’s in my room—with his shirt off!

“You sure you’re okay, Moons?” Sirius asked, peering at him.

“I'm fine—it should be you we're worried about! Not that—er... Sorry. I can… I can take that towel from ya now.”

Sirius reached up to bundle either side under his chin like some Russian grandmother. “I’m good. Hair’s still kinda wet. But hey, thanks for the blanket. And the trousers, though… they are a bit long.”

They both looked down, and Remus noted the bunched up fabric around Sirius’ ankles. Sirius would’ve never called himself short, so he was obviously doing it to make Remus feel better. And it did work some.

“I left some water and a few scones for you on that table there,” Remus said in what he hoped was a kindly way. “I know it’s late and all, but they shouldn’t be rock-hard yet.”

“Yum. You’re the best.” Tucking the pillow and blanket under one arm, Sirius gave him a friendly nudge to the shoulder with his fist before walking over to the chaise. As he went about turning the lounge into an acceptable bed, Remus drew the curtains and got the light. His ears still felt hot, but it was manageable.

“Moony?” Sirius called, after they’d both finally settled down under their covers. His voice felt so far away in the big room—completely unlike the comfort of their dorm.

“Yeah…?”

“Thanks.”

Staring up at the roof of his bed, Remus felt his heart flutter again. It was horrible.

“I told you—stop saying thanks.”

“I mean it though,” Sirius insisted; “You really saved me back there.”

Remus turned over in bed. Through a crack in the curtains, he could just make out the moon, full and bright. Hopeful.

“See you in the morning, Sirius."

“... Okay, Moony.”

* * *

The next morning, Remus served his punishment and then some for stealing the Rolls and taking it for his so-called “joy ride”. He scrubbed and scrubbed until his fingers were prunes and the car shone with a million sun-kisses twinkles. When Giles could see his every pore in its reflection, he continued his discipline by making Remus polish the floor of the foyer, hang all of the laundry, clean every window in the ground floor, and finish it all off by washing his dishes from the night before—plus any that had been procured from breakfast that day. The kitchen ladies seemed to find it all quite comical, but rewarded him for his efforts with heaping trays of breakfast.

“Gots to feed the growing boy,” one of the cooks—an old Romanian woman named Imena—said, after insisting he take a fifth piece of toast. Remus didn’t argue. He was eating for two stomachs today.

Punishment finally finished with, Remus made a quick pit-stop to pick up a certain someone before sneaking the food up to the second floor. He'd almost toppled both glasses of orange juice several times by the time he stopped outside his own bedroom, but after knocking twice, then twice again—their code, 'I'm okay' —Remus stuck his head in.

"Sirius, you up? Snuck you some breakfast."

"Yes! Absolutely famished," Sirius cried, tossing a random book aside as he shot upright. He was already dressed, all in borrowed clothes, and had folded the blanket and pillow up on the back of the little sofa like any good house guest.

Remus grinned and got ready to open the door wide. "Good. 'Cause the ladies in the kitchen hooked us up. Also... I might have a surprise."

"Ooh. I love surprises. What is it?"

"Don't freak out, but I brought someone to see you."

Sirius froze a bit, like he was afraid James was about to come thundering into the room, but the moment Remus opened the door fully and allowed a single excited coonhound to race inside, a huge grin bloomed across his face.

"Oh shit—dog!"

It was all Sirius had time to say before Dusty had zoomed across the room and bowled right through his middle. "OOF—! Down boy! Jesus. Excitable bugger, aren't you?" Sirius began scratching the speckled dog behind the scruff of his neck. "Now, who might you be? Hold on, this can't be the legendary Dusty, can it?"

Eyeing the glasses of juice precariously to avoid spilling, Remus came in and shut the door behind him with a little jerk his foot, before crossing the room and setting their breakfasts down on the coffee table in front of the chaise. "Padfoot, meet Dusty—Dusty, meet Padfoot."

"Well, Dusty I—oh! That's right, you have another Padfoot here! Where is he? I should like to meet such a distinguished gentleman."

Remus shrugged. "He's probably in the kennel—it's one of the big buildings on the other side of the lawn. Only Dusty comes into the house."

"And how'd you get so lucky, huh?" Sirius grabbed Dusty round the snout, leaning in and making a shameless kissy-face at the end of his nose. Obviously thrilled by the attention, Dusty retaliated by surging forward again, slamming his snout into Sirius' chin and making his head snap back sharply.

"Agh, fuck! Man, I think he rattled my brain."

Sirius pressed a hand to his forehead, careful to avoid the brim of his hat. It was the only thing he'd brought from Belgium that he insisted on keeping, despite the fact that it made him look like a charity advert.

"Why are you still wearing that thing?" Remus asked, busy arranging their breakfast trays on the table. "Weren't you the one who said that all hats are a menace to good hair?"

Sirius grunted, trying to shove Dusty off of him as he desperately lapped at the side of his face. "I'm just… c'mon boy... Just—trying to bring back the style!" He declared. "Why? You mean to say that you're suddenly into fashion?"

Remus just looked at him.

"There then," Sirius said, as Dusty practically bowled him over on the chaise. "It's a statement, just like Marauders. You're just—ngh—behind the times, Lupin."

Remus shook his head, before pulling Dusty off of his friend and passing Sirius a fork. Sirius took it eagerly, and immediately began shovelling huge bites into his mouth as though he were actually starving. Remus realised with a pang that he might be.

"Fuck, I missed fry-ups," Sirius moaned. "Mum hates anything greasy. I swear, she's probably made of porridge at this point. Porridge and hatred."

"I can get you more later if you're still hungry," Remus promised, fiddling with a sausage. Dusty began to whine until he caved and fed it to him. "And we can visit the dogs as long as we're careful. I don't think they're doing any training today anyway."

"Thought I was supposed to be hiding?"

"You are... but I could lie. Say you're a friend. S'not like you'll have to meet my dad or anything."

Sirius gave him a wry look, which was stifled only by his giant mouthful of egg and toast. “Ah, don’t you fret over me.”

“I’m not fretting.”

“You are. It's like your default setting. Mooning Moony."

“I just don’t want you to feel cooped up in here.”

Swallowing, Sirius waved him off. “Oh no, I’ve got plenty of entertainment. You, the guitar, your astounding collection of books lacking any and all plot—and now Dusty!”

“My books have plot.”

“If you count eternal damnation and self-loathing as plot, then sure. But oh, that’s right… I’m forgetting the really scurrilous stuff. You tried to hide it, but I’ve a nose for things like these. I snuffed you out, you sneaky tosser.”

Remus shrugged, assuming that Sirius was talking about the small bit of weed he’d hidden in the bottom drawer of his dresser. “You can have it, but I wouldn’t smoke it in here. Pretty sure Giles can smell burning hash from a mile away.”

“I didn’t mean the weed—though I did find that too.”

“Then what?” He glanced at the bookshelves. “A book? I dunno which one it could be then. I may have a copy of ‘Frankenstein’ lying around if you’re that desperate, but I’d hardly call Mary Shelley ‘scurrilous’.”

“So you admit they have no plot!” Sirius smirked devilishly, and then suddenly whipped a letter out from under a pillow, torn open on its top; “No, it’s not Frankenstein, my poor Watson. What I found was much more interesting.” He turned it over, holding the letter up to the side of his face and puckering directly next to the kiss mark on its back.

Oh shit.

“Sirius, don’t—!”

“You never told me Jillian Stewart had a thing for you, Moony! And blimey, judging by the length of this love letter, she is absolutely smitten!”

“You asshole!”

Remus lunged across the table for the letter, nearly scattering the dishes, but Sirius only let out a bark of laughter and sat upright on the sofa, waving the letter in the air as if to taunt him with it.

“Don’t be too embarrassed, Stewart really does have a way with words! I mean, just listen to this prose—‘kinder than mother Theresa, the smartest boy in our year, eyes like the sea—oh fuck, Moons! She got your eye colour wrong! What a shite girlfriend.”

“Sirius, I’m gonna kill you!”

Coming around the table, Remus dodged his gangly dog and threw himself forward. He ended up missing the letter and falling against the plush edge of the chaise while Dusty barked frantically and Sirius slid away, grinning maniacally.

“You should frame it—put it in a museum! Call it ‘les désespérés et les dégénérés’!”

“Give it back!”

“No way—I’m gonna frame it!” Peeling the letter free from his envelope, Sirius tossed the extra paper away and slipped further from Remus. He used one hand to unfurl the letter and kept the other pressed to the top of his head to hold his post boy’s cap down. “ ‘Dear Remus’,” he read; “ ‘I’ve only just arrived in Bordeaux’—she’s in France? Did you tell her to look Mary up?”

“Give it to me!”

“No! Finder’s keepers, Moons! Now—where was I?”

Grabbing him by the ankle, Remus gave a single viscous tug and Sirius flopped directly down onto his back with a yelp. The noise was almost too satisfying, and Remus fought a grin as Sirius scowled defiantly. Giving him a sharp push, Sirius made to turn over and shimmy away but Remus stopped that too, pinning his leg in place.

“Gotcha,” he said smugly. “Now give that back.”

Sirius smirked. “In your dreams, Lupin. Dusty—here boy, come and get the treat!”

Instantly Dusty was there. He swiped the letter from Sirius’ outstretched arm like it was another sausage and shot across the room with it.

“So NOW you listen?!” Remus moaned. Pushing up, he started scrambling to get away, but Sirius was faster. He brought his knee up at the last second, catching Remus in the gut and making him sag back into the sofa. Sitting up, Sirius laughed at him—the git—and made to turn, but Remus wouldn’t have it.

“Right… that’s it!”

He lunged again, grappling his friend and pinning him back onto the velvet. This time Remus didn’t stop until he was straddling Sirius round the waist. Sirius fought back of course, almost like he did with James, and soon enough they were really scrapping. Struggling to keep his hold, Remus grunted—Sirius was like an eel, twisting every which way in attempts to escape. He had to squeeze his thighs just to keep him in place and took several light jabs to the chest for it, but Sirius’ smack was like the gentle kiss of butterfly wings compared to some of the rounds he used to go with Doss and Lee. His legs were deadly enough, but with those pinned, Remus was obviously the winner. Almost laughing—I’ve got you!—he used his hands to cage Sirius in, pressing them to the sofa on either side of his face and leaned forward to—what? Punch him? Kiss him?

Not that it mattered.

Before Remus could decide what it was he was about to do, Sirius wrapped a hand around his wrist and shoved it directly off the edge of the sofa. With all of his weight leaning on his hands and nothing keeping him from diving head-first into Sirius’ nose, Remus dipped forward and let out a sharp squawk of surprise. He was a hair’s distance away from smacking their foreheads together when he managed to catch himself, and as his chest heaved, he looked up to find the both of them nose-to-nose. Staring back at him, Sirius’ lips also parted in shock.

Kiss him!

The thought was almost like a punch to the head. It hit Remus all at once, and he let out a second noise, this one a mixture of what sounded like a gag and grunt. It broke Sirius’ spell, and his face split into a grin as he began to laugh at him.

“Ha! You’re a real shit boxer, Moons. Wouldn't last ten seconds against Prongs.”

Remus couldn’t even comprehend enough to laugh. He was too busy reeling—still stuck on that little ring of pure blue he could see encircling both of Sirius' pupils.

Kiss him, you great quaking idiot!

"I…"

Do it! He's already kissed you!

"I'm… what?"

"Moons? You good...?"

"I—er... uhm... ngh...?"

It was like he had suddenly become incapable of all thought. Remus bit down on his lip hard. He hadn't meant for this, if anything it was Sirius' fault, and yet now he couldn't even find the strength in his arms to move. Surely Sirius would tell him to get off if he was really that inconvenienced, so maybe…

WOOF!

A bark cut across the bedroom, demanding their attention. That's right, they had an audience. Dusty was several feet away, finished with his treat, which was now in pieces around his feet. Suddenly mortified, Remus straightened up and quickly clambered off of his best friend before Sirius had the chance to hear the raging thump of his heart.

That's right… that's your best friend—the best friend that you should've kissed, you blithering pansy!

Resisting a moan, Remus stubbornly shoved all thoughts of kissing away. He'd hoped that after everything with James and Peter, and then with the girls, that things might feel clearer; and yet there he was, dripping in anxiety the moment Sirius so much as glanced at him. Fuck. How was he ever going to survive the summer?

Drawing in a breath, Remus began marching away from the chaise.

I'm not gay. I'm not gay, he told himself. He's just impossible not to notice. It's like his job. Him and that annoyingly stupid-horrible-beautiful face—no! Think of something else—think of the stupid hat!

Dusty barked again—WOOF!—as Remus reached him. He was sitting proudly by the foot of the bed, the remains of Jillian's letter scattered in a slobbery circle around his feet.

“That’s a damn shame,” Sirius called, as Remus bent down to scoop up the shredded pieces. “Can it not be saved at all?”

“I-I don’t need to save it,” Remus huffed, collecting every scrap into his palm and quickly moving to stuff it into the waist basket beside his desk. His face felt hot, so rather than turning around and risk Sirius seeing, he turned to the desk and began straightening out the messy stack of books he’d left sitting there. He’d just gotten all the spines to face the right way when Sirius appeared at his side, toeing the bin with Jillian’s letter.

“Sorry I got your love letter shredded.”

Remus smacked the book he was holding down onto the desk. “Don’t you listen to anything? I said it’s not a love letter!”

“Hm…” Sirius pressed his lips out into a curious pout. “Have you written her back at all?”

"No."

"Liar. You're too nice to not have."

Remus scowled. “… A few times. Only a few.”

“So you must like her then?”

“No! Jesus Christ—you said it yourself, I only answer to be polite!”

“But you still wrote her. C’mon, lover-boy, I’m not an idiot. You wrote to her knowing that it’d give her hope, and now she’s swooning at your curls, and dotting her ‘i’s with tiny hearts, and—”

“Well at least she wrote me!” Remus snapped viciously, before immediately regretting it. Sirius’ face fell, and instead of laughing he pressed his lips into a thin line, looking away dismissively.

“Yeah, well… sorry for that.”

“No,” Remus moaned, catching Sirius by the arm, “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean it. It wasn’t your fault. You were… ”

“I was deposed,” Sirius finished. “Packed up, forced onto a train, then a boat, then another train… But hey, my bad. Next time I’ll try and get you the address.”

Fuck. Remus sighed, before forcing a smile. “How ‘bout we just agree that there won't be a next time, okay?"

Sirius looked up at him through those thick lashes, and finally he nodded.

Feeling slightly at a loss over what to do next, Remus pushed the stack of books away and cleared his throat. "We should go somewhere. Get out of here for a while. I hate this house. Maybe not as much as you hate yours but… It just sucks the life out of you."

"Makes you miserable," Sirius agreed. "I get it. This mean you're gonna be my tour guide around London?"

"I'd probably be shit at that too, but yeah, I'll do it. Where do you want to go?"

Sirius shrugged. "Anywhere. London's my oyster."

"I thought it was 'the world's your oyster'."

"The world's too vast right now, Moons. We start with London, and then we take the world. More realistic that way."

Remus smiled, and he felt better. "Let's at least finish breakfast first."

Sirius' eyes flitted away. "Yeah… dunno about that one." He pointed, and Remus spun around to find Dusty with his head bent over a clear plate that had held half of a full English breakfast not five minutes before.

"Augh! Goddammit, Dusty!" He groaned as Sirius began to laugh from behind him. Marching up to the dog, he grabbed him by the collar, hauling him away from the table just as he was reaching for the rest of the toast. "You bloody—"

They were cut off by a sharp knock coming from the door. Already trained, Sirius all but dove behind the bed. It was smart of him too, since Remus was pretty sure he'd forgotten to lock the door. Instantly on edge, he forced Dusty to sit and cleared his throat.

"I'm changing, don't come in!"

"It's Carston, sir," the butler said through the door; "Your father has asked that you meet him in his office."

Remus huffed. "Bloody ruins everything… Alright! I'll be there in a moment!"

“Very good, sir.”

Releasing Dusty’s collar, Remus crept toward the door and waited several seconds before opening it and peering out. All he heard was the sound of the butler’s footsteps receding down the hall, and let out a sigh of relief.

“Dad’s office, huh?” Sirius drawled, now lounging on the bed. “Someone's in trouble... Heh—kidding. I know what that’s like.”

Remus shut the door quickly. “Are you gonna be okay in here?”

“Oh yeah, don’t worry about me or Dusty-man. We’ll be waiting right here for you when you get back. In fact, bring more eggs.”

WOOF!

Remus rolled his eyes. It was with love. “Fine. Be back in a jiffy then. Make sure you lock the door behind me.”

Sirius saluted, and Remus opened the door again, slipping out.

The main hallway was as quiet as normal. There was only the gentle patter of his feet on the wood as he walked, occasionally joined by the distant sounds of a maid moving about, most likely dusting some old china or changing the untouched linens on every unused bed. It all felt so pointless. A huge house, and for what? No one came over. No one slept in the beds. There was Sandra now… but Remus doubted it would actually last. She would realise eventually that Lyall was never going to put her before his work. She’d be lucky to make par with the dogs. She’d find out things that girlfriends ought not want to know, and then she’d decide none of it was worth it and whatever rose-tinted honeymoon she was living in would end. It was what had done-in Tomny and Tonya. Their ugly bits got a bit too ugly and then… poof.

Remus still wondered about Tomny. Couldn’t help it really. He wished he could talk to him about Sirius. For someone who’d grown up without any real role models, Tomny sure gave good advice. He’d probably have found the whole thing hilarious—rich boy is sent abroad and promptly runs away to live in his best friend’s closet. It would be funnier only because Sirius’ unusual antics were almost tame compared to people Tomny knew; the one difference was money and pride. Tomny would’ve told Orion and Walburga Black to take their ancient and noble lineage and shove it right up their arse.

Yeah… he missed Tomny.

But Sirius was there now, and they hadn't resorted to hiding in closets yet, though as Remus stopped outside his father's office, it occurred to him that perhaps they'd already been found out. For all they knew, Lyall could be preparing to have Sirius dragged home in chains. Inviting him alone to break the news was just his pathetic way of saving face. Remus would never let it happen—he'd force Sirius to call James first. Or Peter, or Lily, or even that cousin of his in Islington—Andy. She'd already been disowned for having her daughter out of wedlock. Didn't even help that she'd married the guy after—he was far too poor. And if not Andy, then someone. James' parents… an eccentric aunt… someone. Someone would help. They had to.

"You called for me?" Remus called, as he strode into the office without bothering to knock. If they were already caught then there was no need to stand on ceremony. Unexpectedly, he found Lyall not at his desk but across the room at the bar cabinet, pouring himself a scotch.

"A little early for drinking, innit?"

"The correct phrasing is, 'isn't it'," Lyall said dryly, capping the scotch and carrying the glass back to his impossibly large oak desk. "Get yourself one if you wish," he told him, "but close the door."

Remus didn't, but he did close the office door, only slightly bewildered by his father's unnervingly blasé attitude. As he approached the imposing desk, Lyall sipped his scotch and turned to admire the large painting that hung on the wall behind him. It was of a beach somewhere in Wales. He and Hope had gone there on their honeymoon. The Lupins had had enough money to go anywhere in the world when they'd married, and Hope had chosen there. Lyall had had the painting commissioned as a birthday gift a few years before that. Remus wasn't sure why he kept it around.

"Are we gonna talk or are we gonna just stand here?" He said, taking a deep breath to soothe his frayed nerves. Maybe Lyall didn't know about Sirius. Maybe he just wanted to lecture.

Turning away from the painting, Lyall set the scotch down and opened one of the finely crafted boxes on his desk and withdrew a cigar. Instead of setting it between his teeth, he offered it to Remus expectantly.

"No, I'm fine."

Lyall gave him a hard look. "Just take it."

Huffing lowly, Remus stepped up to the desk and took the cigar. Lyall lit a match and held it to one end, letting Remus puff on the other until it glowed orange. Instantly the peppery smoke had him coughing, and he drew back as Lyall lit one for himself, a ghost of a smile on his lips.

“Glad to know there’s some things you haven’t tried.”

Scowling, Remus held the cigar away from him, but didn’t put it down. He didn’t want to give Lyall the satisfaction. Casually, his father waved out the match and sucked back his own cigar, before breathing out the smoke and finally dropping down into his leather throne.

“I got a letter from your school today,” he said.

A flicker of hesitant hope bloomed in Remus’ chest. So it wasn’t about Sirius then… but what else?

“What did it say?” He asked, doing his best to remain aloof.

“That you’ve been asked to be a school prefect.”

It was not the answer Remus had been expecting.

“Well?" Lyall raised a brow. "Is it true?”

“… Yes.”

“And you’ve accepted?”

Thinking back to the silver prefect pin sitting on top of his dresser, Remus took a deep breath. “Yes…”

Lyall sucked in another lungful of cigar. “Good. Then I will inform the school that you’re looking to enter university right away. Your classes will have to be switched. Can't have anything unnecessary clogging up your schedule.”

Eyes blown wide, Remus stepped forward, nearly dropping his cigar. “My classes?! You can't just—”

“Your current choices are unacceptable,” Lyall snapped. “I’ve read the sylabuses. Medieval History, Pre-colonial Africa, the Life and Works of Shakespeare—music. None of these things are going to help you in the real world.”

“Who bloody said I wanted to live in your so-called ‘real’ world?”

“That’s a child’s answer. No one gets a choice in the end, but the choices you make now will make or break how you navigate it.”

“You’re not changing my classes!”

“No, you will. That is as long as you wish to attend that school.”

“You’re the one who sent me there in the first place!”

“And you’ve done well for yourself, all things considered. Don’t let it all be for nothing.”

“Why?” Remus wailed. “Why are you so bloody miserable all of the time? And why must I always be miserable with you?!”

“You’re fortunate,” Lyall said sharply; “don’t presume to pretend otherwise. People would kill for the things you have—the opportunities I’ve given you.”

“I never asked for any of that!”

“Yes, and I never asked—!” Lyall drew up short, raising his cigar in a firm dismissal. “That’s enough.”

“No, go ahead,” Remus taunted. “Say what you meant to say.”

“Not another word, Remus," Lyall warned. "Or mark mine, you won’t be going back to that school. It’s a few useless classes in exchange for a real future. One day you’ll thank me.”

Torn between fury and fear of losing everything left dear to him, Remus bit his tongue. Was this how it felt for Sirius? Or was it much worse, considering his family never gave him a choice? Goddammit.

Clearing his throat, Lyall lifted his scotch to his lips and finished it in a single gulp. “We can talk more about this later,” he said after; “For now, I have something else we must discuss.”

“Must you be so fucking formal about everything?” Remus said scornfully. Lyall eyed him, but said nothing until he’d tapped the ash off his cigar into the ashtray in front of him.

“I’ve asked Sandra to marry me.”

Remus felt his ears pop. “What?”

“And she’s accepted.”

“What… the fuck…?”

“Please, Remus, try to maintain some decorum.” Lyall raised his chin. “Truthfully there isn’t much to discuss. Everything’s already decided. The ceremony will take place in September.”

“How could this already be decided?” He demanded. “How long have you even been dating her?”

“Don’t be a child,” Lyall scoffed, making Remus’ temper flare even more. “The two of you had a good time together yesterday, didn’t you?”

“So?! Tolerating one measly day together doesn’t mean I want to live with her!”

“Do you want to live here at all, Remus?”

The question caught him like a slap. “No,” he ground out.

“Then I suggest you return to school, attend your classes, and then continue on to a good university so that you might support yourself outside these walls one day. God knows that it isn’t that hard.”

“I won’t call her mother.”

“I don’t believe she asked you to.”

“I won’t love her! … I’ll hate her—and I’ll make her hate me too.”

Lyall levelled his gaze. It was scornful—no, unimpressed.

“Seventeen years of practice, and that’s all you can muster?” He drawled. “A single bit of hatred? I would’ve expected more from you.”

Remus couldn’t help it—he threw the cigar, letting it sail over Lyall’s shoulder and spatter ash against the painting of his mother’s beach. It didn’t matter. It was worth about as much as every other painfully mundane landscape hanging up in the estate. Remus hated all of them.

“You’re losing control again,” Lyall warned from his chair.

“Oh shut up!” He roared, slamming his hands down on the front of the desk. “You know what you used to tell me when she lost control—when she went off the rails?!"

"You're making this about her, but it has nothing to do with your mother."

Remus wondered how Lyall could be so wrong. This had everything to do with her.

" 'Remus, go to your room'—'Remus, go to bed'!" He howled; "And when I refused, you'd ask me, 'Remus, why are you such a brat?'—'Remus, why don't you ever listen?' But you never gave me a chance, not one! I was just her son, and you were waiting for me to go off the rails too—I always knew it! ... And when it eventually happened—well, me you'd just have committed, because—oh, you'd already learned your lesson!"

Utterly still, Lyall didn't even blink at him. "How world-weary you've become in just a few years at that school. Perhaps you should be committed, if this is how you insist on behaving—stark-raving mad and still just a child."

Enraged, Remus grabbed the empty scotch glass and threw it against the wall. It shattered into a million tiny pieces and yet he didn't feel even the slightest bit better.

"You hate me! Just admit it—JUST SAY IT! Say what we both know to be true! Say it, so all of this can be OVER WITH!"

But Lyall said nothing. Even as Remus heaved with the effort of his shouts, his father gave him nothing.

You could just say it yourself, you know, the vicious Moony sneered. If you really had the balls you'd finally come out with it. You never told the lads at school because you were afraid it would make you lesser—you never told Tomny because it would make you the same. And no matter how much you wanted to be one of them, you always needed to be special.

No...

Oh yes… But maybe it's not about them at all. Maybe it's about him. Lyall... Dad... You're afraid he won't care. And you want him to care, you always have. He could pull you from that school, ship you off to Belgium, and you'd still care. You can't help it.

With an immense cry of frustration, Remus slammed his fist down onto the desk. He didn't so much as dent the surface, but the pain stifled some of the thoughts.

“I know, you know,” he growled—dared. “I’ve known for years and I know you have too... But that doesn’t make me the coward, I was just a kid—you’re the one who can’t say it!”

A muscle twitched in Lyall’s jaw. Remus seized it. If this pain so demanded to be felt, then Lyall would feel it too.

“Yeah—you,” Remus hissed. “The adult—the father... How could I ever be ashamed of it—me? I can’t. Not when you’re bad enough for the both of us… What’s a’matter, can’t admit to yourself? Afraid that that would mean she never actually loved you...? Well, I’ll tell you one thing, Dad—you touch my classes and I’ll tell Sandra everything. I’ll call the damn papers—your bloody boss—anyone who cares enough to gossip... To hell what happens to me.”

It was enough. Lyall dropped his brow, hands fisted in his lap. “Get. Out.”

“What? Is it harder to hide from your ghosts when they’re still alive?”

“OUT!”

Remus exhaled. His eyes burned and his limbs felt heavy, but he’d gotten what he wanted, and now he needed to be anywhere else.

“Yeah, alright,” he sighed, slowly moving backwards to the door; “But hey, good luck on the marriage. Congrats—really! You don’t deserve her…”

Pushing open the door, Remus emerged in the hallway and slammed it behind himself. He was still breathing hard, his heart beating loud enough that it echoed in his temples like an ache. He considered just screaming, but before he even had time to fill his lungs, he heard the familiar click of another door behind shut a short ways away. Perking up, he followed it, dragging his feet until finally he found himself outside the room no one ever entered. Not since he was eleven, anyway.

Hand practically trembling, Remus reached for the door’s handle. It fell open under his touch, revealing a vast music room, every table and chair covered in a white sheet to protect it from dust and light. As he looked around, it struck him how he used to be afraid of this room, back when Hope would just sit by the window in her wheelchair and stare at nothing, as though she were already dead. Then she’d died and it was just empty again. Or at least it had been before.

Across the room, at the piano he must've uncovered himself, Sirius sat alone. He was still wearing the cap, but had rolled up the borrowed shirt and trousers at his wrists and ankles just to make them fit. He'd never looked less like himself, but Remus would've still recognised him blind. It was a relatable feeling, that blindness. As he advanced into the room, every step Remus took felt soundless, as though he'd gone deaf out of fear alone. He must've, because he could see Sirius playing and yet heard no song. It wasn't until he was standing directly behind him, watching the gentle movement of his hands, that Remus realised that there was sound. Sirius was playing so tenderly that the music was like a whisper. You had to want to listen to hear it.

Slowly, he slid in beside Sirius on the bench, watching his slender fingers softly dance up and down the tops of the keys. He wanted desperately to take one of those beautiful hands in his own, but everything was so raw at that moment that Remus was half-sure he'd have simply ceased to exist if he acknowledged the pain long enough to do it.

"You were listening," he said. Sirius stopped playing immediately and carefully tucked his hands into his lap.

"… Yeah."

"You shouldn't have done that."

"Sorry."

"Someone could've seen you." Taken you from me.

"They didn't," Sirius promised.

Remus swallowed; "Good," but his voice cracked and he hated himself for it.

"He shouldn't have talked to you like that."

"… Don't worry about it."

"He threatened to take you out of school."

"He won't. It would mean keeping me here, and he's too desperate. My staying would ruin everything. He wants to start over… That's why he's marrying that woman."

“Is she…” Sirius took a breath. “Is she bad?”

“No,” Remus answered, “she’s good.”

“Oh… m'glad.”

Neither of them said anything for a while, just staring at the black-lacquered surface of the piano. Remus could see his reflection as though he were looking into a mirror. Eventually Sirius reached out again with a single hand, playing a few somber notes like the closing to a chapter. Remus recognised them immediately, and gave a weak chuckle—just air blowing out his nose.

“ ‘Any way the wind blows’…”

Sirius withdrew his hand and instead of returning it to his lap, he slid it beneath Remus’ own, lacing their fingers together so tightly it felt as though not a single atom could've fit between their palms. It didn’t even make him nervous like he’d thought it would. In the end Sirius was still his friend.

“I’m happy you’re here, Remus,” Sirius said.

And then Remus sighed, in relief and thankfulness. Because thank god for Sirius Black.

“Do you want to get out of here?” He asked. “Just go somewhere—anywhere?”

“Yes,” Sirius told him. “Anywhere with you.”

Chapter End Notes

'Per Aspera Ad Astra' is a Latin phrase meaning 'through hardships, to the stars'.
A 'lorry' is a truck.
A 'fry-up' is like a traditional English Breakfast.

Again, Fridays/Saturdays will be upload days! (Maybe Sunday if you're way ahead of me in timezones) If you can't wait that long, feel free to hmu in the comments or on tumblr/tiktok @motswolo. I'm always cruising there, and I love chatting about all things hp/wolfstar <3
Much love - mot

Chapter 67: City Lights, London Nights

Chapter Summary

> They take the city, and maybe just a little bit... the city will take them.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Spitting, smoking, and just general tomfoolery (lol). 'F' slur used ONLY in a smoking context. Sexual content (non-graphic) that could be considered important to the plot. Read whatever makes you most comfortable.
>
> There's a lot of subtext in this chapter, especially within Remus & Sirius' conversation outside the cinema. I hope it's clear enough, but they really are just scared boys, and love and sexuality are as scary as it gets sometimes. Love them as they are when possible <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Waterfall,
Don’t ever change your ways;
Fall with me for a million days,
Oh, my waterfall…

- “May This Be Love” Jimi Hendrix, 1967

Most people who grew up in London had a hard time seeing the magic in it. Like Remus, they saw the Underground only for its horrible rush hour and poorly-lit stations. They thought of streets like Carnaby as crowded tourist-traps and never really got excited about much of anything. But for newcomers like Sirius, who were just itching to sink their teeth into anything street-cultured, London might as well have been the promised land. It was all new, from the shops and streets, to the people that filled them. It went without saying that Sirius had never been on the tube before. He’d also never hailed a cab for himself, or gotten lost on a backstreet. Sirius had never had to step over a morning drunkard’s vomit outside a Chinese place that looked scummy but actually had amazing wonton soup. He’d never scattered pigeons in Hyde park, or eaten a kebab from a street vendor along Portobello, or haggled amongst the stalls of Brick Lane, and he’d certainly never strolled into a random pub to catch a pint and a friendly game of snooker.

For all intents and purposes, Sirius was a complete city-virgin, but perhaps the strangest thing to Remus was that Sirius had never spat on the pavement.

“I just don’t get it. What’s the appeal?” Sirius asked, as they made their way down the street. Row houses rose up on either side of them, decorated with brick and iron fences, all overgrown with ivy and ragged thorn bushes. They’d just crossed over into Clifton Hill after walking a good twenty minutes from the station. Neither of them made a fuss, for a young boy in 1977, anything under five miles wasn’t worth the whinging.

“I can’t just tell you,” Remus said, “it’s like a cultural thing. You do it with the lads.”

“Sounds like a more disappointing jerk-circle.”

Remus shoved him, making Sirius lurch sideways into the road as he sniggered. Stopping to wait for him, Remus dodged a young mum pushing her baby in a pram and crossed his arms over his chest. “Go on, try it then,” he prompted.

Sirius eyed the pram that had just passed. “You mean now? In public?”

“S’long as it doesn’t offend your pretty little manners.”

Sirius scowled and Remus waved the comment off. “Here, watch me.” Stopping in the middle of the pavement, he hocked back a large wad of saliva and spat it in the direction of the road. He managed to clear about ten feet—almost a new personal record—and when he turned to Sirius he found him clapping blithely.

“And who says the hooligan doesn’t have any talents.”

“You go then,” Remus urged. Sirius sighed and reached up to scratch his head beneath his cap, before making a noise deep in his throat as though he were trying to clear it.

“That’s it,” Remus said, “gotta dig deep. Doss always told me to imagine like you’d just swallowed a spoonful of cough syrup. But you’re going for distance not size, so—”

Sirius turned on him. “Can you shut up, I just swallowed it!”

Remus backed away. “Sorry, my bad. Take your time.”

Taking a deep breath, Sirius wiggled his jaw around, looking distinctly concentrated. When he threw his head back Remus almost thought he was gonna do it, but what came out was a pitiful spit wad that just barely cleared the tip of his trainers.

“Sirius, that was… Well, it was just sad actually.”

Sirius wiped his mouth. “It’s gross.”

“Nah—well, maybe—but you’re not getting enough momentum. Come ‘ere.”

Turning around, Remus grabbed hold of the rusty iron fence that let into one of the row houses’ front garden. Sirius joined him a moment later, looking slightly intrigued and a bit perturbed all at once.

“Try ‘n put your whole body into it,” Remus instructed, before leaning backwards. Using the fence, he propelled himself forward and launched the spit wad so far that it landed in the scraggly, heat-ravaged pushes beneath the house’s front windows.

“Damn.” Sirius shook out his shoulders, even cracking his neck as though he were getting ready to run a hundred metre dash. “It’s a cultural thing…” he murmured to himself, before hawking back enough to make Remus’ throat twinge, and rocking back on his heels to shoot a winner spit glob directly over the fence. It sailed a few feet before hitting the grass, and Remus jumped up in celebration.

“Brilliant! Maybe you are a natural after all.”

“Bet I could get it further than you,” Sirius said, looking suddenly smug.

“Oh yeah? Try it.”

Grabbing hold of the fence again they both began hacking, but before they could expel another wad of phlegm, the front door of the house flew open and an old man came thundering out in only his robe, waving that morning’s paper around like a bat.

“Oi! Stop spitting on my lawn!”

Remus swallowed the wad of spit, and together he and Sirius dashed away down the street, laughing together.

“Did you see his face?” Remus asked once they’d finally stopped on the next corner. “He looked as mad as Filch that night we set the firecrackers off.”

“Thought the old codger was going to flash us, to be honest,” Sirius agreed, stretching his arms up over his head with a low moan. For all the walking they’d already done, it was still early, but that just meant there was plenty left to see.

“Haven’t we made it yet?” Sirius asked, glancing around.

“Almost. Should be just one more street up.”

They kept walking, hands in their pockets and knocking the odd stone out of their path. Remus had just pulled his cigarettes from his pocket and passed them along to Sirius when they turned the corner onto the zebra crossing and Abbey Road finally fell into view. Sirius drew to an abrupt halt, actually fumbling his cigarette and leaving Remus to pick it up.

“Holy fuck!” He cried. “It’s bloody real!”

“ ‘Course it’s real,” Remus smirked, tucking the cigarette into the corner of his own mouth and lighting the end. All around them were scattered tourists, snapping photos and using the striped crossing to recreate their own version of the photo off of the Beatles’ most infamous album.

“George Harrison walked here,” Sirius prattled; “John Lennon walked here.”

“They recorded right over there too, if you’re interested,” Remus said, pointing further up the street, where more people were mulling around outside the gates of the EMI recording studio.

Sirius’ mouth fell open. Then snapped shut. “I think I might pass out.”

As Sirius continued fawning over the iconic musical landmark, Remus settled back against the brick pony wall along the side of the road and continued smoking his cigarette. He’d been to Abbey Road twice before. Hope had taken him when he was maybe nine, right after he’d first shown interest in her favourite group of mods-turned-rockers. The second had been with Tomny, mostly to rewrite the memory of the first. Tomny hadn’t even been able to name a single Beatle, but he'd still played at being excited for Remus' sake. A bit pointless now, but third time's the charm… probably.

"I could find a camera—snap your picture," Remus drawled, when Sirius kept playing at getting closer to the crossing. He eased in slowly, looking out of place amongst the sightseers in his borrowed, oversized clothes and ragged shoes and cap.

"Nah," Sirius dismissed, reaching down to pull the cigarette carton from Sirius' breast pocket himself; "I think I'm content to watch. Wouldn't want any evidence of myself dressed like this anyway."

Remus held up his lighter, and Sirius leaned in to catch the flame with the end of his fag. Looking down at him, he couldn't help but notice that Sirius' lashes were still endlessly long. It reminded him of that day in the girls' room when they'd woken up next to each other, and because it wasn't exactly a pleasant memory, Remus pushed it away.

"Shall we find you some new clothes then?"

After leaving Abbey Road behind, they hopped a tram and made their way back into the heart of the city, toward Mayfair and Soho. Remus considered taking Sirius to Selfridges or C&A but Sirius had been to a department store before—better to give him an experience that was wholly new.

"I've never owned anything second-hand. Unless you count Andy's guitar," Sirius said, as they scooted round the street corner and slipped inside the charity shop. It smelt of dust and old leather inside, just as Remus remembered, and the shop staff was little more than a teenage girl sitting behind the counter, flipping through a magazine. A few others mulled about lackadaisically—an old man picking through the chinaware, a scholar-type pulling old books down from the shelves, a young mum carefully sifting through the children's section with a sleeping baby against her shoulder. All of them living their own lives, completely separate from the two of them. If there was anywhere you could be a complete unknown, then it was a second-hand shop in Soho.

As the door chimed behind them, Remus gaze fell on a shoe rack overflowing with ragged books and trainers. On top sat a beaten up pair of red Chuck Taylors, which were inexplicably, just his size.

"You should get them," Sirius said, when he'd finished ogling long enough to catch Remus staring.

"Nah, we're here for you."

"But they'd look good on you."

Remus bit the inside of his cheek, before tossing Sirius a cheeky glance. “Come on, let’s get you dressed.”

He steered Sirius toward the rows and rows of clothing racks along the back, walking past badly dressed mannequins and abandoned furniture. They stopped at the first aisle, which was mostly shirts, and Remus had Sirius go down one side while he took the other. There was bound to be something among the endless stockpile of fabric that was halfway decent and could suit the posh boy.

“Sorta smells like a library in here… Like mouldy books,” Sirius observed as they quietly pushed the wire hangers from right to left. “They probably do it to attract your sort.”

Remus raised an eyebrow. “What d’you mean by ‘my sort’?”

“You know, the ‘old before their time’ types. The romancers who think they’re no good at romance. The gifted kids who squander everything on booze, fags, and records.”

“Wow. You should write a song. Dick.”

Sirius smirked down at the clothes, and then plucked a garish-looking caftan big enough to house an elephant off of the rack and held it up with two fingers.

“I think it’s your colour,” Remus snarked.

Sighing, Sirius dropped the hanger back on the rack. “Come on, Moony, what are we doing here? I wanna see the sights!”

“And we will, but first you need some decent clothes.”

“I have clothes.” Sirius gestured to himself pointedly.

“I meant clothes that actually fit. You look like some orphan straight out of Dickens.”

Sirius defiantly tipped the rim of his post-boy cap toward him. “You sound like James.”

“Trust me, I don’t. Just try and think of this as a new experience. Have you even been in a charity shop before?”

“Obviously not.”

“Well, then there’s a first for everything.” He held up a brown collar shirt, which Sirius grimaced at. “So picky,” he huffed, returning it to the rack. Moments like these were when Remus was most reminded of his friend’s privilege. His own, too, if he were being honest. The Blacks probably would’ve locked Sirius in a box and dropped him in the sea before letting him march into a high street second-hand shop, and Lyall would’ve been right there with them.

“Do you really shop here?” Sirius asked, pausing to study a suede vest, before apparently deciding against it.

“Sometimes…” Remus kept his gaze on the clothes. “It was easier to walk through the End when I wasn’t dressed like—”

“A rich prat?” Sirius was eyeing him pointedly.

“Uhm… yeah. A new coat’s kinda a giveaway down there, and since I went there all the time I learned how to not be noticed. Not that it matters anymore anyway…” Remus took a breath, trying for a cheerier tone. “But hey, sometimes you can find some really cool stuff in here. Got my favourite Stones’ shirt right in this very shop.”

“You mean the one with holes in both armpits?”

He ignored him, shucking the wire hangers down their rows until he found something promising. “Here,” he said, holding up a plain white t-shirt. Sirius reached over the rack and took the garment from him, turning it around for inspection.

“Oh goodie, only two stains… Do they have anything in black?”

Remus snatched the shirt back and hung it on the rack. “It’s dead summer, do you want to sweat to death?”

“If I’m gonna go out, I might as well go out in style.” Sirius looked off to his left and did a double take. “Oh, look Moons! Real cowboy boots!”

“I don’t understand how your sense of fashion works,” Remus started, but Sirius had already rushed off, abandoning him in the middle rows. Sighing, he turned back around and continued sorting through the assembled hoard. A few more shoppers who had wandered in from the heat were meandering silently around him, but the shop was pleasantly cool thanks to the rattling fans set up in each corner. Just over their noise, Remus could hear the sound of a radio going, playing its top ten hits.

'I'm your boogie man, I'm your boogie man,
Turn me on;
I'm your boogie man, I'm your boogie man,
Do what you want…'

It wasn't a good song per say, but it was easy to mindlessly bob his head along with. Remus was just considering what the odds were that Sirius would agree to a lime green polo shirt when the sharp sound of a feminine giggle caught his attention. He looked up from the rack and found a pair of girls two rows over, faces bent closely to one another as they whispered behind a handful of clothes. If their knowing smiles were anything to go by, then they must've been there for some time. Remus looked down, pushing a few more hangers aside arbitrarily, and when he glanced back up again one of the girls was staring straight at him. She waved and flashed him a pretty smile, before her friend grabbed her wrist urgently and squeaked something that sounded a lot like 'what are you doing?!'

As the girls descended into another giggle fit, Remus reached up and rubbed the back of his neck. He'd already told himself that he wasn't interested in any more casual flings. Sirius' sudden entrance had more than scared the promiscuity right out of him. But still, one last peek couldn't hurt…

"Oi, Moony—"

Remus jumped on the spot, whirling around to find Sirius next to him.

Speaking of sudden entrances…

"Damn," Sirius chuckled, "didn't mean to sneak up on you, space cadet."

"I was concentrating," Remus clipped.

"Oh yeah? On what?" Sirius leaned in, but another tell-tale giggle made him look up. "Ooh, I get it."

“Sirius, don’t.”

Sirius waved him off, and leaned forward on the clothes rack, whistling sharply. “ ‘Ello, ladies, nice day for a shop, innit? You two pretty things come ‘ere often?”

The girls glanced at each other and then began to laugh behind their hands, quickly shooting off in the other direction. Obviously soured by their lacklustre response, Sirius turned back around. “Hmph. Must be deaf.”

“No, I think they heard you,” Remus mocked. “It’s not a bar, Sirius, it’s a charity shop. And who were you trying to imitate anyway, Michael Cain?”

“No, it was you from our first year together—any’un got ‘a light? Can’t imagine why that would turn ‘em off.”

“Must’ve been the clothes then.” Flicking the rim of Sirius’ cap, Remus went back to the rack and pushed aside several tops, eventually coming across a half-decent button up. “What do you think? This one doesn’t have ruffles on the collar at least.”

Sirius shook his head adamantly. “Nah, s’not really ‘me’—but check this out!”

He raised his other arm, showing off a beaten-up leather jacket that looked as though it weighed forty pounds and had survived both World Wars. Remus ogled it.

“It’s summer!”

“I know it’s summer, but this thing’s killer, Moons! Someone real cool owned this jacket once, I can tell. You can practically smell the history on it.”

“Actually that’s just cat piss.”

Sirius rolled his eyes. “Found these too.” He held up a pair of blue jeans that once touched revealed themselves to have had just enough wear and wash to turn the fabric soft as butter.

“Those aren’t terrible,” Remus said, giving them a once-over. “We should find you some new shoes too, yours are falling apart…”

Sirius nodded, and then his face lit up and he reached past Remus, toward the shirts. “Oh yes, this is it! This is the one.”

“Lemme see.” Remus turned the top around. “… You’ve got to be kidding me.”

“I’m all about blending in with the locals,” Sirius sniggered, ripping the shirt off its hanger.

Not five minutes later, Remus found himself sitting outside of a fitting room on a fuzzy electric-blue footstool, twiddling his thumbs while he waited for Sirius to try on the clothes.

“Jeans are a bit tight around the family jewels,” Sirius called over the door, “but my arse looks fantastic.”

Remus felt his heart jump. “Hurry up, you’re burning daylight.”

“Coming!” The fitting room door flew open and Sirius strutted out, wearing the faded jeans and t-shirt he’s picked off the rack. It might’ve been nice, had the front of the shirt not bore the words, ‘Who’s “Big Ben” and why’s everyone looking for him?’

“Well?” Sirius grinned; “How do I look?”

Remus slouched back against the fitting room wall. “You’re so embarrassing.”

“Meh. Dans une grande âme tout est grand.” Sirius turned around to get a look at his backside in the mirror. “I mean, just look at my arse, Moony!”

“No thanks.”

“No, seriously, have a look! Jeans fit like a glove.”

Remus sighed and glanced up. Sirius was right, they did look good. And familiar… As Sirius spun around admiring himself and chortling at the stupid tourist’s shirt, Remus leaned in to get a better look. On one of the back pockets of the jeans he spotted the small outline of a heart, as though several rhinestones had once adorned it and had since chipped off. He racked his brain.

“Hey… doesn’t Mary have a pair of jeans she always claims makes her butt look spectacular?”

“Hm? Oh yeah—wears ‘em on every date.”

“Did you know if they happened to have anything on the back pockets?”

Sirius paused. “Yeah… a little heart or something.”

Remus squinted harder, just to be sure, but yep—definitely a heart. He snorted. “Padfoot… I hate to say it, but I think you’re wearing women’s trousers, mate.”

“What?” Sirius reached around, attempting to peek at the faded tag. “Shit. What are the odds? Guess that explains it though, Mary’s never wrong about these kinds of things.”

Remus shook his head hopelessly, then; “You should get them. Your arse… does look fantastic.”

“Ha! Knew you looked.”

Looking a little too pleased, Sirius ducked back into the fitting room. As he did, Remus swallowed the lump that had formed in his throat and peered out around the corner to the rest of the shop. He didn’t see the girls from earlier, perhaps they’d moved on.

“What shall I do with the shirt and slacks you leant me?” Sirius called through the door.

“Just leave ‘em,” Remus said, now busy picking a hangnail. “They’re too small for me anyway.”

“Ha. That’s just your under-handed way of calling me short.” A second later Sirius had strolled out, now donning the leather jacket. The sight of him caught Remus’ attention straight away, and he watched as Sirius began strutting in front of the mirror again, flapping the leather collar with supreme confidence. “So? What do we you think of the jacket?” Sirius inquired. “I think it looks ace.”

“It’d look better without that stupid hat, I’ll bet,” Remus said. Sirius looked at him in the mirror, before gently smoothing his hands over the brim.

“Nah… the hat adds to it.”

“You’re going to sweat to death.” Remus stood; “Just take it off.”

“No, I’m fine.”

“C’mon Padfoot, I’m sure you’ll be alright without—” Before he’d even finished his sentence, Remus had made a grab for the cap, and Sirius spun around like a cornered dog—one that was ready to take his hand off at the wrist.

"DON'T—!"

Remus yanked his arm back. "S-Sorry! Was only teasing…"

Retaliation dawned, and Sirius paled slightly before shrinking back from him like a school boy about to receive the strap. "Nah, m'sorry. Didn't mean to snap at ya." Sirius licked his lips. "I… haven't taken it off really."

"Why not?"

Sirius' eyes dipped to the floor. "It's… my hair? It kinda… got cut."

Remus stepped forward again, not quite so much as to invade Sirius' space, but enough to peek under the brim at the flaccid locks of dark hair pasted to his forehead beneath. "You still look like you got hair."

"It's the side here." Sirius gestured languidly at his head. "The matron came at me with these clippers, but I wouldn't have it. So she yanked me, and I yanked back. Hurt like a bitch for a while."

"You mean she…?"

"Yeah. Hair's gone."

Remus suddenly felt very fidgety. "Well, I… I'm sure it doesn't look that bad."

"It doesn't look good. You'd laugh if you saw it."

"No, I wouldn't." He gave Sirius a very hard, genuine look. "I wouldn't."

The look made Sirius falter a bit, and he shrugged. "It's not that fascinating anyway."

"Would you show me?"

Sirius clenched his jaw like he might say no, but after several seconds of anguish, he finally stepped back and whipped the hat off his head. Locks of sweaty hair promptly tumbled down to just below his jaw, looking lanky and sad, but Remus didn't really see the issue until he glimpsed the other side of Sirius' head in the mirror. Horrified, he grabbed his friend by the shoulders and spun him. There, just behind his ear, Sirius had a small bald patch, as though whoever had grabbed it had held on until the hair had torn out from the root.

“Those fucking—” Remus sucked in a sharp breath. He’d nearly reached out to touch it but then Sirius turned back around and fit the cap back over his head, tucking in the leftover pieces of hair.

“Whatever, it’s done,” he said dismissively. “Don’t even hurt anymore either. I just don’t want others to see, so I’ve been covering it up… Didn’t exactly have time to see a barber in Calais.”

“Well, we could—” Remus scrambled for a solution, “we could hide it some other way maybe?”

“Oh yeah?” Sirius asked sarcastically. “Started carrying makeup and wigs around with you? Too bad Mary’s in France, could’ve used her.”

“Don’t be an idiot,” Remus said. “We could tie it back. Should hide the worst bits at least.”

“Nah, tried that already. You still see where the hair's missing, plus it kinda hurts... Don’t worry though, m’sure it’ll be fine soon enough.”

“How about braiding it then? I could do it. I mean, I’m not that great, but I could try.”

The offer had clearly surprised Sirius, who raised both eyebrows. “You want to braid my hair?”

“Just for now, jackass," Remus snapped, feeling flushed. "You don’t even have to keep it in for long. Anything’s better than that hat.”

Sirius’ lips quirked upwards. “So many nasty comments about my choice of dress today.”

“Just trying to look out for you.” Glancing around himself, Remus reached into a bin of spare clothes next to the fitting room. He withdrew a single unpaired trainer and quickly unravelled its lace.

“What are you gonna do with that?” Asked Sirius.

Remus held the shoelace up. “I’m gonna tie your hair back. Might be a bit rough but no one’s gonna notice. Now go on, have a seat.”

Looking only a little reluctant, Sirius popped a squat over the shaggy purple stool and Remus took up his spot behind him. His hands began to feel clammy as he began to gather Sirius' hair back away from his face, and he worked carefully to avoid touching any other part of him.

"I thought you don't steal, Moons," Sirius mused, watching him in the mirror.

"I don't."

"You gonna pay for that shoelace then?"

Remus rolled his eyes, before glancing around to make sure the teenage shopkeeper hadn't set upon them. "Fine, I will knick one shoelace. Happy? Now shut up and let me concentrate."

Sirius smiled, but was quiet after that. Wiping his palms on his trousers, Remus cleared his throat and tried to ignore the way Sirius' reflection was staring at him in the mirror, while attempting to recall the girls' lessons. Bring sides under the middle—or was it over? Christ.

His fingers felt slow and clumsy, but after the first two or three ruined attempts, Remus finally got into the swing of it. Sirius never complained, simply waited until he'd woven the braid all the way down the back of his head and tied it off with the shoelace. He snatched his hands away again when Sirius tipped his head back to smile at him.

"There…" Remus mumbled; "All finished."

Getting up from the little stool, Sirius peered into the mirror. Turning his head this way and that to admire Remus' work, he pulled a few pieces free around his face and finally straightened up. "Wow. You really never cease to amaze me, Moons."

"S'just a braid…"

"Do I look okay?"

"Huh? Oh… yeah! Y-You look great! Or I mean—you can't see the bald spot at all."

Sirius began fiddling with the stubby end of the braid. "It doesn't look too… girlish?"

"Ha. Since when have you ever worried about 'looking girlish'?"

He laughed again, and straightened up. "You're right. Thanks,

Moons."

Remus looked away. "Don't mention it… Shall we finish finding you a shirt then?"

"Whaddya mean? I've got a shirt right here."

He looked at the tourist atrocity clinging to Sirius' frame. "You can't really be planning to wear that around the city."

"Why not?"

"You're gonna look like one of those tourists from Abbey Road. Like an American."

"Well, can't have that, can we?" Sirius said, making no move to remove the shirt. "Perhaps I should work on my accent, eh gov'na? Can't have the yanks going crackers thinking I'm one 'a them, can we? It'd all be straight dog's dinner from there!"

"Yeah… so I'm gonna go find you those shoes now." Remus turned and began strolling away. "… Bloody idiot."

Sirius just chased after him. "What, you don't like that one? Alright, how 'bout I commit to the bit. Now how's it go again… Maybe like— hey, I'm wah'kin' here! Oh shit, that was pretty good! Right, Moons? … tch… Moooons!"

* * *

Remus had started keeping a mental list in his head of all the things he'd learned about the institution in Belgium;

They aided and abetted in kidnapping kids from their own homes.

And then when the kids arrived they dressed them in itchy grey suits, like convicts.

And when they misbehaved they locked them in isolation rooms for days on end.

And encouraged corporal punishment.

And withheld food.

And ripped their fucking hair out!

Lyall would've loved it, surely. A fact that only made him more pissed off. The matron who'd tried to shear Sirius' hair off had better hope that Remus Lupin never made it as far as Belgium. If he did, nothing was gonna stop him from burning her miserable school to the ground.

"Turn this way, Moons."

Luckily, Sirius didn't seem as intent on stewing over the bad.

Remus turned to him when bid, and Sirius slipped a pair of sunglasses up the bridge of his nose. He inspected them for a moment, before ultimately shaking his head and returning them to the table stand they'd stopped at.

"You've got such a big head, you dwarf all of them," Sirius mused, perusing through the frames with clever interest. He'd already picked out a pair for himself, and the wayfarers sat balanced on the top of his handsome head. Remus had just about melted when he'd put them on. Pretty fuck.

As Sirius fit a second pair on him, this one in the shape of a cat-eye (for his own amusement, surely), Remus lifted an arm to check his watch. They'd left the charity shop ages ago, and had since been up and down the city streets, dipping into various neighbourhoods like Camden High Street, making faces at the mods and punks and catching trolleys up and down for no good reason. It would've been faster to get around using the tube, but staying above ground meant better views and Sirius was just dying to ride one of the double-decker buses anyway. A by-product of that, they were now waiting to catch a short hop-on tour from Fitzrovia to Trafalgar Square, so Sirius could check 'punting a pigeon' off of his bucket list.

"Did you still want to go to the museum?" Remus asked, busy flipping through a sightseeing map as Sirius fit his dozenth pair of sunglasses on him. He'd already given up on not looking like a tourist. "Says here they've got a big exhibit on music. Classical music, but still."

"I'd rather go play that game you mentioned," Sirius said absent-mindedly. "Shoot 'n toot or whatever."

"It's 'Shoot 'em up'. It's a video game—like remember 'Pong'? They've got this crazy place in Burlington, s'called an arcade. James and I went with Pete at the beginning of summer. Pretty sure he's gone there every day he's been home."

Sirius picked up a new pair of glasses. They'd been standing and chatting for so long that the stand owner had begun to eye them suspiciously, but Remus quelled him well enough when he passed over a few quid for Sirius' glasses.

"I can't decide which John you should be," Sirius said, holding up two pairs on either side of Remus' face. "Are we to go with Elton, or Lennon?"

Remus arched his brow. "Seriously?"

"You're right. Has to be Lennon."

Tossing the ginormous, bedazzled square-rims aside, Sirius opened the round tea-shades and shoved them onto Remus' face. Remus didn't fight it—he just paid the stall guy and they carried on.

"Sorry I'm costing you so much today," Sirius said, casting a glance around the busy street as they crept closer to the trolley stop.

"Nah, spend away. It's only my dad's money."

"I'll pay you back, swears," Sirius said anyway. "Once I get my inheritance from Alphard. I'm almost eighteen. Soon we'll be able to rent out a flat or something."

"I see. Have you picked out where it is you want to live then?"

"Still shopping around. Soho's nice though. It's got a drug-dealer on every corner, right?"

"Only if you know where to look."

Sirius grinned. "It's gonna be so nice to have a place of our own."

Our?

Remus grabbed the side of his neck awkwardly. "James and Pete'll be there too… right?"

Sirius gave him a funny look. "As opposed to being…?"

"Uh…" Glancing away, Remus pushed the sunglasses further up his nose. "Right, I just meant that—"

"Quick, Moons," Sirius interrupted; "Trolley's here."

So, Remus was once again saved from his own stupidity. Sirius wasted no time rushing to the top floor of the bus, taking up an empty set of seats near the very back. As he sat down next to him, Remus silently cursed himself. It was time to get a grip. Sirius wasn't there because he was in love with him, Sirius was there because he'd needed help, and Remus had been the closest—the most convenient. That wasn't to say that Remus was ungrateful, he would've helped Sirius even if all they'd done since was fight, but he wasn't any more special to him than James, or even Peter. He was just there.

Well, if there was all he could be, then that's what he'd do.

As the open-air bus made its way down the street, full to the brim with tourists and people from all over, Sirius stood up on his seat and whooped at the sky—just a great hoorah! It made Remus cringe a bit while the other passengers laughed, and soon enough one of the tour-leaders had come storming up the stairs to lambast him for 'committing unsafe acts while the bus is in motion'. Sirius attempted to give lip, but Remus just pulled him back into his seat and they laughed together.

"Think we could get everyone here in on a game of bumps?" Sirius suggested not two minutes later.

"Do it and I'll throw you over the side," he warned, but the next time the bus hit a pothole, Sirius jabbed Remus in the arm and suddenly they were scrapping again right there in their seats. That was the last straw for the tour-leader, who demanded to know where their guardians were. Without any parents to be found, they bid the bus goodbye and made a hasty exit along Shaftesbury Avenue, about five stops too early. Weaving through the theatre district's tight alleys, each filled with tiny cafes and boutiques, they made their way through Chinatown toward Soho, nearly the exact route Remus had taken on a trip out with Marlene weeks before. By then they were starving, and so Remus stopped to get them both a basket of chips, which they ate while they walked.

"Imagine living down here!" Sirius declared, stuffing his face as he stared up at the towering rows of flats and shops. They'd been out for hours and he still hadn't lost an ounce of awe. "We gotta find ourselves a place somewhere like this," he said around bites; "Somewhere big enough for all of us."

"That's gonna cost a pretty penny—fitting all four of us into one flat," Remus said.

“Five. Can’t count out Evans.”

Remus laughed in surprise, dodging a woman walking her dog as they made their way down the street. “Here, gimme these,” he said, before taking Sirius’ empty to-go container and tossing it in a public bin. “You know… you’ve been oddly ‘team Evans’ for a while now, Padfoot. It’s odd. Did something happen between the two of you?”

“What makes you say that? I’m just assuming that Evans is the only one of us who can actually cook.”

“She’d lash you for saying that.”

“I know,” Sirius said with a guilty smile.

“Nice try, now fess up,” Remus prodded, even poking him in the shoulder. “You’ve been a little too friendly ever since that crap with Snape. So what is it that she’s got on you?”

“Nothing!”

He poked him again. “Come on!”

“Evans and I just came to a mutual understanding s’all! We talked over Easter and—”

“You talked?”

“Letters,” Sirius dismissed; “She sent me a letter. I sent one back, s’all.”

“Well, what was in it? What did you… talk about?”

“Normal stuff—her sister being a prat, Reg being a nob. I think she was just checking in. Making sure I didn’t off myself. Said something about Prongs needing his best friend back come April.”

They’d stopped along with a small crowd at a pedestrian crossing and Remus leaned in. It secretly pleased him to be able to do that; he hadn’t realised it until Sirius had taken the hat off, but he must’ve grown some more. Now he could see right over the top of Sirius’ head. He tried not to be too smug about it.

“So…?” Remus prompted. “What’d you say back?”

Sirius looked away, almost bashful. “I… I thanked her! I was expecting word from you and the lads, but Evans had never sent a letter before. It just felt genuine, I guess. She's actually pretty funny once you get to know her, you know."

He said this last bit very wryly, and Remus shook his head, endlessly amused. "Oh my god, you've gone soft for Lily."

"Shut up," Sirius pouted as the traffic changed and they began across the street. "Did you know her middle name was 'Juniper'? And her sister is 'Petunia Marigold'? I almost pissed my pants laughing reading that."

"Her parents are botanists. And yes, I did know that. You're not the only one Lily's fond of, ya know."

Sirius smiled. "Is that Remus Lupin, bragging? Hah. You're right though, I wager you're the only one who has a chance of swooping her out from under Prongs' feet."

"Nah," Remus said very quickly; "Lily's just a friend."

Sirius shrugged again. "Suit yourself. But she liked you when she still hated the rest of us, so… I can't be all wrong. Maybe she had a crush."

"She liked James then too."

"You can like more than one person at a time. You're telling me you never considered it? Hey, hey?"

Remus took a breath. He really didn't want to talk about girls anymore, but if Sirius was going to dish it out, then he was going to get a full serving right back.

"So you and Lily are friends now, huh?" He mused. "Crazy what sort of miracles can happen when you stop being a dickhead, hey Pattycake? I mean, I never really got how you could chat up girls like that—what when you look just like one of 'em."

Remus chuckled, almost proud of himself, but instead of answering, Sirius waited until they'd crossed the street and then threw his arm back straight for a direct ball shot. The low-blow left Remus bent over and clutching his groin as the entire street parted around them with a grimace.

"You—son of a bitch—" he wheezed.

"Oh c'mon, it was barely a tap!" Sirius cackled.

“Augh—I’ll show you a tap!”

Sirius didn’t wait for permission before he turned tail and ran. When he could move again, Remus immediately gave chase, dodging pedestrians and other traffic as he pursued Sirius through thick and thin. Sirius kept looking behind himself to laugh at him and nearly ended up in a public rubbish bin for it, but that didn’t even come close to being as funny as it was to watch a police officer drop a sandwich the length of his arm in attempts to blow his whistle at them as they flew past. The officer didn’t catch them, but ultimately neither of them were James Potter, and they’d both spent far too much of the last year chain smoking to make it further than a few streets. When Sirius finally came to a skidding halt outside a building lit up like a Christmas tree, Remus practically tackled him to the pavement, terribly out of breath and red in the face.

“Gotchu, tosser!” He grunted, holding on tightly to Sirius’ shoulders and readying himself for some apt revenge.

“Hold on, Moony, look!” Sirius declared, thrusting one hand down to cover his sensitive bits and the other up at a poster box hanging on the building’s wall. It was then that Remus realised where they’d ended up—outside the Prince Charles theatre. The cinema’s canopy was advertising several films, and its lights were already bright and blazing in the early summer evening. Sirius continued thrusting his finger at the poster, obviously excited, but Remus had already recognised the film; The Man Who Fell to Earth .

“It’s Bowie!” Sirius said in amazement. “Blimey, I didn’t even know he did films!”

“Me neither, honestly,” Remus said, straightening up and releasing his hold of Sirius’ shoulders.

“We gotta go see it!”

“Sure, it was pretty good. Marlene and I saw it together a few weeks ago actually.”

“Oh.” Sirius dropped his head a bit. “Well, in that case, it’s fine, we don’t have to see it. We’ve done a lot today after all.”

“Don’t tell me you’re tired already?” Remus glanced back up at the canopy and smiled, before nudging Sirius fondly. “C’mon, looks like today’s the last night they’re showing it. Let’s go see your idol on screen.”

Biting his lip, Sirius nodded eagerly and together they made their way to the ticket booth. Remus bought their tickets and later, a box of popcorn to share, but the moment they sat down in the dark theatre, he knew he'd made a mistake.

The first time he'd gone to the cinema with Marlene they'd been holding hands and making gentle passes to each other in the dark. The second time they'd been broken up, and though that should've been cause for some discomfort, there was none to be found. They simply watched the film and when it was over, he listened to her rant about everything she loved and hated about it on the tube ride home, only occasionally interjecting with a thought of his own. Now, sitting next to Sirius and practically sharing an armrest, Remus couldn't pay attention to the film at all. Not even Bowie's sultry portrayal of an alien walking amongst humans was enough to draw him back in. All he could think about was Sirius' thin wrist brushing up against his own, or the dazzling way with which he watched Bowie every time he came on screen. At one point Sirius caught him staring and gave a little smirk before reaching over and grabbing a handful of popcorn out of the bag in his lap. Remus looked down at the bag, horribly aroused, and spent the rest of the movie clenching the armrests. It was surely the longest film of his life.

"That was great!" Sirius declared, walking out of the picture house into the warm evening air. It was dark out, but he'd put his sunglasses back on, and the theatre's canopy lights reflected in the lenses like a bursting star. "I mean the plot was sort of meh," he continued; "but did you see how he dressed? So cool. And hearing him talk? Absolutely mental. Tell me though, why was I expecting him to sound more… I dunno, whimsical?"

"I think he sounds pretty whimsical," Remus said, while tucking his own sunglasses into the collar of his shirt and tossing their empty popcorn bag in a bin on the street. "You've really never heard him talk before?"

"Nah. Just seen him on the 'Pops'. Once I tried to catch an interview on some daytime show, but it was summer and mum caught me before it even started." Sirius sniffed a bit and shoved one hand into his pocket, the other he used to fan himself with his shirt collar. "But hey, it was ace! Haven't gotten to see a colour film in a while… Gonna be so shit when we go back to school and have to watch everything in black and white again.

"Maybe you can put in a request with AV club to get a telly upgrade."

“That’s not a bad idea. Suppose Pete could hook us up?”

“Probably… if he feels like it. But we got a telly back at my place. It’s in the parlour. We can watch it when everyone’s asleep.”

“Right,” Sirius smirked, lifting his glasses; “Gotta wait until everyone’s everyone’s kipped if I’m to stay your little secret.”

“Shut up.” Looking to busy himself, Remus pulled out his cigarettes and offered Sirius one, and then his zippo. They weren’t the only ones standing outside the cinema and smoking; several other groups were sprawled about the pavement, clouds of haze drifting around them like fog.

“So…” Sirius started eventually; “You know how I spent the last several weeks, but you never said what it was that you’ve been doing all this time. How did the great Remus Lupin spend his summer?”

“Uh…” Remus flicked the ash from the end of his fag. “Just hung around mostly.”

“That’s it? Boring.”

He shrugged awkwardly. “Yup… that’s me. Boring Remus…”

“You seriously didn’t do anything? You didn’t… meet anyone?”

“Nope.” No way was he going to tell Sirius about the girls. Not only did he feel guilty for not remembering most of their names, but… it was Sirius! And he was… god, it was all so messed up.

Sirius had paused to take a long drag, but Remus could sense his eyes on him from behind the glasses. Then; “I met someone.”

Remus blinked. “You… Where?”

“Belgium. The school.” Sirius blew his smoke proudly. “I told you we could get weed in, do you really think we all stood around not talking to each other?”

“No, but you said you spent most of your time in that isolation room.”

“I did. But I made fast work of it before then.”

Remus licked his lips. Relax. It was good that Sirius could have a few trysts of his own. It was normal. Honestly, a frigid Sirius was more worrying.

“Alright… What was her name then?”

Sirius looked up at the canopy lights. “What makes you so sure it was a ‘her’?”

…

“Oh! Uh...”

“Something the matter, Moony?”

Is something the matter? OF COURSE SOMETHING’S THE MATTER!

Stop, the voice warned; Don’t freak out.

Too late—I am absolutely freaking out!

Don’t! It’s what he wants… Just be cool. Say something cool.

Something cool? Okay, I can do that.

Remus cleared his throat. “So did the two of you, like… kiss then?”

Sirius lifted his sunglasses again, looked at him, and immediately broke down laughing. As Remus stood stunned, he whirled away, laughing loud enough to draw attention from their fellow smokers.

I said something cool, idiot.

Maybe next time you could be more specific.

“Oh, Moons,” Sirius guffawed, completely unaware of his inner turmoil; “You’re really are so fucking cute.”

Remus felt his face grow warmer. “It was just a question!” He blabbed. “You could’ve just said yes!”

“Yes!” Sirius laughed. “Yes, I kissed him. Shall I give you the entire rundown?”

No, dear god, please no.

“Honestly, it wasn’t terrible. A bit wet for my taste, but he was French, and you know what they say about the French—”

“I kissed someone too!” Remus blurted. It was a reflex; anything to get Sirius to stop talking.

“You did?” Sirius echoed, without missing a beat. “A girl?”

“Of course it was a girl! I’m not like—” He realised his mistake a second too late. “Wait, I didn’t mean that.”

“It’s fine,” Sirius said. His voice had gone an octave higher, a fact that socked Remus straight in the gut. “Should’ve assumed really, seeing as you’re…” Sirius just gestured at his general appearance.

“But I really didn’t mean it like that. I swear.”

“I know,” he nodded. “But hey—you found a girl. That’s great. What’s her name?”

“She’s no one,” Remus said quickly. “Or… she was… someone. But not to me.”

“What’s that suppose to mean?”

“I just mean that she was nice, but it was a… just a one-time thing. And your… guy then?”

“Oh, him?” Sirius waved a hand. “Nah, that was nothing, I was just playing the toff. There was this one girl, though—Caprianna. Mhm. Yeah. Gorgeous, just so fit. Best tits I’ve ever seen. Mhm. Yup… She was great…” Sirius went to pull another drag, but the cigarette had burned down. Remus was offering him another before he’d even flicked it away.

“What’d she do to get sent there?”

“What? Oh. I… dunno! We didn’t really do much talking, if you know what I mean. Heh… But tell me about your girl, the one-timer.”

Remus shook his head. “Not much to say.”

“Don’t be like that, you can tell me about it. I wanna hear. Whatever you told James, you can tell me. I’m still… well, I wanna know!”

He wasn’t sure if his ears were playing tricks on him or not, but Remus almost thought that Sirius sounded a bit desperate. It occurred to him that he probably was. A summer away, and now liking other lads… Sirius had never been othered before. At least not by his friends. Maybe it scared him. Remus knew what that was like. And so he decided then that even if Sirius couldn’t like him that way, he could at least be brave enough to reassure him that he wasn’t any different from the rest of his friends.

“Well… She was nice.”

“Nah, nice try. Gimme details,” Sirius insisted. “What’d she look like? Was she a bosom or a bum?”

Remus scrambled. Which one?

“Uhm… bum?”

“Ah, that’s right, you’re an arse-man!”

“Ugh."

"Okay, so she had a nice bum, what else?"

"She had... dark hair? ... Nice eyes. Decent body. She was, I dunno… just nice? Or she kissed nice—and erm… she had her own flat.”

Sirius nudged him in the arm. “You jammy bastard, you went to hers?”

“I couldn’t very well bring her home, could I?”

“Ah, if you can sneak me in then I’m sure a few girls would’ve been just as easy. You gotta get more creative, Moons.”

Remus flicked his fag away. “Whatever. Tell me about this guy then.”

Sirius raised his cig to his lips, looking indignant. “No, don’t wanna.”

“Why not? I told you.”

“You told me she kissed ‘nice’. That's not exactly front page news, now is it?”

“You’re not being fair.”

“Yeah, well… tough.”

Remus couldn’t think of a comeback and they eventually lapsed into silence. It was almost maddening. He’d thought hearing Sirius talk about girls was bad, but hearing him talk about other guys? Now that was real torture. Maybe now was finally the time. Maybe if they got things out in the open they could finally be more like themselves again, instead of all… this.

Just say it then. Ask the question.

Remus steeled himself. “Sirius… about that night in the bathroom—”

Sirius’ eyes were on him in an instant. “What night?”

“O-Our last night. At school? Remember, Mary suggested that game, and we all—”

“OH!” Sirius shoved him by the shoulder, almost too hard to be friendly. “Yeah, yeah. Fun night! Totally crazy. Don’t remember much, actually.”

Remus’ throat turned to ice. “You don’t… remember?”

“Mm-mm. Woke up with a killer headache. Super sucked. Boy, we must’ve really lost our heads.”

He’s lying.

What if he’s not?

He is.

But what if he’s not?! What if he really didn’t mean the kiss? What if he was just drunk?!

People don’t kiss like that when they’re drunk.

“I remember,” Remus said, plucking up the last of his courage. Lord, was he really about to do this outside of a cinema? Guess so.

“Remember what? Oh—you mean when Wormtail called McKinnon 'mum'? Yeah, that was funny. Heh."

“No, it was when I went into the bathroom. You followed me, and we sorta—”

He didn’t get to finish.

Before Remus could get his final word out, Sirius had surged forward, covering his mouth with his palm. “Please, Moons,” he begged, “please, don’t.”

Remus pulled his face away. He could feel the words on the tip of his tongue. Why not?

“I don’t want this to change,” Sirius told him, as though he could read the question in his face. “If we can just stay like this, I’d be happy. What that was…” He looked around desperately; “It was wrong. A mistake. So just… forget about it. Please.”

Remus fought a frown. It was an uphill battle.

Told you he was lying…

“Alright,” he said, in the firmest, surest voice he could muster. “I didn’t mean to dig anything up. I’ll forget about it.”

Sirius exhaled, visibly relieved, and smiled at him. “Cool.”

More silence. Remus would’ve given anything to rewind time to even just thirty seconds ago. He’s been stupid to bring up the kiss. Of course Sirius hadn’t meant it. He was Sirius, and Remus was… this.

Dammit. Idiot. Stupid fucking idiot!

Hey, no arguments here.

You shut up! This is all your fault.

I think you mean your fault? Unless I’m secretly somebody else’s inner monologue.

He needed to get drunk. Or high. Or take a header on the pavement so he forgot all of this had ever happened. Remus was considering the last one, when another body strolled right up to them, this one bearing a lip ring and a large faux hawk and without a shirt entirely.

“Bum a fag, lads?” The punk-boy asked. He seemed friendly enough, but Sirius still stared openly. Remus supposed it was only fair, considering it was his first day in the city. There wasn’t very much radical subculture in Bath, and the guy was more alien-looking than anything they’d seen in The Man Who Fell to Earth.

“Sure. Have at her,” Remus said, offering his carton.

The guy accepted a single cigarette and tucked it between his teeth. Beyond them, a group of similarly-dressed folks were shouting and trying to flag him down.

“C’mon Dell, fuck off! We’re gonna miss the show!” A girl out front complained. She might’ve been short, were it not for the platform boots that lifted her at least a foot off the ground.

The punk brushed her off, and nodded jovially at the two of them, mumbling around the fag; “Cheers, cunts.”

As he handed the pack of smokes back and stepped away to rejoin his friends, Remus saw his chance to be rid of all horrible thoughts and feelings.

“Hey, what show you guys heading to?”

Dell turned back around. “Punk group. Callin’ themselves the Sex Pistols.”

“They new?” Remus asked, not recognising the name.

“Yeah, but they’ve played everywhere—Free Trade, Nashville, got banned from the Marquee even. They’re playing at 100 Club tonight.”

“Would I know any of the members?”

He shrugged, then eyed Remus’ trainers, slacks, and Led Zeppelin t-shirt. “Don’t ask me. They’re totally radical though. Bassist’s name is Sid, 'e totally demolished a journalist at their last show—sent the fucker home in a body cast!”

That’d be a no then.

Remus raised a hand; “Cheers,” and Dell spun away again, sauntering back over to his group. As he did, a small pack of university-age girls wearing fur coats like they’d just stepped out of Biba eyed him critically. As though he sensed their displeasure toward his very existence, Dell jumped out at them with a great ‘AH!’ and the girls all shrieked in surprise. As their shock turned into cursing and swearing, the punk dismissed the judgemental girls with a single wave and rejoined his friends, who were all howling with laughter as they started back up the street.

“I don’t blame ‘em for screaming. That guy could use some serious toothpaste,” Sirius quipped, making Remus actually crack a smile. He turned to him.

“You heard him—there’s a show going on. Don’t you want to go?”

Sirius’ eyes widened. “But he said it’s a punk group. And we’re…” Sirius glanced at the way Dell and his friends had gone; “Not punk.”

“Music’s music. Especially when it’s live. Surely you feel the same way?"

At that, Sirius considered. It only took him about two seconds. "Yeah, get a leg-on then! I wanna know what band's so bad that they get tossed out of the Marquee club."

Remus nodded in agreement. Yes, this was it. A couple hours of booze and rock music was exactly the thing they needed to shake some sense into them.

He hoped.

* * *

Neither of them had ever heard of a "Sex Pistol" before, so they definitely hadn't been anticipating the line wrapped halfway down the block just to get in. It was definitely a punk show alright. People decked out in full street-punk attire shuffled back and forth, creating a small mushroom cloud of haze from the weed and tobacco being shared between them, and they actually got to watch as one guy turned to his friend and ripped the shirt sleeves clean off his shoulders. Remus just knew the show was going to be amazing. If they could just get in.

"Where're you going?" Sirius asked, when Remus bypassed the end of the line.

"I'm not waiting. Come on."

"You mean we're not going in?"

"We're going in," Remus smirked, "but not this way. Follow me. Oh and, maybe turn that shirt of yours inside out."

Glancing down at his 'Big Ben' tee, Sirius snorted and quickly turned his stroll into a jog to keep up. Making their way to the end of the street, they skirted around the corner, and up toward an alleyway. By the time they made it to its mouth, Sirius had turned his tourist t-shirt inside out and had even torn the sleeves off for good measure like he'd seen the other punks do.

"Where are you taking us?" He asked, tossing the scrap fabric into a grimy dumpster and tying the sleeves of his leather jacket around his waist. He shook out his braids too, mussing up his hair with both hands and tucking a chunk of it behind one ear to hide the bald spot.

“We’ll never get inside if we wait in that line," Remus told him, "thought I’d try something else. Just shut up and stay close.”

“Ooh. I love sneaky Moony.”

Remus almost wished he could be sneaky, but if they were to make it inside then he needed to be convincing Moony, or in the very least, bull-shitting Moony. He wasn’t quite sure what his plan was, but he’d seen Tomny talk his way into a cheap second-rate pub gig on more than one occasion. Only none of them had been the 100 Club, and if Remus were being honest he wasn’t sure he had the guts to bluff through his teeth either. Guess he’d find out.

“What’d that guy say the bassist’s name was again?” He asked Sirius.

“Sid.”

Remus wiped his sweaty palms on his trousers. “Kay.”

As they made their way down the alley, passing various trucks and cars stuffed to the brim with what was clearly music equipment, Remus pulled out his rumpled cigarette box and cleared his throat. The music was louder there, and he could feel the heavy bass and kick drum practically vibrating beneath the ground. Somewhere just below their feet a band was playing to an audience of crowded, sweaty punks, all of them losing their minds to the music, but around them, only drivers and club workers mulled about, mostly smoking or drinking or just taking in the air. No one paid them much mind until they made it to the end of the alley, where the music was loudest. There a bouncer stood up from his milk crate, abandoning the game of cards he and another roadie had set up on an overturned rubbish bin.

“Oi, where do you think you’re going? It’s fans ‘round front!” He barked.

“We—We’re not fucking fans,” Remus spat, in what he thought was a rather convincing tone of anger, “we’re staff. And we’re only out here because one of you fuckheads forgot Sid’s fags!”

“What you say to me?”

“Oh take the piss, why don’t you?” Striding right up to the guy, Remus stopped just before his huge gut, throwing up the cigarettes and scoffing in his face. “I told you idiots I was done making stupid piss-runs for bands and you still whinge like fucking babies. This is the last time we're letting you send us anywhere when we got work to do first, ya hear me?!"

"No one sent you anywhere, I don't even know you!" The bouncer boomed. "Where's your badge anyway?"

"You think we had time to grab the bloody badges? You lot couldn't even have cigarettes on hand for your bassist! Is this why you're never out front? 'Cause ya can't be bothered to know who works here and who don't? Do you even hear them down there?" Remus thrust his hand up to one ear, but the bouncer barely had time to look confused. "Yeah! Fuckin' terrible. That's whatcha bloody get when ya send the guys responsible for sound checkin' out to buy fags when you dickheads can't do your damn jobs! Now get out 'a my way unless you want to be the one explaining to Sid why he's suddenly quittin' cold-turkey!"

The bouncer gave him such a nasty glare that Remus just about caved right then and there. He seemed to be determining the likelihood of getting into shit himself were they actually telling the truth. Best not to let him think too hard.

"Tick-tock, meathead," Remus hissed. "You steppin' aside or am I to climb in the window and get Sid out here to tear a strip off 'a ya 'imself?"

More grudgingly than he'd ever seen anyone do anything, the bouncer finally stepped aside and pulled the door open. The roadie who was waiting to finish their card game just looked at them as though he couldn't decide if he was more confused or more impressed. Remus didn't give him the chance to figure it out. Grabbing Sirius by the shoulder, he pushed him inside first and waited until the heavy door had slammed shut behind them to breathe again.

"I cannot believe you just fucking did that," Sirius gaped. "Oh my god —how'd you do that"

"I dunno," Remus wheezed, holding his head. "But I think I just shit my pants."

They both broke down into a fit of laughter that might've left them in stitches for the rest of the night, had the band not kicked up another song, this one even more riotous than the last.

"Bloody hell, they're really something aren't they?" Sirius said, wiping the tears of laughter from the corners of his eyes. Remus looked at him, still handsome in the dim red light of the club's hallway, and pushed all of his feelings of love aside. He was determined to have a good night.

"I promised you ages ago that I'd bring you to a scummy dive bar," he said, "and I doubt it gets scummier than a group of punks calling themselves 'The Sex Pistols'."

"Then what are we waiting for?" Sirius grinned, already pushing him down the hall toward the music. Every step got them closer to the club's garish thunder of noise and after plunging further underground on a cement, red-tinged staircase, they emerged into the club. The doorway they'd come through was clearly meant for staff only, and was tucked between the bar and the loo. The room was entirely rectangular, and every inch of it was stuffed by twisted and excited bodies. The band was literally only a few feet away, lifted up on a tiny stage with a huge, glowing '100' behind them. There wasn't a single bar table—there wasn't room—only the stage and those who'd come to listen and forget that morning was only a few precious hours away. Not that there was much to listen to aside from the singer's bleating.

"I don't even think they're speaking English!" Sirius shouted. "It's great!"

Using the last of Remus' cash, they got themselves several shots and a whisky highball each, downing each until they were so severely liquored it wouldn't have mattered if the band were screaming in Pig Latin. The crowd was absolute insanity, covered head to toe in metal bits and facial piercings. It seemed as though even a light jostle among the thrashing bodies would have them skewered, but that was part of the fatalistic appeal.

Throwing themselves into the fray, Remus nearly lost a shoe after someone stepped on his trainer from behind and pulled it clean off his foot. No one cared, least of all him. The band kept going, mashing their instruments together until they were indistinguishable from one another. The music was awful—the attitude of the band even worse so—but that was the point. Remus looked for the bassist, Sid, and was startled to find that he looked a bit like Peter—if Peter had lost a hundred pounds and lived solely off cocaine and glue huffing. He might've said as much to Sirius, had he not already strayed far into the crowd. He kept playing at getting closer and closer to each fight that insisted on breaking out, and Remus hadn't even the sense to care. At some point someone spat beer down the back of his neck, but he knew better than to retaliate in such close quarters. Whenever someone did get ballsy enough to throw a punch, the band only seemed to get louder. Finally the lead guitarist took a glass from an audience member, downed the drink, and turned to huck the thing against the wall behind the drum kit, shattering it all while the band kept playing.

Everyone lost their minds.

It was glorious.

“You’re getting shit all for an encore tonight because I’m a lazy bastard!” The singer wailed into the microphone. “So fuck you London, here’s ‘No Fun’!”

“YEAH, JOHNNY!” Another clubber wailed from behind Remus, fisting the air with both hands.

“FUCK YEAH, JOHNNY-BOY!” Sirius shouted gleefully, reappearing at Remus’ side with two more shot glasses and a lit cigarette in the same hand. Remus didn’t know where he’d gotten any of it, but he took the shot and then let Sirius hold the smoke to his lips for a drag as the song started.

‘No fun, my babe—
No fun!
No fun, my babe—
No fun!’

“It’s a Stooges song!” Remus said, smacking Sirius in the chest, but even that wasn’t enough to get his attention. Not while he was busy staring at some girl standing practically on the other side of the stage. Remus couldn’t believe it. Trust Sirius Black to be the only one who could catch a girl’s eye while being serenaded by a band that sounded more like a collection of wood-chippers.

“Bloody go talk to her then!” Remus shouted, shoving Sirius hard with his shoulder. Bouncing off another concert-goer, Sirius gave him a sharp look.

“WASN’T GONNA!”

“SURE YOU WERE!”

“NUH-UH!”

Remus looked up and scoffed. “WELL TOO BAD ‘CAUSE HERE SHE COMES!”

Sirius spun around just in time to find the girl squeezing through several bodies to get to them. Her hair was cut short and plastered to the sides of her neck and face with sweat and her eyebrows were drawn on with what looked to be felt-tipped pen, but she had large eyes and might've been pretty under the rest of the make-up. Too noisy for small talk, Remus watched her mouth a sultry ‘hi’ before offering Sirius another shot and a lime she had tucked between two fingers. Ignoring the fact that he could see directly down her shirt, Remus huffed and looked away just in time to see The Sex Pistol’s bassist take a long drag off a cigarette and put it out on his own nipple.

‘No fun to be alone—
Walking by myself!
No fun to be alone—
In love with nobody else!’

It would’ve been better if he could’ve just listened to the music, but Remus couldn’t help it. He looked back and found Sirius whispering in the girl’s ear, a sight that instantly turned his stomach. It was one thing for Sirius to flirt openly in front of him, but right next to him? No —he wasn’t going to put up with it this time.

Turning to move away, Remus only managed a single step before Sirius’ hand shot out, grabbing him tightly around the wrist and yanking him back. He almost fell right into him, but somehow still didn’t miss the way the girl leaned away from Sirius, shock clear on her face. Whatever Sirius had said to her must’ve been something, as the wide-eyed look she gave Remus was enough to stop him in his jealous tracks. Then—quite miraculously—the girl simply shrugged and moved off with her shot still in hand.

“WHAT’D YOU SAY TO HER?!” Remus demanded instantly, but Sirius only gave him a single shit-eating grin and then shoved the lime slice between his teeth. Remus choked on it and Sirius’ mouth split into a laugh that was swallowed by the band’s noise as their encore came to a turbulent and fervent end.

After a rousing second and third encore—the latter of which was just a screaming match between two of the band members—the show was finally over. As the band members fucked off deeper into the club and music switched over to a more party-like ambiance, the crowd continued drunkenly mulling about. It would've been nice to stay longer, but Remus knew the trains would stop running soon and it was always a pain to get cabbies to go from the centre of the city all the way to Blackheath. And since they couldn't call Giles to come pick them up…

Taking Sirius by the arm, he led them up and out of the basement venue, where they spilled out onto the pavement and gulped down the fresh night air.

"That was so good! Did you see how close we got to the stage?" Sirius whooped, nearly walking into a sign post on the side of the road.

"So what, you a punk now?" Remus sniggered, grinning widely up at the lights of Oxford Street. The city was still noisy so close to the club, but the further away they got the quieter things became, until only the occasional bum on the corner was around to spot them.

"My ears are still ringing. Just wait until James and Pete hear about it," Sirius beamed.

"They're gonna be so jealous…" Remus mumbled, too busy watching Sirius from the side to make much more conversation. It could've been the booze, but when Sirius talked about the music and lit up as he did, Remus was sure he'd never seen anything more pretty. Certainly the night was a monster made for Sirius. He never glowed so brightly as when they were outside and in love.

In love?

Remus tripped on a crack in the pavement. He might've gone sprawling face-first had he not caught himself at the last second, Sirius' arms stretched out beside him just in case he needed him.

"Too much to drink, Moons?" He laughed.

Fuck. Not enough actually. Not if he was still able to remember what had happened that night in the bathroom. Not enough for Sirius' begging to cull those damn feelings. At least before, when Sirius hadn't been writing him back, Remus had been able to resent him. He'd been able to feel sorry for himself, but now that he knew the truth—that Sirius hadn't been ignoring him, that he really wanted it over with—everything felt a lot worse.

What if he just kissed him?

The thought occurred to him just as they turned another corner, onto an even darker street. If he kissed him, would it prove anything? Or would it just make things worse? If Sirius had already moved on past the kiss and forgotten about it, would it ruin absolutely everything for him to know that Remus hadn't?

Subconsciously, Remus found himself peering into alleys and behind shop corners, wondering if every incoming shadow would give him enough space to pull Sirius aside and find out the truth. Nothing could be done about it out in the open, he wasn't that stupid, but if he just bulked up the nerve to reach out and take Sirius by the hand then maybe! Except if he had the nerve, he'd left it behind somewhere between Abbey Road and the floor of the 100 Club. Every opportunity passed him by; they passed so many dark alleyways and empty doorways that Remus was starting to wonder if he would have to feign a hurt ankle just to slow their pace.

But then it didn't matter anymore. They'd reached the tube station and its bright yellow lights suffocated any chance of privacy. Not bothering to pay, they hopped the ticket stalls and skipped down the stairs into the underground. Remus shoved his hands into his pockets to suppress his prickly mood. There were only a handful of other people on the platform, but he hated every one of them for existing. Maybe if they hadn't, he'd be kissing Sirius right now.

"You know where we're going, right?" Sirius asked, peering down the tracks as a train rumbled toward them.

"You ask me that now, as if I haven't been leading you around the entire city all day?" Remus replied cutting. Sirius gave him a simple shrug, too drunk to notice the tone. A few moments later the train came to a whirring stop in front of them and they shuffled aboard as the announcer echoed over their heads, 'Please mind the gap'.

Taking a seat in the corner, Remus tried not to think about Sirius' thigh pressed up against his own, bobbing like his heartbeat had travelled down to the ball of his foot. Instead he leaned his head back against the window while the announcer droned on, 'last train to Bethnal Green'.

"Moony, can I have a cig?" Sirius asked after a while.

“Can’t smoke in this compartment.” It was a lie, but he didn’t feel very truthful right then.

“Ah… Really?”

“Mhm.”

“Oh.”

Sirius fell silent again next to him and the train continued roaring down its tracks, late-night commuters coming and going while the buzzing yellow lights glared down from overhead. It was another long while later when Sirius spoke again;

“Just think of it, Moony.”

Remus opened his eyes. He’d almost drifted off. What he found was Sirius smiling at the row of seats ahead of them.

“Just think… one day that’s gonna be us.”

Remus raised a brow. “You mean we’re gonna be the ones picking some girl’s shirt up off the stage and wiping our sweat on it?”

“Only if we’re lucky. But who am I kidding, you already have a line of girls who want your sweat-stained clothes.” With two fingers Sirius flapped the front of his shirt suggestively.

“First of all—you’re fucking gross,” Remus snorted; “second of all—are you joking? You actually think they’d take me over you?”

“I know they would!”

“You’re mental.”

“And you’re blind!” Sirius turned in his seat to smack him in the shoulder. “You think McKinnon’s the only one who ever had her eye on you?”

“We broke up!”

“I know that! But what about all the others?”

“What others?”

Sirius scoffed; “Are you really being this thick on purpose?”

“No, you dickhead! There are no others!”

“Of course there are others! You said it yourself, right? The ‘nice kisser’? Bet she would’ve dated you outright.”

“Jesus—I didn’t want to date her.”

“Then I don’t get it! You’re going to all these shows—sneaking in the back and shoutin’ at bloody security guards like you have balls of steel —”

“What are you talking about?” Remus wailed. “That’s the first time I’ve ever been in a club like that!”

Sirius’ eyes widened. “It was?”

“Yeah, I mean I’ve been outside it plenty, but only while Lee and Flacky picked pockets—we were just kids, they’d never actually have let us in.”

“Then how’d you know about the back way through the alley?”

Remus licked his lips before raising his chin haughtily. “Tomny told me. Once saw him bluff his way into another show. Nothin’ like that though.”

“So you do have balls of steel then!” Sirius guffawed. “See, I knew you were cool, Moony!”

“Oh shut up.” Remus scowled in embarrassment, shoving him back with his shoulder. In response Sirius just leaned in closer, a hand wrapped around Remus’ bicep tightly enough to make him worry if he was blushing.

“This is why girls like you, you’re cool and humble. Careful or some bird’s gonna come along and walk right over you,” Sirius warned.

“Sort of like you’re doing right now?”

The train slowed to another stop, letting off an old man who’d been sitting a few rows down from him. He folded up his newspaper as he passed, pointedly flapping it in their direction with a nasty look. Sirius just flipped him off from behind.

“Still,” he pushed as the train started up again, “you hang out with them.”

“You mean girls? Like Lily?”

“Yeah, duh!”

The train’s noise muffled Remus’ sputtered laughter. “She’s my friend —and she’s dating James, who happens to be your best friend by the way!”

“Well, does that make Lily your best friend?”

Remus balked a bit. “She’s—She’s one of them!”

“And me?”

“You are too! You said it yourself, didn’t you?”

Sirius fell back a bit, relaxing his hold on his arm. “Yeah,” he said, more quietly this time; “You’re right. We’re friends… ‘course.”

Something deflated in Remus’ chest as Sirius turned away. As he did Remus looked around. They were the only ones on the train car.

“Remember that girl at the show?” Sirius hummed.

Remus just made a noise in the back of his throat like a ‘hmph’. Honestly, how could he have forgotten?

“She said her friend thought you were fit.”

Remus looked up at the map of the underground hanging over the train door. Two stops left. “Don’t matter now, does it?”

“She probably would’ve hooked up with you if you fancied it,” Sirius said, “but then you threw that fit and tried to storm off. What, gotta keep yourself pure for Jillian Stewart?”

Something inside of Remus snapped. He whirled on Sirius, their faces only a breath apart. “You’re fucking infuriating.”

“Oh yeah? Well, you’re a bastard!”

Remus almost laughed. Too right, that.

“Fuck you, Sirius!”

“No, fuck you, Moony!”

“You think you’re so fucking funny—”

“—I know I’m funny!”

“No, really you’re just a big fucking dick! You can’t do anything without turning it into a stupid fucking joke!”

“A joke? You mean like you and Stewart?!”

That’s it!

Remus brought up one hand, slamming it on the train window next to Sirius’ head and boxing him into the corner seat. “Shut. Up.”

Sirius returned the look with wide-eyes. “I didn’t mean to…”

“I don’t want to talk about Jillian anymore,” Remus ground out.

Then he grabbed Sirius by the jaw and kissed him.

Time seemed to slow. The roar of the train dropped away, and all Remus could hear, feel, and taste was heat. Sirius’ heat. It drove right through his mouth and lit him ablaze. He was furious—confused, hurt, and pissed off, but oh so happy. More happy than he’d ever been. Sirius Black may have been one of the only people who could drive him up the wall and back again, but lord if he wasn’t just the best to kiss.

And when Sirius’ mouth parted and he let Remus slip his tongue inside? Well, that was just the cherry on top.

Pushing in even further, Remus cupped Sirius’ neck with both hands and just kissed him. It was magnificent. Eventually Sirius’ fire gave way to all traces of him—the whisky on his breath, the smooth curve of his bottom lip, the hint of cigarette smoke clinging to his tongue. He didn’t have time to wonder what Sirius tasted—they were too busy, practically falling over top of one another on the train seats.

It took a nasty jostle from the tracks to finally separate them. Remus pulled back, nearly panting as the distinct feeling of horror that he might’ve just ruined everything surged over him. Neither of them said anything at first, but when Remus had collected himself to chance a look in Sirius’ direction, he was rewarded with relief and—oh thank god—desire. Sirius’ eyes on him were soft; after a few more laboured breaths, he raised his hand and traced a smooth path across Remus’ cheek and down to his lips. And then when Sirius smiled, Remus thought that he might actually be dreaming. If he were, he prayed he would never wake up.

“Sirius…”

“Shh… Just…” Sirius laughed again, more of a nervous chitter than anything. “My god—it’s about fucking time.” And then he returned Remus’ kiss with every inch of himself.

Remus couldn’t believe it.

They’d kissed.

They were kissing.

Remus never wanted to stop. Finally—an answer to everything he’d been feeling! How it taken so fucking long? Sirius was right there—he’d always been there! Always going on about the romance of music or the importance of making life into a story and not just an everyday sentence of hell that must be served. He’d listened to all of it and yet somehow they’d only ever missed each other. Like ships passing in the night—it almost wounded him! But kissing Sirius healed all of it. It reminded him of the things that hurt the most and somehow took away their hurt all together. It was like Sirius’ favourite stories, each of them about knights slaying dragons to save a princess, or kings coming into their own by pulling magical swords out of stone. It was just so Sirius. The Sirius who read Shakespeare like a religion, revelling in the tragic romance that filled every play and sonnet. Who preferred heartbreak and misery in every tale, but only if it served a happy purpose, and only if the characters had once been happier than their misery could ever make them. Remus had read all the stories too, and yet he was sure that their happiness and misery paled in comparison to what it felt like to kiss Sirius Black.

Distantly Remus was aware of the train slowing, but he was also conscious of Sirius’ fingers dipping down below the collar of his shirt, brushing that chain and wrapping it around his hand so he could pull him even closer. It almost hurt. He wanted more.

“You’re gonna choke me,” he grunted between kisses.

“You’d probably like it,” Sirius mumbled gruffly, running his tongue across the roof of Remus’ mouth and leaving him trembling in his very core. He could’ve stayed kissing him forever, had the train not pulled into the next station. They reluctantly pulled apart as the doors opened and a single woman got on, obviously drunk and raging, shaking her fist at some guy she'd left behind on the platform.

"Oh go fuck yourself! I never want to see you again, you cheating bloody bastard!"

She stormed aboard, slamming herself down on a seat on the far-side of the train car. The guy ran several paces before giving up, instead shouting back at her; 'You crazy bitch!' as she began spitting obscenities through the window like a fitting cat.

"Really, some people have no sense of public decorum," Sirius murmured cheekily, his face still flushed from kissing. Remus instantly broke down in a flurry of laughter and Sirius fell into him, cackling.

"What you laughing at?!" The hissing woman roared from her end of the train compartment. They sat up instantly, peeking awkwardly at one another before their happiness got too big again and they were laughing once more.

The woman continued glaring at them for the rest of the ride, and Remus tried to behave himself for the most part, but it was as though a set of floodgates had opened. It was suddenly impossible to keep their hands to themselves. Sirius continued flashing that cheeky smile of his and began running his fingertips along Remus' arm until he had goosebumps. Remus silently swore he'd get him back for it, and when the train finally pulled into the last station and the announcer cried, 'All change!' they were off like a light, skidding up the stairs behind one another and out onto the cool nighttime street.

Free of all prying eyes, it quickly became clear that rather than just floodgates, an entire dam had burst within them. The moment they were alone they had each other pressed up against alley walls or street corners, anywhere dark enough that a passerby would've been able to tell what it was they were doing. It took far too long to hail a cab the rest of the way home and more than once they simply let a car pass them by—too busy throwing themselves at one another to care. They didn't talk much—Remus was tired of talking—and when they finally made it back to the estate, his lips felt puffy and bruised from kissing.

Sirius gave him enough time to make sure the coast was clear before they snuck back inside, every inch of their bodies thrumming with anticipation. The moment they were alone in his bedroom they were back at it, tearing at each other's clothes and barely leaving enough time between kisses to breathe. They ended up on the bed, pushing aside the curtains and falling next to one another over the alreadyrumpled sheets. It was completely different from how it'd felt to be with Marlene; then it'd been an expectation—they'd bloody planned it for Christ's sake—but with Sirius everything was new and exciting.

Without even asking him to, Sirius straddled his waist and Remus was free to glide his hands up beneath his t-shirt and trace the lines of his back. He didn't dare touch his stomach. He'd been using the image of it as wanking fodder for far too long and he was worried that if he paid it too much attention he'd finish right then and there. Luckily there was plenty of Sirius he'd yet to explore. The small of his back was perfect, the line of his spine a work of art, and he hadn't even seen either up close yet. As Sirius slid his hands down his back from above, leaning down to nibble the shell of his ear, Remus began to kiss his neck, daring to reach even higher beneath the thin fabric of his shirt until his fingers brushed one of the rippled scars that lined the top of Sirius' ribs.

It was like an electric shock to both of them.

They yanked apart—two boys—and in that instant, the faces of every girl he'd ever kissed flashed through Remus' mind. He'd liked them all, though some more than others. They'd had the pretty smiles… the silky hair… and whenever he dared to get closer they'd always caressed him with soft fingertips and stuttered breath. Sirius had all of those things and then some, but he was still a man. What did it even mean to love another man…?

Remus fell forward, leaning his forehead against the crook of Sirius' shoulder. Was love supposed to make you feel so sick? Like you couldn't breathe?

"Toujours pur."

It was like the barest chance of a whisper. Remus almost thought he'd imagined it, until he heard it again, tickling the shell of his ear like a kiss. Sirius had told him what it meant on their drive into the estate. A family motto. A designation of propriety.

Always pure.

A bolt of fear shot through him, and Remus clenched his jaw as he fisted the back of Sirius' shirt.

This is it, this is where he takes it back, the voice warned.

No, he'll have to rip me off.

“Moony.”

Almost wincing, Remus leaned back very quickly. He blinked up at Sirius’ face in the darkness, searching his expression for that fatal moment of pause. Of regret.

“… What’s wrong, Sirius?”

Sirius’ tongue traced his lips. “I have to know. Does this mean… that you’re…?”

Remus’ mind began to race. What to say—no? No, I like girls? I’ve always liked girls, I’m just awkward and you’re just beautiful and it’s all just a damn mess? ‘No’ scared him. He didn’t even have the words to articulate how badly it scared him, and yet it seemed the most obvious choice because—no, he wasn’t! And neither was Sirius, right? He’d said so himself. But if the answer was no, then how could they begin to justify such love?

“Moony…?”

He’d taken too long. Sirius was staring at him now, waiting for an answer… He had to say something, and he had an answer but he hated it! And he didn’t want to stop— god, he couldn’t take it if they stopped. Maybe it would just be best to…

“Nope,” Remus answered simply, as if Sirius had asked if it were raining.

Nope, no chance of rain, Padfoot. Just a half chance of being queer…

Sirius’ eyebrows raised in unison. “No?”

“No.”

“Then we…”

“No one has to know,” Remus said very quickly. “It can just be us.”

Sirius’ eyes dipped down, then up again. “You… wouldn’t tell anyone?”

No, no, no!

“No. Never. We couldn’t, right? Not if…” If they wanted anything in life, really.

A beat passed between them, and Remus slowly uncurled his fingers from Sirius' t-shirt, gingerly sliding them against the intoxicating curve of his spine. Sirius shivered, and he thought he could taste it.

"We could just stop," Sirius said. "Stop now and… never speak about it."

No…

Remus swallowed. "We could…"

"Just… go back to how it was before. Be friends."

"Aren't we friends?"

Sirius' mouth twitched. "I want you," he confessed. He raised his chin as he said it, as though he were trying to be proud.

"I want you too," Remus sighed, practically sagging with relief.

"Doesn't mean this has to mean anything," Sirius said. "We could just… do it."

"Right! It can just be for us. We don't have to tell anybody…"

"Just… for us."

Remus nodded, and then he almost said it—I love you—but he didn't want to risk chasing Sirius off. Best to continue comforting him.

"No one else is here, Sirius. No one at all. It's an empty house. It's just you and me."

Sirius held his gaze a moment longer, and then began drawing off his shirt. Slipping over his head, it puddled on the bed next to them and Remus got full view of Sirius' red, band-like scars. The whole of his chest and neck were flushed, but the old wounds stood out like living fire beneath his skin.

"You're beautiful," Remus said. He meant it.

Sirius didn't say anything at first. Instead he extended his hands to cup Remus' face. Surprisingly, his hands felt cool, and he used both thumbs to trace his nose and the scar there.

"I told you once that I trusted you," Sirius said slowly, "do you trust me?"

“Oh god… yes.”

Sirius kissed him. It was softer than any of the ones they’d shared before, and when he pulled back he was smiling. It was like a cutting ray of moonlight.

“Then bloody get on me already.”

Unhooking his legs from around Remus’ waist, Sirius stood up and stepped back several paces. Remus watched him go from the edge of the bed, utterly transfixed. Sirius was still wearing his charity shop trousers, and they clung to the sharp ridges of his hip bones like linen on a wire. He raised his arms in a lazy shrug, as if to say, what are you waiting for?

For someone to tell me I’m dreaming, Remus thought dumbly. Then he was moving all at once.

Surging forward, he caught Sirius around the neck with both hands, drawing their mouths back together in a single desperate kiss. Sirius fell into him instantly, opening his mouth and allowing Remus to slip his tongue inside. It was the heat of him that set him apart, he realised; Sirius’ heat was unlike any girl’s. Their tender caresses could never compare—not when his touch left him feeling more alive than any rush, or higher than any drug. Sirius was scalding and intoxicating all at once. He was the first ‘I’m sorry’ and the last ‘I forgive you’. He was everything Remus had ever wanted and more.

“Hurry up,” Sirius grunted against his lips, while Remus fumbled with the zipper of his own trousers. He’d only managed the first button by the time Sirius was ridding him of his shirt, tossing it over his shoulder and immediately reaching up to wrap one hand around the chain at his neck. Trousers finally open at the top, Remus reacted in kind—drawing Sirius up against them and spinning them both around until they were tumbling back onto the bed in a single heap. With the other boy on his back amongst the sheets, Remus began placing sparse and eager kisses down the side of Sirius’ neck and lower. He didn’t avoid the scars, and every time he looked up he found Sirius watching him with eyes glazed over in need. Remus knew the feeling well, and it drove him as he dipped lower still, until his nose was brushing the tip of his navel and he’d just met that faint trail of dark hairs he’d been fantasizing about for months. He’d just managed to slip his fingers into the waistband on Sirius’ trousers and reveal the top of his pants when Sirius reached down and knotted his fingers into his hair, drawing Remus to a halt.

“Hey, c’mere… Come back up here.”

Remus glanced hopelessly at the trousers. “But I thought you said…” Then his voice turned whiny; “I want you.”

Sirius flashed a grin. “I know, it’s just… I haven’t nearly kissed you enough.”

Fucking hell…

Obediently, Remus rose back up until the two of them were hovering only centimetres apart. He leaned in, but before he could kiss him again, Sirius pushed Remus away by the chin. His clumsy lips met Sirius’ hairline, and Remus pulled away.

“Um, what?”

Sirius laughed, bold and beautiful, and then leaned in to kiss Remus’ neck. “I never said where it was that I wanted to kiss…”

Unable to help it, Remus chuckled and let Sirius have his way. Soon enough his eyes were fluttering shut, as he swallowed moans while Sirius’ tongue took a leisurely stroll about his throat. Unwilling to take a back seat, Remus slipped a hand down between them and cupped the other boy through his jeans. He was hard, and the relief was imminent.

“For us,” Sirius murmured against his skin. A moment later he was pulling away, and they’d matched gazes.

“No running away,” Remus said. Agreed. Then he watched as the corners of Sirius’ mouth quirked.

“Had enough of that for a lifetime anyway.”

And then Sirius was raising his face towards him again.

Remus almost leaned in to meet the kiss, but before their lips could touch, Sirius used his teeth to bite down on the pick that had been dangling off of his chain necklace between them. He smirked deviously then, and dropped back against the bed covers, tugging Remus down with him by the neck. It was the hottest thing Remus had ever seen.

“Oh... fuck me."

Sirius released the pick, running his tongue across his teeth. “Don’t mind if I do…"

They kissed again and did not stop until morning.

* * *

Stupid boys.

Maybe things would've been easier if they'd both just admitted how much they loved each other that very first night. It would've made what came next certainly a little less confusing… But they'd come around eventually. It just took some time to be honest with each other and themselves—and also to figure things out. After all, they were only two boys.

Stupid, lovely boys.

Later on, Remus would recall how Lily had once described love as a lightbulb going off inside your head. At the time she'd failed to describe how the lightbulb wasn't just any old lightbulb. Love lightbulbs tended to hang in pitch black rooms without any doors or windows at all. The room was so dark that whenever the light sprung on, it tended to blind you. Depending on how long you'd been in darkness, that blindness would last and last… Yeah, love was like that. Foolishly blinding. So much so that it was sometimes easy to mistake a love lightbulb for something far, far worse. It was a mistake Remus had made often.

For so long love had felt like an ailing mother and a healthy father who only saw the worst of each other whenever they looked at him. It was not the kind of love Remus wanted to give anyone, let alone Sirius.

And so he'd looked elsewhere. What he'd found was that love sometimes began to feel more like jealousy—like an excruciating jab to the gut that left him raw and bitter for days. It had also felt like a song he couldn't get out of his head, or a light fluttering in the centre of the chest, or just plain dizziness. Sometimes love made him sick, as though he were a book with its spine suddenly cracked. Those were the hard loves—the 'tough loves', but there was also a comforting, friendship sort of love, like the kind he felt for Lily and James. One of the most common though, was the rubber band type of love. It was the sort that snapped against your skin like an electric shock but wore off just as quickly. Just— WAP! —and you're finished.

One thing was mostly clear though: no matter the source, love was almost always unexpected…

Unless you'd always expected to love them.

On the good days, Remus did not worry about love. He simply lived and let live. It was hard then to imagine it, but there would be other Tonyas… Other Tomnys even. And for them, there would certainly be other Remuses. Or at least, that was the hope. Because what else was real love but hope? Hoping for better, hoping for worse so that the better could be better, and hoping that those who cared enough to say even a little while would turn out happy in the end.

Yeah… just love, love, love.

It would take a lifetime to figure out, but the love Remus had for Sirius encompassed all of these things and more. There would never just be one way to describe it. It would change and grow with them, affected by the times and their lives and the people that came in and out of it. It would not always feel or look the same, but there was one thing that Remus invariably told himself: Love was wonderful—terribly so, if only because you never quite knew where you'd find it.

Chapter End Notes

'Snooker' is a game like pool or billiards.
A 'zebra crossing' is a crosswalk.
'Selfridges' and 'C&A' are both department store-type shops.
'Kipped' or 'kip' is slang for sleepy/sleep/nap.
Biba was a woman's fashion store.
'All change' is the the announcement for the last stop on public transportation.

Song in the charity shop is "I'm Your Boogie Man" by KC & The Sunshine Band, 1976.
The song in the club is "No Fun" originally by the Stooges but covered by the Sex Pistols, 1977.

Chapter 68: Interlude

Chapter Summary

> A moment of rest, where all one might need do is breathe and let be.

Chapter Notes

> I accidentally posted this early last week but immediately deleted it, so sorry if you got an email without an update, lol. Enjoy this happy chapter.
>
> CW: Sexual content (non-graphic) and smoking. Issues surrounding being queer and coming out, though mostly present in Remus' inner monologue.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Workin' on our night moves,
Try'na lose the awkward teenage blues;
Workin' on our night moves,
Mhm…
And it was summertime…

- "Night Moves" Bob Seger & the Silver Bullet Band, 1976

The morning following…

Remus awoke first. It was almost noon. Outside the sun was beaming, and if they'd bothered to throw the curtains aside and open a window, they might have heard the tell-tale signs of life at the estate. Dogs barking from their yard and kennel, a mower busy chewing up the grass, even the sound of Sandra's fancy sports car as it zoomed up the front drive. She and Lyall were off on another day trip. Remus didn't care enough to remember where, as long as it was away. It'd become a norm since summer's start; Sandra enjoyed getting out of the house, and Lyall enjoyed Sandra. It was a symbiotic enough relationship, albeit still a bit strange to Remus. They'd be married soon, he recalled. She'd move in, find a place to put her fancy horses and fancier cars. The maids would start calling her 'Mrs. Lupin'. Would she redecorate? Throw out the untouched linens? Retire the unused beds? Maybe.

Remus wasn't sure if he looked forward to it or not. Hope had touched those linens, she'd known those beds.

Do you want to live here, Remus? His father had asked.

No, he'd answered.

Then what use do you have for linens? For beds?

None.

"Mornin'…"

Sirius had woken. He was naked save the sheet that covered him, and so close that Remus could still feel the warmth of his breath on his cheek. Sirius' hair was silhouetted around his head like a dark halo. It reminded him of all the times he'd seen him sleeping in the dorm, except now all Remus had to do was reach out and he could be running his fingers through those raven strands himself. So, he did.

Sirius blinked the sleep from his eyes. He was already smiling. Remus took it as a sign that their day would be good.

I love you, he thought.

"Mornin'," he said.

"Mhm… Been up long?" Sirius stretched, arching his back. Under the covers, Remus felt his leg shift over his own, still knotted together in tandem. Remembering the night before got his heart racing again. Sirius, Sirius, Sirius.

"No, not long," Remus answered. Then he kissed him.

Sirius kissed back, opening his mouth like a blooming rose, and then they slid together until they were sharing the same pillow. It was bliss. Slow, lazy bliss. He never wanted it to end.

"What do you want to do today?" He asked, when they parted. Their limbs were still wrapped around one another; their heartbeats the same. Thump, thu-thump!

"Anything," Sirius answered.

"Where do you want to go?"

"Anywhere."

“Anywhere?”

“Mhm…. Anywhere with you.”

* * *

Late July 1977

The trip into the city had set the tone for the summer. With the rest of their friends gone on extended vacations, Remus and Sirius were free to come and go as they pleased. Lyall and Sandra seemed to be doing the same; in the span of two weeks they’d visited eight different cities spread out amongst the southern half of the country. Sandra almost always asked Remus to go with them, but he never did. He didn’t want to leave Sirius for even a moment, and as nice as she was, he didn’t fancy spending any more time with Sandra or his father than need be. Luckily she never pressed the matter. Remus didn’t know what Lyall had told her of his reaction to the engagement, but if it meant he would be left alone, then it didn’t really matter. Lyall never mentioned any of the trips either, and he never called Remus to his office or brought up the subject of his lessons again. Eventually Remus wasn’t even expected to have dinner with them. It was truly like an ebbing tide; Lyall Lupin was starting over. A new life, a new wife, and no juvenile teenagers to lose sleep over.

“Maybe you should change your surname. We could both do it,” Sirius had suggested, before launching into an eager rant on the upsides of doing just this. Remus didn’t think much of ‘Remus Mercury’ or ‘Sirius Jagger’, but Sirius had poked and prodded until he spat out the first thing that came to mind. An instant regret.

“ ‘Dean’, huh?” Sirius replied; “Remus Dean… Remus Dean… Wow. That’s actually pretty sexy.”

Remus faltered, but not because of the compliment. He only regretted saying it. He knew Sirius wouldn’t understand, but hearing the name turned his stomach. So, because he couldn’t think of anything else to do, he kissed him and all talk of surnames was quickly forgotten.

Their days passed like that. Quiet and unkempt, and for the most part, more lovely than Remus could’ve ever imagined. It turned out easier than he’d originally thought to keep Sirius hidden; with the master of the house gone most days, no one bothered with Remus, not as long as he returned home at a reasonable hour and got his chores done. There weren't many chores in a house with so many hired hands, which meant that his own hands were almost always free to do as he pleased. This usually involved touching Sirius, which he did, often.

By their second week together, Remus was sure there wasn't an inch of his best friend left that he'd yet to kiss or touch. He spent every waking hour drinking in the sight of him, until he had every bit of Sirius permanently committed to memory. Sirius was always handsome—beautiful even, as his perfect Black family genes made so—but even he was not without his own menial, cosmetic flaws. Aside from the scars and the shying bald patch, Sirius had a slightly wonky hairline, only visible when he pushed his long fringe out of the way. Then there was that grazed chip in one of his upper canines, courtesy of James and a boxing match gone awry in their eighth year. Remus had also discovered early on, the small constellation of moles on his back.

"James is always saying that I should get them looked at," Sirius said. "His dad had a friend who died of skin cancer or something."

"You've shown James your back like this?"

Sirius looked at him. They were naked again, save just their pants—playing cards and smoking around the velvet chaise. "I assure you, I have never shown James my back like this."

The reply had left Remus feeling like a bit of a dolt. Of course Sirius and James had never… James wasn't queer. James liked girls. But then again… didn't he and Sirius also like girls? Remus was almost sure that he did. Sirius was just different. Liking Sirius didn't make him a homosexual; liking Sirius was simply a state of being. If anything it made him a person with eyes. A Siriusexual.

Ugh… idiot.

No matter the hour or their current state of dress, the subject of their friends came up a lot. It was only natural, and Remus never minded. As happy as he was to finally have Sirius all to himself, he still missed the others who made up their merry band of messers. Lily had called twice that first week, first to check in, and second to lambaste him for not picking up for said check in. (He'd been thoroughly occupied by an exceedingly hot snogging session at the time.)

"I just wish you'd agreed to go to Devon with James and Peter," Lily had sighed into the phone, when she'd actually managed to get ahold of him. Ever the nosy prat, Sirius snickered behind delighted fingers after leaning in from the other side to have a listen, and Remus gave an embarrassed huff.

“Why is everyone treating me like I need a babysitter?”

“It’s the moody attitude,” Sirius whispered.

Fuck off, Remus mouthed.

“You don’t need a babysitter, Remus,” Lily said into the phone, “but isn’t it better to be with friends than to be on your own?”

“Aren’t you alone? Or have you forgiven Snape after all this time.”

“Don’t be nasty. I’ve got Pet.”

“Ah. And how is sweet Petunia doing?”

“Terrible. Vernon still hasn’t proposed. I think she’s likely to kill him if they’re not at least engaged by Christmas. He’s pretty traditional—”

“That’s code for ‘stuffy bleeder with a steel pole up his arse’,” Sirius added, helpfully.

“—So Pet’s still living at home. Mum drives her up the wall most days —Dad the rest—and she hates the women’s college.” Lily’s voice grew very quiet, as though she were covering the receiver with her palm; “She still hasn’t told them, but she withdrew from the secretarial program. She’s been going to her girlfriends’ houses during class hours to avoid fessing up.”

“Wow. Can’t say I really blame her.”

“Remus! Tch … Anyway, it’s just been rather slow-going ever since James left. I’ve already been to the library over a dozen times, and I finished all my summer homework weeks ago. How’s yours going by the way?”

“Ah, yeah… s’great. Nnn… Almost finished.”

“How’d you find the essay?”

“Fine…”

“Have you heard from Sirius at all then? I just talked to James yesterday, and he's still totally beside himself. Have you talked with him lately?"

"Uh…"

Hang up, Sirius mouthed sharply. Then he made a very crude gesture with his hand and mouth, and got up to leave. Remus watched him go, lips slightly ajar.

"Hey, Lily… I think I've gotta go…"

That had been a Sunday, which had quickly become Remus' favourite day of the week. Lyall had started giving the entire staff the day off, and he and Sandra were almost always off somewhere. Even Giles would take the chance to head down to the local pitch or pub to catch a game. This left him and Sirius with free rein of the house, which they took full advantage of, lounging around the furnishings and cooking for themselves.

"Would it kill them to play something half-decent?" Sirius complained after the phone call. While Remus busied himself with making lunch, he continued fiddling with the kitchen radio's dial. It seemed as though every station in London was playing the same disco pop. "Ugh, I give up," Sirius moaned eventually, abandoning the radio to join Remus by the stovetop.

"You couldn't have given up on something more bearable?" Remus asked. Sirius had left the radio playing a Donna Summer song, which only had about three words to the entire thing.

'Ooh I feel love, I feel love,
I feel love, I feel love,
I feel love…'

Sirius smirked, wrapping his arms around Remus from behind. It felt very intimate, like the way James was always holding Lily. Except he and Sirius weren't dating. They were just doing… this.

"You smell good," Sirius murmured, fitting his face into the crook of Remus' neck.

"Mm, yes well, we did shower today."

“Right, how could I forget? You, with your dashing curls all dripping, practically glistening in the light.” Sirius blew on the side of his neck, and Remus could barely resist a shudder.

“You’re a menace,” he muttered.

“I try.”

Sirius pressed himself flush against his back and Remus bit his lip. The kitchen really wasn’t an ideal place, but if Sirius wanted to, then…

Sirius tsked suddenly, shattering all of Remus’ sinful thoughts.

“Moony, you’re burning the eggs.”

“Am not!” Remus used the spatula to lift the sunny-side egg up. He found it more than just a little well-done. “I was distracted,” he said indignantly.

“By what?”

You, obviously. “Your shit taste in music.”

‘Ooh you and me, you and me,
You and me, you and me,
You and me…’

Sirius scoffed and released him, snatching the spatula and attempting to save the eggs himself. It became apparent quickly that they were unsalvageable, and so they tossed the ruined pan in the sink and had beans on toast instead.

“Lily's right. I think we should call James,” Remus said later, in between bites. They’d taken up two seats in the extravagant Lupin dining room, lounging in the high-backed chairs and feasting on their peasant food.

“Nah,” Sirius answered. “No need.”

“He and Peter are worried about you. Lying to Lily’s one thing, but they deserve to know you’re alright.”

“That eager to be rid of me, are you?”

“No! I just… I promised James I would let him know as soon as I heard from you, and I’ve more than heard from you.”

“That’s for sure.” Sirius paused to suck the butter from his thumb, eyeing him suggestively. Under the table, he drew his foot up the inside of Remus’ calf.

“Don’t try to distract me,” Remus grumbled, knocking the foot away.

“I’m not. I’m eating, clearly.” Sirius took a large bite. “You just like to worry. It’s your default setting—Mooning Moony.”

“If you weren’t so easy to worry about…”

Sirius smirked, sipping his glass of water. A second later the foot was back on Remus’ thigh, sliding higher and higher. “When did you say your dad would be back?”

Remus swallowed. “Around six.”

Sirius glanced at the grandfather clock along the far wall. It was barely noon. “Well, I’d say that’s just enough time…”

Just like that, all talk of school was over with again. Remus told himself to stop the incessant worrying and to enjoy it—enjoy what Sirius was giving him. Whatever it was. They could figure out the rest later, hopefully when things felt less unsure. For now... enjoy it.

And with that behind him, filling their days quickly proved to be tricky and uncomplicated at the same time. They continued going out when it suited them, and ended up catching more than one show. Nothing lived up to the fanatical thrill of the Sex Pistol’s concert bash, but every bit of it was fun. They laughed and danced and got drunk, and for all their talk of music while at school, the subject of ‘Marauders’ came up very little. It was almost as though they were on vacation from a profession that they didn’t have yet. There was no pressure to write their own songs, they simply wasted away the hours listening to others’. On these days, Remus let himself imagine that they were already famous musicians, taking time off as a retreat from the endless days and nights on the road or else in the recording studio. Sirius still played his guitar everyday, and Remus was content to sit back and listen.

“What shall I play today?” Sirius would ask.

“Play Queen,” Remus would answer.

“What shall I play today?” Sirius would ask the day after.

“Play some Stones,” Remus would answer.

“And what shall I play today?” Sirius had asked that morning.

“ … Your heart.”

Sirius had laughed at him, and Remus had just watched him do it, so in love it was pathetic.

Music had always been a safe space for the two of them. And so when they weren’t desecrating public spaces with gross amounts of affection, they played their favourite songs to pass the time. Guitar or records, it didn’t matter. Sirius was thrilled to have the little piece of his collection Remus had brought home with him and he played each album on low volume at all hours. It was brilliant (even if they did sometimes argue over the snogging song) mostly because it felt different from any other summer spent at the estate, when Remus had used music to escape from reality out of desperation. Playing music with Sirius became grounding in all the best ways. It brought him back to earth and comforted him, and on those precious days when his father was out and very few people were around, they gathered up the courage to venture downstairs to the music room where Hope Lupin had once sat by the window and wasted away.

Setting a chair against the door just in case, they opened the windows and let new life inside, creating a private world just for themselves. Being down there was hard for Remus because it’d been hard for Hope, and it was difficult for Sirius because the piano reminded him of every mistake that led to being disowned by his own family. Sirius hadn’t said anything on the subject for a long while, but Remus eventually figured out that that’s what had happened. Even if there was some slight chance that the Blacks hadn’t officially disowned him, there was no way Sirius could return. Walburga Black’s fury was violent on the best of days, and the school in Belgium was the final straw—there was nothing left for him at the Ancient and Most Noble House of Black anymore.

“Hey, it’s fine,” Sirius said nonchalantly, whenever Remus thought to bring up school. “Maybe I’ll just live in a little hut in the village. That way you guys can sneak out to see me on the weekends and we can practice. Dunno how the acoustics’ll be, but it’ll be better than practising over the phone from Belgium.”

From his spot next to the piano, Remus looked up at Sirius very sharply. He had Andy's guitar slung over his lap and was currently rubbing his raw fingertips on his trousers. He missed the heaviness of the Fender's strings. The acoustic's thinner nylon made his fingertips feel like they were being sliced to ribbons.

"What are you talking about?" He asked. "What 'hut'?"

Sirius seemingly ignored him, letting his fingers dance lightly up the keys in a pretty sequence of notes; "I'll tell you one thing though," he mused, "I'm not looking forward to getting a job."

"Why would you want a job?" Remus demanded, more forceful this time.

"Well, if I'm to not go back to school then I gotta at least find something to do with myself."

"What do you mean 'not going back to school'?"

Sirius had to go back to school! They only had a year left, and Remus couldn't imagine setting foot in that dorm room without him.

"Lots of people leave school after year twelve," Sirius shrugged. "Honestly, save me the headache of A-Levels."

"But what about James and Peter? And the girls?"

"They'll understand."

"Okay, how 'bout—I don't understand. You could get decent marks without even trying, and your friends are all there, so why not go back?"

"My parents disowned me, Moony—or good as. I won't go back."

"I'm not telling you to back to them, but I still don't see why you couldn't come back to school with me—I mean, with us."

Sirius hit a wrong note and flinched at the sound, before letting out a rather forced chuckle. "Do you know how much it costs to attend Hawkings for a single term?"

He didn't, at least not exactly, so Remus kept quiet.

"I don't have my inheritance from Uncle Al yet. So how am I supposed to pay the tuition fees?"

“James or me!” He blurted then. “We could get the money—easy!”

“Alright, say you actually manage to get the money together then—what’s to stop McGonagall from writing home and telling my parents exactly where I am? And then on the off-chance they haven’t actually disowned me, they’ll have me hauled back to Bath faster than I can blink, and there would be nothing any of you could do to stop it.”

“We could hide you.”

“Hide?” Sirius echoed. “At Hawkings? No. I’m not gonna hide in my own home.”

Remus lowered his gaze to the floor like a cowardly dog. He needed Sirius to come back with him desperately, but he didn’t know how to convince him.

“It’ll be fine,” Sirius continued. “I just gotta find something else until I turn eighteen and get that inheritance. It’s only a few months, really. Reckon that pretty broad from the pub in town would let out one of those rooms upstairs on an I-owe-you?”

“Not unless you can remember her name,” Remus grumbled.

“Ruth? Ruthie? Rachel…? Nah, it’s definitely something with an ‘e’. Hm, Ruby? Riley? Oh wait—Rosie!”

“How can your perfect memory be this subjective?” Sighing, Remus stood up and leaned the guitar against the wall. “You gotta come back with us, Sirius.”

“Why?” Sirius asked. His hands were relaxed in his lap but his back was perfectly straight, as it always was when he sat down in front of the grand instrument. A habit, Remus assumed. “I already said, plenty ‘a kids don’t do their final year, and I don’t plan on going to uni after so what’s the point?”

Remus pressed his lips together.

“Well, what about… us?”

“You mean the band? Aren’t you listening? I just told you that we—”

“No, I mean ‘us’ us, Sirius… I mean this. Everything we’ve been doing.”

Sirius’ lips parted. “Oh.”

“You haven’t even thought about it, have you?”

“ ‘Course I have. Give me a little credit...”

Grinding his teeth together, Remus began tracing his fingers along the sleek lines of the piano. There was only one thing left he could think of to try to convince him.

“I… like you,” he said finally. “I like doing… this.”

“I know,” Sirius smirked. “Feels pretty good for me too.”

“I would keep doing it… when we got back to school. A-As long as you would want to… too…”

Rather than answering, Sirius set his fingers back on the piano and started up a brisk and lively tempo while he spoke; “I dunno,” he called over the music; “I’m not really sure I want to play tag all year.”

“What do you mean?”

Sirius’ cadence increased and he kept his eyes trained on the keys. “I mean that I’m not interested in rehashing what I had with Miles, that’s all. What’s the point of all this if it don’t really mean anything?”

A spike of jealousy dug into the centre of Remus’ chest. Ever since that first night they’d been dancing around the subject of Miles—him too nervous to broach the subject and Sirius almost unwilling to even attempt it. Now it felt like a slap to the face.

“Who said it had to be like with Miles? And who said it didn’t mean anything?”

Sirius stopped playing abruptly and the piano’s music choked out like it’d hit a wall. “You mean you’re just going to announce what we’ve been doing to everyone? Could you even do that?”

Remus froze up, hands splayed on top of the grand piano.

No, of course you can’t. If it doesn’t ruin this, it’d certainly ruin something else. You’re already the freak—the delinquent with a dead mum, swimming along in a sea of sparkling gentry. Do you really need to be a bloody queer too?

Unable to answer truthfully, Remus quickly switched gears;

“Would you? … Announce it?”

Sirius obviously hadn't been expecting him to turn the question around. He wrung his wrists a bit, as though they were sore. "Obviously not… I'm not an idiot."

"Then I don't see why we can't—"

"Right, exactly," Sirius interrupted; "Let's just enjoy it now, while it lasts."

"I am enjoying it," Remus said firmly. "But we at least should talk about this, shouldn't we?"

"Talk about what?"

Remus could feel that biting anger of his creeping back in. "About us," he practically snarled. "About how much I like you!"

Sirius looked up at him. Bits of hair had fallen from the braid Remus had done himself just that morning. "... You like me?"

"I just bloody-well told you that I did, didn't I?!"

Sirius got that delighted look in his eye, similar to when he was plotting a prank. "Really?"

"Am I speaking English? Or do you sleep with everyone without checking that they actually like you first?"

"Jesus." Sirius slumped back on the piano stool, almost bemusing. "If you're going to slut-shame me you might as well do the courtesy of fucking me beforehand."

"I have been—plenty."

Impossibly, Sirius' expression grew even cheekier. "Yeah… s'pose you have."

"... Ngh… Well?" Remus fidgeted. "What do you think?"

"I think I like you too."

Remus couldn't keep the relief from his voice; "You do?"

"Yeah, have for a while." Sirius licked his lips. "You?"

"A while," Remus agreed, laughing nervously.

“So what’s this mean? That you wanna date me? Be my… boyfriend?”

Oh fuck. Boyfriend?

‘Boyfriend’ was not a term Remus had thought to contend with before then. Maybe if he had, he would’ve been able to keep the shock from his face when Sirius said it.

“Uhm…”

Wooooooow… a new pet name! How cute. Tell me, ‘boyfriend’, which is more queer, that or ‘Mooning Moony’? But ooh, best be quick, your boyfriend’s waiting.

Remus stifled the voice. “I—uhm… ‘boyfriend’ s'just a bit…”

“Never mind,” Sirius said very quickly, waving him off like the entire thing had been a bad joke. “I was just talkin’ out my arse. Bit naff, right? I mean look at you, you’d probably be a shite boyfriend anyway.”

“Oi,” Remus said, offended.

“Bet McKinnon would agree.”

Remus held his tongue. It surely wasn’t the best time to have the ‘mutual breakup’ argument, and besides, the teasing just felt like Sirius’ way of bandaging a wound anyway. Like self-preservation.

“I really like you,” he said instead.

“It’s fine, Moony.”

“But I—”

“I get it,” Sirius said, as though he’d already finished mourning all of it. “Let’s just enjoy the summer. We can figure the rest of it out later. Mm?” Mirroring what Remus had been telling himself for days, Sirius flashed a warm smile and started playing again. This time Remus recognised the song, but Sirius put a jazzy spin on it that made it all the better.

“So what do you think,” Sirius called over the music, “is there a chance Miss Rosie’s lookin’ for a cute little bar-boy? Or well, I suppose there’s only a point in going back up north to the middle of bum-fuck nowhere if you guys still wanted to come see me. I’d get it if this were to change stuff.”

“I’d come and see you,” Remus replied without hesitation; “ ‘Course I would.”

Sirius smiled down at the keys. “ ‘I want to hold your haaaand—I want to hold your hand’,” he sang, then; “Moony, give me a kiss?”

Unable to help himself, Remus leaned over the keys and pressed his lips to Sirius’, who didn’t miss a single note as he did so.

“I suppose there is one serious downside to all this,” Sirius murmured as they parted.

Remus’ heart jumped badly. His first thought was, only one?

“And what’s that?”

“Going back to school… be bloody difficult to have you like this whenever I wanted.”

Oh! Oh...

“I dunno about that, you’re creative.”

“You saying we could manage?” The corners of Sirius’ eyes crinkled fondly. “We’d be living with two other blokes, ya know.”

“… Maybe I should just tell Dad I’m not going back either then,” Remus answered, licking his lips longingly. Sirius didn’t miss the gesture and suddenly his hands weren’t playing piano anymore, but grabbing Remus’ collar and pulling him for another hungry kiss—then another, each one more desperate than the last. Remus’ mouth opened automatically, allowing Sirius the heat he wanted. Kissing was as easy as breathing nowadays. Neither of them ever seemed to get tired of it.

Yes, this is it. This was the easy part. No talking, just this.

Dropping down onto the piano bench next to him, Remus slid his fingers up into the loose ponytail at the base of Sirius’ neck. It fell apart under his fingers, but Sirius only gave a low moan. Pushing closer, he snaked his hand down between them, pressing it against the crotch of Remus’ jeans. Unable to help himself, Remus surged forward and covered Sirius with his entire body, pinning him against the piano bench. As he did so, his hand slipped on the slick leather and he collapsed down on top of him, breaking their kiss and making Sirius give a very different type of moan.

“OOF! … Fuck, ha-ha!”

“Yep,” Remus grunted, “this ain’t working.” He glanced up at the piano next to them and considered. A second later he was jutting his head in the instrument’s direction. “Get up there.”

Sirius followed the look. “You mean do that on your mother’s piano? You’re such a fiend.”

Half-grinning, Remus slid his arms under Sirius’ thighs and lifted him upright on the bench. As Sirius wrapped his arms around his neck, he leaned in and gently nipped at the sensitive skin under his ear. “What is it you’re always saying?” Remus murmured; “ ‘Get on me’?”

Sirius gave a little gasp, both scandalised and obviously aroused; “Ah, ah, ahh—I warn you, you are playing a very dangerous game, Remus Dean.”

Remus ignored the nickname, and pulled away to blink lazily up at him. “I think I like my odds.”

Scoffing over a smirk, Sirius kissed him again and took his tongue between his teeth, toying with him as Remus cradled him by the tender skin of his hips. Sirius moaned into his mouth faintly and a sudden surge of desire washed over Remus. He nudged Sirius’ knees apart, gathering him into his lap and fisting the back of his trousers to grind their waists together. The shape of Sirius’ hardness stood pronounced against the base of his stomach, and like always, it didn’t feel the least bit queer. Funny how those feelings all disappeared the moment they stopped talking about them.

“You locked the door, right?” Sirius asked, his voice husky with equal parts want and need.

“Mhm.”

“Good. Take off your shirt.”

“Take it off for me.”

Sirius laughed, and quickly manoeuvred his hands between them to begin his fight with the top buttons. He took each one slowly at first, as if to tease him, but as he neared the middle Sirius grew more frustrated.

“Fuck this,” he huffed, grabbing the shirt by its edges and tearing it wide open. The leftover buttons scattered around the room with tiny pings, and Remus looked down at his bare chest in shock.

“You ripped my shirt.”

“Give me four months, I'll buy you a new one,” Sirius replied, quickly tugging his own t-shirt up over his head and tossing it behind the piano. Completely bare save for his trousers, Remus couldn’t help but stare. Sirius was so beautiful. No Greek statue could compare. Gently, as though he really were two-thousand year-old marble waiting to crumble, Remus reached out and touched him. He let his fingers glide down over Sirius’ shoulders and collarbone, to the soft ridges of his chest, then nipples. His ribs, which were less pronounced than Remus’ own, felt like smooth ladders under his palms, and when he reached the subtle dip of his waist and cupped him there, Sirius shuddered.

“I like you,” Remus said, leaning in to kiss him. Sirius evaded the kiss, smirking.

“I know,” he said.

Remus laughed. “Dick.”

“Hm… Speaking of which.” He palmed Remus through his jeans again and Remus couldn’t help the noise that escaped him. “Oh, Moony,” Sirius chuckled, kissing his chest, “little eenie-meenie Moony… When you gonna make good on that promise?”

Remus’ breath hitched. Sirius was still caressing him through his jeans.

“Wha—What promise?”

Sirius’ wicked tongue snaked upwards, across the hollow of his throat, over his jaw, and landing very sensually on the shell of his ear. “Are you gonna bend me over that piano or what?”

Remus’ eyes shot wide. Oh fuck yes—

“Or I could bend you over it,” Sirius offered just as quickly, leaning back to snap at the air over his nose with his teeth.

“Easy,” Remus warned, squeezing a handful of each hip, “else I’m gonna ruin you.”

Sirius’ eyes flashed with giddy desire. “Then get to it, you bloody prat."

Something deep within Remus' stomach snapped like a whip. He stood up abruptly and Sirius practically fell off of him, almost laughing as he skirted around the side of the piano. There he stopped, draping himself there with both elbows pressed back against the instrument's shiny black surface. Remus was before him a second later, ready to worship him like a god. It was not an exaggeration to say that Sirius could've asked for anything in that moment and Remus wouldn't have had the sense or want to deny him, but instead he simply cocked his head to the side with a single suggestive look, and reached for the waistband of his trousers.

"Shall I turn around then?"

Remus felt his mouth run dry. He was never going to be able to look at a piano the same way again.

* * *

Early August, 1977

They'd finally said it then.

I like you.

Remus could hardly believe it. I like you!

The 'boyfriend' bit had derailed them some, but not so much that they weren't still falling into one another every chance they got. It made hiding out almost easier. All Remus wanted to do was stay in bed and wrap himself in everything Sirius. His touch, his smell, his… like. And judging by his eagerness, Sirius felt the same. Eventually they lapsed into a routine of it; sleep by day, play all through the night. It didn't always involve sex, sometimes it was just talk, and then there was so much music and TV to catch up on that they were never bored. It was these times that Remus was able to reassure himself that no matter what had changed between them, they were still friends. Which was good; Remus could see himself getting away with hiding a friend in his bedroom—but a boyfriend? No way.

As stupid as it sounded, Remus didn't really entertain the idea of getting caught until he began to notice the way the estate's staff would eye him as he left or entered a room. Unsolicited knocking on his bedroom door had become more frequent, and every time Remus had gone to check it was usually Carsten or some maid, simply trying to 'check in' on him. It was infuriating and nerve-wracking all at once, and Remus was starting to get to his wit's end. He couldn't be sure if his father had told them to be more conscious of his comings and goings, but one of the maids had already made an off-hand comment of how his daily trouser-usage had suddenly doubled. It was probably only supposed to be a friendly observation, but Remus went back to hiding his laundry and dishes anyway. He did them at night, when no one was around and Sirius could sneak out with him for something to do.

The cherry on top had come when he and Sirius were lounging around in bed late one afternoon, as per the usual. They weren't even doing anything especially outrageous, but Remus was supposed to have gone out with Giles for a driving lesson and he'd skived off to stay in bed. If it weren't for Dusty, barking when he heard the key turn in the door's lock, they might have actually been caught; but the two seconds of warning had been enough for Sirius to throw a blanket over himself and Remus to dive on top of him like he were a lump of pillows.

"GET OUT!" He shrieked, just as the maid walked in. The shout upset her so badly that she dropped a bucket of mop water across the floor, which she immediately began to fret over. Remus had to scream at her again just to get her to leave, and she fled with fear written across her face. He felt bad later on—the maid was just doing her job—but as he pulled back the blanket to reveal a laughing Sirius, he knew he'd done the right thing.

"I don't want anyone going into my room," he ordered later, chin held high and practically fuming. "In fact, stop sending people up altogether. I don't need any of you to check in on me like I'm some child."

Carsten, the head butler now that the last one had gone, bowed his head respectfully. Remus didn't know if the butler before him had been fired or left of his own accord, and he didn't care, he just needed Sirius safe.

"I understand. Marjorie didn't realise you'd stayed in for the day," Carsten said. "Shall I just send one maid in during the afternoon to change the linens then?"

"No—none," Remus said firmly. "I can change my own sheets, and clean my own room. I just want to be left alone. Why is that so hard for the rest of you to understand?"

"It's simply your father's wish that we—"

"I'll handle my father, the rest of you just stay away from me."

Remus could practically see it in the man's eyes—brat.

Good, let him think it. He didn't want a butler in the first place.

"And no one is to ever go into my room when I'm out. It's an invasion of privacy."

Carsten nodded grimly. He probably just thought he was hiding drugs (he was—but that was hardly the point), which when compared to the risk of losing one's livelihood, wasn't as intriguing as initially thought. So all the butler said was "Very good, sir." And the conversation was over.

After the close-call and his ensuing outburst, all of the maids did start leaving Remus alone, and he and Sirius were allowed some peace for a little while. It might've stayed that way for the rest of the summer, had they not been forgetting one very crucial detail.

"OI! I HOPE YOU'VE GOT YER PANTS ON BECAUSE I'M COMING IN!"

True to his word, Giles immediately came barrelling into his bedroom a few seconds later, practically blowing the door off the hinges. Remus had just enough time to throw his lit cigarette into the ashtray on his side table and wrench the bed curtains shut to hide Sirius from view. He wasn't even wearing a shirt—his lips still felt warm from the kiss Sirius had given him not ten seconds ago.

"Giles, ever try knocking?!" He seethed, face as red as a tomato. Had he seen anything? Did he already know?!

"Privacy is reserved for those who have the decency to keep to their word!" Giles lashed, coming inside and marching over to the radio, which he turned off with a sharp flick of his wrist. "You were supposed to be out on the driveway over twenty minutes ago!"

Remus sighed in irritation. "I'm not going today."

"You're not going today—or yesterday, or the day before that, and the day before that!" Giles began listing each missed driving lesson off on his fingers like a shopping list. "Honestly, you sit around here all day like some grubby lout, and you can't even have the decency to walk down those stairs and tell me you're not coming yourself!"

"I told Carsten to tell you!"

"And I told you—unless you're paying Carsten's wages, he ain't your bloody errand boy!"

"Well, what else is he supposed to be?"

Giles marched forward and smacked Remus upside the head. He was tall enough now that the old man had to reach up to do it, but it still smarted.

"Ow! What was that fucking for?"

"First the car and now you've been smoking in here too? I'm trying to keep you humble! Do you know how hard those lasses work to keep this house neat and the beds tidy? What—you want to waste all their hard work by letting the smell of your blasted cancer-sticks seep into everything including the bloody paint?"

"No, actually. The guy I bought them off assured me that they'd smell like daisies and chamomile."

Giles smacked him again, none too gently. "What's a'matter with you—all this lip suddenly? I didn't raise such an ungrateful whelp. You claim you don't want anyone in here—that you're man enough to make your own bed and yet I come in to find this!"

Before he could be stopped, Giles reached over and threw the bed curtains aside. Remus just about shrieked, but what he found was only a mess of rumpled sheets, pillows, and another ashtray with a single smoking cigarette in the middle of it all—no Sirius in sight.

"Explain this," Giles ordered. "Don't look like no made bed to me."

Remus clapped a hand to his forehead in relief. To Giles it must've looked like annoyance; he crossed his arms with an irate expression.

"Okay fine, I'll make the damn bed," Remus swore.

"Are you depressed, son?"

"What?! No!"

“Then what’s been going on with you? You used to be outside all hours of the day—couldn’t very well get you to come home most times. Now you never leave this room.”

“I thought that’s what you wanted!” Remus snapped. “For me to come home so you could all satisfy your own ego and feel like you’re doing a half-decent job at parenting me! So you could bitch without a phone in the way!”

Giles’ frown deepened. “You’re gonna swear at me now? Fine. Gimme your cigarettes.”

“Oh c’mon, Gil—”

“You heard me, hand ‘em over. You can have ‘em back when you’ve proven you can take care of your things and keep up with your commitments like a proper ‘man’.”

Huffing like a child, Remus reached across the bed, patting around the covers until he found the half-empty carton tucked haphazardly underneath. He scowled as he clapped them down into the driver’s hand. Satisfied, Giles squashed the cigarettes in his fist before pointing a finger straight at Remus’ nose.

“Don’t think this means I’m just gonna let you laze about all day like some little skiver. You best be downstairs in five minutes. And comb your hair, you look like you stuck a fork in a wall socket.”

Resisting the urge to roll his eyes, Remus just waited until Giles had turned and marched for the door. He grabbed the door handle and swung it closed before pointing his finger once more as a threat. “Five minutes,” he warned, before shutting the door.

After counting to ten to make sure he’d gone, Remus sighed heavily and immediately spun around. He picked up the bed covers, throwing them in the air like he might find Sirius hiding beneath them, but still nothing.

“Sirius?!”

“Under here,” a voice sniggered.

With a sigh of relief, Remus dropped to his stomach to find Sirius tucked up under the bed, his chin resting on his hands like a dog.

“That’s some tough love, love,” Sirius tsked, then; “I thought you said your dad never hit you?"

"Well, obviously Giles ain't my dad," Remus scoffed, offering Sirius a hand.

"Anyone ever tell him that?"

Before Remus could respond, Sirius had taken his hand and tugged him halfway under the bed. He met his lips with a kiss, which quickly spiralled into a bout of snogging that took much longer than the five minutes he'd been allotted. When he'd finally emerged onto the drive Giles was furious, but Remus couldn't wipe the dopey grin from his face.

"You really need to watch yourself on those roundabouts," Giles said after the lesson, when Remus had gotten out and chucked him the keys.

"That Volkswagen came out of nowhere," Remus countered, turning to make a dash for the estate's front steps. He was just itching to be inside. They'd gone all the way to Hammersmith and back and the entire time he could think of nothing but Sirius. He hoped he wasn't too bored waiting for him. They'd talked about heading into the city again, which might've been a fine idea had the house not seemed so busy all of a sudden. Sirius had off-handedly mentioned a round of strip poker that morning. Maybe they could just… mhm…

As he was off daydreaming, Remus passed a large white lorry parked at the head of the driveway. A team of four men were unloading what appeared to be lumber and metal sheeting, creating a large mess that blocked most of the stairs. At the head of the group, methodically directing the entire operation, was Sandra. Paired with a floppy wide-brimmed sun hat, she was wearing dungarees and bulky work boots, as though she were ready to dive head-first into a gardening project. Remus half-suspected that she were, at least based off of the various array of building goods; but as he let his curiosity distract him Sandra spun around herself, and simultaneously broke into a wide grin.

"Remus! I'd heard you and Giles took the car out," she exclaimed, before stopping to direct the moving team; "Yes, that's it lads. All of this has to go down to the stables." She turned back to Remus; "So, how'd the lesson go?"

"Fine, I guess."

"Is that your favourite word? 'Fine'?" She teased.

He shrugged indifferently. "It's one of them."

Undeterred by his dismissive attitude, Sandra leaned in with a sly look. “Is Giles a good teacher, or does he mostly cling to the door handle and scream blue murder?”

“... Bit of both, actually.”

“Ah. I remember the days, my dad was just like that when he was teaching me to drive. Worse even. Though, I probably deserved it. I put his favourite Italian coupe in a ditch on my first go.”

She smiled like it was some genius inside joke, but Remus just nodded amicably and looked away. He wanted to get back to Sirius, and even if Sandra wasn’t the most terrible person to grace their good earth, she was still marrying his dad.

“Remus, would you help me with something?”

He looked back to her. Even with her hair done in glamorous golden waves, she felt juxtaposed. Her clothes didn’t match, nor did her fancy sports car or kind eyes or generally upbeat attitude. And yet she’d made herself fit. Remus didn’t get it. The estate had always been a cold place, no matter the time of year, and Sandra felt warm.

“What is it?” He asked, rubbing the side of his neck.

She flashed those kind eyes at him. “Follow me.”

He wanted to complain, but also got the feeling that she expected him to, and so Remus kept his mouth shut. He let Sandra lead him across the vast green lawn, past the dog kennels where several trainers were walking hounds on sixty-foot leads for their daily show of exercise. There she’d had him pick up a hay bale that was at least double his size around the middle.

“Can you manage? They are about sixty pounds each.”

Already struggling after just a few steps, Remus glanced over at her. Sandra was carrying her own bale with ease, as though she were used to the grunt-work.

“Yeah… ngh… got it…”

Sandra hummed contently and then was off again, meandering casually in the direction of the horse stables and leaving Remus to toddle precariously behind her.

“I’d meant to have the hay dropped off here, but they must’ve mistaken the kennels for the stables,” Sandra said, dropping the bale down outside the stables’ grand white doors and dusting her hands. Remus was several pathetic steps behind her, and when he finally dropped his own load next to hers, he collapsed onto it, breathing hard.

“Dunno how…” he wheezed; “the dogs are… so noisy…”

“I thought the same thing!” Tipping her head back so she could see past the brim of her hat, Sandra squinted up at the impressive building. The entire thing was built out of pine, creating a long ‘L’ shape along the estate’s eastern side. It was more out of the way than the garages or kennel, and Remus liked it that way. Inside he could hear the horses’ normal baying and the occasional whinny. The Lupins didn’t have many horses, but money was old, and horses would always be money. Lyall’s mother, Remus’ grandmother, had supposedly kept many more, but they’d been sold off to other more interested buyers when she’d passed on. Though that had been ages before Remus was born.

“Are you… looking to expand the stables then?” He asked. There was another fresh pile of lumber sitting next to the stable’s outer wall, and several feet of grass had been dug up and replaced with new posts as thick as two men put together.

“I am!” Sandra replied. “Your stables are beautiful, but I’m afraid not all of my girls would fit, and I wouldn’t want to get rid of any of your horses.”

“Not my horses.” He didn’t even know most of their names. “Get rid of ‘em if you want. Or sell them. It’s whatever…”

“Oh no, I couldn’t do that. This is their home.” She gestured for the stable door. “Shall we go in then? Say hello?”

Remus shook his head. “Still don’t like horses much.”

Sandra dropped her arm immediately, accepting the boundary he’d given her without the slightest thought. He could tell though that he’d upset some sort of plan. Clearly there was more on her mind than just a stable expansion and a few stray bales of hay.

“Did you know, Remus,” she started, “that horses can hear a human heartbeat from as far as four metres away? It's why they call them the mirrors of the soul—they feel your every intention before you even know what it is yourself." Smiling wistfully now, Sandra lifted one foot and placed it on the edge of her hay bale, leaning into it. "When I was a little girl, my father taught me two things—or three, I suppose. How to drive, how to swing a hammer… and to bring a horse with me whenever I made a deal that had a chance of running sour."

"I at least hope the last one was useful."

"Ha! Yes, actually. I took my favourite mare with me the day I signed the deed to my first house. We ended up having to do it in the front garden, and that's when I realised the entire foundation was rotted… heh, s'a bit silly… But my point is—horses always know when you're being truthful. They see it inside you. Turn you honest."

Because he wanted to be difficult, Remus said; "I dunno, just sounded like dumb luck… noticing the foundation, that is."

Sandra just smiled again, perhaps even a bit wider this time. God, why did she have to be so nice?

"Alright, I see what you mean, and I'll stop going on about horses, but I'm still left wondering… if the two of us can be honest with each other?"

Oh. Right then… It was one of those conversations. It'd be a lie to say that Remus hadn't been expecting it. Adults never talked to kids or teenagers just to 'talk', there always had to be some sort of catch… some bloody lesson.

"This about you and my dad gettin' hitched?" He asked. The least he could do was make her slightly uncomfortable too.

Sandra nodded her head in earnest. "It is. What do you think of it?"

Remus almost didn't have an answer. Lyall never asked his opinion on anything, things just simple were, and it was up to him to get with the program or be left behind. He usually didn't mind it as much, but if being left behind meant he wouldn't get to go back to Hawkings, then he might as well be honest.

"Truthfully? I don't give a rat's arse," he said. "Marry whoever you want."

It obviously wasn't the answer she'd been looking for, but Remus suddenly didn't feel much like pandering. Disappointed, Sandra paused for a moment before meeting his eye again. "I see. Well, I appreciate your honesty. But I want you to know that I won't change anything without your permission either. It's still your home, Remus."

"You're moving in without my permission, aren't you?"

"Oh." Sandra let out a stilted laugh. "Alright, so that is quite the change, I'll agree that you have me there. Let me rephrase then—I won't… or… I will try to keep things the same. I don't want you to think that I'm coming in here to upset everything you and your father have. I simply want to add to it. But if you veto something—that's it, it's gone. No need for an explanation, I won't even question it. I'm not trying to replace your mother."

Because he was cruel, Remus said; "You couldn't."

She nodded earnestly. "I understand. Hope was very kind, you know. I didn't know her all that well, just the odd lunch-in. But she was always such a glowing woman. She spoke about you a lot—to anyone who'd listen. About her little boy... When we heard she'd grown sick we were all so upset."

Remus said nothing. 'We were upset'? He didn't even know who 'we' was.

"Did you really drag me out here to talk about my dead mum, Sandra?"

"Oh… no. I'm sorry." Sandra knotted her fingers together with unease. "There was more to it, but I won't keep you. I just… I would really like it if we could be a family, Remus. You and your father, I've grown very fond of you both."

Remus let out a sigh, pushing himself to his feet. How was he to tell her that they hadn't even been a family before? That there was no 'you and your father'?

"Could we do that?" Sandra asked again. "Could we try to be a family? ... Would you let me be a part of your family?"

Remus pinched the bridge of his nose. "Look Sandra—Sandy, whatever… I really don't care. Change what you want, make your family, I just want to be left alone."

Sandra sighed quietly, upset, and Remus had to fight the urge to feel guilty. Whatever pain this is, keep it. I've enough of my own.

“You’re a good boy, Remus,” she said, almost surprising him. “Thank you for your kindness.”

He’d been anything but kind, but Sandra hadn’t really meant it that way anyway. What she’d really meant was, thank you for making things clear.

Remus dug the toe of his trainer into the soft bed of sand that surrounded the stables. “Is there anything else then…?”

“No, I believe I’ve got it from here. Boys should be arriving soon with the lorry. And thank you for your help with the hay. I’m much obliged, and so are the horses, I’m sure.”

Avoiding her gaze so as to not permeate the air with further awkwardness, Remus gave Sandra a single polite nod and stepped past her, back up the path toward the main house. He only got a few feet before he turned back around again. He couldn’t help it—he had to know.

“Why did you fall in love with him? … Him? Of all people?”

Sandra turned around, and then she looked at him. Or into him. He wasn’t sure.

“Your father feels things very intensely, Remus,” she said. “I can tell that you have that in common. You’re like two lost ships, drifting along aimlessly, just looking for their lighthouse.”

“And are you supposed to be that lighthouse or something?”

“I can’t be sure,” she said softly. “But Remus… forgiveness is a gift you give to yourself.”

Remus’ eyes began to burn. He should’ve known.

“Tell me, Sandy, would you forgive a man who forced you to call him ‘father’, but would never call you his son?”

The question had been part metaphor, part truth. Not knowing what Sandra knew, he wasn’t sure if she’d caught the double-meaning. Not that it mattered. He did not wait to hear her answer anyway.

* * *

Mid-August 1977

Remus didn't need a lighthouse. He had a lightbulb. And not just any lightbulb—a lightbulb that shone with all the ferocity of the brightest star in the night sky. Sirius was his lightbulb. He just knew it. It was mid-August now, which meant that they'd been hiding out together for just over three weeks. Soon it'd be a month. An entire month, and no one was the wiser. Remus was almost inclined to rub it in his father's face.

Remember that ineffable House of Black? While I've got their eldest son in my bedroom—in my bed! How's that for keeping him happy, eh Dad?

He didn't of course, because that would be ludicrous. But Lyall still wasn't bothering to hound his every step anyway, so Remus just went back to focusing on what they had—enjoying it. Which might've been easier, had another deadline not been looming.

"So… school?" Remus had asked that very same morning. It was Sunday again, their third together, and they had no plans. It was wonderful.

Across from him on the bed, Sirius did not even glance up from the joint he was fiddling with. "Ugh. Do you think I'll ever get better at rolling these damn things?"

"Sirius... I'm talking about school."

"Mhm... Oh bollocks... Will you roll it then?"

Remus sighed. Foiled again. "Hand it here."

Sirius did so, and Remus expertly shimmied the loose hash into the centre of the paper, licking its side and rolling it up.

"Ace," Sirius commended, taking the spliff and adding it to a jar with several others.

"James and Pete are coming back from Devon soon," Remus attempted instead. "I'm supposed to meet them."

"How nice." Sirius began glancing around for the jar's lid.

"You're going to go with me, right?"

“Sure. Eventually. No need to rush.”

“They come back soon,” Remus said again. “Like soon, soon. Like three days soon.”

Sirius found the lid amongst the bed covers and quickly jammed it onto the jar’s top, before tossing the whole thing up in the air haphazardly. “How nice,” he said again.

“Sirius.” Remus caught the jar out of the air. “I’ve ignored seven calls from James since you got here. Seven.”

“Nice number, seven. You know what’s even better than seven though? Eight.”

“No, no more joking. We have to tell them.”

“Do we though?” Sirius pouted. “Would it not be enough to just let them know that you heard from me?”

“It would be a lie.”

“Just a tiny one, wouldn’t hurt much. And then in a few days we can go see them together and all’s well again!”

Remus set the down with a huff. “I don’t understand why you’re being so difficult. They’re your best friends.”

“I’m not being difficult. I just would rather savour this.” Sirius looked leaned back on his arms. “I wanna see them, course I do, but rushing back there would mean all this has to stop, wouldn't it? And I… I don’t think I want that.”

Remus didn’t miss his meaning. Pushing the jar of joints aside, he crawled across the bed to Sirius and kissed him deeply and without hesitation. “We don’t have to stop,” he said after, like a whisper. “No one’s gonna find out.”

“Moony, I don’t…” Sirius’ voice trailed off, and then he was sliding his hand up the side of Remus’ neck, pulling him back again. “Alright then… I’ll take this much.”

Later they both snuck down to the parlour and Remus rang James’ summer house. He knew Sirius didn’t mean to be cruel to his friends on purpose; he simply resided under the impression that if they were going to worry somewhere, then it might as well be from the comfort of their summer homes.

“I still think you should still talk to him,” Remus pushed one final time, as he flopped down into one of the salon’s arm chairs and pulled the phone towards him.

“Then he’d know I’m here,” Sirius grumbled stubbornly.

“And safe. Is that really such a bad thing?”

“Look, I know James. You tell him I’m here and he’d rush out onto the road to hitchhike.”

“Oh, woe is you—to have friends that care about you.”

“It’s not about that, you git. I just don’t need him or Pete coming home early to weep over me.”

“How do you know they’d weep? At this point I think James is just as likely to sock you one,” Remus pointed out. “And hey, if he does come back maybe he’ll get you out of my hair for a while.”

“Out of your hair, huh? You weren’t saying that last night when I was —”

Remus pressed the receiver to his ear and began punching in numbers; “Shut up, I’m on the phone.”

Smirking, Sirius fell back against the sofa, stretching out before the salon’s windows like a cat in the midday sun. Remus watched him—really there wasn’t ever a moment he wasn’t watching Sirius, and it absolutely had nothing to do with the fact that Sirius had neglected to put on trousers that morning.

As the line began to ring, Sirius propped his head up on a pillow, raising his leg and gently grazing Remus’ knee with his toes.

“Hey, Moony, what if I were to…” Sirius let his foot travel up higher.

“Buzz off, I said I’m on the phone,” Remus hushed, nudging his foot away. Sirius just frowned mockingly and raised a hand to trail one finger down his cheek like a tear.

The phone clicked on, silencing its ring;

“… Hello?”

“James!” Remus started, making Sirius sit up slightly in anticipation. “Hey, mate.”

“AH! MOONY!” James exclaimed on the other end, then; “You bastard —been ignoring my calls have you?!”

“Sorry, been a bit busy.”

“Mhm, I’m sure. What’s the girl’s name this time?”

"Oh." Remus glanced sideways at Sirius. “Erm—didn’t catch it actually…”

“You dog. Anyway, you’re gonna think I’m crazy, but I actually knew it would be you! I just got this feeling—had to practically wrestle mum out of the way of the phone. How’s tricks—heard anything from Sirius?”

Remus smirked, and Sirius caught the look. “What’s he saying?”

“Yeah,” Remus said into the phone; “as a matter of fact, I have.”

“Oh my shit, really? Fucking finally! Oh, sorry mum—So, what’d he say? Did he send a letter?”

“Er—yeah, got it this morning. He’s good, better than good actually.”

“Really? He’s not dying?”

“Decidedly not.”

“Well, why’d he go so damn radio-silent?”

Remus cast another look at Sirius, who just shrugged. “Erm… Trouble with his parents, I think. Seems like he’s sorted out mostly now, though.”

“Man, this is why I should’ve stayed home,” James sighed. “He could've sent me a letter too, I should’ve been there to get it. Maybe I should just take the train back.”

“... You want to come back?”

Overhearing, Sirius began shaking his head frantically, and Remus quickly cleared his throat. “I wouldn’t worry none, Prongs. I’m sure you’ll hear from him when you get home, just enjoy the last few days of your holiday. Sirius is fine, honest. You’ll see for yourself soon.”

“I bloody hope so or I’ll wring the nutter’s neck myself… How ‘bout you then? You’ve been going outside every once in a while, right? When’s the last time you touched some grass?”

“Sod off. I got outside plenty.”

“I don’t just mean to pubs and music shops.”

“Why not? They’re enriching. I’m expanding my palates—musical or otherwise.”

“I just don’t want you to be lonely.”

“Now you sound like Lily.”

James ignored him; “I know things with your London friends went tits-up. Just want you to know that we’re here for you.”

Remus sighed and pressed two fingers into his eyes. “Thanks, Prongs, but I’m fine.”

“Alright… But you’ll still come over and visit when we’re back, right? You promised and mum and Dad still want to meet you.”

“Oh yeah, I’ll come.”

“Great! Arsenal’s playing a home game on the twenty-sixth and Dad says we can go see it together, and afterwards I’ll make it up to you by watching every episode of the ‘Pops’ I’ve missed since we got to Devon. You should bring the guitar too! That way when we get back to school we can blow Sirius’ bloody mind with how amazing we sound. You should hear Pete now, he’s gotten really good—even Sim thinks so! Although Lottie still seems unimpressed, but I think that’s just ‘cause they still have to share a room here. Oh, I almost forgot—the other day we went into town and you’ll never guess who we ran into!”

Remus leaned back in the sofa chair, absent-mindedly staring at the ceiling as he listened to James rant. “Mhm, who?”

“Benjy Fenwick, our old dorm monitor! Guy’s here on vacation with his girlfriend’s family. Says they met at uni—she’s a graduate student and like, twenty-seven, it’s insane!”

“Oh yeah…?”

“Yeah, and so we got to talking a little bit. He couldn’t believe that Lily and I are dating now, but then—"

As James continued rambling on, Remus felt a tug at his waist band and shot upright to find Sirius reaching across from the sofa and working his pant zipper with one hand.

"Are you bloody insane? I'm talking to James!" He hissed, covering the speaker.

"Talk to him later, I'm bored," Sirius shrugged, succeeding in popping the button of his trousers open. Remus smacked a hand down across his fingers and Sirius smirked evilly. "Fine, stay on the line then," he taunted, sliding off the sofa and taking up residence on the floor between Remus' legs.

Mouth gaping and utterly scandalised, Remus pressed himself back into the recliner with the telephone cord wrapped tightly around one wrist as he struggled to get a grasp on what James was saying.

"—And I sorta thought to myself, 'hey, who am I to judge?' It's not like I'm an art critic, though I told my mum about it—you know, the actual art critic, and she said that—"

"Oh my god—get off, you lunatic!"

"I've not even done anything yet!"

"Hey, Moony…? You still there?"

"Oh! Yeah—fine! Just dealing with the—er… dog!"

"Arf!" Sirius barked, before clapping his hand over his mouth to avoid bursting into laughter.

"You stupid—" Remus swallowed thickly. "Hey James, reckon I could call you back later? I'm just in the middle of something here and I sorta think I need both hands for it."

"I only need one," Sirius whispered, undoing Remus' zipper and exposing his underwear.

"Oh sure, Moons. We're going back to the village tonight for Simeon's birthday dinner but I can catch you whenever. Let me know if Sirius writes again. Or better yet, maybe I should just post him from here. You think he'll—"

Remus couldn't wait anymore. "Let you know—got it! Bye now!"

With a gasp of relief, he slammed the receiver back down on the phone before turning to glare at the handsome boy kneeling between his legs.

“I could kill you.”

Sirius grinned evilly, barely restraining his eager fingers. “You could. Or you could tell me why you were so desperate not to go to Devon with them in the first place.”

“ ‘Cause I hate the beach. And because I didn’t really feel like intruding on their only family holiday of the year.”

“Hm. Is there anything you do like?”

Remus looked down at his open zipper. “… I can think of a few things.”

“Is one of them sex on the beach? I think it would make things a bit more bearable.”

Feeling his gut tighten with sudden need, Remus leaned down until his nose was brushing against Sirius’ cheek.

“Just shut up and fucking kiss me.”

“Hm,” Sirius smiled, pressing a finger to Remus’ lips, “I’ve got a better idea.”

Trailing his finger down his chin and across the hollow of his throat, Sirius stopped with his hand splayed in the centre of Remus’ chest. Then he shoved him hard, pushing him back into the chair before gripping the elastic waistband of his underwear and tugging it down past his hips. Heat hit a moment later and Remus’ breath caught in his throat as he dipped his head back to stare wide-eyed at the ceiling.

“Ah… fuck!”

Needless to say, he didn’t last very long.

Afterwards, they snuck back up to Remus' bedroom and Sirius hopped into the shower. Left alone in the vastness of the room that was his but never felt it, Remus thought about what he'd said to Sirius before. No one had to know... and they didn't. Remus didn't know much about being queer nowadays, but everyone and their mother knew that it was just better to not be. They wanted to be rock stars—artists, and though artists were awarded a certain level of reprieve when it came to such things like their sexuality, they always had to be established first. No record executive in their right mind was going to give Marauders a chance in hell with two poofs manning the helm. It just wasn't done. Sirius was so desirable, but no one was that desirable. Imagining anyone knowing, it was like taking an ice pick to the stomach. He couldn't—he wouldn't. He won't.

Remus felt immediately guilty after. He knew what had happened with Miles and how it'd hurt Sirius, but if anyone found out about them then wouldn't it just happen all over again? There was no way Lyall Lupin would let his only son return to Hawkings if he knew—Remus would finally feel the stinging slap of his father's palm first. And then there would be nothing left.

Fuck. Fuck—Fuck—Fucking shit!

Remus wished he had someone to talk to about all of it with. Someone who didn't have a stake in it—someone who wasn't Sirius Black. But where was he going to find that? He didn't know any queer people—at least to his knowledge. There had to be a book out there somewhere. If he could just get Sirius to agree to go to the library…. hm…

"Shower's all yours, Moony," Sirius called, appearing out of the bathroom with a towel tied around his waist.

"Kay..." He was so beautiful, that Sirius. No one else had to know how beautiful. Maybe they could just keep it under wraps—anything to keep from having to stop. Remus didn't think he could handle stopping. And if that made him queer, even in a private way… then so be it.

While Sirius began walking toward him, rubbing his damp hair with a second towel, Remus sat up and reached for him. Sirius noticed and dropped the towel around his shoulders with a pleased expression. As he took his hand in return, Remus drew Sirius in to himself and pressed his cheek to Sirius' damp chest, letting his eyes slip shut.

"That shampoo in there s'pretty good," Sirius mused. "Still don't know why you insist on that awful bar stuff at school."

"It's what they have in the commissary," Remus grumbled back.

"Can't wait until we're buying our own soap," Sirius murmured back, already running a hand through Remus' hair and making him absolutely melt. "And milk, and clothes, and cars... Yeah... What you thinking about, Moons?"

“Hm... Just you."

“Ooh, good answer. I think it deserves a wish, even.”

Remus drew back again. “Anything?”

“If it’s within my power,” Sirius said, wiggling his eyebrows suggestively.

“Sing for me?”

The surprise was clear on Sirius’ face. Remus had no doubt that he’d expected him to ask for something dirty, but he could’ve asked for dirty things at any time—he had been—and asking him to sing felt right all of sudden.

“What should I sing then?” Sirius asked, acting almost shy. He wasn't, but that was part of the charm.

“Whatever comes to mind first," Remus said.

Sirius thought for a moment before licking his lips and wrapping his arms around Remus’ neck, sliding all the way onto his lap until their foreheads were touching.

“You are my moonshine—”

“Oh lord.”

“—my only moonshine. You make me happy when skies are grey... You’ll never know dear, how much I love you... Please don’t take my moonshine away.”

Remus couldn’t help it, he laughed as tears of what could’ve only been heartsickness pricked the corners of his eyes. If only this could last forever. Sirius beamed at him, rocking them gently back and forth.

“C’mon, Moony, you gotta sing it back,” he teased.

“I’m no singer.”

“Sing it just for me then.”

Sucking in a happy sigh, Remus whispered; “Alright.”

And so he sang.

* * *

Their blissful existence together came to an end too quickly. Remus had blinked and most of August had come and gone. Soon he'd be expected to return to school not just as any old student, but a prefect. And then after that? Well, he just had to figure out what it was he was to do with the rest of his life. No pressure. Though, things could always be worse, couldn't they? He could be Sirius, who was still under the impression that he had no purpose left at school, and now must focus on finding an entirely new place to live. Remus didn't bother saying it, but there was no way he was going to let that happen. Neither would James, once he found out. The only problem was that Sirius didn't seem all that inclined to tell his other friends what had really happened.

Sirius loved James and Peter dearly, but he hated appearing weak. In front of others he was always cool Sirius Black, aloof and untouchable. Remus hadn't realised it until they'd spent those last few weeks together, but the raw Sirius—the one who cried at music and became a revenge-hungry monster whenever anyone dared inflict suffering upon his friends—that was a Sirius that perhaps only he had ever been party to. When he asked, Sirius couldn't even explain it. It was simply as though their souls had seen into one another and decided subconsciously that they were the one person they could afford to be weak in front of. Remus wasn't sure if knowing that made him feel triumphant or horrified. It was an odd feeling to know that the person you liked most in the world knew every dark inch of you. Or well, most of you.

"You have to tell them," Remus said quietly. "James would want to know."

"Maybe, but..."

"Do you think he'd pity you? Because—"

"No, it's not pity. James is too good for that."

"Then why is it hard? I won't know unless you tell me."

"It's just different with James," Sirius said, murmuring into his hair. He was hugging Remus from behind, something he'd started doing whenever he didn't want Remus to see his face. They hadn't talked much that day—the last day. Instead they'd just laid next to each other with the radio playing and watched the sun rise and fall in the sky outside their window. Eventually the blue summer sky had given way to a majestic sunset, casting a warm orange glow over the entire room. Tomorrow their friends would be back and Sirius could go see them... if he wanted.

"How so?" Remus asked, because he knew it would help Sirius answer.

"He's so good, Moony. If James were a colour he'd be pure white. Like a cloud. A great white cloud... What if I stain him?"

"Then… I think he'd call it tie-dye."

Sirius let out a noise that was probably supposed to be a laugh, but filtered off like a cry. "Shit. You're probably right."

Remus slid a hand up to his chest, where it found Sirius' and he could lace their fingers together. "You said his parents were good. What if they're able to help?"

"It isn't their problem."

"Hm. Why is it victims always feel the guiltiest?"

"To keep things interesting, I suppose."

Turning over, Remus looked down over Sirius' pretty face. How many times had he looked at it over the last month? It felt like a million, and yet he was sure he'd never get tired of it. In a room of one hundred people, he'd only ever see Sirius.

"I won't make you go," he told him; "but I hope you do. If not for your own sake, then for James'."

Sirius met his gaze, grey eyes into brown, and sighed. "Yeah, well, the tosser does have my stereo so I guess I should at least get that back."

"That's it. Silver lining."

"You'll go with me right?"

"Yeah. I promised James, and well… I'm not quite ready to give you up just yet."

Face glowing a vivid orange in the evening light, Sirius smiled sheepishly and leaned up to press a kiss against his lips. When he pulled away, Remus licked them just to taste him.

“Are you gonna tell me what colour I am now?" He asked. "And please don’t say white like a cloud.”

“Oh Moony,” Sirius sighed, “you’re the whole bloody sky.”

Chapter End Notes

A 'skiver' is a lazy person.
Do I have to say what a Tescos is...?
A 'bunch of fives' is a punch.

The song is "I Feel Love" by Donna Summer, 1977. (A queen honestly—Remus is just a snob.)

Chapter 69: Potter Cottage

Chapter Summary

It's nearing the end of summer, and Remus and Sirius head to the Potters. Along the way, they meet someone they did not expect.

Chapter Notes

This chapter took forever to edit so sorry if it's a bit late aasafgjsgdfj

Coincidentally it is also dedicated to my lovely Asaelia, who not only made the very first comment on this fic over a year ago, but has been my friend ever since. Thank you for always answering any questions I may have, no matter how silly. Ily <3

C/W: 'F' slur in smoking context. References to scars and child abuse.

A/N: Full transparency, I am not Hindu! If I have gotten anything wrong or made a bad decision please let me know in the comments so I might correct it!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Our house is a very, very, very fine house,
With two cats in the yard;
Life used to be so hard,
Now everything is easy 'cause of you…
- "Our House" Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young, 1970

With only a week of summer holiday left, Remus packed them a bag and together with Andy's guitar in hand, he and Sirius started the trek across London to see their friends. They first hopped a cab to Camberwell, then a bus to Charing Cross where they crammed themselves into the first train toward East Finchley along with all the rest of London's late-morning commuters. Remus would've preferred to let James know that it was not just him on his way over, but as dramatic as always, Sirius was determined to make an entrance.

"If I'm to show up on their doorstep a pauper, then I might as well make it a surprise," he insisted for the hundredth time, turning to watch the London Underground speed by. Sirius never got tired of city-watching; no matter how dirty or crowded, he was always facinated. Every little thing thrilled him and he spoke to whoever cared enough to strike up a conversation. Remus had thought on more than one occasion that if Sirius had looked any more like his true blue-blooded self they'd have been tagged by a pickpocket ages ago, but neither of them had much to steal in the first place. Just a single old guitar, a few dingy records, and the clothes on their backs.

"Blimey. Look at this, Moons," Sirius said after a while. Remus looked up from his song journal, which he'd really only brought to pass the time, and found that Sirius had picked up one of the stray papers other commuters were always leaving behind on their seats. He was flipping through the rental classifieds.

"This one here says one bedroom flat in Brixton, a ninety-eight pounds a month. Sounds reasonable, right?"

"For a one bedroom in Brixton? Way too expensive."

"Alright, then how 'bout this one—two bedrooms in Mill Hill. Sixty-seven pounds a month. That's like plonk-change!"

"Except Mill Hill isn't exactly close to the city."

Sirius huffed and passed him the paper. "Go on, you have a look then."

Setting his journal aside, Remus opened the paper and began scanning each ad. "This one in Chelsea don't sound all that bad… Or here—in Shepherd's Bush. Three bedrooms."

"That's where we went to that killer pub, innit?" Sirius beamed. "God, their bathrooms were disgusting though."

"As so many in Shepherd's Bush are."

"Eh, I'll keep looking. Dunno what I'd do with three bedrooms anyway."

Remus just about started. He'd began the conversation thinking Sirius was talking about all of them getting a flat together after school… not about him moving in by himself.

"M'sure rent's cheaper in Scotland…" He murmured.

“Oh totally, I'm just having a look. S’good to keep my options open, but I can’t leave you lot anyway. You’re simply too irresistible.” Taking the paper back, Sirius leaned into him and pouted his lips into a kiss. Remus smiled in relief.

“Wouldn’t want you to leave,” he said.

“I know. It’s because I’m even more irresistible.”

“Don’t forget modest.”

As Sirius went back to his search, Remus reached for his journal again. As he was flipping it open to the correct page, he glanced up to find a man and a woman business dress watching them from a short ways down the carriage. Remus eyed him warily, and the next time the train gave a jostle he slid away from Sirius on the bench slightly.

“Do you think we should’ve told James I was coming?” Sirius asked, not five minutes later.

Remus resisted a groan. “Are you joking me?”

Sirius winced. He was staring at the Underground map posted over the door, his newspaper rumpled nervously in his lap. “I dunno… maybe this whole thing was a mistake.”

Remus glanced out the window. The stone walls of the Underground whipped by, anonymous and haunting. As the train grew nearer to the next platform, Remus had to draw his knees in while a woman passed them to get to the door.

“You’re gonna be fine,” he said. “It’s just James and Pete, how long have you known ‘em?”

“They’re gonna be so pissed."

“Only if you tell them you’ve been with me all this time.”

Sirius looked up at him. “You don’t want to tell them?”

What was there to tell? That the two of them had been shacking up since July? Not bloody likely. On that they were both agreed, at least.

“I mean, you could tell them that you've just been... you know, hiding out. But you're not going to...?"

Sirius caught his meaning right away. "Tell them about—no. 'Course not."

Good, Remus thought. "You could just say I let you stay in a spare room or something."

"I just don't want to worry them. I'll tell them about Belgium—hard to hide that if I'm to not go back to school—but... maybe a little fib...?"

"There's your answer then, I guess."

"... Right." Sirius took a deep breath. Above them, the train chimed and the automated announcer cut across the noise;

'The next station is Camden Town, High Barnet Branch. Change here for…'

"There," Remus said, interrupting the announcement, "we're basically halfway there now. Just relax."

Sirius nodded again, eyes flitting about like an ever-nervous bird. Normally, Sirius was too stubborn to be considered a flight risk (that label was reserved for Remus alone) so when the train pulled into the station and other passengers began to shamble out onto the platform, Remus didn't think much of Sirius as he stood up.

"Something wrong with your seat?" He asked, mostly to tease. But then Sirius turned to him, and he finally noticed the panicked look on his face.

"I-I can't—!" Sirius squeaked, before streaking toward the train door and right out onto the station platform. Remus leapt to his feet after him, gaping.

"Sirius!" He started to go after him, but as he jostled for his bag, he accidentally dropped his journal and kicked it halfway down the train.

'This train is about to depart,' the announcer chimed; 'Please mind the doors.'

"Shit!"

Scrambling to get out onto the platform in time, Remus snatched his songbook up off of the dirty train floor and threw himself at the nearest pair of doors. He got caught between them the first time, but as the doors pinged and reopened again, he fell out onto the platform amongst a sea of other flummoxed commuters.

“Sirius!” He called again, whipping his head around. There was no sign of an infuriating, black-haired prat, and so he quickly legged it toward the stairs, taking them up and out onto Camden district’s busy pavement. He had to squint in the early sun, wishing he'd remembered his sunglasses. Across the way was a movie plaza and a Fine Fare market, but he found Sirius just a short ways down the road, already smoking beneath a billboard. Ironically, the billboard bore an advertisement for cigarettes; Rothmans. The best tobacco money can buy. Warning: Cigarettes can seriously damage your health.

“Tell me,” Remus said, as he marched up to him, “are all your shit ideas this spontaneous, or were you actually trying to leave me behind?”

Sirius dropped his arm, blowing smoke out his nose. “Sorry.”

“Hm? Sorry, didn’t catch that.”

“I’m sorry alright!”

“Oh, you’re sorry?!”

“Yes!”

“Then I don’t get it!” Remus snapped. “This is James, your best friend since nappies almost. That’s who we’re going to see. You’re always going on about how great his parents are—how you’d kill to be their son—so why’re you running away now?”

“Because I don’t want this to end!” Sirius exclaimed.

Remus softened, but he couldn’t help but look around. There were too many people passing them by for a real love confession.

“Nothing’s gonna end, Sirius,” he promised, coming in close. “We’re gonna find a way to get you back to school, but I can’t do it on my own. We need James and Peter.”

Sirius sighed, glaring down at his cigarette like it might bite him. “I wish we could just run away, Moony. Start our life now. Find a flat and play our music—get some bum job pouring pints for old codgers and just never talk about our shit families again.”

“Giles would string me up first," Remus said, trying for the light-hearted angle.

"We can hide. I'll hide you, like you hid me. It'll be just for us again."

Oh how I wish it could be.

"That sounds great," Remus said, "but wouldn't you miss our friends? I know I would."

"James and Pete could come too," Sirius answered stubbornly.

"They're not just gonna leave school because we asked them to, Sirius. And besides, I thought Hawkings was your home?"

"It is. Or it was… now I'm starting to think that home could be anywhere, as long as I have you guys."

Dammit Sirius…

"I understand," Remus said firmly, "but James and Peter are gonna be at school. And right now? They're at home—waitin' for us."

"You don't know how hard it is—going there," Sirius said glumly. "Effie and Monty are amazing. They make me feel like I could actually be their son, but I'm not their son, Moony. I'm a fucking lost cause. Wrong in all the right places."

Wrong in all the right places. Yeah, Remus knew exactly what that was like. He just wished he knew where this sudden martyrdom was coming from. Normally Sirius' psyche was an impenetrable barrier, but it'd been just the two of them for so long now… even Remus couldn't help mourning it a bit.

"I'm not gonna go without you," he said, trying to think of a solution. It came to him suddenly—a trolleybus rolled past, it's side placarded with advertisements for Camden Market. Sirius didn't seem to notice. His eyes were on the toe of his boot as he ground it into the pavement.

"Maybe we just need a few hours, hey?" Remus suggested, as the trolley moved on. "James isn't expecting us—or me, more like—until early afternoon. Should we just go somewhere in the meantime?"

Sirius nodded, and flicked the barely-smoked cigarette away with an exhale of relief. "That'd be nice."

And so they went. Anywhere and everywhere Sirius wanted to go. With no real aim, they ended up retracing their steps from all those weeks before, dipping into the same shops and stopping to practice their spitting over the back of a public bench. Albeit a little rough due to the ongoing job crisis, Camden Town was nice in the summertime, always awash with signs of city life. They passed several buskers along the way, and one even tried to get Sirius to play with him when he noticed the guitar, but Sirius bowed out humbly and Remus tossed a tenner into the busker's pot. The man just about dropped his saxophone when he saw it, and stopped mid-song to scoop the note into his pocket.

While walking, the two of them picked up a game of 'find the flat', in which the goal was to choose a random flat and imagine what their life might be like if they lived there.

"What about that one?" Remus asked, pointing to a corner apartment just off the main drag.

"Too much traffic noise," Sirius said, laughing when a cab flew past and honked obnoxiously, proving his point. "I think one of those would be a better fit."

Remus followed his gaze. The flats in question were tucked up in a quaint brick building without so much as a single busted window. "Hm, maybe… but ah, it's got a butcher's on the ground floor. Imagine how it'd smell in the heat."

Sirius sniffed the air as they passed. "Eugh … don't have to imagine."

After walking for near-on an hour without any real aim, they eventually ended up in Primrose Hill. The park was already sprinkled with other wonderers, a family eating lunch, a couple lounging on a blanket, several old women feeding pigeons. Remus chose a spot in the park under a sparse oak tree where they might not be bothered, and laid back with his head on his bag, smoking a cigarette while Sirius pulled his guitar from its case. They just hummed and strummed for a while, watching others come and go from the park's pathways.

"Tell me how that first part went again," Sirius asked eventually, his guitar still propped up in his lap.

Grinding his cigarette out in the grass, Remus sat up and pulled his songbook from their bag. Once he'd found the right page, he began to read; " 'Mary-Anne's darling mother—' "

"Nah, you gotta sing it, Moons."

“I don’t sing.”

“You do sing. You’ve sung for me and I’ve heard you in the shower.”

“Shower singing does not count. Everyone sings in the shower.”

“C’mooooon. Sing it for me—again?”

Remus sighed. “Not a word about my ‘tone’ or ‘pitch’ or whatever.”

Sirius zipped his zips shut snidely and beckoned him on before setting his own fingers to the strings, ready to play. Only slightly nervous to be outside, Remus cleared his throat; “ ‘Mary-Anne’s darling mother didn’t know how to comfort her… She only told her “be a good girl and you’ll see” ’.”

Sirius nodded, his eyes slipping shut as he found his rhythm and began to gently strum along the guitar. What followed was the beginnings of a soft melody, like the caress of a loved one.

“Next part, Moons,” Sirius prompted.

“ ‘When Johnny left his home of troubles, the men in the pub sat him down and said, “hear our words of wisdom, they’ll set you free”…’ ”

Eyes still closed, Sirius smiled and his strumming got stronger. Urged on by its clear tenderness, Remus continued;

“ ‘Head held high, never cry, our lady’s love is nigh—hear our Lady of Conceptual Hope’s sad, sad lullaby’.”

Sirius lifted his hands from the strings the moment Remus stopped and gave a little shudder. “Wow. Utter chills. ‘Lady of Conceptual Hope’—talk about irony. How’d you even come up with that?”

“Dunno,” Remus answered, flipping the journal shut again. “… Just sorta picked a few names and strung the words together. Maybe it’s the religious trauma.” He chuckled, then; “Mm… Sounds a bit silly now.”

“Silly? Are you joking? That was pure prose. I wish I could sit down and write something like that.”

“But your songs always sound so much more rock and roll. I sound like a knock-off. A fifth Beatle.”

Sirius smirked. “Eh. My songs aren't ever as heartfelt as yours. I just try and write something I can scream."

"Point in case."

Sirius waved him off bashfully before taking a sip out of one of the Cokes they'd stopped and gotten from a nearby corner shop. "I got something new actually! Couldn't sleep last night so I borrowed your journal—hope you don't mind."

Remus frowned down at the book, and after Sirius instructed him to flip to the back page, he found several scribbled lyrics in his handwriting. Reading them over quickly, Remus' original judgement was instantly proven.

"Alright, go on then, book thief," he said, eagerly tossing the journal across the grass. Sirius spun it toward himself and quickly began fiddling with the keys of his guitar until its tuning went from low to high.

"Okay, so I haven't figured out all of the chords yet—didn't want to wake you," Sirius explained.

"Such the gentleman."

"Don't be an arse, Moons. So I care about your sleep habits—sue me."

Remus drew a knee up to his chest and leaned his chin against it. God, I love you. How simple it is to love you.

"Remember, it's a work in progress," Sirius continued. A second later he was playing a chord progression that felt both bluesy and hard. Remus instantly liked it. It was faster than anything he'd ever written, and so, so Sirius.

" 'Blow out your voice—till there's nothing left'," Sirius sang; " 'You're less than bloody likely—to die in your bed. Call us Harlot's Progress—red apple gone bad. Making way more money—than dear ol' Dad'!"

Sirius strummed harshly several more times, grinning from ear to ear, before silencing the strings with his palm. Down the hill, a group of teenagers had turned to watch, but Remus' eyes never left Sirius.

"Colour me impressed," he called, "that actually sounds pretty good."

"I know, right?" Sirius answered, tone dripping sarcasm. "Guess you're not the only one that can spin a tune. It'll sound way better once we get Pete on those new drums of his, but I figure it could actually be pretty good. I've already written the hook too—the beat picks up here and it goes, 'Music gets louder—sent us a howler. Singin' ain't breathin'—sleepin' ain't dreamin'! Crowd keeps growin'—time keeps slowin'! On an upswing—that's just rock and roll, yeah'!"

Sirius finished with a spectacular flourish, and Remus clapped for him.

"What's a howler?" He asked.

"Who knows? I just needed it to rhyme!"

Remus began to laugh, only stifling himself by pressing his cheek back to his knee. "I think it sounds real good, babe."

Sirius gasped lightly, and then looked around like he might be hearing things; " 'Babe'?"

Uh… Remus baulked a bit and straightened up. No one was close enough to overhear, but the lack of privacy did help to launch his stomach into his throat ever so slightly.

"Thought I'd try it out," he mumbled sheepishly. Better than 'boyfriend', anyway…

Despite Remus' sudden aversion, Sirius only appeared ecstatic. "Hm… okay, babe," he purred. "In that case, I think it sounds pretty good too."

Sirius finished off his Coke, setting the bottle aside and returning to the same strumming pattern he'd created for Remus' "Lady of Conceptual Hope". Remus just watched, content, and eventually the playful feeling returned.

"Did I ever tell you that while you were dating Kimmy, she asked me for a threesome?"

It was a rhetorical question—of course he'd never told him—but Sirius' reaction was funny none-the-less. His fingers came down, almost strangling the guitar strings as he bolted upright in place.

"WHA—A THREESOME?!"

"SHH!"

"SHE ACTUALLY ASKED YOU FOR A THREESOME?!"

Horrified that someone might actually overhear this time, Remus snatched up his songbook and chucked it at him. “Fucking honestly… I knew I shouldn’t have told you!”

Unfazed by the book bouncing sharply off of his shoulder, Sirius practically threw Andy’s guitar aside in a mad rush to scramble forward. “OOOH—! How dare you keep such vital information from me, Remus Lupin!”

“UGH—Gerroff!” Remus wailed, as Sirius caught him by both ankles and dragged him halfway onto his back.

“No way—out with it!” Sirius ordered. “Tell me everything this instant, or I’ll—I’ll kiss you right here.”

“Alright, alright,” Remus moaned. “Just shut up! … It was that night last year, when we were at the bonfire.”

Sirius’ mouth dropped open. “Jesus fuck—is that why you were so fucking aggro until the end of term?”

“Oh fuck off. I wasn’t ‘aggro’, I was just pissed off. Do you know how it feels to have your best friend’s crappy girlfriend practically pawing at your lap?”

“If I did, then we’d be having a real different conversation!”

At that, Remus laughed. Kicking Sirius’ hands away, he sat up against the oak’s trunk and smoothed out his shirt. “Yeah well, s’not like I could say yes.”

“Why not?!”

“ ‘Cause she was bleedin’ awful. And ‘cause you pissed me off!” And because I didn’t even know what it was that I was feeling. Handsome git.

Sirius gave a deep moan, falling forward onto his stomach in the grass. “I have been mortally wounded. I simply cannot go on… I shall succumb to the ennui of it all and die.”

“You’re such a drama queen.”

“Don’t belittle me, Remus Dean! This is positively the worst thing to have ever happened to me!”

Remus shook his head. “The worst? Are you kidding me—you mean you would’ve wanted to?”

Sirius rolled over. "UH—YES?! Kimmy may have been a total cad, but she was still smokin' hot! You'd have to be blind to miss that. And with you?! UGH—FUCK ME."

"You're hopeless."

"… Nah, just horny."

"Desperate then."

"How can you call me 'babe' one moment and be so mean the next?"

"It's called nuance."

Sirius began to grumble over the strings of his guitar. "Pfft… 'nuance'… more like straight-up moody… yeah, 'Moody' Moony… ya bastard."

Remus smiled and reached down to pat Sirius on the shoulder. "I think that means it's time to go. We're officially fashionably late for our meeting with the Potters."

"Can we at least get something to eat first?" Sirius whined. "It's bad taste to show up to a party hungry."

Remus rolled his eyes fondly. "You're so dumb. C'mon."

He held out a hand to help Sirius up, and together they gathered the rest of their things and set off. Leaving Primrose Hill behind, they made their way back over the train tracks toward the market in Camden Lock. Along the way they passed the Roundhouse, so named for the circular stage that occupied its interior. The building itself had originally housed a railway turntable, and then later used as a warehouse for old railway cars, but now attracted bands from all over the world to perform to intimate crowds hand-picked from London's finest and most passionate fans.

"Everyone's played there," Remus said, when Sirius stopped to hand off the chain link fence surrounding the venue. "Jimi Hendrix, Pink Floyd, the Doors… The Who. Even David Bowie."

"Yes," Sirius said with a wistful smile. "And one day it's gonna be us."

Remus didn't bother questioning the finality with which Sirius made his statement. Even if they had a snowball's chance in hell of actually making it onto the Roundhouse's stage—or any stage, really—it was his dream too now.

Carrying on, they followed the tracks until they found themselves skirting around the market, its stalls piled high with various antiques and handmade jewellery. Sirius stopped outside one of them to admire a table piled high with chunky silver and brass rings. The woman selling them was set up behind the table on a mattress of several oriental-looking rugs, eating a salad that looked more like the grass of Primrose Hill than lettuce. Her entire outfit seemed to be made of various silk scarves and the smile she gave them when they approached felt similar to the rest of the traders in the market; just a hungry artist looking to make a buck.

“My dad has one of these,” Sirius said, plucking a large signet ring out of the heap. “Family heirloom. Had the Black family crest on it and everything. Was supposed to be mine when I turned eighteen. Suppose it’ll go to Reg now.”

“Good riddance?” Remus suggested meekly.

“Yeah,” Sirius agreed. “Always thought it was an ugly old thing anyway. Though, at least his was real silver.”

The stall-woman gave them a vexing look and Remus quickly took the ring from Sirius, replacing it and steering him away. The next few stalls were packed with fresh cooking and hungry market-goers, and Remus had to muscle his way to the front of the line where he ordered döner kebab for both of them. Lamb for himself, beef for Sirius.

“Ohhh… I think I’m gonna marry this sandwich,” Sirius moaned, already several bites in as they made their way out of the market thoroughfare.

“Are you now? Didn’t you once say that you’d never get married?”

“… I’m going to fuck this sandwich.”

Remus grinned, taking a large bite of his own. “It’s called kebab, you tourist.”

Sirius just nodded, eyes closed in reverence. “I want to make a pun, but I can’t think of any, so I’m just going to enjoy this.”

Mouths stuffed, they made their way along, eating while walking and hindered only by their sparse possessions. People passed them in the streets without so much as a glance. Maybe one day, when they were christening stages like the likes of the Roundhouse or Dingwalls, the reaction would be different. But for now they were just two nameless idiots with half a pack of fags and an old beat-up guitar.

“Which was back to the station?” Sirius asked around another bite of kebab. Throwing his wrapper in a roadside bin, Remus wiped his mouth on the back of his hand, already looking on ahead.

“It’s just—”

Remus’ eyes shot wide.

Could it be? … Really? Agh… ah fuck.

Oblivious, Sirius looked up at him with a cheeky expression. He reached for his cheek. “Oi babe, I think you’ve got a little something right—eugh!”

Grabbing Sirius by the collar of his shirt, Remus quickly hauled him into an alleyway that they’d just passed. Surprised by the sudden yank, Sirius dropped the rest of his kebab on the way and appeared fully ready to throw a quality fit, but something on Remus’ face must’ve given him reason to pause. Instead he slowly peeked around him and peered out onto the street, obviously unsure what to look for.

“Moons…?”

It was as though Remus’ heartbeat had moved from his chest into his ears. It’d been so long, he almost glossed over them entirely, but Vint was a large guy who wore his leather jacket more often than Sirius, and Seesaw was never without his signature shades. But still they looked different. Their heads were shaved… their faces more flat and square. Remus could remember thinking they’d all looked grown last Christmas, but this was something else. Gone were the boyish features he’d known, replaced by stoney looks that deterred any passerby from getting too close. They weren’t alone either—they had a gaggle of other guys with them, some younger and freckled, others with leftover scars from acne or one-too-many fights. He couldn’t recall any of them as familiar, but he searched every one of their faces desperately. For a hint—a chance.

No dice. Tomny was not among them.

“Moons?” Sirius said again, grabbing his arm. “You good…?”

Remus said nothing, just ushered Sirius further into the alley. The group was almost upon them, and he couldn't bring himself to look when they passed. He didn't want to be noticed—he couldn't be noticed, what would he even say? Hello? Hello and goodbye? I'm sorry? Dammit.

In whatever capacity to feel that he had left, he was grateful for Sirius. The other boy didn't say anything else, and simply waited until the pack of boys-turned-men had long passed. A few of them were in the middle of conversation—laughing. Remus couldn't tell what about, it was so quick, but caught wind of Seesaw's lazy drawl as he quipped a quick reply and it was enough to send him sprawling back to those days at the flat. He'd thought he'd mourned them all. Guess not.

"I knew them," Remus said later, when he'd finally had the courage to exit the alleyway and continue on.

"You mean those guys?" Sirius clarified. "The ones that looked fresh outta the chokey?"

He glanced over his shoulder like the boys might reappear holding switchblades and brass knuckles.

"They didn't look like that when I knew 'em," Remus murmured. "They were my f-f… my friends. They know Tomny."

Sirius' expression became a glower. He still had not forgiven Tomny for the way he'd ended things, though it was entirely on Remus' behalf. "You should've said hello," he told him; "Asked them where Tomny was so we can go kick his arse."

Even in his raw state, Remus found it within himself to smile. "You'd actually pick a fight with Tomny for me?"

"Hmph. Can't be that tough, not if he's weaselling out over the phone like a little bitch."

The snipe did not make Remus feel better, but Sirius was quick to rectify it. He leaned in close as they walked and wrapped a friendly arm around Remus' shoulders.

"Hey, don't think about it. Those guys are the ones missing out, not you. After all, you're Remus Dean, you're gonna play the Roundhouse one day. Then the 100 Club, and the Astoria, and Wardour Street… you're amazing, you are."

“Careful,” Remus replied meekly, “any more ‘a that and m’gonna start thinking you’re trying to charm your way into my trousers.”

“Don’t be silly. I’ve already done that twice over.”

That you have.

With a sigh caught between relief and longing, Remus wrapped his own arm around Sirius’ shoulders. It was just a friendly gesture—no one would’ve mistaken them for being anything other than a pair of lads out on the town, but it meant more because it was Sirius. Sirius would always mean more.

“Ah! I know just what’ll cheer you up!” Sirius declared not five minutes later. They were only a street over from the station and it was getting late into the afternoon, but that didn’t deter him from steering Remus directly toward the record shop the moment he spotted it.

“Retail therapy’s always helped me,” Sirius instructed, pushing the door open and letting the bell overhead chime.

“Especially when it’s someone else’s money,” Remus added.

“Precisely!”

It was a small shop, with yellow overhead lights all cracked in various places and crates upon crates of old vinyl stacked all the way to the ceiling. There was music playing, and a few other shoppers weaved amongst the rows, browsing quietly while an animated clerk attempted to charm some girl over the register’s counter. “Hey-up,” he called halfheartedly, as the two of them ambled inside. Sirius returned the lame hello with a wave.

“Think they got any Sex Pistols?” He asked Remus.

“Only one way to find out…”

With tapes on one side and records on the left, they promptly got to work.

“Do you think we’ll ever be rid of disco?” Sirius asked, standing across from Remus and haphazardly flicking through the shrink-film wrapped albums.

“Could be worse. Could be synth.”

“You think synth's worse than disco?”

“Obviously. At least disco uses some real instruments. Synth is all machines making music—nasty. You lose the human aspect of it, the part that makes it rich and… I dunno, alive.”

“You’re such a music snob,” Sirius laughed. “I love it.”

Remus smirked down at the row of albums in front of him. How easily Sirius could banish a bad spell. All thoughts of Tomny and the flat gone, a giddy feeling had come over Remus, like the sort that made screams of triumph build up in your chest. Before he could lose it completely, he shoved the albums back into their place and cleared his throat.

“Gonna go ask the guy if he’s got any Sex Pistols.”

Sirius just nodded, bobbing his head to the shop's music as rummaged through the stacks.

As Remus broke away, he slipped around the few other shoppers and stopped a short ways away from the cash counter. The shop clerk was still heavily engrossed in conversation with the girl—or that was to say, she was still heavily engrossed in conversation with him. Remus had to wait several minutes while the guy went on and on about the marvels of bands like Bad Company and Cheap Trick, not so subtly pausing every third word to peek down the front of her shirt as she leaned half her torso across the counter. Remus didn't care much to listen in, but his mouth-breathing was hard to ignore.

"Yeah, so ya see, Black Sabbath was completely unlike anything on the scene at the time. Their blues-rock was pure sludge music—either ya hated it or loved it.” He shrugged nonchalantly. “I personally prefer their earlier stuff meself, but ‘Technical Ecstasy’ wasn’t bad.”

Impossibly, the girl leaned even further over the counter. “Wasn't their lead singer supposed to have sold his soul to the devil?”

“That’s jus' Oz being Oz. He created this whole ‘Prince of Darkness’ thing to wake people up. You know, make rock faster by slowin' it down.”

“Wow.”

Grimacing slightly, Remus glanced at his wrist, wishing he’d remembered his watch. “Uh, s’cuse me…”

“Be right with you, pal,” the clerk responded, without so much as glancing Remus' way. "Have you listened to their debut album?"

The girl shook her head.

"Oh man, you're really missing out. It's just got these—these tones to it, ya know?! It's doom, but it's also hope, and—and—ya know, their guitarist used to lower his string tension all the time to get these really low, grovelly notes. I'm talking like, almost out of tune here!"

Remus rolled his eyes. "Uhm..."

"Yeah, hold on a sec, mate. Anyway, he did it so he could mix rhythm riffs with lead guitarist right there in studio. He hated editing his sound in the booth. Said it ruined—"

"No, he didn't," Remus cut-in mercilessly, "he did it because he was missing the tips of two fingers on his right hand."

Both the girl and the clerk looked up at him very sharply. "Excuse me?"

"Tony Iommi," Remus said. "He lost them while working at a sheet metal factory when he was seventeen. That's why he played low."

The clerk squinted at him critically. "Who?"

"The… The guitarist…? Of Black Sabbath?" Remus glanced around as though he were being chaffed. "Were you not just talking about him?"

Looking more than a little affronted, the clerk cleared his throat and began to nod briskly. "Right. Iommi. Class act, him… er—Right!" He lifted his hands into the shape of an air-guitar and began mimicking the fretboard while the girl watched. "Lost his fingers! Total devastation time. Imagine fretting a guitar with half your hand!"

"Well, actually—" Remus pointed to the guy's other arm; "Iommi plays left-handed so it'd be your other hand."

The clerk gave a sharp huff and dropped his arms. "Orright, kid, whatchu want?"

"Do you have the Sex Pistols' new single?"

"You sure you're old enough for that kind of stuff?"

The girl giggled and Remus puckered slightly. "You sure you're not too old to be hitting on teenage girls?"

Apparently the joke was not a hit. “Don’t got it,” the clerk retorted.

“Could you double-check?”

“Look, even if I did have it once upon a time, you’re about the tenth guy I’ve turned away already. Try checking back next week.”

“Gee, thanks,” Remus replied, not at all thankful. He turned away and the clerk promptly launched back into another rant—“Where was I? Oh right, actually Sabbath’s pretty much old-hat now anyway. It’s punk that’s in now. You’ve heard of the Ramones?”

Making his way back across the shop, he found Sirius going through a milk crate of LPs that were on-offer.

“Ever cared much for the Allman Brothers, Moons?”

“Nah, too American.”

“Too right.” Sirius dropped the LP back into the crate. “What’s the verdict then? We gettin’ high to ‘God Save the Queen’ tonight?”

Remus shook his head. “They don’t got it.”

“Bollocks.”

“We could always check in Finchley. James said there’s a decent shop not too far from his place.”

“Right, right—he’s told me about it. But hey, I found these!” Crossing over to the centre aisle, Sirius began showing off several more albums —good albums. Marvin Gaye. Joni Mitchell. King Crimson. Even a few he didn't know.

“What’s ‘Kraftwerk’?” Remus asked, holding up one of the albums curiously.

“Dunno,” Sirius said; “I’m trying to diversify. I think they’re German—but look, one of these songs is over twenty-two minutes long!”

“Jesus... and they say Queen's bad. Alright, give ‘em here then.” Gathering the albums from Sirius and tucking them under one arm.

"Oh, you don't have to get all of them," Sirius said quickly.

"Sure, I do. Call it an advance on your birthday gift."

Sirius smiled shyly, fingering his sunglasses.

As they turned for the cash counter, the door behind them opened and chimed to allow other customers inside. Neither of them paid any mind. “You think you’re ready to head on to James’ now?” Remus asked.

“Good as,” Sirius said. “Can’t keep ‘em waiting forever, now can we?”

“Not if you want this band of yours to actually work out. Any more of this nonsense and James might actually kill you. And then what would we do without our notorious Sirius Black?”

Sirius grinned. “ ‘Notorious’, huh? I like the sound of that.”

“You would.”

“Gotta find you a new stage name too. How 'bout the Rakish Re—"

"No."

"No? Alright, then maybe, Majestic Moo—"

"Keep trying."

Sirius huffed. "Fine, then how about the Spectacular—"

“Sirius…?!"

The name had not come from Remus or Sirius' mouth. Instead it’d echoed from behind—from the woman who’d just walked into the shop. Already half-facing Sirius, Remus saw her first; she was quite short, but no one they knew from school, with hair the colour of coffee with just a bit too much cream. At her temples were two twin streaks of purple and she wore a collared necklace around her throat like a second belt. Heavy beaded hoops hung from either ear and dark coal rimmed her eyes—a punk if Remus had ever seen one. But as striking as she was, Remus was instantly horrified. He hadn’t counted on anyone recognising Sirius before they were even due back to school. Almost a month of pure secrecy coupled with hiding out in his bedroom and here was this random stranger off the street, waltzing in and shouting his name out of nowhere. There couldn’t be that many Siriuses in London, surely. And none that could’ve been mistaken for Sirius Black.

Remus felt like saying, Don’t turn around. Just run. Run and I’ll distract them! But they were not characters on a daytime drama with finite answers and endings. They were just two boys with a strong affinity for irony, and there was nothing else to do aside from watch as Sirius spun around to face the potential threat. Face her and… hug her?

Lost in his own surprise, Remus stood by dumbfounded as Sirius' face split into an inexplicable expression of disbelief and utter joy. "ANDY!" He cried, throwing himself forward and forcing the woman to catch him. She did—barely—and then stood back to get a better look at him.

"Oh my god! It is you, Sirius! Holy fuck—what are you—How are you —?!" She whipped her head around. "Ted! Ted, it's Sirius! It's my cousin."

Another guy stepped forward. Remus hadn't the gall to notice him until he did, but what he found was a man nearly twice Andy's height, with an eyebrow piercing, wearing a creased t-shirt with the words 'Vive le Rock' across its front. His hair was spiked up with gel and he wore leather cuffs on both wrists. Despite the rough-looking dress, he appeared friendly enough as he extended a hand toward Sirius, tucking a cigarette behind his ear as he did so.

"I'm Ted," he said with a lazy smile. "Pleasure to meetcha. Heard lots from Andy."

Sirius shook Ted's hand, still entirely starstruck. "I-I'm sorry," he managed, "but is this really happening right now? I mean—what are you doing here? Where's Dora?"

Andy looked Sirius up and down slowly, like she still couldn't believe it was him. "Dora's with grandma. The Grateful Dead's just released a new album, and we—we know the owner… What are you doing here? Have you really moved to London?"

Appearing unsure, Sirius glanced back at Remus. "Er... Something like that…"

Andy didn't miss the look. For the first time Remus felt as though she'd noticed his presence; giving him the same once-over, she paused just long enough for him to begin worrying again—but the next moment she was smiling, and all the anxiety instantly melted away. Her eyes weren't the same grey as Sirius', more of a mottled brown, but they had the same shape, the same little wicked crinkle at the outer corner.

“Oh, who cares?!” She exclaimed. “You’re here. And you have my guitar!”

Sirius perked up, raising the colourful guitar case high. “Yeah, a‘course! Couldn’t leave it. It’s the best gift I’ve ever gotten.”

Looking like she might cry, Andy let out a little whimper of happiness and pulled Sirius into another hug. “It’s been too long—you’ve grown so much… oh… I missed you, little brother.”

Unable to see his face, Remus couldn’t be sure what expression Sirius was making, but if he knew him at all, then it was bound to be something very close to luminous.

They’re like mirrors of each other, Remus thought later, as the four of them made their way up and down the borough’s busy streets together. From behind, the Black cousins could’ve been closer to siblings. They both had that willowy look about them—pale skin, dark eyes, with legs up to their necks and hair to match. Then there was the part where they both spoke with their hands; the more excited they got, the more they jumped over one another in conversation until eventually they were finishing each other’s sentences with ease.

“You do know that Bella—”

“Got married? Oh yeah, Cissy still sends me the occasional letter. Did you—”

“Go to the wedding? Nah, as if mum would ever let me. It was in April anyway. But I saw the photos! … Almost feel bad for Bella, too. Her unibrow might be worse, but nothing’s as bad as his—”

“His teeth! Oh my god, I remember the teeth. Like a fucking horse!”

It was good to hear Sirius laugh at someone else’s jokes. He and Andy walked on ahead, leaving Remus and Ted to trail behind like the leftover partners they were. They had no real destination, but the sudden reunion was too wonderful an opportunity to pass up. No one complained, after all Andy and Sirius hadn’t done more than send letters and talk over the phone in almost five years. Since that time, Andy had found out she was pregnant, had the baby out of wedlock with a lower-class boy from Tottenham, and was promptly ejected from the family of Black—an experience the cousins now shared.

“I don’t know why you didn’t just call me!” Andy lashed, after Sirius reluctantly told her how he’d ended up in London in the first place.

“What was I supposed to say? ‘Hey Andy, mum sent me to prison in Belgium, can you come pick me up?’ ”

“Yes! Exactly that!”

Sirius waved the answer off, but Remus could tell he was secretly pleased. It was a foreign feeling to him—cousins. Remus didn’t have any. Both Hope and Lyall had been only children, and well… there was no way of knowing what went on within his more distant relations.

“They look alike, don’t you think?” Ted asked suddenly, pulling Remus back down to earth. “Think it’s the eyes. Like a gene lottery. Though I suppose I’m the lucky one, really.”

Me too, Remus thought.

Smiling, Ted turned to look at him while they walked. “Sorry, I never caught your name?”

“Oh, my bad. It’s Remus.”

“Pleasure. You Sirius’ friend then?” Ted offered a hand, which Remus shook. It was firm, his palm a bit rough, like Giles' or any other working boy. Briefly, Remus wondered what Ted thought of his palm. It was probably smooth enough to assume that he'd never done a day of work in his life.

“Er… yeah," he answered. "He’s been staying with me for a while.”

“You from London then?” Ted asked.

“Mhm. Blackheath.”

“Nice. From Tottenham, meself, but we’re over in Islington now. The two of you should drop in sometime! I’d love to get Sirius to jam out with us. You play anything?”

“Bass.”

“Oh, champ! Don’t tell Andy I said this—but the bass is where it’s really at.”

Remus smiled. He liked Ted, he’d decided. He was friendly without asking too many questions, and he was tall enough that Remus didn’t feel gangly or out of place. Plus, he looked bloody cool. A bit fit, even —but that was queer thought, so he pushed it away.

“Sirius said you used to be in a band?” He asked.

Ted nodded. “A few years ago. Almost got a contract even, but then everything went tits up when our lead singer skipped town for America. Thought he would make it big in L.A, ‘cept now he buses tables while his boss busts his balls.”

“Oh. Bad luck, that.”

“Eh, didn’t matter really. I quit not long after anyway—when Dora was born. Gotta feed the family somehow, right?” Ted chuckled. “Not that I’m complaining! Got a whole new outlook on life. I look back now and I’ve realised that I was just drifting before, y’know? Andy didn’t just give me a family, she gave me a purpose.” Without any prompting, Ted popped a tattered wallet out of his pocket and flipped it open. Aside from a sparse few paper notes and his driving licence, it held only a handful of photographs, mainly of Andy holding a chubby baby girl.

“This is the most recent,” he said, thumbing through and producing a small photo of his daughter covered in paint and brandishing a paintbrush like a sword. He showed the photo off with all the eager glee of a loving father, almost a complete paradox to his hard, punk-like exterior. “Cute, huh?”

Remus nodded firmly until Ted had tucked the photo away again. He couldn’t imagine giving up everything for something as trivial as family. But maybe that was just because his family had never given anything up for him.

“I wish we could’ve talked for longer, but Dora turns into a real riot act if we’re even a minute late,” Andy said, after their twentieth turn around the block had ended outside the entrance to the Underground. “We’re still not sure who taught her how to read a bloody clock at only four years-old, but I’m gonna wring their neck when I find out.”

“Reckon she’s just gifted,” Sirius said, “like me.”

“Don’t say that. Can’t afford to let my kid take after a bruiser like you.” Andy ruffled his hair fondly, loosening the braid Remus had done himself that morning. “You’ll come and visit us before heading back to school then?”

“Sure, sure,” Sirius smiled.

“I mean it. If you don’t I’ll kick your arse.”

“C’mon Ands, we’re not kids anymore. You couldn’t kick my ass if you tried,” he scoffed, leaning in to taunt her. Andy socked him one for it —right in the stomach—and Sirius folded around her fist like a piece of paper.

“You were saying?”

“Ugh… alright, I yield, Ands—uncle, uncle!”

After that they hugged, and Remus held back to shake Ted’s hand once more.

“Take care of him, Remus,” Andy said, just as they were about to part ways. It was only about the third thing she’d said to him directly, the first being ‘so you’re the Remus I’ve been hearing so much about!’ and the second, ‘blimey, you are tall’. Remus didn’t really mind; Sirius was usually the subject of attention, but this time around he deserved it.

“I will,” he promised her.

“We take care of each other!” Sirius interjected, hitting Remus with the tip of his guitar case and poking his tongue out in Andy’s direction.

“Don’t be a stranger then!” Andy called, taking Ted’s hand and already backing down the pavement. “You come visit too, Remus, and bring James and Peter as well! We’ll catch a show—or have one! Perhaps both!”

They waved, the happy couple, and Remus and Sirius returned it in kind. Neither of them moved until Andy and Ted’s forms had faded far into the distance, and when they finally turned to head down onto the platform, Sirius did so with a revived spring in his step.

“Absolutely mental—seeing Andy again!” Sirius said, as the next train to Finchley rumbled into the underground station and they boarded. “She was pissed off that I didn’t give her the bell a'course,” he went on; “Or tell ‘er I was in London, but it was… Blimey—amazing. She looks the exact same.”

“Real fates at work,” Remus agreed, as they took two seats near the back of the train car. “You gonna go visit her then?”

“Yeah, should, shouldn’t I? ... ‘sides, I’d like to see Dora, and Ted’s supposedly still got all of his old equipment in storage. I told you once that Andy was the only other one Alphard left money to? It’s how they bought the house in Islington! You could come—we could all go! ... Ha, oh hell. James is going to be so pissed off that we're this late."

Remus shrugged. "Day ain't over yet, he'll understand once we explain everything."

"Yeah—yeah, he's good like that, that Prongs. He'll understand. Can't wait to tell him about Andy."

"You never told me that Andy calls you 'brother'," Remus said, because he could tell Sirius wasn't done talking about her.

"Picked up on that, did you?" Sirius beamed, still babbling along. "Jus' something we did as kids. All I had was Reg, and she liked her sisters well enough, I guess, but we were always the odd ducks. Pretending it was just the two of us made things more bearable. Sucked when she left though. But hey—we're both better for it, we're both here now! Totally free and livin' life."

"That's right," Remus said, then; "I don't have any cousins."

"None?"

"Not that I know of."

"Sounds a bit lonely."

"Hm. Maybe… I had the dogs though."

Suddenly going very quiet, Sirius bit his lip. "Er—that's right, what am saying?! You're not really missing out on much anyway. In fact, I hate most of my cousins! They're all racist, right-wing Tories who'd rather get with each other than marry someone of a lower class. 'Cept for Andy of course."

Remus chuckled lightly. "Thanks for trying to make me feel better. Andy seems pretty rad."

"Oh yeah, she is. Sorry I never really introduced you properly—got a bit excited."

"S'okay. Next time."

Smiling, Sirius glanced down at his hands. The anticipation of 'next time' was written all across his face, and Remus was glad for him. In the exposed space of the train car, he wished he could have leaned his head on Sirius' shoulder in comfort, but he couldn't, so instead he set his bag across their laps and slid one hand beneath it, reaching for Sirius' lovely fingers.

If Remus hadn't turned to face the train window to hide his own guilty blush, he might've noticed the smile on Sirius' face become that much wider.

* * *

"Moony?" Sirius asked, as they made their way down the street from the station. It was already late afternoon, almost evening, and they were most certainly late, but Remus still couldn't bring himself to rush.

"Mhm?" He responded, busy staring at the passing houses.

"Don't hate me, but I think I'm still sort of nervous…"

"It's just James, Sirius."

"It's not though. It's the Potters. I've only ever visited that one time, and when I showed up, it took about five minutes for them to start calling me their son. It was… indescribable."

"Wow, you've really convinced me. They sound horrible—guess we should go home!"

Halting in the middle of the pavement, Remus made a sharp about-turn and Sirius laughed, immediately pulling him back by the arm. "Alright, I get it. I'm being a pansy."

"You are," Remus agreed. "And I'm tired of putting up with it, so let's just getchu on home to Prongs, okay?"

Sirius sighed. It was with love. "Okay, Moony."

Like they had on the train, Sirius reached for his hand. Remus let him at first—he'd almost grown used to it after a month—but as they began to walk, he noticed a young couple down the lane pushing a pram ahead of them and quickly pulled free of his grasp. Sirius' fingers flexed at the sudden absence, but he said nothing about it. Cringing with slight regret, Remus held his breath until the couple passed, but even then he couldn't bring himself to reach back out again. He told himself not to be bothered—Sirius understood.

On the way they discovered that the walk from the station to the Potters' was a decent one. They passed through several different neighbourhoods and suburbs until the townhouses gave way to detached homes, and then detached homes with a driveway, and then detached homes with a driveway and a garden and a path and then some. They really only got lost once, but after stopping a passerby for directions, they eventually found themselves walking down a private driveway lined with rich growth and birch trees. They had to pass a country club to find the house, but finally made it to the proper start of the Potters' drive after a few more minutes of walking.

"Bloody hell," Remus murmured, when he first spotted the house. He was used to the vast finery of the Lupin estate, but Potter Cottage was something else.

"I know, right?" Sirius said back, still taking it all in himself.

Just beyond an unlocked gate made of solid brass was an elegant driveway that stretched all the way up to a stunning three-floor Tudor home. It's sprawling front garden was covered in blooming colours and fully-grown trees of birch and oak. Each window was made of stained glass, and flowering ivy crawling up its exterior walls. The lawn was perfectly manicured, with thriving rose bushes that dotted the lane leading all the way up to the home's front door. Everywhere they looked there was more greenery, more life, but none of it felt stifling or uniform. Grass grew where it chose to grow, and the weeds were tidy but not eliminated all together. It felt a bit arbitrary to call such a fine house a 'cottage', but the home wasn't so needlessly large as to avoid any real character in favour of blatant wealth. It was warm and happy—it looked happy.

"Hasn't changed a lick," Sirius said, trailing his fingers across the bars of the gate. Taking the initiative, Remus pushed it open for him and together they started up the drive where they eventually passed Mr. Potter's sensible, yet still flashy, Aston Martin sedan.

"Giles would be jealous," Remus said, peeking in the window. "Look, it's got a built-in cassette player!" He glanced up, but Sirius had already moved on, having set his guitar case down on the front stoop to wring his hands nervously. Remus followed, and Sirius turned to him, taking a deep breath.

"Alright. So how should we do this?"

"How 'bout like this." Remus rang the doorbell.

“Moons, I wasn’t ready!”

Already fretting, Sirius ducked behind a shrub while a great thundering started inside the house. It sounded to Remus like frantic footsteps, and he was proven right when James burst forth out the front door, looking wide-eyed and utterly delighted to see him.

“Moony!” He declared, already hugging Remus fiercely. “About time, mate! I told you to ring me when you got to the station so Dad and I could come pick you up!”

“S’okay, I enjoyed the walk,” Remus smiled, patting James on the back in return.

Releasing him, James stepped back into the doorway. “Made it alright then? I hope your dad didn’t give you much trouble. Mum says she’ll still call if he’s got a problem with you staying over.”

“Nah, he don’t care. Got enough on his plate to not be worried about me.”

Nodding understandably, James began to usher him inside. Already Remus could smell the comforting scent of fresh baking. “Come on in then, Mum’s just in the kitchen making lunch. Pete’s gonna be by soon too! He’s just the lane over.”

Biting his lip over a smile, Remus dug his heels in and hesitated on the door mat. “Well, there’s one thing you probably know first, Prongs…”

“What’s that?”

With a great cry, Sirius burst out from behind the shrub, a single leaf caught in his fringe. “TA-DA!” He announced, as James’ jaw fell open. “Miss me, Prongsie?”

If James did, Sirius never heard about it. After snapping his head back and forth between them for a few shocked seconds, James Potter let out a furious war cry and threw himself out of the doorway, making Sirius turn-tail and run out of sheer alarm.

“OH—GOD! SOMEONE CALL ANIMAL CONTROL," Sirius wailed. "WE’VE A PRONGS ON THE LOOSE!”

“YOU WANKER!” James screamed, chasing his best friend all across the lawn, shouting and waving his fists as he ran. “GET BACK ‘ERE—I’M GONNA THROTTLE YOU!”

“MOONY! OH, MOONY—AUGH GOD—HELP ME!”

Remus shook his head. “Told you he’d be mad!” He called, just as James threw himself forward and managed to tackle Sirius from behind. With a great ‘omph!’ they went down into a single pile and began to roll across the lawn like two thrashing crocodiles. No surprise, it was James who came up on top, pinning Sirius on his stomach as he rubbed his smug face into the grass.

“YOU BASTARD! YOU CHEEKY FUCKING BASTARD! DO YOU EVEN KNOW HOW WORRIED I WAS?!”

Sirius made a grunting noise that might’ve been something akin to ‘no, why don’t you tell me?’ and James finally let him up to breathe.

“OUT WITH IT! WHERE HAVE YOU BEEN ALL THIS TIME?!”

“Oh, you know…” Sirius began spitting foliage. “Around…”

With another cry, James thrust his face back down into the turf and Remus just sighed, crossing his arms. He might’ve gone to break the tussle up himself, had someone else not stepped out onto the stoop with him.

“What the devil is going on out here?”

Remus spun around to find a woman standing in the doorway, holding a hand to her forehead as she peered out at the pair of wrestling boys on her front lawn. He knew instantly that it was James’ mum—she had his almond-shaped eyes and brown complexion, with the same high ridged nose and angular cheeks. She appeared a bit older than he’d imagined, but still clearly a pretty woman, with her hair methodically pinned back from her face and an intricate golden earring dangling from each ear.

“James, what are you doing? Get up this instant!” Mrs. Potter ordered. She had a light accent which James lacked, but there wasn’t a hint of anger in her voice. “Honestly, what does that boy think he’s up to?”

“Just a bit of dog training,” Remus quipped out of the corner of his mouth. She caught it and turned on him. For a moment he had the good sense to be frightened—Euphemia Potter was said to be a generally kind woman, but her temper was not one to be prodded.

“You must be Remus,” she said, and then rather than reprimanding any of them, she smiled kindly and offered her hand.

Remus relaxed. “I'm pleased to meet you, Mrs. Potter,” he said, taking it.

“Oh please, do call me Effie.”

He wouldn’t, but nodded anyway. “You, ehm… have a wonderful house... spectacular garden.”

“The garden’s not my doing I’m afraid,” Mrs. Potter said wistfully. “That’s all Monty. I’ve the brown thumb in the family, but James has told us a lot about you, Remus. He’s been oh so eagerly awaiting your arrival…” She cast her eyes back out across the lawn, where James was still busy grinding Sirius’ face into the dirt. “Though now he seems a bit distracted.”

Remus laughed nervously. “Party my fault I think. I hope you don’t mind, but I brought a spare.”

“Oh, not at all.” Mrs. Potter squinted at the pair. Then she huffed good-naturedly and raised her chin to shout; “James Fleamont Potter, if you know what’s good for you then you’ll release that poor boy at once—!”

Spurned by his mother’s words, James gave Sirius’ back one more shove for good measure before at last rolling off him. He was laughing now—Sirius too—and when they stood up they slung an arm over the other’s shoulder, grinning as they made their way back back up to the front door.

“I think you knocked a tooth loose,” Remus heard Sirius say.

“You sure it wasn’t something in your brain?” James replied.

More laughter, and Mrs. Potter’s eyes shot wide as she finally realised who it was.

“Is that—it can’t be,” she gasped; “Mr. Sirius Black!”

Sirius looked up, and his face was instantly aglow with joy.

“Hi, Mum!” He cried, and Mrs. Potter opened her arms wide, letting him run to her and scooping him up in a hug so fierce it nearly pulled him off his own feet.

“It’s been so long, dear!” She cheered, squeezing him tightly. “James didn’t tell us you’d be coming!”

“Yeah well, James didn’t know!” James shot, stopping next to Remus on the doorstep.

“Ah, no matter, you’re both here!” Mrs. Potter smiled, releasing Sirius and patting Remus on the shoulder. The gesture was friendly but Remus still baulked a bit. At least she hadn’t tried to hug him too.

“Come in then,” she insisted; “I’ve got lunch ready and Monty’s just out in the back garden reading the paper.” Still grinned ear-to-ear, Mrs. Potter flitted back inside, and Remus heard her holler across the house; “MONTY—the boys are here!”

“The boys?!”

“Yes! Ring the Pettigrews, let Peterbird know they’ve arrived! And put out the lemonade! They’re probably parched, the poor dears.”

“I think she’s happy to see you,” James said, taking Sirius’ guitar from him.

“Not as happy as I am to see her,” Sirius said, with a subtle wink in Remus’ direction.

Letting James take the backpack from him too, Remus followed his friends inside, taking off his shoes in the entryway. A long hallway extended the length of the house, emptying out into what appeared to be a salon and fine dining room. Around the rich artwork, which ranged from impressionist paintings to clay statues and carven wooden figurines, rows and rows of photographs hung on every wall, each of them filled with happy memories from James’ childhood.

“Look at the handsome tyke,” Sirius razzed, pointing out a photo of a much chubbier-looking James in a baby bonnet.

“I’d like to see some of your baby photos,” James scoffed. “That hair and nose? You probably looked like a rat.”

“Au contraire, I was a very handsome baby. In fact, it was the only time my mother ever bothered to show me off. Apparently it all went downhill the moment I learned how to talk.”

“That I believe.” James paused to look Sirius up and down. “By the way, what are you wearing?”

Sirius glanced down at his ill-fitting outfit. He still had his arse-clinging jeans on, but his shirt was about three-sizes too long for his torso and combined with the oversized leather jacket he was absolutely swimming in fabric.

“What, don’t like my new look, Prongs?” He sniffed haughtily.

“Didn’t say that, it’s just different s’all.”

“Shirt’s mine,” Remus professed, much to Sirius’ apparent displeasure.

James peered on him, before looking back to Sirius and lifting the edge of his jacket sceptically. “Why’re you wearing Moony’s clothes—and how did you even get here?!”

At that, Sirius and Remus exchanged another glance.

“It’s… a long story,” Sirius said.

“Well,” James started, looking more tense than he had a moment ago, “you can tell me over lunch, I s’pose. Mum made kheer—it’s like a rice pudding. And a trifle too.”

“Ugh,” Sirius moaned happily, almost as though the very mention of dessert had soothed all of his troubles; “Prongs, your mum wouldn’t happen to be single, would she?”

* * *

Remus’ earlier assessment of Potter Cottage turned out exactly right—it was warm. The interior of the home was just as grand as its out, and every room felt rich with character. The mahogany floors of each hallway were swathed in vibrant rugs and lush plants sat in every corner. The furniture was all of quality—solid wood that looked as though it’d been carved by only the finest artisans. Eager to get his friends settled in, James showed them around to each room on the ground floor, including the salon, where the family kept their shrine. It sat in its own corner of the room, a large table covered in a silk cloth and decorated with images of deities, fresh flowers, incense dishes, and other silver and brass instruments meant for prayer.

“This is where Mum and Dad conduct Aarti,” James said. “It’s worship—sort of like communion but we can do it at home. They sent me to Hawkings for the education, but we’re technically Hindu.”

“Nothing technical about it,” Mr. Potter called, drifting into the salon with his hands held lazily behind his back. There was no way to not mistake him for James' dad; they looked almost identical, from the wild thatch of black hair on their heads down to the dimples on their cheeks. The only differences at all were the thick streaks of silver lacing through Mr. Potter's hair and the square tortoise shell glasses he wore.

"James is right," Mr. Potter continued, "we sent him to a British school to receive a British education, but he is still a good Gujarati boy. Most of the time, anyway. Just don't tell your mother about the rest." Mr. Potter winked, and James and Sirius shared a small snigger.

"Sirius," he called after, fondly extending his arms, "it is so good to see you, my boy."

Sirius didn't hesitate; he rushed Mr. Potter with all of the same enthusiasm as he did his wife and let himself be held.

"It's good to see you too, Pops."

"James here was getting desperate. Couldn't very well sit still these past few weeks. I think perhaps he thought you'd forgotten him. Replaced him with a newer model."

"Dad," James moaned.

"Never," Sirius promised, pulling away and letting Mr. Potter ruffle his hair. Then he turned to Remus and held out a hand.

"Remus, I presume?"

Remus nodded and took the hand, only to be pulled into a great bear-hug of an embrace. He didn't fight it, but when Mr. Potter released him with a hearty laugh, he couldn't help the nervous chitter that followed. "It's nice to meet you, sir..."

" 'Sir' was my father, call me Monty," Mr. Potter said, waving him off kindly before clapping his hands together. "So, boys, what are your plans for evening? I've got the nets set up in the back garden. How 'bout we have a friendly game of—"

"Monty!" Mrs. Potter clipped from the salon's doorway; "Didn't I tell you to set out the lemonade?"

"Yes, yes, dear. Be right over." As his wife turned to leave Mr. Potter leaned over to Remus and murmured; "Scary, that one. But she does make the most wonderful suppers."

While his parents set to preparing the table for lunch, James led them on a tour of the back garden, which did indeed boast a near full-size football pitch along with a large oak cradling a treehouse that appeared bigger than some flats Remus had been to in the East End. On the door was a small sign bearing the words 'James' Place – only smiles allowed'. Along with the vast field and heavy oak, Mr. Potter kept an immaculate lawn, which he decorated with various fruit trees and a porch big enough to entertain dozens of people.

After the backyard, they finally ventured up to the second floor, where James showed off his father's office, which doubled as a library, Mrs. Potter's studio (she was on leave of work for the summer), and several impressive guest rooms. Each was large enough to house a king-size bed and every door seemed to open up to a room more lively and large than that before it.

"We have family come and stay with us lots," James said, after showing them the third bathroom. "You'd love my cousin Ajay, he's got great taste in music, but he's living in Boston right now. Going to Harvard."

"Hey, you still got that picture of Farrah Fawcett pinned to the ceiling over your bed?" Asked Sirius.

"It's a movie poster!"

"Yeah. Of her tits."

"Now why would that be hanging over your bed, Prongs?" Remus added with a smirk.

Rolling his eyes, James led them down the hall to his own bedroom, which was easily four times the size of their dorm room Hawkings. Every wall was plastered with photographs, Arsenal team banners, and posters showcasing his favourite bands. The second-hand guitar he'd received that same summer was leaning proudly up against his desk, and above that hung the framed Kink's album Something Else, which was amazingly signed by the entire band. Mr. Potter had picked it up at auction a few Christmases ago and Remus had been infinitely jealous when he'd heard about it, but James never took the thing off the wall even to bring it to school, too worried it'd get ruined.

"Mum says you guys can take whatever guest room you'd like," James said, sitting on his bed. “Pete’s gonna stay over too so it’ll be just like school. You are staying, right?”

Remus nodded. “Giles gave me a week or so.”

“And you?” James looked to Sirius sternly. “You gonna tell me what’s been going on—why I haven’t heard from you all summer and then you just suddenly turn up on my doorstep with Moony?”

Sirius rubbed the back of his neck like Remus did when he was feeling guilty. “I’d rather wait until Pete gets here. Don’t really want to go over it twice…”

James looked like he wanted to argue, but in the end he only nodded in agreement. “You’re okay though?”

Sirius chanced a glance at Remus. “Yeah, m’okay.”

Staring at his best friend a moment longer, James eventually turned his gaze on Remus, who smiled comfortingly. He looked down, but just then Mrs. Potter’s voice carried up to them from the ground floor; “Boys, lunch! And Peterbird’s here!”

“ ‘Peterbird’?” Sirius echoed wryly.

“Don’t you say anything,” James groaned. “Mum’s been calling him it forever, but I know he hates it.”

“Heh—couldn’t imagine why.”

Shaking his head, James jumped up from the bed and slid his arm around Sirius’ shoulders. “C’mon then,” he said, “let’s eat.”

After Peter had had his turn to sputter and gape at Sirius’ arrival, they took lunch under one of the apple trees in the backyard, laying out a blanket and sitting around one another as the summer breeze tousled their hair. Peter staunchly remained in the shade, still nursing a terrible sunburn he’d gotten on holiday, and Sirius restrained himself and only teased him for the nickname twice.

While they’d been setting up, Remus had caught Mrs. Potter staring at them while she set the porch table for herself and Mr. Potter. It took him a while to realise that she was in fact staring at Sirius; the look on her face simultaneously worried and baffled, as though she were simply waiting for him to disappear in front of her eyes. It was obvious that she knew something was wrong—maybe that was just what it meant to be a mother—but she always held her tongue, pinching Sirius' cheeks every time he turned to her. On the other hand, Mr. Potter didn't seem all that interested in prying. Out of all of them, Peter was the least subtle. He eyed Sirius' clothes and general lack of belongings like the whole thing were a puzzle he'd yet to solve, and when Sirius brought Andy's guitar out he couldn't help but blurt;

"I thought Moony had the guitar?"

"I did," Remus surmised automatically, "but it's Sirius' guitar."

"So he was with you then?" Peter asked, not missing a beat.

Thankfully, it was Sirius who answered; "I called Moony a little while ago," he said. "He helped me out, made sure I could get here."

"Why didn't you call me first?" James demanded. "No offence, Moony."

Remus waved him off, picking at one of Mrs. Potter's homemade sausage rolls.

"I couldn't remember the number for the summer house," Sirius said. It was a lie, Remus knew. Sirius didn't forget things easily, especially not his best friend's phone number. James however, didn't seem to make the connection. He slumped back on his spot on the blanket and glared down at his lemonade grudgingly.

"So… what happened then?"

Strumming gently on the guitar, Sirius sucked on his lower lip. "Got disowned."

"Your parents threw you out?!" Peter gasped, with as little bedside manner as usual.

"Not exactly. They sent me away. To this school… in Belgium."

James and Peter's reactions were not all that different from how Remus' own had been. Their jaws dropped and they looked around, blinking as though they were waiting for each other to make sense of it.

"B-B-BELGIUM?!" Peter ended up sputtering. "What the bloody hell were you doing there?!"

"Like I said, it was a school," Sirius continued. "Got sent there for 'bad behaviour', but I managed to break out and hop a train into France.

"France?!" James cursed. "You mean you just casually hitchhiked through two countries?!"

"Not really. After the train I caught a ferry to Dover, and then Moony picked me up. Been staying at his place ever since."

"For how long?" Asked Peter.

"A… few days."

"A few DAYS?!" James shouted, before turning on Remus. "You had a few days with him and you couldn't be bothered to pick up the phone and let us know? You knew he was okay and you didn't say anything?!"

"I told him not to, Prongs!" Sirius insisted. "I didn't want to ruin your guys' holiday."

"Holiday-schmoliday! I thought you were dead—or—or at least in trouble!"

"He was in trouble, haven't you been listening?" Remus lashed, suddenly more annoyed. "They tried to disown him and then sent him out of the bloody country! You were in Devon—what was he supposed to do?!"

"Moony," Sirius said, placing a hand on Remus' thigh; "it's okay. They didn't know."

"Everything alright, boys?" Mr. Potter called. He and his wife were sitting across the lawn on the patio, but James had certainly been yelling loud enough for them to hear. The sudden attention made Remus spring upright, and gently nudge Sirius' hand from his leg.

"Yeah, Dad, everything's fine," James called before huffing and turning back to the pair of them. "This is fucking mental," he said in a low voice; "You know this is fucking mental, right?"

"Yeah," Remus and Sirius said together.

"Great, now that we're all on the same page… You're gonna to tell us what it is we 'don't know'?" Still glaring at them, James snatched up a roll and bit into it fiercely, as though his mother's home cooking could calm him.

Sirius shifted uncomfortably on the blanket before setting the guitar beside himself. “I’m not going back to school.”

“Not going back?” Peter echoed, perhaps his millionth question since the entire conversation started. “Why, ‘cause you were disowned?”

Sirius nodded.

“Couldn’t you ask your parents to take you back—convince them to change their minds? Maybe if you say you’re sorry, they’ll take you back.”

“Of course he’s not gonna say sorry!” Remus snapped. “Don’t you know what they’ve done to him? They’re monsters—how could you even think that, Pete?”

“Well, at least then he could go back with us,” Peter said sorely. “School’s almost starting anyway—he won’t even have to see them soon!”

“You mean you’d actually support him going back there? Just like they want? What the fuck, Peter?!”

“Okay,” James started, throwing his arms out, “so going back home isn’t an option then, but you can’t just drop out!”

“I can’t access Alphard’s inheritance until at least November,” Sirius said, “that’s too late for tuition.”

“I bet you could talk to McGonagall,” Peter reasoned. “Get a payment plan or something. Maybe she could make you a scholarship student—like Lily!”

Sirius scoffed sarcastically; “If by some miracle, McGonagall agreed to let me come back without any incentive, she’d still have to tell my parents.”

“Why don’t we just pay your tuition?” James said.

Instantly Sirius turned stony. “No. No way.”

“Why not? Any one of us has the money, we just gotta ask our parents. You can stay here too—until school starts. My parents won’t mind, they love you.”

Sirius’ grip tightened on the neck of the guitar. This was the conversation Remus knew he’d been dreading the most—and Remus had been dreading it because just like James, he couldn't understand why Sirius wouldn't accept the help he was definitely owed.

"I love them too," Sirius said, "but I still can't accept."

James smacked a hand down defiantly. "You're telling me that after a decade of friendship and enough bullshit to sink the bloody Titanic, you can't accept a bit of money to come back to school with us?"

"It's not just the money," Sirius said stubbornly. "If you tell your parents what happened they'd have to tell somebody and then I might get sent back."

Sticking his hand into his lemonade, Peter brought an ice cube up to cool his sunburned forehead. "I thought you said you were disowned? Why would they even want you back?"

"Watch the tone, Pete," Remus snapped.

"I didn't mean it like that!"

Sirius scratched his head. "I guess I don't know for sure if I've been disowned, but I'm also not really looking to find out. I just need to get by until I'm eighteen and then I'll never have to worry about it again. Moony's right, I won't go back to them."

"Then come back to school—with us!" James pushed. "My parents aren't just gonna let you walk back into that place, not if you explain everything! I'm sure there's something my dad could do legally, and then it wouldn't matter what your raving mother has to say."

"And what would I tell them? Your parents?"

"The truth! Tell them they sent you fucking Belgium."

"It's just a school. It'd be like Moony's dad sending him to Hawkings—nothing against the law there."

"Tell them you've been mistreated then," Peter supplied. "I mean you have been, haven't you?"

"It'd just be my word against theirs," Sirius said. "And they've got the influence, while I've got no proof."

"Yes, you do."

The words had come out before Remus could stop them, but he didn't regret them—not even when Sirius' sighed and dropped his head.

"You have your scars," Remus said firmly, grabbing Sirius by the shoulder and forcing him to look at him. "You could start telling people what happened. Show them. It's proof."

"They're six years old, no one's gonna care."

"But they might if you tell them your parents forcibly sent you out of the country to an institution that tried to cut your hair and beat you when you wouldn't let them!"

Sirius scowled bitterly, like he'd been betrayed, but Remus didn't have it in him to worry about it. He wanted Sirius to come back to school just as badly as the others did, and if he had to play bad cop to do it, he would.

"They really tried to cut your hair?" James asked.

"Yeah, and then they ripped it out," Remus answered for him, while Sirius just glared.

"Show us your hair, Sirius," James said firmly.

Huffing, Sirius broke away from their staring contest just long enough to reach up and rip the elastic from his hair. After a bit more finessing, the braid he'd been sporting for several weeks fell apart around his fingers. For a long time he didn't move, staring at the gingham picnic blanket. It was obvious he was reluctant to put his pain on display, but it was too important to back out now.

Willing to be brave enough for the both of them, Remus reached over and took Sirius' arm, squeezing it comfortingly. "Hey, it's just us," he murmured.

Sirius eyed him, but with a final sigh, eventually turned around on the blanket. James and Peter were on their knees a second later, leaning in to get a good look at the bald patch at the very base of his skull. After three weeks the hair had grown back sparsely, but at least the skin didn't look raw anymore.

"Oh Sirius, mate," James whispered, "you gotta come back with us. You gotta tell my parents."

"I didn't even want to tell you," Sirius grumbled, turning around again.

“I know,” James said, the pain clear in his voice, “but we’re thankful you did.” He reached over and took both of Sirius’ hands in his own. It was an intimate thing, but Remus wasn’t a bit jealous. He loved James too.

“Everything’s gonna be okay,” James promised. “Screw school, then. There doesn’t have to be a timeline—no expectations. We’ll figure everything else out as we go.”

Pressing his lips together, Sirius squeezed James’ hands back. Then they smiled at one another, brothers in all but name, and it was enough. Sirius simply took up his guitar and James settled back into his spot on the blanket, renewed and the same all at once.

“If it’s what you want, then I’ll talk to them,” Sirius murmured, setting his fingers to the cords.

James nodded. “Thank you, Sirius.”

Remus didn't say anything; he didn't need to. He and Sirius had their own ways of talking to each other, but James and Sirius were a beast of their own nature. Only James could get through to Sirius that way. Remus tried to tell himself that it was normal to be jealous. He just wished he could see Tomny, or at least stop missing him.

While the rest of them continued to eat their lunch in relative peace, Sirius began to play. It was Remus’ song, the one they’d practised in the park. Remus could hear all the words in his head.

When those two kids found each other,
Heaven opened up and cried,
Dear lovely children, come to me;

And so our Johnny found his lover,
He felt a light that they couldn’t see,
He prayed away the heartache on his knees;

The Mary-Anne her mother once knew,
Never left her childhood street,
Instead she found her answers in her dreams;

Head held high, never cry,
Our lady's love is nigh;
Hear our Lady of Conceptual Hope's sad lullaby…

"What's that tune?" James asked, over another mouthful of sausage and chutney.

"Moony's new song."

"It's a work in progress—show you later," Remus said, before anyone could ask him to start singing.

"Glad to see you've been doing some homework," Peter said wryly. "But are there any more surprises we should know about? Like, neither of you are suddenly getting hitched, right?"

"No, Wormtail," Sirius smiled; "Though I wouldn't put it past Prongs and Evans."

"Oh, I dunno. That probably depends on how Lily's going to take the news of James and Farrah Fawcett," Remus sniggered.

"You're all wankers," James said, already moved on to the trifle.

* * *

To no one's surprise, it turned out to be much harder for Sirius to get the words out in front of Mr. and Mrs. Potter. He and James waited until that evening when all of them were sitting around the table and playing cards. Mr. Potter had already kicked their arses at whist and they'd just moved onto blackjack when Mrs. Potter had strolled into the dining room with drinks for all of them. They'd been having so much fun together that Remus had almost forgot the biggest purpose for their visit, but Euphemia kindly reminded him when she asked the fatal question:

"So, are you boys excited to return to school?"

Immediately, all four of them exchanged a look, but thankfully it was James who spoke first.

"Mum, there's something we have to tell you."

Their eyes connected—kind eyes—and just like that, the entire mood shifted. James hadn't needed to say anything else, it was an automatic. Just the faintest look and all that was left was… poor dears.

Under the table, Remus gave Sirius' hand a squeeze.

While the rest of them retired to the parlour for evening tea, Mrs. Potter took Sirius into the study to talk. Remus sat back with Peter while Mr. Potter prayed at the shrine—James joined him, though he looked much more sombre—and as Mr. Potter was ringing his bell, he sent up a silent prayer of his own, to no one in particular.

Whoever might be listening, please just let this work out. I don't think I could let him go.

When the Aarti ceremony was over, they tried watching the telly. A game was on, Arsenal vs. Newcastle United, but not even James could pay attention. While his father sat back in his armchair and smoked a pipe, James paced the room, peppering him with reasons why Sirius couldn't be sent back until he sounded downright whiny.

"You don't get it, Dad—they're evil! They hate everything and force him to obey every single stupid rule, and even when he does he's punished! I know they made sure he couldn't contact us for help! They wanted him to feel alone!"

"Your mother is talking to Sirius right now," Mr. Potter said, the picture of calm. "We can't jump to any conclusions. Afterwards, we'll figure out how to contact his parents."

"NO!" James shouted. "You can't call his parents! If you do, that witch'll show up and drag him out by his hair just like last time!"

"It won't be like last time, beta, " Monty assured him.

"But you saw his hair, didn't you, Dad? They mutilated him! And there's bruises all along his neck like he's been strangled!"

Remus bit down on the edge of his teacup. He wasn't sure it would help very much if he told James that the bruises were actually from the three weeks he and Sirius had spent snogging from dawn till dusk.

Mr. Potter tapped his pipe out on an ashtray. "Your mother will know what to do, James. Give them time."

Bitterly throwing himself back into the sofa, James crossed his arms and sulked. Peter ended up offering him a mint from the bowl on the coffee table but he just shook his head, glaring at the television. Remus understood how he felt perfectly; it wasn't fair. Finding Sirius at that Devon port made him more sure than ever that if he returned to Bath they'd never see him again. Even if Sirius eventually decided that he wasn't interested in bringing their summer fling back to school with them, it didn't matter. Sirius was his friend before anything else, and if it came down to leaving him behind while the rest of them returned to Hawkings, then Remus was sure they'd smuggle him in first.

Halfway into the match, with Arsenal leading 3 to 1, Sirius emerged from the study looking tired and grim.

"She wants to talk to you, Mr. Potter," Sirius said, though he'd never called Fleamont anything other than 'Monty' or 'pops'.

Mr. Potter stood up from his chair and moved past Sirius into the hall, pausing only to set a reassuring hand on his shoulder.

"Chin up, son," he told him, and Sirius gave a half-hearted shrug. After Mr. Potter had gone, Sirius slumped down on the sofa next to Remus, who had to restrain himself from reaching out and taking his hand.

"What'd you tell her? What'd she say?" James demanded straight away.

"She's gonna call my mum," Sirius murmured lifelessly.

"No! Didn't you show her everything, and tell her about Belgium and —and how you got your scars?"

" 'Course I did," Sirius snapped, "but what's it matter? I'm just a stupid kid who can't do anything on their own."

James was on his feet in a second. "Fine then. I'll just go talk to them."

"James, no," Sirius said, reaching out and taking his arm, "I'm not gonna argue with your parents."

"Then let me argue for you!"

"Look, I know you mean well but they're your parents."

“And they should be yours too!” James huffed, nearly whimpering. “No one deserves parents like that or a family who hates itself so much.”

“He’s right, Sirius,” Remus said. Sirius turned on him, giving him an incredulous look that said ‘who are you to talk?’ He knew that were they alone, Sirius would’ve said as much aloud, but Remus didn’t care. “It’s okay to ask for help," he told him. "You asked for mine, right?”

Sirius sagged, and his hand on James’ arm slid free, letting James march down the hall toward the study.

“Don’t you want to stay?” Peter asked from his own couch. “James wants you to stay. We all do.”

Sirius smiled sadly. “I know, mate.”

“We could be a real band if you did. We’ve been practising, right, Moony?”

“Yup.” Remus gave Sirius a sideways glance. “It’d be a shame if you gave up on us now.”

Sighing, Sirius set a hand on Remus’ knee, squeezing it tightly, and this time Remus did not pull away. To anyone else it might have looked like a friendly gesture, but he understood. It was as close as they would ever get to be in front of others.

Neither James or his parents emerged from the study for a long time. Because he could be kind sometimes, Sirius distracted Peter with talk about his new drum kit. All too eager to be the centre of attention for even a moment, Peter began rattling off the kit’s specs and everything he’d managed to play half-decently since school had gotten out. Sirius listened with his entire body—recognising Peter’s worth and giving him the consideration he deserved in that subconscious way of his. It was one of the things Remus admired most about him. He wanted so badly to kiss him.

When James finally returned he was fuming. He marched back into the salon with his fists clenched and threw himself down on the sofa next to Peter.

“How’d it go?” Sirius asked cautiously.

“Fucking terrible,” James growled. “They keep saying they have to notify your parents otherwise they could be charged for kidnapping since you're still a minor—can you believe that? Bloody kidnapping?!"

"That can't happen!" Sirius gaped, surely horrified by the idea that the two adults he admired most in the world could be punished for his indiscretions.

"I agree, so change of plans—we're gonna kidnap you!"

"What?" Peter chirped.

"Yeah, it's our backup plan! We just need to hide you until school starts. We can go somewhere and hide until the first, and then we'll take the train north and sneak you into school. At least there we'll have plenty of time to figure out what we're going to do."

"That's such shite, where would we even go?" Sirius asked scornfully.

"Moony's maybe?"

Remus bit his lip. Hiding Sirius was one thing, but keeping four Marauders?

"We can't go to Moony's," Sirius cut-in; "His dad's no better—no offence."

Remus did not feel offended.

"What about the tree house?" Peter suggested.

"You mean in the backyard?"

"Oh yeah!" James gasped. "It's brilliant! No one ever uses it anymore, Dad can't even get up the ladder most days because of his knees! We could bring you food at night, it's genius!"

"Okay sure," Sirius scoffed, "but what'll you tell your parents? They're gonna ask where I went."

"We'll tell them whatever—tell them you ran off because they refused to help! Maybe then they'll feel guilty enough to actually do something."

"No, this is insane," Sirius said, "I'm not going to lie to everyone and hide out in your bloody treehouse just so your parents'll feel guilty!"

"Would you rather go home? Because that's exactly what's gonna happen if they call her and your mum shows up on our doorstep!"

“You could call Andy,” Remus suggested, making Sirius glare at him again.

“No—”

“Yes!” James agreed. “Andy—that’s brilliant!”

‘Stop saying everything’s brilliant!” Sirius lashed. “I’m not gonna risk getting Andy in trouble just so I can avoid my parents—her they’ll actually sue! You don't know how they are with family.”

“But she said to call her if you needed anything,” Remus interjected. “And I think this qualifies as needing something.”

“You talked to her then?” Peter asked.

“Not just talked—we ran into her and Ted this morning.”

Sirius punched him in the shoulder. “Stop spilling all my secrets!”

“You saw her?!” James practically shrieked. “You mean you actually saw her in person and you didn’t say anything?”

“Been a bit distracted, in case you haven’t noticed, Prongs. Besides, she doesn’t need to worry herself over some fight between me and my parents.”

“ ‘Some fight’? Ugh!” James smacked a sofa cushion in frustration. “I swear to god, you’re never dramatic when we need you to be!”

“It’ll be alright,” Sirius insisted again. “I’ll find a job or something to tide me over until November. It’s just two months!”

“You sound like you’ve already given up,” Remus hissed. “Don’t you want to come back with us?”

“Of course I do, but it’s not that easy! I need a guardian’s signature just to get back onto school grounds, so the money’s obviously not our only issue here!”

“We can forge the signature!” James cried. “Pete can!”

“I can!”

“And what if my mum shows up at school—what then?” Sirius demanded.

“Well… we—we could…” James rubbed at the back of his neck sorely. He glanced at Peter desperately, but apparently neither of them had considered that Sirius might not want to return to Hawkings because that’s exactly the place his parents expected him to be.

“I’ll take the train with you,” Sirius started, more softly now, “but you have to let me figure the rest out. It’s not as scary as you think it is.”

Remus wanted to correct him, of course it was scary, but he couldn’t.

If I stopped worrying about every threat my mum spat out, I’d never feel brave again. Sirius had told him that once. And though it’d been before everything, Sirius still found it within himself to be brave now. Remus supposed he owed it to him to be brave too.

“Okay,” he said, making Sirius look at him, “we’ll do whatever you want, Sirius. Just don’t ask us to let you go. We need you.” I need you. “We… need our Padfoot.”

Smiling sadly, Sirius nodded. Then he reached down and took Remus’ hand, making his heart jump until he reached out the other to James. James took it without hesitation and extended the same to Peter before forcing his face into that friendly James Potter smile.

“We’ll figure this out,” he promised.

Sirius nodded again, more firm this time, but just then a door slammed open down the hall, rattling every photo frame on the wall. A few seconds later, Euphemia Potter burst into the parlour, waving her hands frantically while her husband brought up the rear.

“I cannot believe it!” She seethed. “Oooooh that WOMAN! I swear I’ll—”

Mrs. Potter launched into a series of expletives only James and Mr. Potter understood while waving her hands about furiously. Her loyal husband followed her about the salon, wincing and trying his best to calm her.

“C’mon now, Effie,” Monty said, “let’s not do this in front of the boys.”

Undeterred by the obvious show of rage, James jumped to his feet, looking delighted. “So how’d the call go, Mum?”

“That—THAT—WITCH!” Mrs. Potter let out another frustrated wail while her fists trembled at her sides. “How could she say such—and about her own—!" Stopping short, Mrs. Potter took a deep breath and passed right by her son, instead stepping up to Remus and Sirius' sofa. Remus couldn't decide if she looked like she were going to scream or burst into tears, but then it didn't matter anymore. Mrs. Potter had already knelt before Sirius on the rug and clasped his hand in her own, making the bangles at her wrist twinkle.

"Sirius," she started, "would you like to stay here for the rest of the summer?"

Sirius' eyes turned to dark saucers.

"Well, I-I—"

"I know it's only a few short days until your term starts," Mrs. Potter rambled, "but I want you to know you are welcome here, beta, and that you may stay however long you wish."

It was possibly the first and only time Remus had seen Sirius without words. When several more seconds had passed and Sirius still had not said anything, he nudged him pointedly. Sirius blinked as if his entire body were resetting, and then coughed, turning red all over.

"I…"

"You don't have to, of course," Mrs. Potter continued, "but if you'd like to, I want you to stay with us. From tomorrow until forever, if need be."

It wasn't a question, not even a suggestion. She wanted him. It was crystal clear then how Sirius had become so taken with the family, despite only ever having visited the one time. The Potters did not wait for you to want them in return, they simply expelled their love, and waited for you to collect it. And Sirius, who so desperately craved being wanted, could not deny them.

"Yes," Sirius said, voice small like a child, "yes, I would like to stay… ma'am."

And just like that, Mrs. Potter straightened up, a relieved smile on her face. "Wonderful! I'll call the school in the morning and we can get everything sorted! We'll have to get you some new clothes, and all of your school things, of course, but we haven't started that for James either so we'll just do it all together!" She prattled, stopping just long enough to place a kiss on either of Sirius' cheeks. "For now I think I'm going to start clearing out the spare bedroom right next to James' room. We thought to put you up further down the hall since Monty's been using it for storage and lord knows he hasn't cleaned up in there in months, but that just won't do, will it? Hmm, yes, I quite thought so! But until then, you boys just relax, okay? Oh-kay!"

Stopping to kiss Sirius once more, Euphemia Potter smoothed back her dark hair and promptly strode back into the hall towards the staircase, humming in a tight voice as she went. James looked to his father, mouth still agape.

"Dad…? What happened over the phone?"

"Let's just say the call did not go how she expected," Monty surmised, before reaching over and patting Sirius on the shoulder again. "Like Effie said, you're welcome here, son. For now or for forever, there will always be room for you here."

Sirius looked on the verge of tears. "Thank you, Mr. Potter."

Smiling, Monty tucked the end of his pipe into his mouth. "Oh, so now it's 'Mr. Potter', Sirius?"

Sirius cracked a bashful smile. "I mean, thanks, pops."

Chuckling now, Monty pat Sirius on the shoulder. "Welcome home, beta." He nodded at each of the boys and then set off after his wife, humming more gently than she had as he ascended the staircase. Watching him go, Remus now fully understood just how James had come to be James Potter.

"So, Sirius?" James started. "Whatchu you thinking?"

"I think I have the best friends in the world," Sirius grinned. "And that I don't half bloody deserve 'em."

"I think you just have great luck," Peter said sarcastically, making Sirius sniff happily, before jumping up from the sofa to catch him in a headlock.

"Oh, how I love you, Wormy!" Sirius declared, grinding his knuckles over the shorter boy's head while he wailed. Remus laughed at both of them, but he was inclined to agree, and as he leaned his head back on the sofa and watched his friends, it occurred to him that maybe his own luck wasn't all that bad either.

Chapter End Notes

'Plonk' is slang for very cheap wine, so 'plonk change' would mean very cheap.
'Aggro' is slang for deliberately aggressive or provoking.
'Roundhouse' and 'Dingwalls' are both live music venues near Camden Lock.
The 'chokey' is slang for prison.
A 'pram' is a baby stroller.
'Trifle' is a dessert. It's like the fucking best.
'Beta' is an Indian pet name meaning something like 'son' or 'baby'. (Thank you to mendokayalways for the correction ^^)

Dw, summer's not over yet for these boys! See you next week :^)

Chapter 70: If Wishes Were Horses...

Chapter Summary

Remus wishes... and he wishes... and he wishes...

Chapter Notes

C/W: Smoking, illicit drugs & a bad trip (LSD), allusions to mental illness (Remus/Hope), homophobic language (internal monologue), and severe internalized homophobia—mostly triggered by an internal event. There are NO hate crimes or the like.

But I repeat, this chapter goes HEAVILY into Remus' subconscious. Remus experiences a BAD TRIP. If you are at all sensitive to drugs or internalized struggles or don't care to see the development of this PARTICULAR queer identity from the ground up then perhaps this fic isn't for you. (And that's okay.) This struggle (drugs/his sexuality) will not follow Remus in the same way forever, but it will be something he contends with for much of his life. This aside, struggling with your own internalized guilt/ prejudices doesn't mean that you are hopeless and/or incapable of honest love. I hope you'll understand that I'm trying to portray the story in a way I feel is honest to myself and the characters I've built, and that this is a transformative chapter. Transformation isn't always nice or easy. Peace and love <3

A/N: I got a msg recently regarding whether the 'Alice' (Simeon's friend) from chapter 24 'Come Together' is Alice Longbottom, and just so it's clear—NO, she is NOT the same character. She just happens to share the same name, which in hindsight, I can see as confusing. Just note that unless 'Alice' is explicably stated as being 'Alice LONGBOTTOM' (as in, we haven't met her in story—YET, lol) then assume she is another background OC. Thank you xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Holy Moses, I have been removed,
I have seen the spectre, he has been here, too;
Distant cousin from down the line,
Brand of people who ain't my kind;
Holy Moses, I have been removed…

- “Border Song” Elton John, 1970

The time they spent at the Potters was short but soothing, and when two days had passed and Walburga Black hadn’t shown up on the doorstep breathing fire and screaming blue murder, Sirius was finally able to relax some. This meant that his friends were able to relax, and eventually the gentle lull of the house had soothed all of them. Every evening when Mr. Potter arrived home from work, they played football in the back garden while Mrs. Potter took photos or busied herself by hanging laundry on the line. The house was considerably busy, since Peter had elected to stay over as well and Mrs. Potter was working from home at the moment, but Remus was used to sneaking around. In front of others, he and Sirius were as normal as they’d ever been. It was only when they were alone that things became different.

They learned quickly how to recognise the patterns of their fellow inhabitants so that they could steal away for those precious few cheeky or otherwise chaste moments. Everyday around eleven o’clock, Peter would lose himself in some day-time comedy show and James would phone Lily. This guaranteed them at least a half an hour, which they never wasted. The minute their friends were securely distracted, Remus would meet Sirius somewhere they could be alone; in their bedrooms, but also behind the garden shed, or in the upstairs bathroom, or even the hallway broom cupboard where that hoover had fallen over onto Remus’ ankle and left him limping for the rest of the day. It was a bit thrilling, but also entirely terrifying… and whenever Sirius turned those wicked eyes on him, Remus could not bring himself to resist.

The days were good, and Remus was enjoying himself, but he couldn’t deny that the in-between moments—like his dreaded shit-all hour—felt slightly Spartan. He’d always had a tendency to drift off into thought; when he was twelve a teacher had even given him the strap for day-dreaming through an entire test, but something about the soft, ambience of Potter Cottage brought out the worst of it. The summer air wafted through open windows, shifting the sheer curtains of every room like merry ghosts. Perhaps that was one of the reasons why James was so James; even his ghosts were happy.

The daydreaming didn’t always prove an inconvenience, but more than once it’d unearthed a memory Remus hadn’t even known he’d had. These mostly materialised in the tiny moments, like watching Mr. Potter read his morning newspaper. He bobbed his foot while he did so, and every so often the soft flapping of paper flutter would fill the air as he tapped the pages straight on his thigh. Remus almost always thought of Giles, but occasionally an echo of Lyall would slip through —of him sorting through document after document at the breakfast table. No meal in front of him, only coffee and that morning's briefs penned by some nameless assistant. How vast the table between had felt then.

'Remus, sit up straight,' the memory went; 'You're a boy, not an animal.'

It was somehow worse with Mrs. Potter; she had a sing-song quality to her voice that was simultaneously comforting and yet all too jarring. Despite her friendly disposition, she was still a mother, and she was constantly going after James for the state of his hair or the perpetual grass stains that were always showing up on his trousers.

"Honestly, I should just cut them off at the knee! Leave you looking like an abnormally tall boy scout!" She grumbled that morning, after striding out of the utility room to shame her son for another pair of ruined slacks.

" 's not meh!" James said over a mouthful of toast. His mother's eyes narrowed and he swallowed very quickly; "Sirius wore those yesterday! Honestly Mum, you'd think he gets dragged around by raging bulls for fun."

"You Judas!" Sirius gasped scandalously. "That's merely the evidence of all the time I spend on my knees."

James just about choked on his fork. "Doing what?!"

"Praying, obviously. Get your mind out of the gutter."

"Ha! Could've fooled me!"

"You calling me a slag? At your mother's breakfast table? Why I oughta…" Looking no less than delighted, Sirius then used the end of his fork to flick a sausage in James' direction. Unfortunately he overshot and it landed in Peter's teacup, making the poor boy shriek as hot tea surged over the sides of his cup.

"There you go, now you've stained the table cloth too!" James cackled.

"It's too damn early for this," Peter moaned, using a fork to scoop the sausage out onto the aforementioned table cloth.

“Oops! Sorry, Pete,” Sirius chittered. “Just think of it as your daily source of protein. Better than anything Potter’s offering up.”

“Eugh!” James howled, absolutely tickled pink.

As Peter began dabbing sorely at his lap, Mrs. Potter tossed the dirtyv tousers up over her shoulder. “Oh, you boys,” she huffed; “What am I to do with you?”

She marched away, leaving them to giggle like they were twelve and not about to be eighteen. Even Peter found it funny after James ‘accidentally’ fumbled the sugar bowl onto Sirius’ eggs, but Remus wasn’t really paying attention. He was off on his own; lost and drifting.

‘Remus, darling, you’ve a hole in your trousers. Did it happen while you were playing outside? Ah well, take them off so Mummy might mend them.’

It was a stupid memory—he didn’t even know if it was real. He couldn’t recall ever having seen Hope Lupin thread a needle. Her hands were always shaking, at least when he’d known her.

Silly, I used to mend your clothes all the time, Hope said into his mind. You were so tiny, nothing ever seemed to fit right. Your father wanted them to be tailored professionally, but how could I let anyone else touch my baby’s clothes? My sweet, sweet baby… My lovely darling boy…

Remus wasn’t sure when the voice had warped into hers. He wasn’t even sure it was her. Every time he thought too hard on it, the idea would come apart and the voice would fall silent, like smoke through his finger tips. He just wished it would all stop.

“So whadda think, Moons?”

Remus looked up. He couldn’t even tell how long he’d been out of it.

“Er… ‘bout what?”

James was picking his teeth with a fingernail. “Croquet. Dad pulled the set outta the garage yesterday. You game?”

“I dunno know how to play.”

“You knock the ball into the hoop,” Sirius said wryly. “Surely you can manage that, sports star?”

And because even Remus could manage that, they spent most of the afternoon in the garden, knocking colourful plastic balls through less colourful plastic hoops. As it happened, Remus found that he wasn't entirely terrible at croquet; he and James won the first two rounds, but then they switched partners and it became quickly apparent that the victories had just been a combination of James' skill and beginner's luck. After lunch Lottie made the trek over, sporting a pretty blue dress and sunhat that was so wide-brimmed she could've fit an elephant beneath it. Her appearance turned their group of four into a group of five, which apparently meant that one of them would have to sit out. Remus tried to volunteer, but in the end it was Peter who grudgingly flopped down on the shaded picnic blanket so his sister could play.

"Don't you have any of your own friends to hang out with?" He grumbled, sitting cross-legged with his cheek pressed into the side of his mallet.

"None who are as mindlessly unoccupied as you four," Lottie answered coolly, adjusting the brim on her ridiculously large sun hat. "Mary's still in Paris, and Marlene and Lily are decidedly unavailable. There's always Bethany, though she's in Croatia visiting family. And Anette's taking a sculpture course in Florence. And Pernilla's in Sweden again, though she just wrote me and—"

"Alright, we get it! Take your shot already."

Lottie crossed her arms. "It's Sirius' turn."

But Sirius wasn't listening. For the last several minutes he'd been creeping closer and closer to Remus on the other side of the hoops, a look of sceptical concern on his face.

"You sure you're okay?" He asked, for perhaps the dozenth time.

"Yes," Remus replied, "just tired."

"Did you not sleep well or something?"

"S'fine. Must just miss my own bed, I guess."

Sirius wiggled both eyebrows. "I miss your bed too."

"Stop," he hushed, just as James thumped his croquet mallet into the lawn to get their attention.

"Black! S'your turn!"

Eager to advance the game, Sirius left Remus and scuttled over. He'd already drawn his sleeves up and promptly knocked his black croquet ball through the second hoop, immediately whooping with glee. As he lined up to take his awarded second shot, James let out a spectacular 'LOOK OUT!' and Sirius flubbed it all, sending the ball sideways several metres to rest by the old oak.

"Whoopsie, must'a been seeing things," James sniggered.

Sirius whipped his head around; "You toff! We're on the same team now!"

"Oh… right."

"So immature," Lottie sighed, shaking her head. "Really, you boys should be more careful. No girl's going to want to marry any of you if you don't grow up some. Like I met this guy recently, and—"

"I knew it!" Peter cried suddenly. "You didn't want to come hang out with us, you just needed someone new to brag to!"

Lottie gasped, offended. "I wasn't bragging! Hmph—honestly Petey, far from me to want to include my own brother in my wedding plans."

Peter clasped both hands over his ears. "I'm not listening—I'm NOT LISTENING!"

"Lot!" Sirius gasped, his jaw practically dragging the dirt; "You mean you're actually engaged?!"

"No way," James said, equal parts aghast.

Lottie twisted an innocent blonde curl around one finger. "Well, I suppose not yet. But it's only a matter of time."

"I didn't even know you were dating someone," Remus said, practically overcome with chills at the idea of being married at seventeen.

"She isn't!" Peter shouted, hands still over his ears. "She's just deluded herself into thinking some guy she's met twice is in love with her!"

"I thought you weren't listening?" Lottie scoffed. She recovered a second later, looking pleased as punch as she dropped her croquet mallet down and lined it up with the yellow ball. "His name is Roger, and I'm going to marry him—even if he doesn't know it yet."

With a fine clatter, Lottie sent her ball whizzing over the grass, right through the third hoop. Sirius whistled and then clapped for her, before leaning casually on the top of his mallet.

“So where’d you meet this prince charming?”

“At Daddy’s office. I was filing some paperwork for him. Almost refused—it’s terribly dreary in there—but the secretary called in and I knew the system so I sort of thought, why not?”

“Sounds like the best ‘why not’ of your life,” James said. “What’s he do for work?”

“Oh I dunno, must be something important. He wore a suit and Daddy just about tripped over himself to shake his hand.”

“Did you actually talk to him at all?” Remus asked.

“Obviously, I’m not a total lunatic. The first time we got to chatting about the business, and other stuff like my nails—he complimented the colour. Then the second time I saw him he brought me the loveliest bouquet of flowers.”

“Which you said he plucked from the vase in the hallway!” Peter bleated.

“Shush. It’s the thought that counts.”

“Wow, Lot,” Sirius mused; “Sounds like you found yourself a real keeper. What’s he look like then? I at least hope he’s fit.”

Peter smacked the picnic blanket with an open palm. “Stop encouraging her!”

“Oh yes,” Lottie grinned, lining up her second shot; “Very fit.” She took the shot, which sailed across the lawn and went straight into the fourth hoop, and celebrated by giving Remus a tight hug around the middle as her teammate. As Remus patted her on the back in congratulations, James just sighed and looked sadly at Sirius’ ball, still adrift beneath the oak tree.

“Next time, I’m her partner.”

Sirius flipped him the bird.

“You should knock Remus out,” Lottie instructed the next round, when Peter had gotten up for his turn.

“Which daft idiot let you in here?” Peter grumbled, before ignoring his sister and trying for the hoop instead. He missed, and huffed vexingly before allowing Remus up to take his shot.

“Yeah, go Moony!” Sirius cried apathetically from the picnic blanket. He was lying down with his sunglasses over his eyes and not even paying attention, but did raise his fist as a show of moral support.

Licking his lips, Remus drew back his mallet and struck the ball. He was aiming for the hoop, but alas, he only managed to clip the edge. Immediately the ball spun wildly off course, knocking Peter’s aside with a mournful thwack!

“Told you,” Lottie said, as Peter groaned.

“Nice clear!” James said from the other side of the hoops.

“Oh! Did he get it in?” Sirius demanded, lifting his head. “Good show!”

“I was aiming for the hoop, honest,” Remus said to Peter, who just waved him on while scowling at Lottie.

“Go on, take your shot, Remus,” Lottie said. He obediently lined up the mallet, trying his best to aim while James, his partner this round, flapped his arms up and down enthusiastically.

“Yeah, you can totally sink it!” He called. “Straight on through the middle—don’t blob it! You want it right offside, yeah?”

“I had sports jargon,” Remus grumbled, drawing the mallet back. He’d just about sent it when another voice called out;

“Might want to move your hands up ‘a bit.”

Remus stopped dead and looked up to find Simeon Pettigrew strolling out the Potters’ back door. He looked tanner than Remus had last seen him, and the sun had turned his flaxen hair a deep honey blonde. He was wearing a navy polo and beige slacks like he’d just come from the country club, which he very well could’ve. On anyone else Remus might’ve found the attire entirely unappealing, but on Simeon it just worked. Maybe it was the earring…

“What are you doing here?” Peter asked, squinting at him.

Simeon flashed him a dazzling smile. “Mum sent me to pick you up, it's almost tea. You guys been out here all day?"

"We're 'taking the air'," Peter drawled, just as Sirius bolted upright on the picnic blanket and raised the sunglasses from his eyes.

"Oh shit—Sim!"

Simeon waved. "Alright, Black?"

Rather than answer, Sirius jumped to his feet and raced over, taking Simeon's arm fondly while they both clapped each other on the back. "How's Oxford?" Sirius asked.

"Eh, you know how it is. Just 'a bunch of wanna-be philosophers crammed into the same five-by-five cubicle. But what about you, eh? You lot look good. Who's winning?"

"Lottie," all four of them said at once.

"Figures," Simeon said, as Lottie took a commemorative bow; "only one person's ever been able to beat my little sister at croquet."

"Who?" Sirius asked.

Simeon crossed his arms, looking smug. "You're looking at him."

And that was how they ended up getting their arses handed to them on a silver platter for the remainder of the hour. Peter gave up early, hating anything that might pit him against his brother, but Sirius was all too eager to fill the gap and the rest of them cycled on and off as they so pleased.

"I was so close that time!" Sirius insisted, after his ball missed the hoop by only a hair and skipped out of bounds.

"Close only counts in horseshoes," Simeon answered, poking him with the end of his mallet.

Having given his mallet up to James that round, Remus stood back on the sidelines and watched. Simeon's sudden entrance had left him feeling a bit joltish, and though he was happy to see him, it was much easier to let Sirius take the brunt of the attention. Under the impression that a cigarette or two might help calm his nerves—he hadn't had one since that day in the park with Sirius—Remus had just begun to entertain the thought of sneaking off when Mrs. Potter came strolling out the back door, announcing carved watermelon and lemonade for everyone. As they all jumped up and made a beeline for the porch, Remus hung back to pat his pockets, but he'd forgotten his cigarettes in the house.

"Moony, come get some lemonade," James called, flagging him down from the porch. Remus nodded back, and started across the grass, but then Simeon fell into step with him and he promptly fumbled his croquet mallet.

"Hellooo there," he drawled, staring at him with those baby blues.

Swallowing thickly, Remus bent over to pick up the mallet, and when he straightened up he found Simeon waiting for him, stopped in the middle of his path to the porch. "Hi…"

"Lose something?"

He glanced over Simeon's shoulder, toward Mrs. Potter, who surely wouldn't approve of the smoking. "Er… nah."

Simeon's eyes tightened curiously at the corners. "I didn't happen to spit in your tea last time we met, did I?"

"What—no."

"Why are you ignoring me then?"

"I was just… playing the game." Remus gestured meekly to the mallet in his hand.

"Hmm… alright." Simeon looked him up and down. "You got taller."

It was true; Remus could look Simeon right in the eye now. In fact, he might've had a few inches on him—gangly inches, like a half-stuffed scarecrow.

"Maybe you just shrunk," he said. Simeon chuckled, biting his lip over a smile.

"Forgot you were funny. There aren't many funny people at Oxford. Tolerable, but too priggish for their own good most of the time."

"Why do you go then?"

"Expectations, I suppose. Why do you go to school, Lupin?"

"Moony!" James called again. He was holding up a glass, but nearly dropped it when Sirius poked him in the bum with the end of a croquet mallet. Lottie let out a happy shriek as the two of them tousled, while Peter dove to save the plate of watermelon.

“Them,” Remus said, straight away. “Because of them.”

Simeon followed the look. “Ah… good reason, that.”

When he turned back to him, Remus felt his stomach drop a few feet. Simeon may not have spat into his tea, but he’d definitely been avoiding him. He couldn’t help being nervous, Simeon was so effortlessly cool. And he admired him—more than admired him. It was a queer feeling, he now realised. He wasn’t just a Siriusexual then —he was an entire queer.

“Are you staying for a while?” Simeon asked.

“A few days. We go back to school next week.”

“Right, right. Got any plans?”

His heart skipped a beat. “James mentioned a football game… and—uh, band stuff. Mostly writing, but we’re just gonna hang around I think…”

Simeon nodded thoughtfully. “Well, I’ll be in and out. Trying to visit as many people as I can before heading back for the term. Alice lives in Wembley now, and Cass’s gone off to Enfield. Might pop the train to go visit him, but…” Simeon leaned in; “try to keep Sunday night free.”

“What’s Sunday night?”

“Nothing, yet. But the week is young, and you’d be surprised what people can throw together by Sunday.”

“Oxford people? Thought you said they were all prigs.”

“Oh, they are. But the parties aren’t all bad.” Simeon winked, and Remus felt queer all over again.

Sirius, he told himself. Sirius, Sirius, Sirius!

“You save us any ‘a that?” Simeon called, already steering away from Remus toward the porch. Halfway there, Mrs. Potter reappeared and called out to him;

“Oh Sim, dear, your mother’s quite upset you’ve been gone for so long. Might be a good idea to get along.”

“Yeah, we’re going,” Simeon replied, jumping up the porch steps and grabbing Peter by the shoulders. “C’mon, little bro, get your things together! Just let me know if you need help tying your shoelaces!”

“Gerroff!” Peter grunted, batting his brother away. “I’m going!”

“What was Simeon saying to you?” Sirius asked, after James and Mrs. Potter had gone to see the Pettigrew siblings off.

“Ha, curtain-twitcher,” Remus said, stuffing his face with watermelon.

“I am not a curtain-twitcher! I just asked what he said to you.”

“… Nuffin’.”

“Didn’t look like ‘nuffin’,” Sirius grumbled.

Remus swallowed and turned to him. “He only asked vague questions and made vaguer statements. Probably just wanted to seem ‘cool’.”

“Mhm, sure.” Just then Sirius reached around, copping a handful of Remus’ bum. “Just remember, I had this first.”

“Hands off!” Remus hissed. He was just in time too—a second later Mrs. Potter rounded the back door.

“Boys, Monty’s just rung me and he says he’ll be getting off early tonight. Shall we head into town to get you some new things, Sirius?”

Tucking his hands behind his back, Sirius began to worry at his bottom lip. “Sorry, Mum, but I… don’t have the money.”

Effie frowned at him, then smiled. “Don’t worry about that, beta. Both of you just get your shoes.”

She vanished again, as quickly as she’d come, and Sirius flashed Remus a bashful look. “Don’t be jealous, but I think I’m in love.”

Remus shoved him.

* * *

The car almost felt crowded with five people. Mr. and Mrs. Potter rode up front of course, and after folding himself into the two-door coupé, Remus found himself pressed against the driver's side window, with James and Sirius crammed next to him. They were excited, and even tried playing a round of bumps until Effie snapped at them to cut it out. Remus thought briefly that this must be what it felt like to be a part of a normal family; to have two parents that liked each other and prattled on about new school clothes and sensible footwear, and to have brothers who couldn't help but get themselves in trouble and never really meant any harm by it. That was, if you were shagging one of them.

They went first to the tailors, the same shop where the Potters had been ordering James' uniforms since he was in year two. It'd taken quite a bit of coaxing on Mrs. Potter's behalf for Sirius to fess up just how little he had, but his general lack of anything—let alone an appropriate uniform—had been apparent since their arrival. It cost an atrocious amount to have the uniforms rushed in time for September 1st, but Effie didn't bat an eye. She simply wrote the tailor a cheque and that was that.

"Remus, shall I put in an order for a uniform for you?" Mrs. Potter offered kindly. "Just in case you've grown at all over the summer?"

"Thank you, but I'm sure my dad's got it covered."

She nodded, but plucked a light blue dress shirt off one of the tailor's racks. "How about this then? To wear on your off days?"

That would look wonderful on you, darling, Hope whispered. It'll bring out the blue in your eyes.

Remus tried to stifle the voice. I don't have blue eyes.

Of course you do. You were my perfect blue-eyed angel.

"No thank you, ma'am," he managed. "I've got clothes at home."

Effie held his gaze a moment, smiling in understanding and returning the shirt to the rack. "Don't mind me then," she told him, "but if you're in need of anything—even a pencil—make sure you let Monty or I know."

Remus nodded. He wanted to reply in the same kindness, but the short interaction had exhausted him. Retreating like a coward, he hung around at the front of the shop until Sirius and the Potters were finished, all the while desperately longing for a cigarette.

Afterwards they drove all the way into Fitzrovia, where Mr. Potter escorted them to his personal barber. The empty patch of skin on the back of Sirius' head had mostly grown over by now, but it'd left a wonky hairline in the back, and Mrs. Potter insisted that it would be better to have the entire thing cleaned up before they returned to school and some nasty teacher complained of disorderly uniform and tried to cut it with sheep's shears.

"But what if they cut all my hair off? What if they leave me bald?!" Sirius fretted, as they made their way down the street toward Winmore Barbers and Co.

"They're just gonna fix up the back," James reassured him. "Moony, tell him he's worrying for nothing."

"You're worrying for nothing."

"There! See—"

"Wigs exist, after all."

Sirius shot him a venomous look, but when Mrs. Potter held the barber shop's door open for him, he reluctantly plodded inside.

"We'll meet you back here at half past," Mr. Potter called, before ushering James and Remus back down the street. They stopped outside a large two-floor bookshop, and Mr. Potter pulled James' return to school letter from his pocket to squint down at it from behind his thick glasses. "Let's see if we can tackle some of this reading list before supper's come and gone, eh boys?"

Remus, for one, was more than relieved to be back in a bookshop. He hadn't had the chance to visit one for weeks, not since Sirius had arrived, and almost said as much to James when he commented on the sudden improvement of his mood. He caught himself when he realised that Sirius wasn't supposed to have been staying with him for so long, and afterwards Remus resolved to be more careful. He still wasn't exactly sure what the 'this' was between them, but he was positive he wasn't ready to tell anyone.

As Mr. Potter followed a clerk around the shop, piling James' arms high with class reading and A-Level exam workbooks, Remus gave the excuse that he needed to use the loo and slipped away on his own. He wanted to try and find something that might help him make sense of what he was feeling, but for all the times he'd been in a bookshop, Remus had no idea where to start looking for literature of such a queer variety. There was no way he was going to ask one of the clerks, and so he stumbled along on his own, doing his best to avoid James and Mr. Potter, until he eventually made it into the Philosophy and Cultures section. From there he was right and truly lost. Half the section was made up of tomes the size of his forearm, with titles that he probably would've had equal chance of deciphering were they in Latin. There was a small section dedicated to 'lifestyle', and Remus began to silently thumb through the covers, running keywords through his mind as he did so.

'Homosexual' felt the most academic. But there was also queer… gay… Poofter… Shirt-lifter—Bender—Arse Bandit—SISSY—QUEENIE— FREAK!

Hunched over, Remus put his head in his hands. He hated himself.

He hated himself.

Sirius, I'm sorry, he pleaded. I don't know if I can do this…

You sure you're not just lying to yourself, the voice said. Not Hope—the vicious Moony. He was back.

Hmm? Did I go anywhere? Or did you just become more deranged?

I hate you too, Remus thought.

Remus pulled his hands down to his neck, releasing a long sigh. This was what was exhausting him, he knew, the nonsensical unsurety of it all. But as chance would have it, when he opened his eyes again he found exactly what he was looking for: a small journal titled, Early Recollections of Homosexuals as Indicated by Lifestyle.

Ripping the book off the shelf, Remus glanced around to make sure he was alone before flipping it open to the introduction. It read;

This book is a collection of academic studies performed and founded in the science of psychology, created and curated by the finest minds within the field. Although a number of studies have sought to determine the homosexual problem at its root, few have looked toward its ongoing circumstances; that which help the problem persist. By examining the homosexual lifestyle, we seek to answer but two questions, how is the common homosexual related to its fellow man, and does there exist a common measure of lifestyle?

Remus could feel every heartbeat thump in his ears. Lifestyle? Problem? 'It'?!

He flipped several pages deeper and kept reading;

To begin, it is helpful to translate how one might have a tendency to choose the homosexual lifestyle in the first place. It is worth noting that children who choose to become homosexuals are either those who have developed a feeling of weakness and inferiority toward the opposite sex within the environment they have found themselves, or alternatively, have been so petted that a very early desire for being protected and coddled takes on an intensive form. This can be true for both pampered and neglected children, for both extremes feed and intensify the child's longing to attain a future in which he/she will remain entirely untouched by life's difficulties. If additional familial difficulties do persist, they are likely to seek out the familiar, and this becomes no more apparent than in that of the attraction to the same sex.

This was worse than he could've imagined. It was a total mistake. He'd been looking for answers, just a single word that might help him make sense of it all, and rather he'd found condemnation—contempt. Remus wanted to stop reading, but it was as though his eyes were glued to the page. On and on the book went, reducing people's lives to that of uniformed trauma. He didn't want to fit these boxes, but he checked them all. Tick, tick, tick.

And then the real kicker came;

Homosexuals by nature, may be distinguished from heterosexuals by the following descriptions: weaker self-identity, lesser degree of initiative or motivation, or general lack thereof; greater degree of dependence, lack of religious association, effeminate tendencies, strong sense of the world as a hostile and dangerous place, issues with temperament, familial despondency, physical deformity and/or mental disorders, and more severely impaired gender identity.

Remus felt his heart break. It was just one book—one book in thousands—and yet it was enough to reduce him to what? To nothing.

His arms sagged as though they were failing him, and the noise that left his mouth with the next breath sounded more akin to a whimper. Then he realised;

A man was standing beside him. He was looking at him. Looking at him up and down.

It was not with kindness.

Wearing a tailor suit, with a smart-looking hat and briefcase, the man's frown deepened, drawing deep crevasses across his aged face. He shuffled away in expensive loafers; he'd seen what Remus was reading, and he was disgusted.

Remus snapped the book shut and raced from the aisle. He did not leave the book where the man could find it, instead he shoved the book into the display case beside the shop's front door, and whipped out onto the street into the hot evening sun.

* * *

To his credit, Remus did not run the entire way home. But he had to be away somewhere, so he took a lap around the corner and back, and after choking down no less than three cigarettes, he returned to find James and Mr. Potter desperately searching for him outside the shop.

"Sorry," he blanched, "saw a friend, got caught up chatting." James gave him a look, and Remus saw it for what it was immediately. "… Not Tomny."

With two sets of fresh texts weighing them down, they made their way back to the barber where Mrs. Potter was having tea in an outdoor café with a freshly trimmed Sirius sitting across from him. The barber had not mangled him, but Remus had never seen Sirius' hair so short. The crisp black waves were now clipped just below his jaw, with the bits on top shorter and more tousled to give what Mrs. Potter determined was 'more body'.

“Does it look alright?” Sirius asked, appearing genuinely nervous.

For a moment, all Remus could think to do was begin applying homosexual signifiers to Sirius. Effeminate tendencies, issues with temperament, familial despondency—

He could’ve kept going, except it was Sirius looking at him. Sirius.

“You look great,” he told him, genuinely; “You… It suits you.” Everything suits you.

Sirius smiled, still shy, and Remus wished he could’ve looked at it forever. He wished he’d never gone looking for that book. He wished the word queer did not exist.

By then it was getting late into the evening, and Mrs. Potter determined the rest of the errands, such as securing Sirius new school shoes, could wait for another day. After piling back into the coupé, they made their way back to East Finchley and to Potter Cottage, where they cleaned up the back garden and Mrs. Potter served up a wonderful dinner of paneer butter masala.

“Don’t worry, Sirius, I think you’ll be able to handle this dish,” Mrs. Potter teased, as she served up his plate with more than double Sirius’ usual helping.

“I still don’t understand how you managed to make yesterday's dessert spicy,” Sirius moaned, making the entire table dissolve into laughter.

Remus ate quietly for the most part, and when it’d become clear that he wasn’t going to be able to keep up with conversation or stomach the rest of Mrs. Potter’s delicious cooking, he apologised and asked to leave the table early.

“Are you not feeling well, beta?” Mrs. Potter asked, reaching over to press the back of her hand to his forehead. “You don’t feel warm.”

“Just tired. Probably gonna tuck-in early.”

“You did spend a lot of time in the sun today,” she said, then; ‘Alright, you head on upstairs. I’ll wrap up your supper. Make sure you take a glass of water with you.”

Remus nodded and untucked himself from the table.

“See you tomorrow, Moony,” James called. “Remember, it’s the Arsenal scrimmage." He flashed two thumbs up, and Remus responded meekly, before turning for the hall. He did not look at Sirius, too afraid that if he did, he'd see right through him.

Remus' room at the Potters' was spacious and clean. He found his small bag of things waiting for him amongst the fine furniture; one large bed, an ottoman, and a wardrobe hutch carved delicately in the shape of peacock feathers. The wardrobe itself was a beautiful piece, but at night he'd found that the feathers would turn into a hundred eyes, each of them silently watching and judging as he slept. The sun hadn't even set yet, but as the yellow glow came through the bedroom's window, it cast a shadow over the hutch, and one hundred eyes turned on him. What would those eyes say if they had a mouth? He wondered.

Get a load of this queer, probably.

Because he couldn't stand any of it, Remus marched over to the window and threw it wide. The window's view overlooked the back garden and also happened to let out over the porch's roof, an ideal place to sit and mope and not be found. He didn't even bother to test his weight; he was feeling rather reckless anyway. Shimmying out the window, he sighed against the warm summer air and leaned back against the side of the house. It wasn't the most comfortable perch, but it was private enough.

That night was the first time Remus considered running away from the Potters'. As much as he knew he loved Sirius, Remus missed who he'd been before. He missed spending summers at the flat, where he could wrestle with his mates and not have to worry that anyone might think he had more shameful intentions. He missed not feeling guilty for being attracted to someone, girl or boy. Nowadays it was both. Attracted to Sirius and he was queer; attracted to girls and he was what—a cheater? Were they even in a relationship in the first place? … They'd said the fatal 'I like you', but things didn't feel all that different from when they'd just been hooking up.

Remus lit a cigarette. Maybe they were just hooking up. Sirius didn't want whatever he'd had with Miles… whatever that was. Hmph—this or that. What a horrible way to think about it.

Somewhere distantly below him, the sound of the Potters' happy dinner conversation drifted up through an open window. First it was just chatter, then laughter, and then miraculously, Mss. Potter began to sing. It was a song Remus didn't know, in a language he couldn't understand, and yet he still felt sentimental.

I used to sing to you too, Hope said. Everyday. I was much better than her.

You were sick, Remus replied, in that place that did not exist; You made me sick too.

Shall I sing to you now?

Just shut up.

Oh, where have you been, my blue-eyed son?

Shut up!

Where have you been, my darling young one?

"FUCKING SHUT UP!"

"Woah—haven't even said anything yet!"

Remus whirled to the window to find Sirius already halfway out onto the roof, hands raised in surrender. Fuck.

"Are you alright?" Sirius asked, appearing genuinely concerned. And why shouldn't he be? The guy he was hooking up with was shouting at nothing like a raving lunatic. Embarrassed, Remus rubbed his nose to hide his flush and took another sharp drag from the cigarette.

"Sorry… just a bit out of it."

"I could tell," Sirius said, crawling the rest of the way out the window to take up space next to him. "Told the others I needed to use the loo, but thought it best to come check on you instead. Mind if I sit?"

"You're already sitting," Remus grumbled.

"Convenient." Sirius reached over, grasping Remus' hand by the wrist and bringing it towards his mouth. He smoked the cigarette right off his fingers, and after he'd exhaled the smoke, leaned in to kiss him.

Because they were alone, Remus kissed back. He was a weak man, and Sirius was oh, so beautiful.

The kiss progressed slowly, mostly due to Sirius. He leaned up into Remus, nibbling his bottom lip in wordless ask and when Remus opened his mouth for him, Sirius pressed in deep. They breathed heavily out of their noses, chests turning to chests, hands reaching to graze hungrily at neck and jaw and cheek.

“You’re trying to distract me,” Remus mumbled.

“Heh.” Kiss. “Is it working?” Kiss, kiss.

Remus broke away. “Sirius, I can’t.”

“Sure you can,” Sirius said, nipping playfully at his ear; “You just open your pretty mouth, and I’ll—”

“No, I mean I can’t do this.”

Sirius snorted as though he assumed they were still playing, but then he caught sight of Remus’ expression and his entire face fell. “And by ‘this’ you mean…?”

“I don’t think I can be queer,” Remus said shamefully. “I just… it’s not me. I can’t be…”

Sirius’ full lips flattened into a severe line. “Can’t be… or don’t want to be?”

And because he was cruel, Remus almost laughed. “Same thing, innit?”

Sirius wasted no time; he leaned back and popped to his feet, barely stumbling on roof tiles at all as he backed away. “Fine. Guess we’ll just stop all of this then.”

Wait—no! Don't stop!

“Hold on!” Remus quickly stubbed out his cigarette, trying to desperately beckon him back. “I never said I wanted all of it to stop!”

The look Sirius gave him when he turned back around was absolutely incredulous. “Bloody—what?!”

“I just meant that I can’t be that, Sirius. That—that word."

"Queer?"

"Yes! I’m not like—that. I’m… I’m not.”

“Well then, what are you?”

The question was like being flattened dead by a tumble of stones. What are you? What are you? What are you? Remus wished endlessly that he had an answer.

“I like you,” he said instead.

“Fuck you.”

He supposed that was fair. “I’m sorry if I hurt you.”

Sirius just shook his head at him, squaring up his shoulders like he was readying himself for a fight. “James told me about the girls, y’know. Yeah, that’s right—girls. As in plural. You told me it’d been one, so why’d you lie?”

“I–I don’t know!” Remus spluttered.

“I thought you were lying because it’d been a mistake! That shagging those girls was just your way of getting it out of your system. You saying it wasn’t? Am I the fuck you just have to get over?!”

“No!” Thinking of the family sitting just a few metres below them, Remus scrambled to his feet, only to botch it and nearly send himself flying off the edge of the porch roof. “I like you,” he said again, crouched over the ground and surely looking quite pathetic. An ineffable beast, Sirius stayed decidedly upright, stepping over the tiles with all the grace of a trapeze artist.

“I’m not sure you do,” Sirius answered venomously. “If you did, you wouldn’t be saying any of this.”

“I’m trying,” Remus swore, keenly aware of the open kitchen window just below them. “I haven’t had as much time as you to sort through all of this, have I?”

At that, Sirius eased a bit. Relief coursed through Remus, and he grappled for it.

“Maybe it’ll just take more time, but I never meant that I wanted to stop.”

“What’s the answer then? You’re not queer but you like me?”

“Yes…? I dunno—I’m just… I don’t know if it’s that easy.”

"Who ever said any of this was going to be easy?"

Remus frowned. He wanted to apologise, but he didn't know how. "Would you rather I just say I'm queer, even if I don't mean it?"

A muscle in Sirius' jaw twitched. "That's not fair."

"I.... I know." Remus dropped his head.

They were at an impasse, it seemed. Queer, but not queer enough. Thank god these things had always felt more clear for Sirius.

“Fine. Couldn’t you just be queer for me then?” He said simply, slapping his hands against his thighs in a shrug. His tone might’ve been nonchalant, but he was still frowning. Too bad Remus was too shocked to notice.

“ ‘Queer for you’?”

“Why not? I mean, s’not like we’re gonna be telling anyone anyway. So… maybe you can just be queer when it’s us.”

“Is that what you are?”

Sirius’ hands flexed at his sides. “Erm… no.”

“So you’re—”

“—Fully queer, yeah.” Sirius almost gasped when he said it; “Erm… Most of the time anyway.”

The last part felt like a lie, but Remus was hardly the person to call him on it. Sirius always saw things in black or white; one or the other, with no middle ground. If you weren’t a friend, you were an enemy. It was just another extrapolation of his passionate nature, his Shakespearean methodology of life.

“But I’m not blind,” Sirius said stubbornly, “I appreciate the human form too much to not have the occasional tryst.”

Impossibly, the corner of Remus’ mouth tugged upwards. Perhaps he was more fickle a creature than he’d thought. Sirius was telling him he was queer—queer—and yet he wanted to laugh.

“ ‘Occasional tryst’?” He surmised.

“I don’t think you can talk anymore,” Sirius replied haughtily. “Prongs seems to be under the impression that your body count now rivals mine.”

“Impossible.”

“Naturally. Told him as much myself.”

“ … Slag.”

“Tart.”

Relieved for real this time, Remus slumped back down. “I’m sorry,” he said again. “I think I just got a bit spooked coming back here.”

“Well, I get that,” Sirius said, settling back into his spot next to him. “We had it pretty good, hiding out at yours. Almost miss it.”

Remus took his hand. “Almost. S’pose there are a few upsides to being here.”

“Yeah, like not having to eat your cooking anymore. I was growing tired of burnt eggs and beans on toast.”

“I was talking about our friends. And beans on toast are an English delicacy, you uncultured twat.”

“I’ll have you know that I am a cultured twat. I speak four languages.”

“As if I could ever forget.”

“Je t’adore, mon chou. Sollen wir rein gehen und ficken?”

“Was that German?”

“Mhm, and a bit of French.”

“Oh. Gesundheit.”

Laughing, Sirius jumped up and tugged Remus on with him. “Allons-y, Moony! La notte è lunga!”

The dots connected for Remus just as he fumbled back through the window and Sirius began tugging at the bottom of his t-shirt. “What—now?! You told them you were going to the bathroom!”

“I’ll just tell them my stomach felt a bit funny,” Sirius smirked. “Won’t be a complete lie.”

Sirius finished ridding Remus of his shirt, before grabbing him by the chain around his throat and hauling him back for another kiss. The back of Remus' legs hit the bed a second later, and as they fell back onto it, chest to chest, there really wasn't much room left for argument.

* * *

The next morning was better. Remus did not think of the queer book or the voice of his dead mother, nor did he have to worry much about how close he and Sirius had sat at the breakfast table. They were in agreement; any queerness would be reserved for those special alone moments. In front of others they would remain normal friends. In the closet, Sirius had called it later. He'd said it with light disdain, but Remus couldn't bring himself to care, even now. The closet was safe. The closet was blissfully unaware and made more sense than anything else at all. Revere the closet.

The evening before, after Sirius had emerged from his prolonged bathroom break with a rather sheepish-looking Remus in tow, James had forgiven the odd behaviour straight away. After Remus had assured him that he wasn't feeling tired any more, James sprung the bright idea of 'lifting Moony's spirits' by indulging Remus' newfound love for all things gore and gruesome. Much to Sirius' apparent horror (apparently he was more squeamish than Remus had thought), they stayed up late to watch The Exorcist on BBC1. Because it was a TV showing they only got to watch the first hour and half, but Remus was rewarded anyway when Sirius used his discomfort as an 'excuse' to slip into his room after everyone had headed off to bed.

The next morning, Peter arrived bright and early for breakfast and James and Mr. Potter came downstairs already proudly sporting red polos in favour of Arsenal. Remus hadn't forgotten that he'd agreed to attend a real football match, he'd just hoped that if he didn't bring it up it wouldn't happen. As if.

"It's such crap that you have to take the train alone," James said to Remus over breakfast. Sirius' rush-order uniforms that arrived that morning after Peter, and they'd all been engrossed with talk of school ever since. Remus, as a prefect, would be the only one leaving on the thirty-first, but he wasn't worried. At least once he got to school he'd have Lily and the next day all his friends would join him and everything would be just fine.

"Can't help it," Remus said. "Pete, pass the butter?"

Peter did so. “Gonna be so boring though."

“I don’t really mind if it’s boring. Give me a chance to actually do some real reading. I promised Marlene I would finish her copy of ‘Ringworld’.”

“You didn’t read much over the summer?” Asked James.

“Not really… Just got busy.”

Under the table Sirius cheekily slid his hand across Remus’ knee and he retaliated by pinching him on the thigh.

“When did you say you have to be back, Moony?” Peter asked into his orange juice.

“Giles said tomorrow sometime. I haven’t really packed, and I’m supposed to have lunch with Sandra on Tuesday.”

“Oh right, your new mum. Think she—”

“She’s not his 'new mum',” Sirius scoffed straight away. “His dad’s just marrying her.”

Peter scowled. “Thanks a lot, Sirius. I was gonna say something and now you’ve gone and made me forget!”

“That’s hardly my fault, Wormtail.”

“You gonna be there for the wedding?” James asked over his friends’ squabbling.

Remus shook his head. “No, it’s at the end of September. Wouldn’t want to go anyway.”

Peter began digging his knife into the jar for the last bit of marmalade, watching Sirius apprehensively. “They going on a honeymoon?”

“Yeah. Spain or something.”

James whistled. “And all you get is Scotland.”

“Could be worse,” Sirius sniggered, “our school could be in Wales. Then we’d all be sheep-fuckers by default.”

“My mum was half-Welsh,” Remus said.

“Does that make you one quarter sheep-fucker?”

Only if it makes you the—Remus wanted so badly to say it, but their friends were around and so he bit his tongue and glared at Sirius, who smugly popped a grape into his mouth.

“So what should we do with our final night together?” James asked.

“They’re showing the second half of ‘The Exorcist’ on the Beeb,” Remus offered. Sirius immediately began to moan, but then suddenly Peter shot upright, flinging marmalade across Sirius’ face with his butterknife.

“Eugh! Watch your aim—!”

“I remembered what I was going to say!” Peter gasped. “Sim told me —there’s a party tonight!”

“A party?” James said. “Where? We’re not at school.”

“It’s not a school party.”

“I hope it’s not some bloody ball,” Remus said; “or a disco—please don’t let it be a disco.”

“It’s just a party,” Peter amended. “Some friend of his is throwing it on his family’s property. There’s supposed to be booze and stuff.”

“You seem pretty excited,” Sirius said, wiping the marmalade from his cheek with a paper napkin. “Considering it is Sim that asked you to go.”

“We don’t have to hang out with him,” Peter said indignantly, “we can just crash his party and drink his booze.”

Sirius looked to James. “I’m gonna hang out with him.”

“Where’s this party, Pete?” Remus asked.

“I dunno, Windsor or something. Sim said he’d drive if we met him back at the house.”

“Lottie coming?”

Peter rolled his eyes. “No, she has a date.”

Sirius perked up. “Would this be with the dashing Rodney?”

"Roger. And he's a dick."

"I think you're just too protective," Sirius razzed. "You're worried that your only sister's gonna get scooped up by a big, handsome man!"

In answer, Peter pointed his butter knife at Sirius' nose threateningly.

"We'll go," James agreed; "Good way to finish off the night after today's scrimmage. Arsenal versus Chelsea."

"Yes!" Sirius cheered. "Gonna be a good day."

"Not for you. Arsenal's gonna put Chelsea in a grave. All today's gonna be is at least two hours of slow and painful torture for you and your boys blue."

"Two hours?" Remus sat back in his chair and groaned. "Just when Peter had given me hope."

All the boys laughed at him and Sirius leaned into James. "Aw, Prongs, look—he's whining like you'll be when Arsenal loses today."

"You watch your mouth or you'll be sleeping in the treehouse after all," James warned, before glancing at Remus. "Best bring that book, Moons. Two hours is minimum, at least with Dad."

"This is cruel and unusual punishment."

"No, this is a gift! It's not even an official league match so they don't usually let in members of the public. We only get to go because Dad knows the stadium promoter."

"So it'll just be us in the entire stadium?" Sirius asked excitedly.

"Basically, but some others come too! Other fans and Dad's work mates. Sometimes we're there the whole afternoon."

Remus smiled sarcastically. "Brilliant."

As unexcited as he was to spend the next several hours sitting in a plastic stadium seat, Remus couldn't deny that Highbury stadium itself was rather spectacular. Mr. Potter led them in a back entrance after shaking hands with the doorman like they'd known each other their entire lives and suddenly they were in another world. The stands looked incredibly large without any people in them, extending at least a hundred feet high every direction.

“They can fit over seventy-thousand people in here!” James tittered excitedly as they filed in behind the team’s benches along with a few other families. Mr. Potter knew them all, and introduced James and Sirius with equal parts of pride while Remus and Peter hung back in their seats.

“Sim didn’t care to come?” Remus asked, watching disinterestedly as the different teams warmed up across the pitch.

“Sim hates football,” Peter said, marking jersey numbers down in a notebook.

“Explains so much,” Remus murmured, missing the older Pettigrew brother all over again.

“Look alive, boys,” Mr. Potter called, shuffling back into their row with James and Sirius in tow; “they’re about to decide who gets opening kick-off!”

True to Mr. Potter’s word, the teams flipped a coin and Chelsea took kick-off, which was met with much moaning from James and Monty. It was clear that just like his son, Mr. Potter was a die-hard football fan. When the first foul of the game went to Arsenal he jumped up onto his feet and hollered at the top of his lungs that the referee must’ve left his eyes at home. James, Sirius, and Peter all killed themselves laughing of course, but Remus just shrunk further into his seat, somehow embarrassed. As he did so, he noticed a girl about their age sitting four rows ahead. She’d turned around to gawk, and was now busy giggling at Monty’s incessant shouting, but when she noticed Remus staring she flashed him a shy wave. Only slightly unsettled, Remus turned his attention back to the field and scanned the green for the ball only to realise at the last second that he was looking on the wrong side. While he did, Chelsea scored a goal.

“Aw, man, what are they doing?” James groaned.

“I told you, you’d be whining today, Potter,” Sirius cackled, putting his feet up on the seat ahead of him. Mr. Potter immediately chided him for bad stadium etiquette and Sirius dropped his feet, grinning guiltily. Unbothered, Mr. Potter held a rumpled ten pound note out to them.

“Here, at least one of the concessions should be open. How ‘bout one of you go fetch us some drinks and a meat pie or two?”

“Me. I’ll go,” Remus said eagerly, taking the money and jumping up from his seat.

“I’ll take a coke, Moons!” James called.

“Two pasties for me!” Peter added.

“And I’ll take a pint!” Sirius said, making Monty reach over and playfully bat him over the head.

“One pie, Remus,” Mr. Potter laughed, “and you can keep the change.”

“In that case, make it two pints!”

Making his way to the refreshment stand, Remus ordered everything, getting a coke and a Mars bar for himself. Once the clerk had passed him a box towering with drinks and meat pies, he did his best not to drop it while turning around, only to almost run headlong into the girl from the stands.

“Sorry!” She chirped, helping grab the food before it toppled over. “Didn’t mean to get in your way like that.”

“S’fine, don’t worry about it,” Remus mumbled, reaching out to right James’ coke.

“Do you need any help?” She offered, and Remus looked her over. She was short, only coming up to his shoulder, with long brown hair tied off in a ponytail and eyes large and green enough to rival Lily’s. She was pretty, and if he were the same person he’d been only a month ago, he might’ve entertained it, but not now.

“I’m good,” Remus said, stepping away.

“Not many people come to the practice matches,” she continued, seemingly undeterred. “My brother plays for Chelsea—number ten. Stephen McFry. Do you know anyone off the team, then?”

The name-drop might’ve worked for James or Sirius, but she’d picked the wrong Marauder. “Nope,” Remus answered, “just here with some friends.”

“Oh, well I’m Megan.”

“Er… Remus.”

She smiled sweetly, like she’d won a prize. “Do you know your way around, Remus? I could give you a… tour of the stadium? Watching them practice can be so boring sometimes, and these things usually run for a while, so…"

Remus almost faltered. All of sudden he remembered why he'd never liked attention like this. Girls like Megan always saw him for more than he was. Exciting or dangerous, maybe. Stupid really, since Remus only ever saw an awkward, lanky git when he looked in the mirror. Perhaps that was why he liked Sirius so much—he saw all of the awkward and liked him anyway.

"I really don't mean to be rude, but I'm sort of with someone," Remus said staunchly. "So… no thanks."

Megan's smile fell instantly. She sort of just gaped at him for a while, but before Remus could say anything else, she turned and fled in the other direction. Satisfied, albeit a little embarrassed he'd just been run from, Remus made sure he had everything and finally returned to his own seat, passing the food and drink out to his friends.

"Who's winning?" He asked, eyeing Megan, who had reappeared in her seat with her back firmly turned to them.

"Still Chelsea," Sirius answered, sipping his coke and not bothering to complain that it wasn't a pint. Remus watched him and Sirius finally caught on, flashing him a smirk around his straw.

"Got something on my face, Lupin?"

"No," Remus said quietly, "you're just pretty."

Face turning instantly red, Sirius glanced down the row before tapping James on the shoulder. "I'm gonna show Moony where the bathroom is," he told him, before standing and ushering Remus back towards the stairs.

"Kay," James answered, eyes never leaving the field. "… Wait, do you even know where the bathroom is?"

* * *

"James Potter, you boys are going to miss your movie!"

James dashed to his bedroom door, opening it and sticking his head out. “We’re on it, Mum! Pete’s gonna call!”

“Just make sure you don’t keep Simeon waiting,” Mrs. Potter returned from the bottom of the stairs.

James shut the bedroom door.

“You told her it was a movie?” Sirius snorted from atop James’ bed. He was currently standing, reaching up to the roof of James’ four-poster to draw a moustache on Farrah Fawcett’s glamorous headshot.

“You try telling her we’re headed to a ’college’ party,” James snapped, “she’d be burying us in the garden before we even made it up the drive.”

“Not all of us,” Sirius corrected. “Remember, you only need to be faster than the slowest runner.” He pointed at Remus from behind his other hand and Remus retaliated with a pillow in the gut.

“I saw that, wanker.”

“Don’t feel bad, Moony,” Sirius sniggered; “If Pete were here you’d have nothing to worry about.”

“Yeah, but I’d take Peter over you right about now anyway, you leave your laundry everywhere,” James grumbled.

“You’re just in a shit mood ‘cause Arsenal lost today.”

“It wasn’t even a real league match. Hardly a loss.”

“Keep telling yourself that, Potter.”

James turned away like a scorned housewife. It was fitting since he was already going about the room, scooping up Sirius’ clothes from the floor. “If you’re gonna wear my clothes, the least you can do is make sure they make it to the laundry bin,” he said.

“Well, I’m not wearing your clothes today. Am I, Moony?” Still standing on the bed, Sirius turned his bum toward Remus, showing off his charity shop jeans and his backside in the same process.

“Stop it, you toff,” Remus muttered, pushing him away.

“Why? I’m just showing off my favourite jeans. You wanna feel them, Moony? Oh, they’re sooooo soft.”

“Stop torturing him and come get your shit,” James called. He’d just picked up the trousers Sirius had been wearing the day before. From the back pocket, he pulled a piece of rather dingy-looking paper. It looked like an old napkin that’d been doused in coffee then put through the dryer and hung to dry outside. James began to open it, innocently curious, but Sirius was there in a second, leaping off of the bed and racing over to snatch it up.

“That’s private,” he snapped, carefully sliding the paper into the inside pocket of his jacket.

“Sorry,” James apologised, “didn’t mean to snoop, assumed it was rubbish.”

”What is it?” Remus asked, not as innocent.

”Nothing. S’just a song—haven’t finished it yet.”

Sirius cleared his throat, chancing a quick glance in the direction of the door. They might’ve been able to push him into saying more on the subject, had the phone not begun to ring downstairs.

“Suppose that’ll be Pete,” Sirius smiled then, the picture of decorum. “Shall we get our party on, lads?”

As odd as Sirius’ behaviour was, neither Remus nor James mentioned it. Aside from their friend’s general lack of interest in talking about the mysterious paper, there really wasn’t time. It was a short jaunt down the road to the Pettigrews’—past the country club and down a short side road that was so gnarled and bumpy it could’ve taken a tire off the Rolls. What they found at the end of the lane was a true cottage, modest and suburban, with a brown picket fence and several more cars lined up in the driveway. Simeon and Peter were already waiting for them, loading several crates of beer into the boot of Mr. Pettigrew’s Humber Sceptre. Peter was looking very modest in a pair of jeans and a faded Cream t-shirt, but next Simeon, who was wearing flared trousers with a collared shirt open almost to his navel, he appeared quite homely.

“I see you two raided the offie,” James said as they strolled up the drive, gravel crunching underfoot.

“Ho, lads,” Simeon called back. “Just stocking up. Does this mean you’re ready for the best night of your puny teenage lives?”

“Why? Are we gonna meet Mick Jagger?” Sirius asked, streaking on ahead to smack his palm against Simeon's in friendly greeting. "Or have you come to tell me that my mother took a long-awaited trip to the sea and turned up dead in the water?"

"Nothing so spectacular, I'm afraid."

Sirius shrugged, and Simeon lifted a single bottle of beer out of the car's boot and raised it high in the air. "Gotta christen the night," he said, before pulling a bottle opener from his pocket. It was conveniently hanging from his key ring, which Remus thought had to be a decent investment. Save him from using his teeth at least, though that was mostly a party trick anyway.

After popping the cap, Simeon drank deeply from the bottle and passed it along. By the time it made it around to Peter it was empty, and Simeon took the bottle and tossed it away across the lawn.

"I'm not picking that up in the morning," Peter said.

Simeon sighed. "Just get in the car, Petey."

And so in the car they went. Sirius called bagsy and none of them fought him on it, but thankfully the Sceptre had more room in the back seat than Mr. Potter's sedan so Remus' knees weren't horribly cramped the entire way. The party was taking place in the historic parish of Harrow on the Hill, which meant that the home and the family it belonged to was surely to be affluent.

"Just don't act lame and maybe you'll manage to fool one of these university girls into going home with you," Simeon told them as they were passing through Wembley.

"Not us! Pete and I are already off the market," James said. "Guess that just leaves the two of you!" He clapped Remus on the shoulder enthusiastically, and Remus tried not to notice the look Sirius gave him from the front seat.

They arrived when Simeon pulled the Sceptre up to a manor estate with an already full driveway. The lawn was also packed, creating a checkerboard of expensive cars as far as the eye could see. The entire property, which was made up of the manor and several outbuildings, was surrounded by a nest of trees that cut it off from the rest of the village. Remus might've actually believed they were in the countryside had they not passed a roller rink and a Woolworths on the way in.

"Remember, just be cool," Simeon said, as they unloaded the car's boot. “Oh, and if someone comes up to you with a silver chalice and starts gabbing about ‘initiation’, run the other direction.”

“Silver chalice?” James murmured, as he hauled a crate of beer up to his chest.

According to Simeon, their hosts were a pair of brothers named Guy and Hugh. Both were econ majors at Oxford and shared several classes with him, but considering they looked identical, Remus gave up on trying to tell them apart the moment Simeon pointed them out from across the lawn. Not that it mattered; there were enough people at the shindig that he could’ve been introducing himself all night and still not have had the time to meet everybody. The party itself wasn’t even going on inside the manor, instead Simeon had had them carry the heavy crates around the side of the building and out into the back garden, which boasted an incredible lawn and courtyard, a stone porch-way, and of all things, a pool.

“Who the fuck has a pool in London?” Remus said, watching as hordes of kids lounged around the brightly lit water, some fully clothed, others wearing little more than bikini tops and swim shorts.

“Probably costs a bomb to heat it,” Peter added.

“I want one,” Sirius said straight away.

Across the courtyard, a sound system the size of a small house had been set up, playing top hits and the likes of Boney M. and even more Donna Summer. Kids swayed along, drinks in hand, and with the sun long gone from the sky, there were endless shadowed corners left for the more promiscuous couples to sneak off to. This was usually one of the more eventful parts of a party—seeing who hooked up with who—but this wasn’t Hawkings. All around them were strangers, and the four Marauders seemed to watch on in a slight daze, as though none of them could decide what to do next.

“Stop standing there gawking,” Simeon teased, strolling up and passing them each a fresh beer. “Go. Mingle—make friends. It’s the only real way to find the good stuff.”

James’ eyes widened. “And by ‘good stuff’ you mean…?”

Another person called Simeon’s name from across the courtyard and he turned away before throwing up an arm in greeting as a pair strolled up to them. Remus recognised the girl instantly; Alice. She was wearing a black mini skirt and silk top under a heavy leather jacket, and with her mod-looking bob and thick Edie Sedgwick eyebrows she looked straight out of an Andy Warhol film. Beaming, Simeon leaned in and kissed her on the cheek before clasping the shoulder of her male companion.

“Was wondering when you were going to turn up,” the guy said. He had long hair gathered into a ponytail at the nape and a thick moustache that made him look twenty and forty all at once.

“Got weighed down some,” Simeon said fondly, before gesturing to the rest of them. “Lads, you know Alice. This here’s Robbie. Alice, Robbie—I present to you, my brother, Pete, and his friends, James, Remus, and Sirius.”

“Haven’t seen any of you for a while,” Alice mused, looking them over. “Unlike you to be so generous, Sim.”

“I’m plenty generous, ask anybody,” Simeon said. “Thought I’d give ‘em a taste of a real university party.”

“Nah, ain’t real unless someone ends up streaking across the quad bare-arsed,” Robbie said. “Which the four of you might just have to do, considering you’re not even initiates yet. Fresh meat gotta fry, right?”

Robbie elbowed Simeon suggestively and Simeon nodded. “We could have them try bobbing for dead rats, like the cricket team did with their newest recruits.”

“Don’t let these two idiots psyche you out,” Alice cut-in, as the other two stepped back to laugh. “Most of us don’t even go to uni, we’re just leftover private school kiddies. Everyone’s chill.”

“Avoid the blue cups though,” Robbie said, holding up a blue plastic cup of his own. “Or you know, don’t.”

The three of them began to snigger at the obvious inside joke, but by then someone had called Robbie’s name and they were already shambling off. Almost making to follow, Simeon spun around suddenly like he’d forgotten they were there.

“Kay, so… drinks are over there—take what you want, no one cares. Someone usually tries to start a fight or two but they’re basically all talk so don’t worry about it. If anyone comes up to you asking for ‘Barbra-Ann’, they’re looking for molly. If someone asks for ‘Molly’, they’re looking for barbs—backwards, I know. Let’s see, what else…

Erm… Don't take any stardust if you want to be able to breathe in the morning, watch out for the chick that calls herself 'Stardust', she's not that great a lay. Oh and remember—always wrap your willy. Kisses." With that, Simeon began strolling off in the direction of his friends. "And mingle!" He called sharply, before rushing to meet Guy or Hugh —Remus couldn't tell which—and leaving them to their own devices once more.

"Alice is pretty… pretty, don't ya think?" Peter said after.

"I'm telling Moira," Remus grinned.

"I was merely being observant! I never said that I thought she was pretty!"

James touched his top lip wistfully. "Wish I could grow a moustache like that…"

"Alright, you lumps," Sirius interjected; "You heard the man—get to mingling. If it's Moony's last night of freedom before he's to be 'Pecky Prefect' for the rest of the year, then I think we should all be sufficiently gassed."

Briefly, Remus considered pushing Sirius into the pool.

None of them knew it at the time, but being a party where no one knew your name was quite freeing. Eventually there would come a time that this would no longer be the case, the party would be thrown by an acquaintance on their payroll, or by a company head looking to make connections amongst different agents, stars, and producers. Then the parties would be thrown for them, in celebration of their first, second—dozenth chart-topping hit. Suddenly people would be asking for them, looking for them. Amongst a sea of money and fame, everyone would know their names. But for now they were nobodies; just another handful of insignificant kids that showed up because of a friend of a friend.

"Think they rented it?" James asked, when he and Remus had stopped to take in the stacks upon stacks of ugly black boxes that made up the party's sound system. The music itself was still pop-y, but the sound was almost garbled, like it'd been squeezed through a drinking straw. Remus had seen similar speakers being used on stage by the likes of the Who and Deep Purple.

"Must've," he replied, wincing when more Donna Summer came on. He really hated radio sometimes.

Ooh I feel love, I feel love,
I feel love, I feel love,
I feel love…

A group of girls stood a short ways away, dancing on the grass. They held each other's hands, spinning this way and that. As he watched, Remus thought bitterly how easy it was for girls; no one would ever judge them for holding their friend's hand, or snuggling together on the couch. If they kissed one of their girlfriends on a dare it was hot, if a guy did it, it was gay.

"Don't look now, Moons," James said into his ear, "but I think you've got an admirer."

Remus swallowed. The girls had noticed him staring, and one of them raised a hand in a cheeky wave. Remus almost expected her friends to shriek and badger her for the gall, but they didn't. These were university girls, he reminded himself, they were used to batting their eyelashes and getting what they wanted.

"Go on then," James said, bumping him forward.

Remus dug his heels in and turned his back to the group. "Nah. Not really interested."

"Don't be shy, girls always like you. You're sensitive and you read books."

"Fuck off, that's rubbish."

James grinned. "Look, if you're worried about what I said before heading off to Devon, don't be. You're the sensible one, I know you'd never forget to wrap your john."

"Sensitive and sensible. What a great combination for a rock star," Remus replied blithely.

"Yes, well… we're not rock stars yet."

James continued to grin, but before he could insist that Remus go over and talk to them, Sirius and Peter appeared before them, each looking giddy and holding a blue plastic cup in their hand.

“Guys, there’s acid in the blue cups,” Sirius said, as Peter bounced up and down in place at his side. Remus immediately relapsed into thoughts of his first year at Hawkings, when he’d taken the acid and spent the rest of the night watching as the world melted around him.

“I thought the goal was to get drunk, not fried,” James said, gaping at them.

“But Robbie specifically told us not to avoid the blue cups,” Peter said. “Or was it the other way around…? Heh.” He stumbled sideways over a stereo cord and Sirius caught his arm, making them both burst into a fit of giggles.

“Are the two of you high already?” James demanded.

“ ‘Course not, these things take time to kick in,” Sirius said. “Ask Moony.”

Remus shook his head, but accepted the cup Sirius was offering. James was more wary as he accepted the one from Peter, and after an impatient, “Bottoms up!” from the both of them, Remus and James drank. It was just beer, but the drink came with a tangy aftertaste.

“Mum’s so going to kill us,” James said, crunching the plastic cup in his fist as he cleared his throat grimly.

“Vita brevis,” Sirius smirked.

Despite Sirius’ surety, It didn’t take long for the drugs to kick in. It felt the same as last time; floaty and heavy all at once, like he was underwater but had stones in all of his limbs. An hour in and they were all playing the idiot—two and Remus could’ve sworn he’d heard James arguing with a flower pot while calling it ‘Petunia’. Remus had never actually experienced being worried for James Potter, save the time he and Lily had gotten into it on his sixteenth birthday, but James had always been a bit of a stupid drunk. It came as no surprise to find that he was even worse while high off his arse. Like ‘Sirius Black’ worse.

“Think I could make the jump from the top ‘a the pool shed?” He asked Remus, as they laid back on a pair of deck chairs. The night had cooled off some, and the earlier swimmers had all vacated the pool, leaving the too-bright crystalline water to sit undisturbed with a collection of cans and other rubbish floating along its surface.

“No,” Remus answered lazily, staring up at the night sky and watching as the stars grew and shrank in size like the rings of rain droplets. Lucy in the sky with diamonds…

“ … M’gonna try it.”

James launched himself upright, but luckily all Remus had to do was lift one leg and kick him sharply in the ribs. “Don’t you dare,” he swore, as James began to wriggle and moan in his chair.

From somewhere else, Sirius began to shout; “Moony! Moony, over ‘ere!”

“He’s so noisyyyy,” James whined, still massaging his bruised side. “Moony, tell him to shut up.”

“Shut up, Padfoot.”

“Moony! MOOONY!”

“I can still hear him!"

With a tsk, Remus looked away from his winking stars. Halfway down the pool deck, Sirius was surrounded by a ring of people, all of them looking his way expectantly. Sirius began waving his hands frantically when he got Remus’ attention, trying to flag him down as though he were an aeroplane coming in for a landing.

“Moony!” He screamed. “Come show ‘em that trick you can do!”

“Jesus Christ…” Grumbling, Remus sat up on his deck chair. Next to him, Peter had somehow found a deck of cards and appeared to be playing a game of poker against himself using gathered beer caps. “Peter, you watch James,” he said, and Peter snapped his head up.

“Wha…? OH! Oh, okay… Yeah, I’ll watch James, Moony. Noooo worries.”

“MOOOOOOONYYYYY!”

“I’m comin’,” Remus snapped, pushing up from his chair. His entire body felt like melted rubber and he stumbled a few times on his way over, unable to support such a weight. He needed someone to cut him in half, or scoop out his insides… make him into soup… yeah, Remus soup.

As he made it to the group of kids, which numbered well over two dozen, all sitting piled over one another on the deck, Remus awkwardly weaved himself into the centre. There, Sirius pressed a lighter into his palm and began to pat him on the back hurriedly.

“Show ‘em, Moons! Show ‘em!”

Remus looked down at the lighter. Just a cheap disposable zippo.

“ … What?”

“The trick! The trick!” Sirius urged. “That one you showed me once! Remember, back in the astronomy building?”

It took Remus several seconds to understand what Sirius was going on about. When it finally clicked, he nodded and raised his fist. Every kid around them seemed to lean in out of anticipation, but Remus had seen the trick loads of times. It’d been Lee who’d taught him.

Taking the zippo in his other hand, he formed a small chamber with his fist and held the button down so the gas could build up in the small space.

“Watch this, this is the cool bit,” Sirius said to the guy next to him.

After a few seconds, Remus struck the lighter and opened his fist. What followed was a small burst of flame like a tiny fireball, right there in the centre of his palm. Every zooted kid within ten feet gave a loud ‘OOOH!’ and then suddenly they were all clapping.

“Yes! That’s my Moony!” Sirius cried, as Remus wiped his palm on his shirt, just thankful he didn’t light himself on fire. “Moony’s so cool, ‘e’s like magic. Just love ‘im, don’t you love ‘im?” He nudged the same guy as earlier, who gave a torpid nod, clearly high on his own shit. “Hey, Moony! I love ya!”

Remus’ heartbeat suddenly filled his ears. He began to feel itchy, like ants were crawling up his spine. “Sirius—”

“OH DAMN!”

The cry had gone up from the other side of the pool, where a group of guys were laughing and hollering, all of them pointing in the same direction. “FUCK YEAH, MATE!” They shouted. “JUMP!”

As much as Remus wanted to pause everything and peel out of his own skin, there wasn’t time. As a crowd quickly formed, he looked up to find James standing on the roof of the pool shed. Peter, when Remus chanced a look, was still playing poker.

“It’s like I can fly,” James said, much to the glee of his audience.

“You can’t fly, James!” Remus replied, trying his best in his muddled state to calculate the distance between the roof of the shed and the pool edge. Several feet, at least.

“No, I can do it. I’m sure I can fly.”

The crowd immediately took up a chant; “FLY! FLY!”

“YEAH, FLY!” Sirius yelled. Remus smacked him for it.

“Are you crazy? He’s gonna die.”

Sirius glanced between James and Remus like he was just seeing them for the first time. “Uh… Don’t jump, Prongs. Moony says not to jump.”

“Moony says to jump?”

“No! Don’t jump!” Remus shouted.

But the crowd was against him. “JUMP! JUMP!” It cried, fists beating the air with eager want. It didn’t matter if James ran the risk of splattering himself on the pool deck, they wanted a show. Remus wished he knew where Simeon was, but he didn’t, so instead he just began shoving his way through the gathered bodies, until his rubber legs had carried him up to the side of the tall shed.

“James, come down.”

James squinted down at him in the dark. He was missing his glasses. “That you, Moons?”

“Yes, it’s me. Now get down here.”

“JUMP! JUMP!”

“I dunno… I think I’m supposed to jump, Moons. They want me to jump.”

“JUMP! JUMP!”

“Think of Lily,” Remus pushed. “Would she want you to jump?”

“Don’t listen to him,” someone heckled. “Jump already.”

But James was hesitating. “I really miss Lily,” he moaned.

“Alright, then come down and we can call her.”

“Really?” James lit up. “You’d let me call her?”

“Yes, just come down now and we’ll phone ‘er up! I swear.” Remus reached up, itching his shoulders. The winking stars had returned, and he felt hot and cold all at once.

“JUMP! JUMP!” The crowd continued to chant. James was looking all around, like he couldn’t decide where the noise was coming from. He was so close to the edge of the shed now, and Remus didn’t think he’d be able to catch him if he fell.

“James don’t—”

“JUMP!”

“Just come—”

“I’M COMING, LILY!”

And then, with all the stupidity granted to him at birth and that collected along the way, James Potter launched himself off of the roof of the shed.

Remus almost covered his eyes, except he couldn’t feel his arms. Overhead, James soared, carried by the roaring cheers of his fans, and straight into the deep end of the pool. He’d cleared the edge with several feet to spare, but as his dark form sunk to the bottom and did not immediately resurface, everyone began to crowd in.

“He alive?” Someone asked.

“I dunno… you check.”

There were a few mumbled responses, all of them equally as unsure, and Remus felt his chest twinge. He’d forgotten to breathe. Luckily, Sirius was still his ever-loyal self, even when high.

“I’ll save ya, Prongs!” He declared, before letting out a victory cry and throwing himself into the pool. This of course ignited a rallying cry, and suddenly dozens of kids were throwing themselves into the water, clothes and all.

Remus waited with baited breath until Sirius and James finally emerged. When they did, he found them laughing, and suddenly furious, he picked up another discarded beer can and tossed it at James' head before muttering under his breath that he needed to piss.

It turned out that for all the party's expensive sound equipment and endless booze, they did not have anywhere to take a leak. "Try the woods," a guy told him when he'd asked. Feeling irritable, Remus turned and made for the clearest crop of trees.

"Bloody friends… fuckers…" he grumbled to himself; "What's the point of 'em… keep 'em around to… to give ya heart attacks! … Fucking idiots…"

Stopping before a suitable tree, Remus steadied himself and unzipped his trousers. He'd just gotten down to business when a snapping sound filled his ears. At first he thought he was just hearing things—a common side effect when one was dropping LSD—but then the sound came again, followed by the muffled sound of voices.

Almost sputtering, Remus scrambled to do up his trousers and flee, except his legs had gone rubbery again, and when he stepped back he caught his ankle on a tree root and went down hard on his side. Wincing, he looked up, and just a few short feet away he found a couple in various states of undress, both of them rushing to adjust their clothes. It was dark amongst the trees, but Remus hadn't really gone that far in, and when his eyes finally focused, he found not just a regular couple, but a couple of men. And not only that, one of them was Simeon.

"Oh shit," Simeon said, when he realised who had caught them.

"Who's he?!" The other guy demanded. It was Guy… or Hugh. Remus still couldn't tell.

"Relax. I'll handle it," Simeon replied cuttingly. He'd only just managed to get his flared trousers back on, and his shirt hung open revealing his entire chest.

"Here, Remus, let me help you up," Simeon said, coming forward and grabbing Remus under one arm. Without bothering to wait for his friend, Simeon began leading him back toward the house. "Wow… You sure gave us a fright," Simeon said, forcing a chuckle.

"Didn't mean to… Only taking a piss," Remus murmured. He wanted to pull away; Simeon's touch felt like pins and needles, but he was holding onto his bicep with an iron grip. “Didn’t see anythin’ really…”

“Sure you didn’t. But that’s alright.” Simeon was smiling, but it didn’t reach his eyes. Just as they reached the start of the lawn, he stopped and made Remus face him. “Remus, I know you might be thinking that—”

“I didn’t know you were gay,” Remus flubbed, stupidly.

Simeon’s gave a light chuff, like an almost-laugh. “I’m… not, but…”

That’s what they all say, Remus thought. He let his head rock back, blinking at the stars that winked for him. Puddles, puddles…

“Remus, this is a sensitive thing,” Simeon started. “People really can’t know that Hugh and I… hold on, Remus are you alright?”

“I drank from the blue cup.”

He began popping his lips, creating that little sound of a bursting bubble. He did it in time with the winking stars. Bop, bop, bop…

“Fucking hell…” Simeon shook his head, but he was smiling genuinely now. “Remus—Remus, look at me.”

Remus did.

“You can’t tell anyone. This has to be our little secret, alright? Maybe if it were someone else and not Hugh it could be different, but it’s not so… you can’t tell anyone. Do you understand?”

Bop, bop, bop…

“Remus? Did you hear me?”

“Yup,” he replied, popping the ‘p’. “Ourrrrr little secret…”

“Yes, our secret. No one else’s. Especially not Peter.”

Remus nodded. He didn’t want to tell Peter either. Or James, really. “Revere the closet…”

Simeon gave him an odd look, like he was puzzled but still amused, and finally nodded. “You always were funny,” he said, before hugging Remus and finishing with a quick peck on the cheek. “I’m gonna now. Shouldn’t leave Hugh to wonder, he’s a fretter. But remember, Remus —it’s our secret.”

“Our secret!”

Simeon waved him off, and then he was gone again, and Remus was as high as ever.

That was a development, the voice said, as he stumbled back toward the pool. It felt closer when he was stoned, like a real voice whispering in his ear rather than just his head. Remus swatted at the air over his shoulders.

Go away, Remus replied, stopping to lean on the side of the pool shed.

And where would I go?

I hate you.

I am you.

Suddenly he was itchy all over again. Remus regretted drinking from that blue cup. He’d heard Tomny say it before—bad trip. The moment when the good drug turns on you and everything becomes ten times as shitty as when you’d been sober. Tomny was the best at those, he’d experienced every bad trip in the book, and one time, when Remus was fourteen and had gotten fucked out of his head on mushrooms, it’d been Tomny who’d kept him grounded. He’d watched over him. It was just how it was. Now Remus was watching others, except he wasn’t any good at it. He didn’t know how to guide them through their downs, or even cheer them on during their highs. He was too miserable. He wanted Tomny.

Tomny.

“Tom.”

Tomny.

“Oi, Tom!”

Remus pushed the hallucination away. It was the voice again, taunting him with the one thing he couldn’t have. “Shut up, leave me alone,” he moaned, slamming his fist on the shed’s metal wall.

“Pfft. Skaghead,” a voice muttered disdainfully, passing him from behind. “Tom!” The guy barked. “Time tah go. Got the rich twat’s dosh so we’re outta ‘ere.”

“Yeah, yeah, hold on. Gonna find me that girl from before.”

“Plonker, as if that blue-blood bitch’s gonna want anythin' tah do wiff you.”

“Just admit ya don’t have any game and lighten up, alright Brecker?”

It was the ‘r’… The ‘r’ in Brecker. That’s what really gave him away. It was that touch of intonation, the hint of a Scottish drawl he’d all but lost since childhood.

Remus looked up. He thought he might vomit. There he was. Just… right there, a mere few feet in front of him.

Tomny.

“Diddya even see where she went?” Brecker asked, scanning the pool. His head was shaved nearly to the skin, and he had a nasty look about him. But not Tomny; Tomny looked the exact same. Same dirty-blonde fringe, always dipping down into his eyes. Same dimples, same sea-glass eyes. Remus imagined if he were closer, he could’ve spotted that little scar on his upper lip.

“Nah, but I’ve an eye for things like these,” Tomny said, smirking devilishly.

It was as though Remus had forgotten how to breathe again. He used the shed’s wall to drag himself closer, repeating the name in his head in hopes that just one of them would reach his lips. Tomny. Tomny. Tomny.

“C’mon,” Brecker said, nudging Tomny’s arm; “I’m tired of these rich prigs and I don' need Lee takin' off wiff the car.”

Lee!

"I told you we should've left 'im back at my place," Tomny said.

Oh god—Lee and Tomny. The flat! He must've been dreaming. But Remus was so close; he reached out.

Brecker spotted him first. Spinning around, he deflected Remus’ hand and scoffed. “Piss off, we don’t got no more, you zombie. Find your fix sumwhere else.”

Tomny began to turn. “C’mon, Brek, now that’s jus' bad business—” He froze. Remus couldn’t believe it. He saw him. He saw him.

“Christ…”

“Tom,” Remus whined.

“You know this guy?” Brecker demanded sharply. He looked Remus up and down, the same way someone like Lyall might had he seen Brecker on the street in all of his skinhead glory. Apprehension. Disgust.

“I…” Tomny shook his head in disbelief. “Lu… what are you fucking doing here?!”

Lu. Remus almost forgot how it felt to be called that. Relief surged over him like water, and he could finally speak again.

“S'a party,” he garbled; “I wassss invited. What'rrre youuu doin' 'ere?”

“It’s a job,” Brecker answered first. Tomny snapped his gaze to him, pressing his lips into a thin line.

“Brek, why don’t you jus' let me handle this one. I’ll... meet ya back at the car.”

Brecker looked like he wanted to argue, but no matter how much time had passed or where he’d gone, Tomny had always been a leader. It seemed that it still rang true now. After another suspicious glance at Remus, Brecker shambled off, hands in his pockets. Remus, who still hadn’t moved from the shed wall, leaned his forehead against it in attempts to ground himself. Everything was so muddled, and he wanted desperately to see Tomny clearly. To know that he wasn’t just seeing things.

“Are you really 'ere right now?” He whimpered, appreciating the touch of cool metal against his skin.

Tomny looked at him with sympathy—or pity, maybe. “Here, Lu,” he said, grasping Remus gently by the arms. “Let’s getchu sat down.”

He guided him back to the pool, to the very same spot Remus had been lying not ten minutes before. It was fate then, he decided. Mean, ironic fate. Remus looked around for his friends, but they’d gone. To where, he wasn’t sure, but somehow it fit. Thonas Armstrong simply did not exist in the same dimension as Sirius Black and James Potter.

“Feelin' any better?” Tomny asked, kneeling before him and eyeing Remus warily.

Remus ignored the question; “What arrrre... What are youuuu doin' ‘ere…?”

“Sellin' drugs to posh prats with money to burn,” Tomny said blandly. “Never thought I’d see you 'ere though… Never thought I’d see you again at all, actually.”

The comment stung a part of him that Remus couldn’t put words to. “I missed you,” he said.

“You’re drunk,” Tomny responded, “or high. Possibly both. Did ya take it on yer own or did someone dope ya?”

“I miss you,” Remus said again, pathetically. “I miss all of you guys. M'sorrrrry.”

Tomny turned a bit ashen. “C’mon, don’t… don’t say that.”

“Whatever I’ve done, m'sorryyyy.”

“Stop it, Lu.”

“M'sorry I lied to ev’ryone! I’ll—I'll tell the truth, all of it! Ngh… About my family and school and—”

“Stop!”

Remus held his tongue. Still kneeling, Tomny hung his head and then ran a hand across his face. “Look, I can’nah really do this right now,” he sighed. He stood then, biting his lip and looking at Remus like he were an injured puppy he’d picked up off the side of the road. And really, that was exactly what Remus was.

“I have to go,” Tomny said. “Don’t feel sorry, jus’… take care of yerself, Lu.”

Remus felt like crying. Maybe he already was.

“… Okay, Tom.”

Looking almost pained, Tomny raised a hand like he might pat him on the arm, but then he thought better of it. Instead he turned, and Remus had to watch his back as he crossed the courtyard and passed out of sight.

So close, and yet so far, vicious Moony said. Tell me, did you think he would just take you back? You knew he didn’t want you.

"No…"

Don't be sad, darling, said Hope. Shall Mummy sing to you? Oh, where have you been…

Remus covered his ears. "Noooo…"

Who would want you back? said Tomny. You're a liar. You loved my girlfriend, you didn't love me.

"It ain't true…"

No, he's right, you even lie to yourself, said Sirius. I mean really, Remus Dean? Yeah right. You don't know how to be honest. You're bad, Moony. Bad to your core.

"Please… Please just stop…"

You want everything, said Lily. You have everything and you still want more. You're selfish.

Where do you belong, Moony? said Peter. Do you belong anywhere? Anywhere at all?

"Stop it…"

'Stop it, stop it'—just listen to him whine, said Marlene. It's so hard when we refuse to get better. Why can't you just get better, Remus?!

It's 'cause he'd rather run from it, said James. Are you fast enough, Moony? Better run—RUN!

"Stop it!"

He won't run. He's a quitter, said Lyall. He's nameless. He's a child. He doesn't care.

And where have you been, my darling young one?

"STOP IT!"

"MOONY!"

Remus opened his eyes. Sirius was before him, kneeling in the same spot that Tomny had been. He was wet, with his dark hair curling around his forehead. He had both of Remus' wrists in his hands, a look of concern stamped across his features.

“Moony, what’s goin' on? What's a’matter?”

Remus’ mouth opened, but no sound came out. I saw Tomny, he wanted to say. Tomny was here, and now he’s gone.

Sirius moved his hands—first to Remus’ cheeks, then his forehead. “Blimey, you’re soaked. Is this all sweat? Here, lie down.” Slowly, he manoeuvred Remus back onto the deck chair. Remus wanted to ask how he was so coherent, but the blinking stars were back with a vengeance, and it hurt just to keep his eyes open.

“I–I think m’havin’ a b-bad trip, Siri… uss...”

“O-Okay…” Sirius managed; “You jus' stay right here then. M'gonna go find Simeon.”

Sirius left him, racing off into the dark, and it occurred to Remus that Simeon might be rather tied up at the moment. Our little secret.

Remus had a secret. Secret–sss. Oh lord, did he have secrets.

“Sirius…” he moaned. “Sirius…”

He wished they’d never left the estate. He wished they’d run off just like Sirius had wanted; found a flat and played music for pennies. He wished he’d never seen Tomny. He wished he could see him again. He wished, he wished, he wished…

But wishes were for children, and Remus hadn’t been a child for a long time.

* * *

It was official.

Remus Lupin was lost.

He’d really only meant to go a short ways, just enough to punish his father. He’d thought that running away from the car when Lyall had stepped out for a quick meeting and Giles had been distracted by the paper would be a great idea. Maybe then his father would pay attention. Maybe then he’d yell at him, instead of just pretending he wasn’t there.

But now he was lost. He didn’t recognise any of the streets, and people gave him weird stares when he passed. A woman had even tried to talk to him, but she'd been wearing dirty clothes and had pigeons all over her, so Remus had fled in the other direction. That had gotten him even more lost, and he'd ended up wandering until he found a park with a play area. At least, Remus thought it was a play area. All of the bars were rusted or missing completely, and the metal slide had a hole in its middle as if it'd been melted right though. Only one swing remained and when Remus sat on it, tired from walking, he grasped the chain link and pinched the skin between his thumb and palm so badly that it immediately turned purple.

Cradling his hand to his chest, Remus felt like crying. He wished now that he hadn't run. He wished Giles would just show up to take him home in the car, even if it earned him a week's worth of punishments. He wished his father would come looking. He wished there was someone else left to miss him.

"Are you cryin'?"

Remus whipped his head up. A boy had appeared, obviously older than him, with a mop of shaggy blonde hair and an open cut on his top lip. He was wearing a dirty white shirt and jeans with a hole in each knee, and he was smoking. Remus was amazed. He'd never seen a kid smoke so openly before. At school, the other boys who were always smuggling their parents cigarettes in with them had to sneak around the back gym so they wouldn't get caught by any of the teachers or nuns. They'd offered him one once, but the smoke had stung his eyes and made him cough terribly. Not this boy though, he wasn't coughing. He took a drag on the cigarette and exhaled, like he'd been doing it all his life.

"Well?" He said again. "Are you cryin' or not?"

"No!" Remus replied, embarrassed. He wiped his face. "M'not crying…"

"Are you lost?"

"No."

"You look lost."

Remus clutched the swing's chains, ignoring the sting in his palm. "I'm not!"

"Orright, so you're not lost. What you doin' 'ere then?"

"I… I went for a walk!" Not a total lie.

"Bad place for a walk," the boy said, bringing the cigarette to his lips again. " 'specially lookin' like you. Kids like you get picked up round 'ere. Big bad men come and take 'em away and they never see their mummies and daddies again!"

"I don't have a mummy," Remus said, because he thought it might make him sound brave. "She died."

"Mine too."

"… Really?"

"Nah, I lied," the boy said, smiling inexplicably. "Sorta wish she'd died though."

Remus' eyes widened. He'd never met such a boy.

"How old are you?"

"Almost twelve," Remus answered. "How old are you?"

"Almos' sixteen."

Wow, a teenager. Remus didn't know any teenagers, that was unless you were counting that pair of nasty brothers, Jacob and Henry, which he didn't. Remus hated those brothers. They only came over when their father organised meetings with Lyall and they always took his things, or made fun of his teeth, or called him names like 'beanstalk' and 'nancy boy'. Last time they'd even held Remus down and marked up his copy of Magical Mystery Tour with a pocketknife. Giles had bought him a new one straight away, but Remus still hated them.

"What's yer name?" The teenager asked.

"Remus."

He snorted rudely. "What sorta name is that?"

Remus bristled. He hated when people made fun of his name. Especially mannerless boys like this one. "It's my name," he said. "What's yours?"

"Tomny."

"Tomny? And what sort of name is that?"

Tomny smiled, then he answered; "You're posh."

"Am not!"

“Sure are.”

Remus stood up from his swing. He wished he could hit Tomny. He’d done it once before—two months ago when Sidney Donahue had called him pitiful for only having one parent at home and using his driver like a second mum. It’d hurt his hand at the time, and Sidney had cried, but Remus had felt better.

“Are you gonna hit me, Remus?” Tomny asked, as if he could read his mind. “If yer gonna hit me, best be ready tah get hit back.”

“If I did, you’d deserve it. Now I want you to leave,” Remus said, thinking it was best to at least give the other boy a way out.

Tomny rubbed at his eye indifferently. “Nah, don’t think I will.”

“I was here first!”

“No, ye weren’t. I’ve been sittin’ ‘ere all this time, you jus’ didn’t notice me. Easy for people like you, always overlookin' people like us.”

Remus didn’t like what the boy was implying. That they were somehow different, that Remus was bad.

“Leave!” He barked.

“No.”

“I said leave!”

Tomny leaned in very close. “And I said—no.”

Remus couldn’t help it; all of his anger toward his father and his desperation over being lost bubbled to the surface at once. He brought up his fist, clipping Tomny on the edge of his jaw. Only, where Sidney had gone down immediately, Tomny simply glanced sideways, absorbing the punch. Then he lifted his own hand—the one without the cigarette—and hit Remus square in the cheek.

Remus went down onto his backside like a sack of bricks, shocked and bruised. Now he really wanted to cry.

“Yer lucky, that was my left,” Tomny said, rubbing his knuckles. Then he did something even more unexpected than the punch, he offered Remus his hand.

Remus stared at it, at the faint scars on his knuckles, the fingernails with dirt beneath them. He wondered if anyone had ever made Tomny wash his hands before he ate.

“Well, m'on then,” Tomny said, “don’t ‘ave all day.”

Shocked at himself, Remus slowly peeled his hand away from his swollen cheek and took Tomny’s. It was warm, and Tomny immediately pulled him to his feet, even helping to dust off Remus’ trousers.

“There, now the li'tel master’s all spick 'n span.” Smiling, Tomny bent down and picked up his cigarette, which he’d dropped. It was little more than a stub, but he re-lit it anyway using a cheap plastic lighter he pulled from his pocket. Then offered the cigarette to Remus too.

“Wanna try?”

Remus stared at it. Tomny had already socked him one, he didn’t want him to think he was frightened by a little smoking too, that would be lame. Readying himself, he took the cigarette and pinched it between two fingers, sucking in very sharply. The effect was an immediate burning sensation in his throat and chest. He began to hack and cough as Tomny plucked the cigarette from his fingers and finished it off.

“That was my las' one,” Tomny said, flicking the butt away as Remus continued to splutter. “Wanna go get sum more?”

When he could finally breathe again, Remus wiped the corner of his eyes. “You mean… with you?”

“Yeah! … Unless yer not finished with your walk, that is.”

Embarrassed again, Remus looked around. He was still lost, and certainly didn’t want to remain at the poor excuse for a play park.

“Okay,” he said.

Grinning, and revealing two deep-set dimples, Tomny turned and ushered him on. “You can call me Tom,” he said. “You got a nickname?”

Following, Remus shook his head.

“That’s rubbish, everyone’s got a nickname.”

“Not me.”

“Well, ya can’t go round 'ere callin’ yerself ‘Remus’, no one’ll take ya seriously. You need a tough name, one that says ‘don’t mess wiff me’.”

Tomny began to stroke his chin. “Hmm… m’not really a fan of ‘Rem’. You?”

Remus shook his head. “Not ‘Rem’.”

“Orright. How ‘bout somethin' different then? I once knew a guy who called ‘imself ‘Bones’. You like that?”

Remus shook his head again. Tomny frowned. He probably thought Bones sounded very cool.

“Got a surname then?”

“Lupin.”

“Heh. Funny name.” Tomny snapped his fingers. “Oh, I know! M’gonna call you ‘Lu’, okay?”

‘Lu’. Loo… Wow.

“You like that?”

He nodded.

“Champ! Now lets getta move on,” Tomny called, already five paces ahead. “Find ourselves somethin' cool to do. Ever shoot bottle rockets at cars? It’s wicked fun.”

Remus didn’t know what a bottle rocket was, or where they might find such a thing, but his heart felt lighter somehow. He didn’t even care that Tomny had made fun of his name again. Tomny was nice, and not fake nice like everyone that visited the estate. Tomny was real. Remus hoped it made him real too.

“C’mon, Lu, this way!”

Remus glanced back at the dilapidated park. Suddenly it didn’t look so bad. His cheek no longer ached, and he didn’t even feel like crying anymore.

“… I’m coming! Wait for me, Tom!”

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title comes from the Scottish idiom "If wishes were horses, beggars might ride..." just in case you weren't sad enough already :^) Also, apologies to any Welsh readers for the sheep comment, lol.

'Hoover' is a vacuum.
'The Beeb' is slang for the BBC or 'British Broadcasting Corporation'.
'Offie' is slang for 'off license' or liquor store.
Calling 'bagsy' is same thing as calling shot-gun.
Woolworths was a supermarket chain.
'Cost a bomb' is an idiom for expensive.
'Molly' is slang for ecstasy and 'barbs' is slang for barbiturates.
'Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds' is a ref to the Beatles song.
'Skaghead' is a derogatory term for anyone who abuses drugs; typically heroin though. 'Zombie' is the same.

I took inspo for the 'queer book' Remus reads from a real academic article published in a journal of psychology in 1975. It was very grim, but a strong window in on the societal thoughts of the past. I'm proud of how far we've come since. Let me know if you want the article's citation.

I realise the topics within this chapter may be triggering for some so in case you were looking for support, here is link to the Stonewall's list of international LGBT+ resources. Please reach out if you need it. https://www.stonewall.org.uk/our-work/international/international-resources

See you next chapter! (Final part of summer 1977.)

Chapter 71: The Boys at the End

Chapter Summary

> End of summer, 1977. Remus leaves behind the Potters, among a few other things. Hawkings welcomes him back with an unexpected surprise.

Chapter Notes

> C/W: Brief reference to self-harm (but NO actual self-harm, just a misunderstanding), and [unnamed] methods of conversion therapy. Also drug-use and subsequent withdrawal from it, homophobic language, and knives.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Though I know I'll never lose affection,
For people and things that went before;
I know I'll often stop and think about them,
In my life, I love you more…

- "In My Life" The Beatles, 1965

Waking up always sucked more when you couldn't remember falling asleep, except in Remus' case, he couldn't even remember getting back to the Potters'. He learnt later that Sirius had in fact found Simeon—innocently drinking among a group of friends—and that Simeon had hailed them a cab. Only the two of them had left first; Peter had still been whacked off his arse and there was no way they could've taken him back home to his parents in such a state. He and James hung back with Simeon and followed later, but it'd been Sirius who'd dragged Remus across the Potters' threshold, complaining of too much to drink, and then hauled him up to the bathroom where he'd promptly puked his guts out.

"You're mental," Sirius had said while Remus hugged the toilet bowl. "My mental Moony." Then Remus could've sworn he'd heard the words, love you.

It could've been part of the dreams. Or the drugs. Or both, really. Getting high was the only way that the dreams would ever come out; the nights were colourless, while days remained all too exhaustive. It was like he was backwards. Wrong in all the right places.

When he could prise his eyes open, he found that the curtains in his room were still drawn, but Mrs. Potter had left his breakfast on his side table. Along with the tray was a note from Giles that said to call him the moment Remus was feeling human again so he could come retrieve him in time for school.

Ugh, school…

Remus supposed he had to be grateful. Neither Mr. or Mrs. Potter had mentioned what had transpired during the phone call with Sirius' parents, but it was clear they weren't going to allow Sirius not to return to Hawkings. Sirius wasn't about to complain either; it wasn't like he didn't want to go back to school, he just wanted someone to care whether he did or not.

Unable to stomach the thought of eating, Remus drank greedily from the class of water Effie had left and turned back over in bed. He was alone for a while longer, gaze lost on the intricately carved wardrobe of peacock feathers. He'd expected Sirius to come knocking eventually but surprisingly, it was James who came to him first.

"Moony?" Peeking his head in, James knocked gently on the open door. "You feeling alright, mate?"

Remus grunted at him. His mouth tasted vile and his breath was probably worse, but he didn't feel hungover in a sick sort of way, just drained mentally. LSD did that to you, left you feeling fleshly and benign, like a conscious tumour. There was a reason people lost themselves in it, even Remus felt tempted at times. But the trip had been bad, he knew that now. At least most of the energy and jitters from the night before had melted away, and the hallucinations had stopped. Thankfully.

"Not hungry?" James asked, coming in and surveying his untouched breakfast.

Remus sat up, holding his head. "No… feel like shit. You?"

James shrugged. "Feels sorta weird, like I'm still moving in slow motion, but Mum and Dad haven't really noticed. I did wake up absolutely famished though." Sitting down on the edge of the bed, James illustrated this by picking up a piece of cold bacon from Remus' plate and gobbling it down. "Di'h yooh read yer no'h?" He asked over a full mouth.

Remus nodded, plucking the note from the bedside and ripping it into little pieces to keep his hands busy. “How mad was Giles?”

“Duh'no.” James swallowed. “But Mum said he was perfectly pleasant. Guess we’ll see when he comes to get you. If I were you, I’d give him the bell soon though.”

“Right.” That meant a stern lecture was in the cards, at minimum.

“Sirius said you got pretty out of it last night,” James said, speaking carefully like Remus was an eggshell he was trying not to crack. “What happened?”

“Bad trip, I'll wager.”

“What'd it feel like?" James asked, not unkindly, just more curious than anything. "Did you see things?”

Yes. And I heard them. Heard you—all of you.

“Well, it was acid, Prongs.”

James just laughed. “For me it was dancing zebras. They were everywhere. Then I met a wizard with this long white beard, and he offered me three wishes.”

“Isn’t that a genie?”

“Oi, it was my acid trip!”

Remus smiled. “What'd you wish for?”

“First, that Arsenal win the next Cup, then I think it was socks with my face on it—”

“You want to wear socks with your own face on it?”

“They were gonna be for you guys, obviously. Don’t really remember the third wish, but I think it involved less zebras.”

“Wish I’d met a wizard. I’d love to abracadabra some ‘a my problems away,” Remus sighed, then; “Is Sirius alright? He… hasn’t come to see me.”

“Only just got up, I think. Said he was gonna take a shower. You probably should too, by the way. There’s vomit on your shirt.”

Remus looked down at himself. “Ugh. Right…”

Nicking Remus’ second piece of bacon for good measure, James stood up from the bed and wiped his mouth. “I’ll leave a fresh shirt outside your door. Come down whenever you want.”

After his friend left him to clean himself up, Remus peeled off his dirty clothes and shoved them into the bottom of his bag. He didn’t want any more reminders of last night. Not the drugs, not what happened with Simeon (had it been Guy or Hugh? … Dammit.) and especially not of Tomny.

I can’t do this right now, Tomny had said. At the time it’d felt heartbreaking, but now Remus had the good and bitter sense to be angry. Why did Tomny always get the last word? Why did he always get to decide what was best? Remus might’ve been stoned out of his gourd, but he was still a person! He deserved to be heard… and now he almost regretted not forcing Tomny to listen.

Nudging open the bedroom door, Remus trudged down the hallway to the guest bathroom in just his trousers. He couldn’t hear the shower when he approached, but when he tried the door handle he found it locked.

“Sirius, are you in there?” He knocked. “Just need my toothbrush.”

There was a short clatter, followed by a hissed bout of cursing.

Remus raised a brow. “Sirius, you good?”

“Y-Yeah!” Sirius answered. “One sec…”

He waited, but the bathroom had fallen steadily quiet, and after several seconds Remus pressed his ear to the door.

“… Shit…”

“Sirius!” He called again. “Sirius, open up.”

No answer.

Swallowing, Remus forced the panic down and knocked twice; I’m okay, but again there was no answer. He knocked again; silence.

“Sirius,” he ordered in a stern voice, “if you don’t respond I’m going to have to knock the door down and bury you in white roses. Now I don’t care if you’re in the middle of pissing—open up.”

There was some shuffling and after a long, reluctant moment Sirius unlocked the door, peering out through the crack. He was dressed, with his leather jacket on and everything. “Red roses,” he murmured.

“Huh?”

“Bury me in red roses. I’m a traditionalist.”

Remus scoffed. “Bury yourself, ya bastard. Now what’s going on, you weren't really taking a leak, were you?”

“Moony, you’re indecent,” Sirius said, changing the subject. He reached one hand out to poke Remus in the centre of the chest, and Remus batted him away.

“Buzz off. My shirt was…” Remus tailed off. He’d glanced over Sirius’ shoulder and managed to catch sight of a green bag with a white cross on it sitting on the edge of the sink. “What’s that? Did you hurt yourself?”

Sirius whipped his hand back, squeezing the door shut even more. “It’s just a little cut, don’t worry about it.”

“Let me see.”

“No."

"Don't be a tosser, let me see."

Sirius scowled lightly. "I thought Prongs was supposed to be the mother hen?”

Remus ignored him; “Are you gonna let me in, or do I actually have to knock the door down?”

Looking reluctant, Sirius finally opened the door and allowed him inside. The guest bath was tinier than the others, painted sky-blue with a tiled ceiling and bearing a beach theme. A small basket of sea-shell shaped soaps sat on top of the toilet and a framed photo of the Potters’ beach house in Devon hung on the wall. The wallpaper had sailboats on it, and the shower curtain matched. It all felt so mundane, so expectedly homely. There was no way Lyall Lupin would’ve permitted such a room in his house. Sirius’ parents neither, Remus suspected.

“Okay, show me,” Remus said, eyeing the first aid kit. There were gauze pads in the sink, stained faintly with blood. Not enough to be alarming, but still not good. He faced Sirius, who'd shut the door and was leaning up against it with a grumpy frown.

"It's not that big 'a deal," Sirius pouted.

"Why'd you let me inside then? Why'd you hide it?"

"Because you're impossible."

"Good. Anything to get you to listen. Now where's this 'no big deal' of a cut?"

Grumbling a bit, Sirius sloughed off his jacket, revealing a red David Bowie t-shirt (a gift from the Potters) and a large bandage wrapped haphazardly around his arm. It stretched almost the entire length of his forearm and was wound so tightly that the skin on either side was pinched white.

"Jesus," Remus swore, taking Sirius' arm in his hand.

"It's not that bad," Sirius assured him, "I just suck at this stuff. Must've nicked myself last night, but I can't really remember. Woke up with it."

"You swear?"

Sirius gave him a funny look. "Well, I didn't do it to myself, now did I?"

They just looked at each other, and Sirius' expression changed.

"I didn't," he promised. "Swears."

Remus licked his lips. "Okay," he said. "Here, sit."

Sirius did as he was bid, dropping down onto the toilet seat as Remus crouched in front of him and got to unwinding the bandage from his arm. Sirius exhaled as he did, and Remus shook his head.

"You are shite at this," he taunted. He let the wrap flutter to the floor, before gently peeling back the layer of gauze beneath. Sirius had been right, the cut wasn't too nasty, mostly a surface graze, but it ran from the tip of his elbow to his wrist and had obviously dried messily overnight. When Remus prodded the skin around it, Sirius winced.

"Reckon it was that gate," he said. "The metal one, on our way out.

Probably caught it when I was guiding you out."

Remus bit his lip. "Thanks for that, by the way..."

"Don't need to thank me, you just had a bad trip, that's all," Sirius said softly. "I mean, what else are friends for besides picking each other up when we're tossed as a salad?"

I love you, Remus thought intrusively. It wasn't a 'friendly' thought, it was something else. Sirius had saved him, in more ways than one, and Remus loved him for it. He wished he could tell him just how much.

“Doesn’t look like it’ll need stitches, but you should've cleaned it better. It could get infected," Remus chastised, scooping up the extra gauze and throwing it in the bin. "You can show Mrs. Potter later if it still hurts, just keep pressure on it for now.” Popping up to wash his hands, he quickly dried them on a towel embroidered with smiling starfish, and began rifling around through the first aid kit.

"School in a few days..." Sirius said, like he couldn't think of anything else to talk about.

"Yup..."

"Going back to your place today then?"

"Mhm. Gonna call Giles after this."

Sirius nodded silently, and Remus knelt back down before him. Using an alcohol swab, he began cleaning the area while Sirius squirmed on the toilet seat, hissing through his teeth.

“Ugh, burns so good.”

“Don’t make it weird.”

“It’s not weird. You’re tending to my wounds like some soldier fresh from battle, it’s sexy.”

Remus glanced up, ripping into a fresh pack of gauze with his teeth. “Shuddup.”

“Knew you thought so too,” Sirius smirked.

Pressing the gauze to the newly-cleaned wound, Remus began wrapping the bandage around Sirius’ arm once more. “You’re an idiot, Sirius Black.”

“I love hearing you say my name.”

“You would.”

“Not like that,” Sirius scoffed. “It’s different with you. It’s like… you say it and it sounds completely different. No one says my name like you.”

Their eyes met again and Sirius held the gaze for a moment, before his eyes widened and he seemed to realise what he’d just said. “So,” he cleared his throat; “since when did you know so much about tending wounds of the flesh anyway?”

“I don’t, really,” Remus surmised, tucking the end of the bandage in by Sirius' wrist; “But I used to know this kid… Flacky. He was always getting himself into one mess or another. Even put his foot through a window this one time. I just cleaned him up a few times, s’all.”

“And who cleaned your wounds?”

Hm… Remus looked down.

“Aw shit,” Sirius sighed. “I… ignore me.”

Just tell him, Remus thought. Tell him so it doesn’t become another fucking secret.

“I saw Tomny yesterday.”

Sirius’ mouth dropped open, then he closed it. “Nah, now you're having me on.”

“I’m not. I saw him.”

“Actually?! Where—At the football game?”

“No, at the party. He was there.”

“What? What would he be doing there?”

“ … Selling drugs.”

Sirius raised both eyebrows, and Remus immediately regretted telling the truth. How could he not get the wrong idea about Tomny now? Then again, what even was the right idea? They both seemed so different now, Tomny and him.

“You know, you got down pretty bad yesterday,” Sirius said quietly. “You were rambling a lot. Are you sure you’re remembering things right?”

Remus didn’t miss his meaning. “Reckon it was drugs, do ya? That he wasn’t really there at all, and I just dreamed the whole thing up?”

“No! S’just…” Biting his lip, Sirius leaned in. “M-Maybe you didn’t actually see him, maybe you just thought you did. There was a lot of people around after all, and we were all pretty fucked up, right?”

“I didn’t imagine him,” Remus replied sharply. “He was there. Right there in front of me. I talked to him—he… He was there, Sirius.”

“Alright, I believe you." Sirius picked at his bandage sorely. "But what are you gonna do about it?”

Remus sat back, stretching out until his back met the bathroom wall. “Nothing, I guess. It wasn’t like he suddenly wanted me back. Didn’t even know I was gonna be there so…”

Sirius moved on from the bandage and began rubbing his fingers together, in that fidgeting way of his that meant something was wrong. “Well… perhaps it’s a good thing? Like maybe now you can put it all behind you. Focus on the good things—the stuff that matters!”

He’s saying you’re a shit friend, the vicious Moony suggested, none-too-kindly; Imagine if he was always going on about Miles, would that not smart some, Mooooooony?

“Yeah,” Remus mumbled; “You’re right… probably time to put it to rest anyway.”

Sirius nodded eagerly, coming down from the toilet to join Remus on the bathroom floor. “Yeah! And then maybe that way we could…” He trailed off, looking uncomfortable. “Aw fuck, I can’t do this anymore… I’m sorry, Moony.”

“For what?” Remus felt his heart quicken. It was too like Tomny. Too similar to what he’d said. Was Sirius about to break up with him? Could you even break up if you weren't dating in the first place?

“I messed up,” Sirius said solemnly. “You asked me to do something and I bungled it all and… I’m just really bloody sorry.”

“I don’t understand.”

Looking straight pained now, Sirius reached for his jacket, drawing it into his lap. “I never really did tell you everything about that school in Belgium.”

Suddenly, Remus’ stomach plummeted.

“It wasn’t exactly a normal school,” Sirius said grimly. “They called it ‘therapy’. You see, before they sent me there, Mum and I had this huge fight. She’d gone through my room, and she found some stuff. Mostly cigarettes, a few records… and uh…” Sirius licked his lips; “a dirty magazine or two.”

“Bet she loved that,” Remus replied, humourlessly.

“Yeah well, I'll wager she might’ve actually preferred it if it were only tits and snatch.”

“You mean it was…” Realisation dawned upon Remus. “Oh.”

“The magazines were old as dust anyway,” Sirius scoffed half-heartedly. “I found ‘em when I was a kid, in one of the maid’s rooms, and I dunno… I guess I just kept them. I wasn't all stupid though, knew enough to know that looking at guys like that was generally frowned upon by society, so I hid ‘em under a loose floorboard in the corner of my room. It was the only hiding place she’d never found, but this time I forgot to put the board back all the way. Rookie fucking mistake. She’s got a nose like one of your dad’s hounds, right, so of course she found it. She demanded the truth and I… Fuck, I dunno—I told her? ... I think I just wanted to shock her. But hey, it worked. She smacked me, which meant I got what I wanted, and then there I was—off to that fucking school a few days later…Just one and done…”

“What was it like?” Remus asked after a long moment. "If you... want to talk about it, that is." A part of him was afraid of the answer, but he had to know, and Sirius deserved to let it out if he wanted to.

Looking indifferent, Sirius busied himself by picking at a crack in his jacket’s leather sleeve. “Well, apparently Belgium’s supposed to be pretty progressive, but I suppose there’s always gonna be a few cracks in the system. The school was run by some Evangelical from Merseyside anyway. He preached for hours about how ‘God still loves us’ and ‘we’re not broken, we’re just lost on the path to righteousness’. I mean fuck, it was like talking to Father Minsin if he was secretly a bloody poof. I figure most priests are, like you’d have to be, to be that horny for Jesus, but still."

Remus suddenly felt like he were splintering inside. He couldn't even imagine how Sirius felt. "Are you okay?" He asked, another stupid question.

"I'm fine," Sirius replied. "Honestly, I think I got off easy. This other kid I met there, Jeremy, he'd been to three different places before that one. Said they beat you and starve you elsewhere, until you so gone and mental that you're writing bible verses on the wall—total mind-fuck stuff. This place just made us go to church all hours and locked us in our rooms like little kiddies if we were bad." He rubbed his nose. "I thought it might be harder once I broke out, but you came and I was… I was alright again. Really, I was. I just wish I'd run earlier, so that none of it would've happened."

Remus shook his head. "Don't think like that. It wasn't your fault."

Sirius shrugged. "This wasn't my first time running away, ya know."

"You mean when you came to the Potters'."

"Yeah, got a real beating for that one, but that wasn't even the first either. Once when I was twelve I got as far as Chippenham, but I had no idea what I was doing. I'd run away after some dinner where Mum had yelled at me in front of the whole family—didn't even bring a bag. Eventually I just turned around… stupid… And then when I was fourteen I stowed away on this lorry all the way to Newbury, right? Well, the guy found me when he stopped at a petrol station and made me call my parents from the payphone. I didn't even fight him, I just did it. Sucks now… but you know, every time it happened I sorta thought to myself, 'this is it, I'm finally gonna get out' and then things would start to feel real again and I always went back. Hard not to think that if I'd been braver maybe I could've actually changed some of it."

"No," Remus said firmly; "Just because you turned around doesn't mean you weren't brave. If anything, I think going back took more bravery than leaving."

"How is it you always know just the right thing to say?" Sirius asked sadly.

"I don't," he confessed. "I'm only trying the best I can, just like everyone else."

Leaning towards him, Sirius pressed a gentle kiss against Remus' lips and pulled back, stroking his cheek. "You should put that into a song," he said.

"I'm sure somebody already has."

"No." Sirius shook his head. "Not the way you'd write it. I want to hear Remus Lupin's songs."

Remus kissed him back. "Only if I get to hear yours too."

Sirius cracked a smile, before his eyes dropped and he pulled away. "There's... There is something else, Moony." Slowly, Sirius slowly began palming his jacket again, turning it over in his lap. "I really am sorry," he whispered, reaching into the inner pocket. A moment later he withdrew a rumpled piece of paper, the same one James had found in his jean pocket the day before. Up close, Remus could see that not only was it worn and tattered, but also been charred on one end, like someone had tossed it into a bonfire and thought to save it at the last second.

"I'd hid it under the floorboard," Sirius blubbered, more emotional than ever. "I thought I'd hidden everything well enough a'course, but she still found it and she—she threw it into… Oh god, I'm so sorry."

Looking into his face, Remus then realised what exactly it was. Instantly numb all over, he reached out and slowly took from Sirius the blackened remains of Tonya's letter. Unfolding it carefully, he saw that the top half was completely ruined, charred and unreadable.

"I almost told you that day on the roof," Sirius said, "and I… I knew I should've given it back to you or even James before we left school! But I was worried he'd read it and misunderstand or—or that you'd make yourself sick obsessing over it all the time, so I thought it best to… but I was wrong. It was the only thing I managed to smuggle with me to Belgium—I'd never give it to her—but it got even more ruined and I'm… I'm so sorry."

Trying his best to stave off the despair suddenly clouding every thought, Remus clutched the letter. The top may be gone, but he could just make out the end. Smoothing out the paper's rumpled edges, he read it over.

Don't let Tomny stay angry, it read; I love him too. I loved him enough to stay but I love him even enough to leave. And I'm sorry I couldn't give him anything. It's just just not how we work. He'll understand what I mean.

I have to go now, sweet love. Be safe, be healthy, and please be happy, whatever that means. And don't ever anyone—ever—tell you what that means.

Love forever,
Tonya.

Remus lowered the letter.

"Now that's… just bad luck."

"Fuck, Moony!" Sirius moaned. "Don't do that! Don't be so good! Yell at me—hit me—do something!"

"I'm not going to hit you, Sirius," Remus replied sadly.

"Why not?" He demanded. "You trusted me with this one thing—one thing—and I let it get ruined! It was your last bit of her and I wasn't even man enough to tell you when you came and saved my sorry arse, so why won't you do anything?"

"Because I'm sad. And because I'm sorry too."

"Moony—"

"—I'm sorry that I never told you how much I love you."

The barest breath of a gasp left Sirius' lips. Again, Remus felt like throwing up. Baring your soul was so hard, but…

"You make me so happy, Sirius," he said. "You have a light inside you that makes everything sing. Your family may not see it, but I do—so do the Potters. It's like... if James is colour, then you're sound. And I want to listen to you forever. Every soul-crushing pun or joke at my own bloody expense. All of them. You see, this—" he held up the ruined letter; "This is a memory. It's not me. You're me—you are. No one has ever made me feel like you do. Not Tonya… not even Tomny. And god… I like you so much."

Sirius was looking at him with a wet, glassy stare. A bit of his newly-sheared fringe fell across his eyes and he sniffed as he pushed it away. "Dammit, Moony…"

“I can’t promise that I’m not gonna absolutely bollix everything up, because I probably will—I have been,” Remus said; “but I had to let you know. Had to. It's the truth, and the rest of it is this: I’m not good, Sirius, not good by half, but you make me better. And I want to be with you, I do. Even if I'm a coward who can't tell anyone, I want you. Can you forgive me for that?”

“Oh god,” Sirius groaned again. “What the fuck... You can’t just say stuff like that!”

“You deserved to know. I'm sorry.”

"No," Sirius said, smiling through whatever sadness. “Don't say you're sorry—say it again."

"Say..." Remus opened his mouth, and then closed it again. "That I'm in love with you?"

Sirius smacked him in the arm. "Don't make it a question this time around, you shithead! I mean, really—I’m sound? What the fuck, you romantic bastard, how am I supposed to follow that?!”

As he continued swearing like a sailor, Remus caught Sirius by the arm, pulling him in for a desperate kiss. “Tell me whatever you want,” he murmured against his lips. “Tell me the truth.”

“The truth?” Sirius pulled away, wiping under his eyes. “The truth is that I don’t half bloody like you, Moons... I love you.”

Please be happy, Tonya had written. And don’t ever anyone—ever—tell you what that means.

Okay, Ton, Remus thought; I’m happy. Hope you are too.

And because he was happy, Remus took a breath, then another. Then he balled up Tonya’s letter, reached across the bathroom, threw it into the toilet, and flushed it away.

“MOONS!” Sirius barked, scrambling to reach the toilet bowl. “What are you doing?!”

Inexplicably, Remus laughed. “Unless you’re going to throw-up, stop hugging the bog. That’s nasty.”

Still horrified, Sirius spun round and smacked him in the arm, this time much more forcefully.

“OW!” Remus winced. “What happened to loving me?”

“How could you do that? It was your letter! She—She was—!”

“It’s only a letter,” Remus sighed, slouching back against the wall. “Just because it’s gone, doesn’t mean I’m going to suddenly forget what it meant to me. If things were that easy, I would’ve burned every record I’ve ever owned by now.”

Sirius came away, and joined Remus with his back to the wall. “You won’t regret it?” He asked.

“Maybe one day,” he shrugged, “but right now I think I feel just fine.”

Sirius leaned his head against Remus' shoulder. "This is crazy, you know that? Us liking each other... Absolutely mental."

"You know me, 'Mental Moony'."

A dry chuckle; “I just mean, are you sure this is such a good idea? Like, I’ve got a lot of baggage.”

“And you’re talkin’ to the king of baggage.”

“Oh? Allow me to help lighten the load then.” Cheekily, Sirius slid his hand beneath Remus’ interlocking their fingers. Remus, unable to help himself, lifted his arm up and kissed the back of Sirius’ knuckles. Sirius watched him, and Remus let himself believe it was real yearning in his eyes.

“I don’t want you to leave,” Sirius said quietly.

Remus stroked the back of his hand with his thumb. “Won’t be for long. Three days. You guys follow on the first.”

“Yes, ‘you guys’ being the operative words.”

“Oh.” Guys, as in—more than one. The dorm would be just as much James and Peter’s as theirs, which meant no more laze-about days in bed, snogging through breakfast. They’d be lucky to get away with holding hands under the table.

“Things are gonna be such shit at school,” Sirius grumbled.

“… Maybe.”

“Can’t hide in the toilet forever.”

“Nope.”

“And I suppose it wouldn’t be smart to tell people.”

Remus looked away, too guilty to meet his lover's eye. He knew it wasn't what Sirius truly wanted—the hiding—but but he couldn't bring himself to say that everything would just be okay. He wasn't sure he'd be able to handle it; the extra voices in his head that would tell him all of the nasty things people would be thinking should they know the truth. He just... couldn't.

"I'm sorry, Sirius."

"Don't be." Sirius shook his head, instinctively tucking a piece of hair behind his ear. It was too short now though, and just flopped back into his face. “I'll take whatever you can give me, Moons. Besides, I don’t think I could ever say anything,” he started boldly; “I mean, fucking ‘therapy’ be damned, they’d still look at us differently, wouldn’t they?”

Right! Right, right, right...

“Exactly,” Remus said, relieved that the two of them were finally on the same page.

“This’ll be just for us then,” Sirius said, echoing their words from so many weeks ago. “At school we’ll be normal. Anywhere else we can be… well, whatever we want.”

Remus nodded. “Yes.” Yes, oh yes. He couldn’t help it. He thought of the man in the bookshop, and the way he'd looked at him. Then he thought of their friends, their classmates, their teachers. He wasn’t sure he could handle them looking at him like that. Even if they weren’t looks of hatred or revulsion, there would still be looks. It would always be there, in the front of their minds. If he said those words he’d be different forever, no matter how good they were to him. He and Sirius may have loved each other like anyone else, but they would always be… other. And after a lifetime of looking for a place to fit in, Remus wasn’t sure he could take it. Not just yet.

“Right then, school's off-limits. Nothing in public,” Sirius said again. “I suppose that’s that.”

Remus got a bad feeling. He stifled it. “Well, you know… we’re not at school yet.”

Sirius looked up. “Right…” Then he licked his lips.

Emboldened by their newfound confessions, Remus snaked an arm around Sirius’ waist and drew them close together under the soft morning light of the bathroom. He kissed him deeply, and Sirius responded in kind, opening his mouth into Remus like it was the only thing left to do. Their kiss was a needy one, but not like any they’d had in the beginning, when they were so desperate to have one another. This kiss was delicate because it might as well have been the last. Alone they could be whatever this was, but in front of others, they would be Remus and Sirius. Two parts of a single whole. Yes… that was exactly it. As far as anyone else was concerned, they were best friends, simple as that. And come the following morning, no one would ever know about what had happened during their summer together.

For now though, all Remus wanted was to feel Sirius against him and to commit every curve and line of his body to memory. Commit it to life. Make it real.

One more, he told himself, as Sirius traced his hands over his bare chest and pulled at his own clothes.

One more.

* * *

It was late afternoon by the time Giles had arrived to fetch him. As the old man hung back in the driveway to admire Mr. Potter’s Aston Martin and talk cars, Remus let himself be seen off by Mrs. Potter and her two—loving—sons.

“Now don’t you worry, Remus,” she told him kindly, “we’ll take good care of Sirius, just as you have been.”

“Oi, I took care of him too,” Sirius interjected, before shooting Remus a suggestive look. “If this tosser had it his way he’d eat beans on toast for every meal.”

“Explains the height,” James teased, shoving Sirius fondly; “All that protein.”

“Have a good train ride to school, and we’ll see you at Christmas, just like we talked about,” Effie said.

Remus nodded. “Thank you, Mrs. Potter.”

She hugged him, because that’s what mothers do, and Remus accepted it without any fuss. Afterwards he turned to his friends and offered James a hand.

“C’mon, none ‘a that!” James scoffed, before pulling him into a hug even tighter than his mother’s had been.

“You’re just the worst sometimes,” Remus grunted.

“The best-worst!” James added, pulling away.

Remus smiled softly and then it was time to turn to Sirius. He almost hugged him—raised his arms and everything—but Sirius just smacked his palm and grinned.

“Try not to enjoy your night alone in the dorm too much!” He said.

“Right…” Remus forced his smile to go wider. “Well, see you at school.”

As the others waved him off, Remus ignored the heavy feeling in his gut as he trudged down the driveway.

“Ready to go then?” Giles asked, ducking out of the front seat of the Aston.

“Mhm,” Remus answered blithely.

“Really is a handsome beast you’ve got there, Monty,” Giles said, shaking Mr. Potter’s hand in congratulations.

“You flatter me, Giles!” Mr. Potter turned on Remus and held out his hand. “Remus.”

He took it, and was immediately enveloped in another hug.

“Be well, son,” Mr. Potter told him.

Remus peeled himself away from his friend’s father, feeling the last of his patience chip away. “You too, sir.”

He tried to avoid looking back as the car pulled away from the drive, but in the end he couldn’t help himself. Just before Giles set off down the road, Remus turned around in his seat to find the small family of four standing on their stoop, Mr. and Mrs. Potter still waving goodbye.

They were too far for him to make out their exact expressions, but Remus suspected Sirius' was just as conflicted as his own.

"See you at school…" he murmured to no one.

"So," Giles asked later, as they made their way back through the city toward home; "How was your stay?"

"Good."

"Nice people, them Potters."

"Yeah. Real nice."

"You don't seem very chatty today. What, still hungover?"

"M'fine."

"Hmph. Would'a thought you'd be happier leaving your friend's place. Hope it's not school that's got you in such a mood."

Remus began fiddling with his thumb nail. "Gil…"

"Mm?"

He took a breath, not really believing that he was about to ask such a thing. It'd been years since she'd gone from the world, and he'd never cared before. Remus wondered if it made him a bad son, erring so vastly on the side of caution. But really, who wanted to know that their own mother was crazy?

"You remember how my mum was before she died?" He started; "How she would sometimes hear or... or see things that weren't there?"

Remus didn't look up, but he could sense Giles watching him in the rearview. "Whatchu mean, lad?"

"Well, I know she was sick, but… aren't there different kinds of sick?"

Appearing reluctant to answer, Giles cleared his throat. "You see, Remus, your mum, she…"

"She had a lot of doctors," Remus cut in. "Not just cancer doctors, either. I know what they said about her, I would read their notes."

"You were ten," Giles replied sharply. "What were you doing reading such things?"

"She was my mum. She was what I had."

The driver's shoulders slackened in the front seat. "Oh boy," Giles muttered. Then he sighed; "Alright, so you have questions. I dunno how knowledgable I'd be, it's really something you ought to talk to your father about, but don't you mistake none either, your mum was a good woman. She had a lot going on near the end, what with her sickness and all those stints in the cancer ward. Things like that can really take a toll on a person—on everyone. Change is expected, and she… Well, she always tried her best, didn't she? Some days were better than others, but your father never blamed her none for it. In fact he took care of her, right 'til the end."

"And before I was born? Was she normal then?"

"Pfft. What's normal? Nothin' I know. We're just people, lad, each trying to find our own way."

"I don't need you to comfort me," Remus said; "I just want to know if I should be worried."

"Why would you need to be worried?"

Remus looked out the window. "Never mind."

Giles hummed a bit like he wanted to say something else, but thought better of it. "Hey," he called instead, "why don't stop somewhere? Pick up lunch, whatever you'd like."

"No thanks, not really that hungry."

Giles frowned, but then perked up again. "I know, how 'bout we turn on the radio? This car could use some good tunes." Reaching for the dial, Giles flipped it into the first station and has the music filled the car, he flashed Remus a thumbs-up in the mirror. "See! Much better!"

Remus couldn't quite agree.

'Ooh, I feel love, I feel love,
I feel love, I feel love,
I feel love…'

The irony, he thought, as he dropped his head against the window.

“Augh, dammit,” Giles grumbled later, as the road ahead of them turned up closed for construction and traffic began to pack in behind them like dominoes. “Always gotta be doing something new, this bloody city. Them bloody ringways can’t be ready fast enough. Hold on, gonna take the route through Westminster,” he said.

In the back seat, Remus was only half listening as he flipped through a book of mediaeval poetry Mrs. Potter had given him. James and Sirius had thought it horribly swot-like, but Remus still needed a topic for his summer essay and was hoping he could finish the entire thing on the train. Sirius, naturally, hadn’t bothered with his.

The sun, the sister of the moon, from the south, the translation read; Her right hand cast over heaven’s rim; No knowledge she had of where her home should be, The moon knew not what might was his, The stars knew not where their stations were.

Remus hadn’t the faintest idea what it really meant, but as he read, the words stuck with him. He was already several pages along when he flipped back to them, reading them over and over again. Sirius would like this, he decided, if he just gave it a chance. But Tonya—she would’ve loved it. She’d have read it and understood every word straight away, and yet if you’d have asked her what it meant, her answer would undoubtedly be her own. Remus could almost hear it now; And the sun's the roaming heart who's lost her lover. She's clearly begging the stars to bring her love back to her, but they're lost to eternity too. It's a story of two soul-bound lovers doomed never to meet, and the bleeding hearts who watch from far away.

She was a storyteller, that Tonya, or she had been. Sort of like Sirius. Remus wasn’t a storyteller, he was merely a listener, and if Tonya had told him that she was the sun and he was the moon, he would’ve believed her. So would have Tomny, he suspected. Once.

Remus shut his book.

He did not miss Tonya’s letter, but maybe if he’d kept it, he’d have an excuse for what he was about to do.

“Gil, can you stop the car?” Remus pleaded suddenly, leaning forward in his seat.

"You feeling peckish now?"

“No, but there’s something I gotta do. If you'd just let me out here, I can meet you back at the house later. Won't even take long.”

In the rearview, Giles gave him an incredulous look. “Let you out—pardon me?! Absolutely not, I only just got you back. Nah, we’re gonna go home, and then you’re gonna get yourself sorted so you can actually make your train on time this year.”

“Please, I swear I’ll—”

“You can stop your whinging now, I ain’t letting you step foot outta this car until we’re back on Lupin property. Now you best just sit back and enjoy the ride ‘cause that’s my final word on the matter.”

Remus slumped back into his seat feeling frustrated. Outside, the city flew by, illustrated by all its hustling and bustling. In a few minutes they’d be over the River Thames and his best chance will have slipped away. He knew he shouldn’t want to push his luck, it’d already been sliced so thinly, and he had real responsibilities now, to both his friends and school. But he couldn’t leave without trying one more time. One more.

“So tell me,” Giles started, as the car rolled to a stop before a red light; “What’s your schedule this term look like?”

Wrenching off his seatbelt, Remus threw the door open. “SORRY, GIL!” He hollered, as he leapt out onto the road and swung the Roll's door shut after himself. He only just caught the tip of Giles’ flabbergasted sputter, but before he could be stopped, Remus was streaking down the middle of the street. Slipping past cars filled with surprised passengers, he finally scooted round the pavement, dodging pedestrians as he ran. Giles wouldn’t chase him, but he’d surely box his ears when he returned. It was a consequence he’d deal with later—for now he needed to find the nearest tube station.

After hopping the gates, he took the circle line toward Aldgate, and from there he walked. Being there, in that old neighbourhood he’d gotten himself lost in all those years ago, brought back a rush of memories, some more painful than others. He passed the shops where he and Tonya would buy bread daily the summer before and remembered her dancing in the street. Most days they didn’t even have the money to buy anything, it was just about finding something to do, and Tonya had had a knack for making even the most mundane things magical. After passing the shop, he happened upon the all-hours corner shop where they’d buy their fags whenever they ran out in the middle of the night. He could remember the time he and Tomny and Doss had made the trip over, only to be mugged not five feet from the shop doors. It'd been a bitter memory for a long time, but eventually they'd laughed about it. Remus might've stopped in to pick up a carton of cigarettes as a peace offering, except that he'd left everything behind in the Rolls, including his wallet.

Jump me then, he told his ironic fate. Rob me, beat me. I've nothing to give you.

But no one bothered him, and he carried on. The streets he knew like the back of his hand, but even more so, he knew that entertaining the idea of some miraculous return was stupid. Tomny had told him himself not to come, he'd been crystal clear, but Remus was too busy feeling sorry for himself to care. As he shuffled up the familiar streets he made a solemn promise that if Tomny could tell him in person that they were done, he'd leave and never come back. He just needed to see his face when he said it.

The building that housed Tomny's flat looked the exact same when he finally stopped outside its rusted front gate. Most of the apartments had their windows open—desperate for some relief from the heat—but the window to Tomny's place still had the air-con from last summer fitted in place. To anyone else it was an old aluminium box. To Remus it was a memory.

Pushing open the squeaky gate, he started up the pavement, stepping over the weeds that had burst through the cracks in the cement. A kid, maybe eleven or twelve, was sitting on the front steps, fanning himself with one hand and smoking a cigarette with the other. They eyed each other but Remus just approached the door buzzer and hit the flat's number. There was no accompanying buzz which meant the ringer was broken again. Sighing, he turned to the kid and jutted his chin out.

"You live here?"

The boy took a stubborn drag on his cigarette, which was longer than any of his fingers. "Who wants tah know?"

"Right. Tomny still live 'ere?"

"Who wants tah know??"

Remus set his jaw. It unsettled him that this child might know Tomny —that he might've been recruited into the group like anyone else or picked up because he was pitiful. It'd been easier to excuse a lesser age when they were all small, but they were grown now.

“Lupin. Tell him Lupin’s come to see him.”

The kid looked away. “Tell ‘im yerself. He’s out.”

“Gee, thanks,” Remus scoffed, turning away and dropping down the steps. While trying to decide what to do next—did he really have the time to sit and wait while just hoping that Tomny would show up?—he noticed a single flower that had broken through the cement with the other weeds, its pure white petals shining in the sun. Feeling the urge to reach out and pick it, Remus stopped before the weed and stared at it until another voice called out. It was not with kindness.

“What you doin' ‘ere?!”

When he looked up, Remus found Lee standing next to the gate. His brown mop of curls were gone, shaved nearly to the skin and giving him a more gaunt, skull-like appearance. Despite the heat, he was wearing jeans and heavy leather boots. His shirt was missing both sleeves and torn over the left side of his chest, though it was just as likely to be for aesthetic purposes than anything unfortunate.

“H-Hey, Lee…” Remus felt a surge of happiness rise in his chest; “Hey!”

“Don’t ‘hey’ me,” Lee scowled; “I asked what you were doin’ ‘ere!”

Before Remus could even begin to answer Lee had looked past him, practically spitting as he yelled;

“Darry! Get yer sorry arse inside before I crack ya a new one. And stop stealin' those fags!”

Instantly the boy was on his feet, abandoning his half-smoked cigarette as he opened the building’s front door and scuttled inside.

Looking anything but satisfied, Lee rubbed a hand across his face.

“So? Don’t tell me you’ve gone mute.”

“Uh…” Remus swallowed. “I—I came to see you guys. You know, for the summer…”

Lee checked an imaginary watch, the only hint of the boy he once was that Remus had witnessed so far. “I’d say you’re pretty late then.”

“Heh, yeah… my bad, I guess. Is—uhm… Is Tomny around?”

Eyes tightening, Lee pushed open the gate slowly and the metal screamed in protest. “What you want wiff Tom?”

“I’ve just got some things to ask him.”

“What sort 'a things?”

Remus felt his jaw begin to tremble. Stop being such a namby, he told himself; This is Lee for Christ’s sake!

“Look Lee, I don’t know what you’ve heard but—”

Lee started up the path, stopping with barely a foot of space between them. “And what would I have heard?” He demanded sharply. “Oh, c’mon now—don’t tell me we're still keepin’ secrets? All this time and all that bullshit and we’re still not fessin’ up to one another, Lu?”

“I don’t know what you mean.”

“Fucking hell—jus’ cut the bullshit!" Lee barked. "I know everything! Yeah, that’s right. How long did ya think Tomny could stand keepin' it a secret? Always covering for you and your scrawny arse. You know, it made a lot more sense when he finally told all of us. Everything from Christmas and the bleedin’ summers before that—all the favouritism! All the coddling! And then you up and betray us. Did you sell us out, Lu? Did ya?!”

Remus scrambled for a response, but it was as though his brain had short-circuited. He had no idea what Lee was talking about, but if he was this angry then perhaps it was just best to roll over and admit to all of it.

“Lee, I’m tellin’ you," he pleaded; "I never meant to fuck anyone over. All that stuff with Tonya, it was just—”

Lee’s eyes shot wide very suddenly, appearing almost cynical. “Woah, ‘Tonya’—haven’t heard from that bitch in a while," he sneered. "Most of us thought she’d up 'n run off wiff you. But that couldn’t be true because well, yer you and she’s just bottom of the barrel scum like the rest of us.”

Remus was stupefied; “Wha—”

“Must be so hard lovin’ the town bike. Did you take her for a ride, Lu? How’d that cunt taste? Was it rich enough for you—or was her flavour of whore too much for your precious palate?”

The suddenness of Remus' rage nearly choked him. He grabbed Lee by the front of the shirt and yanked him forward; "DON'T—!" He snarled; "T-Talk about her like that again and I'll—"

Lee met his anger with the flick of a knife. He whipped it out of his pocket in one smooth move, and the next thing Remus knew he had a switchblade pressed to the centre of his cheek.

"You'll what?!"

Oh god. Remus released his hold of Lee's shirt immediately and tried backing away, but the other boy only got closer, reaching around the back of his neck to fist the hair there and pin Remus in place against his blade.

"You gonna kick my ass, Lu?! Gonna put me in my rightful place? Don't you know who's neighbourhood you're in, ya fucking fairy?!"

Remus squirmed, but the knife was pressing a groove into his cheek, seconds from breaking skin. Any closer and Lee'd take his eye.

"Get off me!" He cried, attempting a push. Lee barely shifted his weight, and bore down on Remus even more, squeezing his neck tight enough to draw a cry from his lips. Lee laughed then, like a rabid animal pushed to the brink.

"Should I give you a scar to match the one Benny's boys gave you?" He seethed through his teeth. "Send you home to Daddy with one eye? See how well-received you are then?! Or I know, how 'bout we real dig deep—see if you fuckin' bleed blue? Couldn't blend in with us mongrels then, could ya? Nah—we bleed red."

"Lee, please! It's bloody me!"

Lee shook him, and Remus felt the sting of the knife's cut. "That's the problem, don't you see?!" Lee barked. "You're a betrayer, Lu, and you know what happens to betrayers in the East End… That's right..."

Remus felt something trickle down his cheek. Please.

"You should'a never come back here, Remus Lupin."

He took a breath; he held it. Lee's eyes were pin pricks; his mouth twitched feverishly. Then he bared his teeth, like he might rip Remus' throat with them. Unable to do anything else, Remus closed his eyes. He wished he were somewhere else, anywhere else.

Shall I sing to you, darling?

Save me, Remus pleaded. Someone save me.

“Don't be a fucking pansy, open your eyes! Look at me!"

He thought of Sirius, of how they’d confessed their love for one another just that morning. Was this the price? To gain his love he had to lose another’s?

"LOOK AT ME, LU!"

You’re the whole bloody sky, Sirius had said that to him once. Had he loved him then? ... Remus hoped so. He wondered if this was how it’d felt for Sirius to face down his mother. To face someone who ought to love you, and to have no means of satiating them. To be utterly alone.

“Open your fucking eyes, you fucking prick!"

Save me, Sirius, he begged. Save me.

"Last warning... You better open your goddamn eyes or I swear I’ll take this knife and pluck 'em out myself—!”

“LEE!”

For a moment Remus thought his prayers had been answered. That Sirius had somehow followed him all the way from Finchley, and had appeared in his defence like a knight with a sword. But Sirius didn’t know the End, and Sirius didn’t know Lee.

“Fucking let go of him!” Tomny snarled, jumping the gate entirely and rushing toward them. He faltered slightly when he saw the knife, and presumably the blood cascading down Remus’ cheek, but not enough to back down. “Lee, that’s enough!” He ordered. “Put down the knife.”

“No!” Lee wailed breathlessly, wrenching Remus’ head back further. “He’s a liar, Tom. H-He—ones like hims are the ones who—”

“You’re strung out, Lee,” Tomny said firmly. “You don’t know what you’re saying. That’s Lu, your friend.”

“No!” Lee hissed again, each breath like a laboured shudder. “He’s a rat—a f-f-fake!”

“He’s a kid. Now let ‘im go… before I beat your fuckin' arse into the dirt."

Like a predator turned prey, Lee ripped the knife away from Remus' cheek, pointing it straight at Tomny's chest. "STAY AWAY!" He shrilled, but Tomny wasn't fazed. The moment the blade had left Remus' cheek he stepped up to them and grabbed Lee by the wrist. He wrenched it terribly, until Remus was sure the bone would snap, but Lee only gave a yelp and dropped the switchblade onto the pavement with a clatter.

"No!" Lee screeched, diving for the knife and taking Remus with him. He'd almost gotten it too, until Tomny used his boot to punt it across the lawn. With his entire body, he grabbed Lee around the middle and for a moment they wrestled, Remus still caught between them.

"Let 'him—go!" Tomny grunted, before delivering a sharp punch into Lee's stomach. The other boy immediately folded around his fist, finally releasing Remus, and Tomny caught Lee as he fell. Remus, with no strength left in his legs, plummeted back onto his arse in the yellowed grass, shaking all over.

"There, go on then," Tomny sighed, as Lee doubled-over on the ground and threw up. He was crying—whimpering really, and after his stomach was empty, Lee turned to Tomny's legs and held them, sobbing into the frayed hems of his trousers like a wretched child.

"I'mm'sorryyyyy," he slurred. "I'mmmm'ssssoooorrryyyyyy…"

Remus could only watch. He thought he might be crying, but when he touched his cheek he found it was blood. He wasn't even shocked, there was so room for it. Seeing Lee, who was normally full of such light and happiness, reduced to such a state; it was like a nightmare made real.

"I know," Tomny muttered, rubbing Lee's back roughly. "I know, mate."

Nothing happened for a long time. Remus simply sat there, frozen, and Tomny comforted Lee the only way he knew how. He did not look at Remus, and when Lee's cries had finally filtered off into little more than pitiful moans, he straightened up.

"Darry!" He called. "I know you're there. Come on out."

Remus wrenched his head around. The boy from before reappeared in the building doorway, looking weary-eyed and guilty. Tomny beckoned him over, and Darry quickly scuttled down onto the path, moving around Remus like he was afraid he might reach out and bite him.

“Take Lee inside,” Tomny told him, hauling his friend to his feet. “Make sure he stays there, right? Lock ‘im in the bedroom if ya have to, at least until he’s over the roughest bits.”

Darry nodded and meekly let Lee drape an arm around his small shoulders for support. It took some time for the pair to hobble to the end of the front path, and more still to get up the stairs, but eventually Lee and Darry made it through the front door, and it shut behind them with a creak. Remus stared after them for a long while, clutching the front of his shirt and trying to slow his out of control heartbeat. Then suddenly, a body blocked the sun from his face and Remus turned back to find Tomny offering him a hand.

“Stand up,” he said gravely.

Tentatively, Remus reached a shaky hand up and Tomny grabbed him. His hand was as warm and strong as he remembered, but the moment Remus was on his feet again he let go and stuck both in his pockets.

“What are you doing ‘ere, Lu?” Tomny asked. He sounded tired, which was somehow worse than if he'd sounded angry.

“I… Lee, he—”

“Lee didn’t call you 'ere,” Tomny cut-in, mercilessly. “Lee’s too strung-out on oxys to do much of anything these days.”

“When?” Remus asked, heart breaking. “Why?”

“You mean when did it happen? Or why did he start wanting to mark you up like an old tire? He wouldn’t have, if you hadn’t ‘a come.”

Remus felt a lump form in his throat. “I’m sorry,” he said sadly. “But I couldn’t just leave.”

“Why not?”

“ ‘Cause I made a promise…" He half-whispered. "I couldn't let you stay angry.”

Tomny let out a long breath, almost softening. “ ‘ere,” he said, before drawing a plaid handkerchief out of his pocket and passing it over.

“For your… cheek.”

Remus let Tomny stuff the fabric into his hands. He balled it up at first, embarrassed somehow, before pressing it to his cheek. It smarted against the cut, but when he winced he was rewarded by Tomny closing the distance between them.

“Doesn’t look too deep,” he mumbled, tilting Remus’ face up by his chin. He withdrew quickly enough, and when Remus was sure he’d wiped most of the blood from his face, he passed the handkerchief back.

“For you to remember me by,” he said snarkily.

Impossibly, the corner of Tomny’s mouth lifted into a smile. It was gone a second later.

“I knew you would come,” he said. “Seeing you last night, I jus' knew it.”

“I don’t really remember what I said,” Remus told him after, “but I knew that I saw you. And I couldn’t go back without saying my piece.”

“And what’s that?”

“That I’m sorry. I am, Tom. You gotta believe me.”

Glancing around, Tomny scratched the side of his head. For a moment Remus thought he might rebuff him again, but then he was nodding. It was solemn, but it was something.

“Orright,” Tomny muttered, “let’s just get ya out of 'ere then.”

Giving a little grunt that meant ‘follow me’, Tomny turned and started down the pavement, straight out the gate. After a final glance at the flat, Remus had no choice but to follow.

Lee's right, I made a mistake coming back, he thought as he trailed behind his friend. Tomny hadn’t said a single thing to him since the flat and suddenly Remus was worried that he’d never get to tell him the things he’d come to say. More than anything he wanted Tomny to know how sorry he was; sorry if anything he did or didn’t do lead to Tonya’s departure and sorrier still that the only letter she’d left was for him rather than the man she was supposed to be in love with.

Seeing Lee so angry had changed something else within Remus too. He'd expected anger from Tomny, but not the others. As they walked he wracked his brain for meaning of what Lee had said, and when the realisation finally hit him, it hit like a train. Lee knew he'd been lying about everything; where he'd grown up, his family, where he went to school, how much money he had. He knew—and Tomny had been the one to tell them.

Does this make you the betrayer, or the betrayed? Vicious Moony asked. You should be angrier, should you not? Is it not your turn? Have we not been dealt enough injustices?

Remus ignored it. There was absolutely no 'we'.

Ahead of him, Tomny stopped walking and cleared his throat. " 'ere."

Looking up, Remus found that they'd made it to a caff. The words 'Workman's Cafe' were written across the front window in chipped paint and a neon sign hung over the door, though most of the bulbs were busted as though someone had taken a bat to it ages ago.

"What are we…?"

"Well?" Tomny said, holding the door open for him impatiently. "You want to eat off the road or off a plate?"

Eyeing his friend (friend?) Remus slipped past him and walked inside. There was only a few other patrons inside, sitting amongst the cracked leather booths and checkerboard flooring while they sipped their coffees or read the paper. A radio was humming quietly in the background and everyone was keeping to themselves for the most part, not bothering to give them a second glance as they strolled in to the sound of a door chime. They took a seat in a corner booth and not long after a man wearing a grease-stained apron around his rather thick middle came out from the kitchen and leaned over the counter.

"Whatchu want?" He grunted across the cafe.

Tomny glanced at Remus briefly before answering; "Two chocolate shakes and a round 'a chips."

"Oh no, I don't have any money," Remus said.

Tomny arched a single brow. Then he turned back to the cook. "Yeah, that'll be two shakes and the chips."

Leaning back into his seat sheepishly, Remus kept quiet as the cook shuffled back into the kitchen. “Tom, what are we doing here?” He asked finally.

Plucking a toothpick from the tin at the end of the table, Tomny set it between his teeth and crossed his arms. “Figured ya wouldn’t show up on my doorstep after all this time if ya didn’t want to talk. So I brought us 'ere—now talk. Why’d you come back, Lu?”

It still hurt to hear Tomny speak so coldly, but Remus was done playing meek.

“I came to make things right,” he said firmly. “I’m tired of everything being so wrong.”

“What things? What’s wrong?”

“Everything’s wrong!" He exclaimed, before wincing and lowering his voice; "We’re all so messed up—I mean Lee just held a knife on me, what the fuck was that about?”

Tomny looked away, absent-mindedly chewing on his toothpick. “Some stuff’s happened, innit.”

“What stuff?”

“What’s it matter?”

Remus took a deep breath. “Look Tom, I know you didn’t want me to come back and I’m sorry about Tonya, I am—but I’m really tryin’ here. If you could just tell me something—anything—then maybe I could understand. And if after we’ve talked, you still don’t want me here, well… Well then I’ll leave and you’ll never have to see me again. I swear it.”

Tomny gave him a hard look. “I told everyone about you,” he confessed suddenly. “Where you come from, how you tried to hide it… I told them.”

Betrayed, the voice seethed. Betrayed—betrayed—betrayed!

Remus forced it down. He was hurt, but being hurt had never helped him solve anything.

“I… I already know that, Tom," he said quietly. "Lee, he—he said some stuff…”

“So what, yer not mad?”

“Would it change anything if I was? If I said I wasn’t mad would you forgive me for Tonya?”

Tomny reached up and pulled the toothpick from his mouth before rubbing his face and giving a low moan. “Ahhh, Lu… for Christ's sake, I’m not mad at you for Tonya.”

“Then why’d you tell me to stay away?" He demanded. "Why’d you say you didn’t want me around?!”

“ ‘Cause I didn’t know what else to do.” Withdrawing his hands, Tomny sniffled a bit and shook his head. “Orright, so I admit it. I was mad in the beginning—angry that she would leave an explanation for you—someone she should've barely known—and not me. Me! All I got was a bloody note pinned to the fridge asking me to post it to you and I was fucking pissed off! Not even ashamed to say that I almost burned it, but then fate had a good laugh. I hadn’t paid the gas bill 'n couldn’t find a fucking lighter in the entire flat. Tonya had started hiding ‘em.”

Remus almost laughed himself. He almost felt like telling him that the letter had been burned anyway. “It’s okay.”

“No, it's not,” Tomny said grimly. “I was jealous—jealous of your connection with her. Jealous I could never give her what she wanted while you just made it look so easy. Didn't really think I was before, but… yeah.”

“I’m sorry,” Remus said again, because what else was there to say when your friend was hurting so? “But you have to know Tom—she was your girlfriend! You loved each other and I—I might’ve liked her but I would never—”

Tomny put a hand up to silence him. A moment later the cook shambled over with their milkshakes and a basket of chips and left them on the table. He'd eaten nothing all day and still Remus wasn’t the least bit hungry.

“I know nothing happened between you,” Tomny said finally; “I know. I wasn’t jealous ‘cause of that. I sort of… fuck. I dunno, I'd gotten it into my head that she’d said something or told you something she wouldn't tell me! I thought that maybe you knew she was gonna leave and you didn’t bother saying anything.”

“I didn’t know,” Remus swore. "If I had, I would've done anything to make her stay."

“Yeah, I know." Tomny pulled the toothpick from his lips again, flicking it away. "But you were gone and I couldn’t be sure. It was coward’s shit—but then when I thought of how it would feel to see your face and think of her, I… I told you to stay away because I was a coward, and I’m sorry too. But I think it was probably for the best now anyway.”

Remus sat back in the booth. He knew what Tomny meant.

“What happened with Lee, Tom?”

Tomny began stirring his milkshake with his straw, but didn’t drink any of it. “Ian died,” he said stiffly. “Last May. It was an accident—or it should’ve been. Lee’s been pretty fucked up over it since.”

“How’d he die?” Remus asked, the skin of his arms turning to gooseflesh.

“Got jumped in an alley. Basic shite, really.” Tomny smiled sardonically, but it become a deep frown a moment later. He looked out the window, eyes glassy. “You remember when I told you he got someone a few months ago? He didn’t mean it, but that someone must’ve been important to someone else, who knew someone else and…” Tomny took a breath. “These things tend to snowball around ‘ere. It’s always an eye for an eye, tit for tat. The papers and those fucks in government like to make it sound like it’s one great free-for-all with everyone killing each other all the time, but there’s rules! You can’t just take someone out and not expect retaliation—even if it was just a stupid fuckin’ mistake. You don’t start flingin’ bullets unless you have the muscle to back it up, and Ian—he was just another dumb kid. I thought it would be better to get ‘im out of the city, but he didn’t want to go without Lee and Lee kept insisting that we could protect him until everything blew over.”

“Lee asked you to hide him?”

“S’not an unfair thing to ask, innit? Not from someone you supposedly take orders from.”

Tomny leaned his forehead on one hand, looking haggard. Remus looked away. Someone had carved out a smiley face on the surface of the table. “So Lee blames you…”

“… ‘e blames himself mostly, but yeah, me too. Lee was there when Ian was killed. He had to hold him while he bled out. I guess when he died something just… switched in him. It was like the whole world had become his enemy. It took everything—" Tomny smacked the table's surface; "to keep him from going after the guys who got Ian, but if he had it would've jus' started up another fuckin' endless cycle until everyone was just—just fuckin' dead. Throwing 'imself into work wasn't enough, he needed someone else to be mad at—something to distract him—so I… I told him about you."

Though those that are betray'd, do feel the treason sharply, yet the traitor stands in worse case of woe.

It wasn't the voice this time, but a memory. The quote was Shakespeare, one of the plays in his First Folio. Remus had read it in his classics class last term. It'd originally struck a chord with him because of Regulus, but he'd never brought it up out of fear of upsetting Sirius further. Hearing that your betrayer being in the worse situation is not something one wants to think about when they've been betrayed, but Tomny wouldn't have understood it anyway, so again Remus kept quiet.

"I'm sorry, Lu," Tomny said, after Remus had been quiet for some time. "I did wrong by you. I promised I'd look after you, and I failed."

Despite himself and all of his anger, Remus shook his head. "Can't look after everyone, Tom."

"Hard lesson."

Remus ached. Ached for Lee, and the brother he'd lost. Also for Tomny, who'd clearly lost some part of himself that he couldn't place. He ached for Sirius, who deserved better than him, and then he ached for himself, for Remus Lupin, the nameless queer, not queer enough boy that had everything and nothing all at once.

"How are the others?" Remus asked stonily.

"Seesaw and Vint are fine. They're still kickin' around."

"Yeah, saw them in Camden."

"They were probably on a job."

Remus bit his lip. Jobs, stabbings, deaths, he knew nothing about any of it.

“And Doss?”

“Doss got out. Moved to Cardiff with that girlfriend of his. ‘er family runs a sheep farm there.”

“He’s a farmer now?”

“Guess so. I think it suits him some though, don’t you?”

Remus smiled meekly and finally pulled his milkshake toward him. It was more milk than shake but it was cool when he sipped it and the chocolate was comforting.

“I’m sorry I betrayed you, Remus,” Tomny said. “I’m sorry I took the easy way out and told everyone your secret and I’m sorry I took everything out on you before that.”

Swallowing, Remus looked up at him—at the man he’d loved and admired for so long. “You know, Tom, people keep telling me they’re sorry. So many sorries. So fucking many that I’m getting real sick ‘n tired of hearing it. I’d rather we just be friends again.”

“I think I’d like that too,” Tomny said softly, then; “I really missed you, Lu.”

“I missed you too.”

Tomny smiled and picked up a chip, popping it into his mouth. Then he wiped his hands and pushed the entire basket aside. “What d'ya say we get outta 'ere? Do something fun—for ol’ time’s sake?”

Remus took one final gulp of his milkshake before doing the same. “Definitely.”

Grinning, Tomny threw a few quid on the table and they got up, and just like that they were practically chasing one another out of the caff. Remus had forgotten how easy it was to go from strangers to brothers in the End. It was almost refreshing.

At first they just roamed, picking off the memories one by one until they just felt like moments again. The corner shop, the closed down bowling alley three streets over that'd been busted into so many times it was practically public property now, the mattress store with bars over its windows and a cut out of a half-naked lady laying on every bed to entise potenial customers into coming inside. It was enough for Remus just to walk, but eventually Tomny was leading him into an alley where he dipped behind an old skip bin and came back with a milk crate full of spraypaint.

“You just keep these here for emergencies?” Remus ragged, already sorting through the old and dented cans.

“They’re Lee’s from a bygone era. He hid ‘em ‘ere after the city kept painting over that mural he’d done over on Quaker Street. Not sure how much is left in ‘em, but figure we could do at least a bit ‘a damage.”

Remus shook one of the cans, hearing its metallic rattling. “What we waiting for then?”

They found themselves an empty brick wall in between the alley and a street of row houses and got to work. Only a few of the cans had any paint in them and most of the nozzles were clogged after months of sitting out in the elements, but Remus wasn’t an artist anyway. Using a bright piss-yellow, he painted the words ‘Mercury is God’ over the brick’s rough surface. Tomny opted for a more traditional approach, tagging the wall with a great big ‘T’ and the words ‘Rent is piracy’.

“Pink Floyd said that their ‘Dark Side of the Moon’ album was partly inspired by graffiti,” Remus said as they worked.

“Hm. Graffiti is kind of like music, innit?” Tomny said, pausing to admire the ‘Townshend wuz here’ Remus was finishing on his end. “Sort of like another language—like a secret code for the beatniks and the underdogs.”

“What do you mean?”

Tomny pointed across from them, to a wall on the other side of the alley that had already been tagged with layers and layers of paint. Everything from handprints to warped cartoons to peace signs inside the Star of David. ‘Free your mind’ the wall said, and ‘Wall Street is here if you say it so’. There was also a badly drawn portrait of John Lennon with ‘Lenin’ written beneath, and a large portion of the wall's centre was dedicated to the words ‘Realise’, ‘Real Eyes’, and ‘Real Lives’.

“When you see stuff like that, what does it make you think?” Tomny asked.

“That… whoever painted it did a lot of acid?”

“Ha, yer being funny, but I know you see deeper than that. That’s the kind’a shit those dickheads in government think when they see it. They don’t see the history there—history of people who can’t afford their fuckin’ rent or aren’t qualified for the jobs they say they’re creating. These people—they’re the ones dyin’ in their factories and going hungry jus’ so their kids can eat.”

Remus concentrated on a tag that read ‘limbo’. Above it was a single dove with an olive branch in its beak. Below it, a body falling into a black hole.

“I don’t mean to sound preachy,” Tomny said, turning back to his wall. “I don’t think you’re like that—no matter where ya grew up.”

“I get it now though,” Remus said, raising his paint can. As he drew he thought of all the friends he’d earned and lost over the last couple years. None of them were all that different really, even if others would’ve looked between them and said they were as separate as the light and dark sides of the moon. Each of them smiled when they were happy and cried when sad, and in between both, they all experienced the same myriad of emotions; pride, cheerfulness, irritation, rage, love. It was all there. He’d seen it.

Busy humming a tune under his breath, Tomny walked up behind him. “ ‘Marauders’,” he read; “What’s it mean?”

“Just some band. They’re pretty small so I doubt you’d know ‘em,” Remus smiled, finishing the tag beneath it.

“Mhm,” Tomny chuckled knowingly, “and how ‘bout that one—‘The Boys of the End’. That another band?”

“Nope, but maybe one day it’ll be a song.”

“Well, I at least hope it’s a good song.”

“Me too."

Suddenly a police siren looped behind them and a single officer got out of his car, barking at them; “Hey, you! Kids—vandals! Stop right there!”

Tomny whistled in smug amusement. “Oi, Bobby Blue, where were you when I nearly got jumped last week!” He shouted, throwing his spray can and hitting the front of the police car with a clang.

“Tom!” Remus gasped. “You can’t just throw cans at the cops!”

“Sure I can,” Tomny shrugged, pointing with his thumb, “jus’ did it.”

“ALRIGHT, AGAINST THE WALL!” The officer barked, but Tomny just snatched Remus’ can and threw that as well before taking his hand and pulling him into the alley.

“C’mon, Lu—run!” He wailed in glee. The siren whooped behind them, but Remus just held onto Tomny, pumping his other arm as they emerged out the alley’s side onto a dingy neighbourhood street. At the very end was a churchyard surrounded by huge hedges. They threw themselves over its low wrought-iron gate and sped off across the lawn until they were convinced they’d put enough distance between them and the cop, and were able to tumble gleefully against the soft grass.

“Reckoned we outpaced him by a mile, Lu!” Tomny howled, rolling around on his back. Wiping tears of laughter from the corners of his eye, Remus leaned up against a large oak tree, admiring the leaves Tomny had succeeded in getting stuck in his hair.

“It’s what we get for picking a place right out in the open,” he chuffed.

“Ah, well at least we left our mark.” Sighing contentedly, Tomny stared up at the tree branches hanging over them. He’d stopped right next to him on his back, his head nearly touching Remus’ thigh. “Man, I forgot how fun jus’ causin’ chaos was.”

“You should come back to school with me,” Remus teased, “there’s plenty of chaos to go around.”

Tomny slapped him on the thigh; “Ah, but before you know it you’ll be done and causin' chaos right back 'ere again, won'tcha?”

“That’s the plan.”

“And just when do you leave for this poncy school of yers?”

“Thirty-first. Few days from now.”

“I see. And when ya return you’ll be headed to university, I expect?”

Remus pressed his tongue to the inside of his cheek. “Dunno actually. My friends and I, we’re sorta thinking that we could give music a try.”

“Really?” Tomny raised his eyebrows.

“Well, we’ve mostly just been playing at the idea—and we don’t actually have any full songs yet, but what we do have it’s—uhm—well yeah, it’s pretty good.”

“I believe it,” Tomny told him, “but Lu, will you do me a favour?”

“Hm?”

“Remember me when you’re looking down from the top.”

Tomny winked, and maybe it was the thrill of running from the cops for the first time in ages, or the fact that the sun was peeking through the leaves just enough to light up the gold in his dishwater blonde hair, or that Remus had just come to terms with leaving this part of himself in the dark—in the closet. Whatever it was, it had him absolutely ruined. Without a second thought, Remus leaned over and pressed his mouth to that little scar on Tomny’s upper lip.

For a second, Tomny’s lips parted, and he could've almost believed that they were kissing, but then he felt a hand on his chest.

Pushing him away.

Remus came to his senses all at once. He bolted upright, horrified by himself—horrified by the entire world. Tomny didn’t say anything, which was worse than yelling, and as he sat up on the grass, Remus prepared himself for the reality that he’d just ruined everything they’d only just begun to patch up.

But when Tomny turned around, he didn’t look mad or repulsed. Instead he scooted back up against the tree until they were shoulder to shoulder against its trunk, both looking down at their laps.

“I love ya, Lu,” he said softly, “but not like that.”

“I’m sorry,” Remus breathed. Terrified. "I-I..."

Reaching out, Tomny took his hand and gave it a squeeze. “Hey, s’nothing to be sorry for.”

Tomny held his hand until he’d stopped shaking. It was cool in the shade of the garden and not even the typical honking of nearby London traffic could be heard among the hedges. It was as though they were the only two people in the entire world.

"I don't know what's wrong with me," Remus whimpered. "I'm not… but there's Sirius, and oh god—I just kissed you!"

"Worried about the posh boy, eh? I'm sure he won't mind."

"You haven't met Sirius."

Tomny chuckled. He was still holding Remus' hand and gave it a little squeeze. "No, but I have a feeling he'll understand."

Pulling his hand away, Remus covered his face. Fuck. Shit—Fuck!

“Remus," Tomny said fondly, "I also wouldn’t worry much if I were you.”

Reluctantly, he peeled his hands away. “… Worry about what?”

Tomny grinned at him, showing off both dimples. “Even if you're not my type, you’re still totally going to rake in a ton of ass when you become a sexy musician.”

Snorting embarrassingly, Remus dropped his head back against the trunk of the old oak. He thought he might cry out of relief, and then he realised he already was.

“In that case,” he wept, “you’re going to regret not kissing me back, ya fucking prick.”

Next to him, Tomny raised both hands up behind his head, smirking casually up at the sky.

“You’re probably right.”

* * *

31st August 1977 – Two days later…

The morning he was supposed to leave for school, Remus got a letter in the post. The return address was of number 38 Burtonhole Lane, London, home of Potter Cottage, and it was written in Sirius’ beautiful scrawl. The letter was everything Remus had hoped.

Dear Moony,

(or alternatively, a one Mr. Dean)

THERE! I'm finally writing you back now so take that, ya dickhead! Also, I cannot BELIEVE how fast post travels in London. I asked Prongs how long he figured it would take to post something to you and he said two days—TWO DAYS?!?! Pure insanity. Next thing you know we'll be sending them in tubes through the air. Prongs thinks it's a bit daft that I'm writing to you instead of calling now that I can do that too, but this is a goodbye letter, so it should be formal. And yes, you heard me right, this is last one. No point in sending post if I'm always around to regale you guys with my beautiful voice in person, right? Yessiree, September 1st marks our last year at school, Moons, and then you're in for it. No more holidays apart for us. Just the rest of our lives, baby!

I know you already know this because you were there, but I feel like I have to tell somebody or I'll explode. Effie and Monty have been good to me—far better than I deserve. They've offered to pay for my tuition and I've accepted. And because Prongs is tired of hearing it, I need you to know that I'm going to pay them back every penny the minute I get Alphard's inheritance. They say I don't have to, but you and I both know that I do. On the upside, Prongs makes a pretty good roommate, but you already knew that too. He called me his brother the other day and I think he really meant it. It just felt different this time. Don't tell the handsome twat, but I might've cried. Oh and you were both right about Wormtail, he's really gotten good on the drums. He can actually carry a beat now!

Speaking of music, did you hear that Elvis died? Like actually DIED—on the toilet, no less! Guess it happened while I was at yours—really, how could we have missed it??? (I'm only kidding—I know we were pretty busy.) But Elvis! Who's next? Mick Jagger? Marc Bolan? I fucking hope not. All I'm saying is that when we're rich and famous, the toilet is not the way I want to go. Put me on a rocket and blast my bones out into space. Now that's rock and roll.

I'm glad we talked the other day. Put some real perspective on all of this. You're still my best friend, Moons, and I don't want anything to change that. You're too important to me, and after all, I still need a bassist if I'm to start my world-wide musical take-over. Loving you just might be an extra perk, one that's just for us. (Never said I wasn't a romantic.)

Don't get too lonely in the dorm without us. Or do, just means you'll be thinking about me. I'll see you soon, and tell all those perky-prefects hello from yours truly. They don't have any idea what they're in for, letting a double-agent into their ranks.

Yours in unequivocal adoration,
Padfoot.

There was something about the letter that felt slightly foreboding, but no matter how many times he read it over, Remus couldn't quite put his finger on what it was—Mick Jagger's death maybe? Whatever, Remus told himself. Be thankful, the two of you finally understand one another. And Sirius had given him hope. Just for us, he'd written. It was an aspiration for whatever their relationship was going to be. Maybe they could do this after all. Perhaps it was as easy as just saying yes.

When Giles put the Rolls into park outside the station, Remus tucked Sirius' letter away into his pocket. He'd probably read it again later, but for now he had a train to catch.

"You're sure you have everything?" Giles asked, fixing the shoulder strap on Remus' bag himself. He was probably just relieved they'd made it on time at all; Giles hadn't even given Remus a real punishment when he'd returned from Tomny's that day. All he'd done was shake his head at the cut on his cheek and mutter that his uniforms had arrived. Remus was definitely going to miss him.

"Yes," he answered. "Just like I had everything the last twenty times you asked."

Giles chuckled as the train's whistle sounded behind them from down the platform. "Who would'a thought though," he gushed, "our Remus going back to finish his A-Levels—and as a school prefect to boot! It's enough to make a man start choking up."

"Shall I find you a tissue?"

"I just want you to know how proud of you I am." Giles took him by the shoulders. "And that your mum would be very proud of the man you've become too."

"Thanks, Gil," Remus said lightly.

Humming over a smile, Giles released him and took a step back. "Okay, remember what I told you the first time we did this—be good, and if you can't be good…?"

"Be smart."

“Ah, but you already got that covered, my little genius!” Rubbing the top of his head with several thick knuckles, Giles laughed while Remus batted him away. “Alright then, time for me to be off. I’ll see you at Christmas.”

“Bye, Gil. Miss ya already.”

“Miss you already too, cheeky blighter.” Still grinning, Giles tipped his hat and began walking away, waving over his shoulder as he did. Remus watched him go, silently thankful, before grabbing his trunk and turning back to the train.

“Don’t I get a sappy goodbye too?”

Remus just about jumped ten feet. Straight ahead of him, Tomny had appeared in the middle of the platform, looking cheekier than Remus had ever seen him with his same battered jeans, faded t-shirt, and a smile.

“TOM!” The disbelief was clear on Remus’ face. The two of them had already said goodbye that day in the End, and he hadn’t been expecting to see him again so soon. “What are you doing here?”

“Seeing ya off, a’course,” Tomny said, raising his arms. “S’yer last year after all, never gonna get the chance again.”

Unable to deny him, Remus rushed his friend, enveloping Tomny’s broad chest in a greedy hug. Tomny hugged him back of course, patting Remus on the back one with one hand all the while.

“How’d you know I’d be at this station though?” Remus asked as he pulled away.

“Lucky guess,” Tomny shrugged. “You did say you left on the thirty-first. Where’re yer friends at?”

“Oh, they’re not leaving for school until tomorrow. I—er… I have to go a day early.”

Tomny squinted. “Why's that?”

“Because I’m a—er… I’m a… nghschoolprefectmmnnhnn…”

“A what now?”

“I'm a school prefect!”

“Wow! That’s, er…” Tomny started to laugh; “Im-pres-sive, heh!”

“Shut up!” Remus cried, punching him in the arm; “I didn’t ask for it!”

“Oh yeah, sure, whatever you say, m’good sir.”

“You’re the worst.”

Tomny winked. “Yeah well, try not to miss me too much.”

Remus smiled. Never a day of rest with his friends. “I'm glad you came.”

“Me too. Feels a bit special knowin’ I get tah be the las’ one to see you off. Also, I may have picked up somefin’ for yeh.” From under one arm, Tomny pulled out a brand-new album, the Clash’s self-titled. “I asked around at the record store after you told me about that punk show you and yer friend went to. Bloke there said these guys were promisin’.”

“Thanks,” Remus said, admiring the cover; “Can’t wait to listen to it.”

“I know, and these are for when you do.” Slyly, Tomny held up a pack of cigarettes and tucked them into Remus’ shirt pocket. Glancing down at them, Remus suddenly felt very overwhelmed. Before he could start crying, he threw his arms around his friend again, making Tomny gasp and then laugh in response.

“Ah, Lu,” he hummed, patting him on the back, “m’gonna miss ya.”

“You keep saying that,” Remus said into his shoulder, “but I won’t be gone forever. I’ll be back, Tom.”

Tomny pulled away; “And I’ll be here,” he tsked, before picking up the handle of one of Remus’ trunks and wheeling it toward the train. “C’mon, let’s get you on board then.”

After lifting the trunks up into the train, Remus paused and looked back. He couldn’t leave without saying it. “Tom, about what happened the other day in that church yard. I need you to know that—”

“No you don’t,” Tomny said first. “ ‘Cause I understand. Maybe you surprised me a bit, sure, but you’ll always be my Lu, wont’cha? Nuffin’s gonna change that.”

Remus sighed. “Yeah,” he said, while Tomny pulled his hands from his pockets. He took Remus by the head and kissed his forehead fondly, before ruffling his hair.

“Go on then,” he told him. “Go kick that poncy school’s arse.”

With nothing else to do, Remus boarded the train. He dragged his trunks down to the first empty compartment and found Tomny already waiting outside the window. He rapped his knuckles to the glass to get his attention and Remus rushed to open the small window at the top, just to hear him again.

“Almost forgot—for luck!” Tomny said, before stretching up and passing a small object through the opening. Remus took it, and as he turned it over in his palm he realised that it was a lighter. Just as crappy and dented as the first one Tomny had given him.

Smiling, Remus broke open his pack of cigarettes and lit one up like a small victory. Tomny remained outside the window, looking like a nobody with his hands in his pockets, until the final whistle blew signalling the train’s departure. No one else knew just how important they were to each other, but when the train car began to move, Tomny proved it by kicking up into a jog, which quickly turned into a run as he tried to keep up alongside the locomotive.

“I love you!” Tomny barked through the glass, pointing furiously at Remus. “I love you! Kick its ass! Kick its ass!”

Remus slapped his palm to the window, like he could reach through it and touch his friend. “I love you too, Tom!” He cried back. “I love you!”

And then, as the platform neared its inevitable end and the train sped up to take Remus back to school, Thonas Armstrong fell out of sight.

* * *

Saying goodbye to Tomny at the station had left Remus’ heart feeling full for the entire, lonely ride back to Scotland. Unused to the quiet of an empty compartment, he read and napped and pigged out on snacks he’d bought off the trolley, and even found it in him to finish the rest of his summer homework. When the train finally pulled into the Highland station and he boarded the bus that would take him to Hawkings, Remus was more than a little travel weary. He knew from the prefect’s itinerary McGonagall had sent that he’d be expected to attend a meeting in preparation for the other students' arrival the following day, but at least he'd have Lily to complain to and eat dinner with afterwards. It bummed him out that he hadn't seen her on the train, but she could've just taken the other line from Liverpool. It was on him for forgetting to call first and check.

After he'd lugged his trunks all the way to Godric and dumped them in the empty 4A dorm room, Remus made his way up to Rowena and stuck his head in, catching another girl as she came down the staircase.

"Have you seen Lily Evans around?"

She glanced about in consideration. "I hav'nae, sorry," she replied in a thick Scottish accent. "Are ye heading tae the prefect's meeting?"

"Yup."

"Cool, so am I." She held out her hand; "I'm Patricia, year twelve, but ye can call me Trish."

"Pleasure to meet you. I'm Remus, year twel—or I mean thirteen, I guess." He shook her hand sheepishly. "Are you sure you didn't see Lily upstairs?"

"Na, don't think so. But a group o'girls have already left for the hall. Maybe she was with 'em. We can walk over together if you'd like."

"Sure, why not."

Smiling kindly, Trish let the dorm's front door fall shut behind her and came down the rest of the stairs to join him. At her side, Remus spent the entire walk to the Great Hall glancing around himself at the campus. It felt like ages since he'd been there last and the breeze in Scotland was much cooler than it had been in London. Trish was friendly but she didn't talk at a million miles an hour at least, which he appreciated. When they finally were filing in, another student had them sign their names on an attendance sheet and Remus stopped to scan the list for Lily's name, only to realise that there was no 'Lily Evans' in attendance.

"Does Lily not have to sign this?" He asked the prefect, who shrugged in response.

Passing the clipboard along to Trish, Remus shuffled into the room and looked around for a glimpse of fiery red-hair. After turning up with nothing once more, he began to feel a seed of doubt bloom in the back of his mind, which he had to squash immediately.

Relax, Lily would never miss a prefect meeting. She'll be here.

As he went back to scanning the rest of the prefects' faces for any sign of his friend, Remus ended up locked eyes with not Lily, but Regulus Black, who was glaring at him from the other side of the room.

"Don't think that's a look o'admiration," Trish said, appearing at his elbow.

"What? Oh, you… know Regulus?"

"Sure, he's in my year, after 'ah."

"Right…"

Quickly breaking eye-contact, Remus turned away and shuffled toward another corner where he knew he'd have better luck avoiding the youngest Black brother. If he were being honest, Regulus had possessed very few of his thoughts throughout the summer. He'd wondered only with a small twinge of anger if Regulus knew what had actually happened to Sirius, but now that they were face to face, he could hardly blame him for the scowl. Not after what they'd done at the end of last year.

"I hope this doesn't go on ah'evening," Trish said, raising her arms over her head with a yawn. Remus agreed, only slightly bewildered as to why she'd stuck around, and thankfully Professor McGonagall appeared at the top of the stage of the Great Hall, clearing her throat to address all of them.

"Hello prefects, so happy to have you back with us for another year here at Hawkings School," she said. "First of all, I wanted to thank you personally for your continued dedication to the school and upholding its rules and regulations. I know it's been a long day of travel for all of you, but you'll have plenty of time to gather your wits before your fellow students arrive tomorrow. In a moment I'm going to start listing off your perfect partners for the term and then afterwards you may mingle amongst yourselves and get to know one another in preparation for student arrival tomorrow. You're going to be working together after all, might as well get used to it."

"Remus!" A voice trilled quietly.

Lily! Finally…

Remus spun around, only to have his entire face fall when he found Jillian Stewart pushing through other students instead. “Sorry,” she said to Trish, before pointedly side-stepping her and getting between them.

“Dinna fash yerself,” Trish mumbled, before casting a questionable look at Remus, which he ignored out of pure embarrassment.

“It’s so nice to see you!” Jillian gushed. “You never told me you were going to be a prefect!”

“Oh, you neither, heh…”

"Jesus," Jillian swore suddenly. "What happened to your cheek?"

Remus touched the butterfly stitches Giles had outfitted over his cut. It'd be healed soon enough, without a scar most likely.

"Oh, you know... took a tumble."

Jillian's eyes flashed greedily. Dangerous, they seemed to say, like she were delighted.

“Well, I missed you over summer. It was so nice to get your letters.” She took his arm and held it so tightly to her chest that he could almost feel the outline of her bra through her school shirt.

“Man, people really gotta stop missing me,” Remus winced.

As Professor McGonagall began reading names of her list, Jillian continued to beam up at him. “Psst, Remus. Notice anything different?”

He looked around in question. “Er…”

“About me, silly! Look—I got my braces off.” She smiled again and Remus nodded slowly.

“Oh yeah, looks great, Jill.”

“Don’t they? It’s such a relief to have them off. Snogging is going to be so much easier now.”

Next to them, Remus heard Trish snort and he just about caved in himself. Where the fuck was Lily?

“I’m so glad you’re a prefect this year,” Jillian said, seemingly unruffled. “I always thought being stuck with one partner all year was terribly dreary, but wouldn’t it be so great if we got to be partners?”

Please god, no, Remus pleaded, anyone but you.

“Er—Jillian, have you seen Lily at all?” He asked nervously.

“Hm? You mean Lily Evans?" She chuckled faintly. "Why would I have seen her?”

“Because she’s supposed to be here. I didn’t catch her on the bus or at her dorm but—”

“Silly Remus, Lily’s not a prefect this year!”

Remus’ jaw dropped open. “What?”

“Yeah! She told everyone at the end-of-the-year party that she was switching her classes around and didn’t have the extra space in her timetable.” Jillian blinked happily. “Didn’t she tell you that?”

“No…” he half-wheezed, “no, she didn’t.”

“Oh, well that’s okay. Suppose she can always tell you herself tomorrow.”

“Miss Stewart,” Professor McGonagall called sternly from up on her dais; “Is there something you would like to share with the room?”

“Sorry, professor!” Jillian squeaked, clutching tighter to Remus’ arm as though he could save her from the Headmistress’s wrath.

Clearing her throat again, McGonagall went back to her list; “Stewart, Jillian,” she read, looking unsurprised.

Turning on him, Jillian held up two fingers. “Finger’s crossed!”

Silently, Remus began to pray.

Please! Please! Please! Not me! ANYONE BUT JILLIAN!

“—and MacDuff, Patricia.”

“Bugger!” Jillian frowned. “We’re not partners, Remus… tch.” She shook her head bitterly. “At least we’re guaranteed to run in the same circle as prefects, right?”

Remus just nodded, busy having his own celebration inside his head. Next to them, Trish looked as though she'd just swallowed a lemon. Remus could hardly blame her. Trish was a year younger, he doubted Jillian even knew her name.

"Remus, are you doing anything tonight?" Jillian asked, as McGonagall continued down her list of partners. "We're supposed to be meeting again, but we could always sneak—"

"Lupin, Remus!"

Jillian fell silent immediately. Remus wasn't thick—she was probably just trying to figure out who her competition was going to be, but if he wasn't to have Lily, then Remus just hoped that his partner ended up being even moderately tolerable. He glanced quickly around the room. The options weren't horrible, there was always—

"—and Black, Regulus!"

Immediately, a dull roar of whispers broke out amongst the other prefects.

"Lupin and Black?"

"Wrong Black, looks like."

"No shit! Lupin better watch out, Regulus is out for blood."

"Regulus?" Jillian echoed sceptically. "That's Sirius' brother, isn't it?"

She looked to him as though it was some grand revelation, but Remus couldn't even hear her anymore. All around them, kids who remembered the horrible prank from the term before were craning their heads to get an eyeful, and when Remus finally spared a glance Regulus' way, he found a look of pure venom waiting for him.

Be ready, it said; because I'm going to kill you.

Remus felt like the Titanic as it sank to the ocean floor. That ill-tempered fate had dealt him a foul hand yet again, it seemed, and left him sure of only two things:

1. He was going to throttle Lily, and;
2. He was so bloody fucked.

Chapter End Notes

'Bog' means toilet.
'Lorry' means truck.
Giles' meaning of 'ringways' refers to the ringway roads around London, precursors to the M25 motorway.
The poem Remus reads is called ‘Völuspá’. It is the most well-known poem from the ‘Poetic Etta’. It tells the story of the end of the world and its subsequent rebirth in Norse mythology.
A 'caff' is a small, inexpensive restaurant or coffeehouse; cafe.
Trish uses 'dinna fash' as in Scottish slang for 'don't worry about it'.

A/N: My next update won't be for a few weeks. I'm behind in my editing, and the quality of year 13 really isn't up to par with what I'd like to give you. I'm very busy with general life/school/work right now, so I'm going to take some time to work on it.
Next update: March 4/5 2022 (depending on timezone). I realise this is three weeks from now, but I believe that's what I need to get back on track. Hope you understand <3

See you then!

Chapter 72: Eight Days a Week

Chapter Summary

The beginnings of the lads' final year at school, and things are... complicated.

Chapter Notes

A/N: This chapter picks up almost straight after the end of the last. Maybe re-read the final scene if it'll help you remember where we're at.

C/W: 'F' slur used in a smoking context.

Note for future of this fic: As the first chapter of year 13, I felt the need to inform you that this year goes heavily into Remus' experiences not just as a queer person but as someone who struggles with mental health. I hope it'll come across clearly, but in a thoughtful way, that Remus is bipolar and experiences symptoms of BPD (Borderline Personality Disorder). I don't really expect this to come as a shock, considering how I've built him/his experiences/his reactions until this point, but maybe it is if you're not as familiar with the signs and symptoms of either disorder. Going forward (and in the past) it'll become obvious that Remus experiences a lot of the same symptoms of Bipolar II disorder (though type 1 & 2 were not differentiated until the 90s). As a seventeen year-old who uses substances as a vice, it's not uncommon for Remus' mental health to take a turn during this point in his life. For anyone wary, I am taking this seriously, but please do not expect this to be an over-consuming part of the storyline. It is a part of Remus, it is not him entirely. There is no one "right way" to have a mental illness, and all experiences are valid.

Honestly I feel a little nervous putting this out there, since I don't want anyone to think I just 'threw it in for the drama'. Remus has been, and always will be this character, so please don't hesitate to send me any messages or ask questions in the comments. I look forward to the open discussion should there be one. Cheers, and enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Oh! Darling, if you leave me,
I'll never make it alone;
Believe me when I tell you,
I'll never do you no harm;
Believe me darling…

- "Oh! Darling" The Beatles, 1969

Things literally couldn't have been worse.

Initially, Remus had thought that his final year at school would be a quiet one. He'd certainly thrown a spanner into the works by kissing Tomny, but he'd yet to decide whether that really counted as cheating. He and Sirius hadn't exactly 'defined the relationship', but they'd confessed. Was it emotional cheating then? Was that even a thing? He could've asked one of the girls, except that would entail an explanation, and he certainly didn't have one of those. Remus tried reasoning with himself that the kiss with Tomny hadn't meant anything—not really. It was more like a pile-up of emotions, like when you filled your teacup too full and a little spilled over the edge as you went to add the milk. It was a stupid analogy, but it was about all he could come up with, what with everything else going on.

First and foremost, there was Jillian. She'd insisted on sticking around, and with her came a gaggle of other prefects Remus had otherwise had very little interaction with beforehand. It turned out that, awkward wire braces or no, Jillian was the sort of popular that occurred in those kind of tight-knit, academically-driven circles. She seemed to have both a personal vendetta and admiration for Lily, for her academic skill and ability to corral even the worst botched jobs. Remus had already heard word of her success in subduing the likes of 'James Potter and those other messers' pittering through the other prefects, though news of this tended to grow quieter whenever they realised he was within ear-shot. Now this year, without Lily around, Jillian was free to take on full authority of the prefects. She stepped in like McGonagall had actually crowned her Head Girl, and no one seemed interested in fighting her on it, aside from Remus' own prefect partner, that was.

"You don't get to just switch the schedules around," Regulus told her, after Jillian had tried to trade Remus' timetable with another twelfth year so they'd be together during library duties.

“It’s not like it’s that big of a deal,” Jillian retorted. “You and Remus will just take the library rounds every other month, with me and Trish.”

“Professor McGonagall didn’t give you leave to do that,” Regulus scowled, snatching back the schedule and shoving it into Remus’ hands. Jillian appeared upset, but as she turned to complain of the younger boy’s rudeness to her friends, Remus made to catch up with him.

“Hey, thanks for that. Dunno what I’d do if I got stuck—”

“Don’t talk to me,” Regulus snapped, stomping off and bringing the conversation to an abrupt end.

That evening, as the prefects all gathered around the dining hall tables for supper, Remus reluctantly took up a spot at Jillian’s table. There was apparently some dull tradition about spending the first night getting to know your new partner, but he doubted he and Regulus were about to break away from the group to shoot the shit over a friendly game of cribbage. Or whatever Regulus did in his spare time. He had no idea.

“I feel for you, Remus, I really do,” Jillian said from her seat at his side. “He’s just so rude. I would’ve thought at least one Black brother would make it out with some manners.”

“Sirius has manners,” another prefect named Tracey said. “And he’s funny... handsome too.”

“Ooh, Trace, does this mean you’re really interested?”

Tracey blushed terribly. “I’m not! Besides, Sirius probably already has someone...”

“No way. He never dates anyone over the summers, right, Remus?”

"Hm."

“I’m sure Remus could give us the scoop," Jillian continued. "I mean, it’s not like Sirius is all that hard to come by, right? Nothing like his little brother. I’m not even sure Regulus had ever spoken to a girl—nicely, that is.”

Tracey giggled, but it was Trish who answered.

“I think yer being a bit quick to judge, meself,” she said, picking her teeth with a toothpick. “Regulus isnae that bad.”

A part of Remus was almost thankful for her support. It wasn’t like he wanted to comfort Regulus, but he couldn’t bring himself to participate in Jillian’s subterfuge, lest she begin to think he was interested in anything else she had to offer.

“Does that mean you’re interested in Regulus too, Trishy?” Jillian teased.

“Nah, I just ken when yer being a bitch.”

The look on Jillian’s face was priceless, and Remus almost broke, but as Trish began innocently sifting around in her pockets he managed to swallow his laughter with a bite of roasted ham. As he did, he glanced back at Regulus’ table. The other boy wasn’t looking at him, but Remus figured that if he had been, he’d just as readily draw a thumb across his neck in threat.

“Either o’ ye have a lighter?” Trish asked.

“No,” Jillian replied, scathingly.

“You, Looper?”

It took Remus a few seconds to realise she was talking to him. “Me?” He flubbed.

“Aye, you.”

“Uh…?”

“Do–you–have–a–lighter, my dear gowk?” Trish said again.

“Oh.” Reaching into his pocket, Remus passed the zippo over without a second thought. It wasn’t until Trish saluted him and left the table that he realised it was his good lighter, the engraved one Sirius and James had gifted him for his birthday. Hoping she could be trusted to return it, he pat his other pocket and was relieved to find that he still had the one Tomny had given him that morning for luck. Not that it’d been much help so far.

“Bit rude herself, that one is,” Tracey said.

Jillian huffed. “Don’t even try complaining. At least you don’t have to be her partner for the rest of the year.”

Trish's balls of steel aside, Remus was almost jealous. He would've let Trish call him 'gowk' or 'bawbag' or whatever other Scottish jargon she wanted if it had meant that he could just switch partners. So far he'd yet to try anything so drastic, but as fate would have it, Professor McGonagall came strolling out of the kitchens, busy talking with one of the head cooks.

"Reckon we'll get any new professors this year?" Tracey was saying. "I keep hoping Binns'll finally retire. I can not sit through another year of his droning."

"It's Dr. Becker for me," Jillian said. "He's just so creepy. Darcy swore she caught him looking down her shirt once." Sniggering, she tilted her head so she was back in Remus' view. "Remus, you're coming back to Byron after supper, yeah? We prefects always head there first night to catch up. We've got some booze too—Suzie nicked some of her dad's sherry."

"And Dustin's even got some weed," Tracey added, the picture of scandal.

Remus stood up from the table. "Be right back," he muttered, before taking off after the Headmistress. He managed to catch up to her and the cook in the hallway, a large knot of dread forming in his stomach.

"Professor! Professor, I'm sorry, can I talk to you for a moment?"

Pausing to finish her conversation with the cook, Professor McGonagall then turned around and raised her head to him. "Hello, Mr. Lupin. What can I do for you?"

"It's about our assignments," Remus said, trying his best not to sound ungrateful. "I just think that it might be better if we—"

"Switched partners?" She interrupted, surreptitiously.

Since she was so clearly keen on the subject, Remus cut straight to the chase; "Regulus hates me," he said. "In fact, I think he'd rather it be anyone other than me."

"Mr. Lupin," the Headmistress started, "what would you say if I told you that Mr. Black had already come to me confirming your suspicions?"

"You mean he actually admitted to hating me?"

McGonagall gave him a knowing smile. “I think this will be a valuable lesson for you both. Far too often, students at this school simply complain and get their way, but the two of you…” She tilted her head down to gaze at him over her spectacles; “I have real hope for.”

Remus felt like telling the Headmistress how seldom it was that he actually got his way, but he wasn’t quite at the level of grovelling just yet.

“So you’re not going to let us switch partners?”

McGonagall straightened up. “No, I don’t think I will. Now is there anything else?”

Remus ground his teeth together, and through them managed; “No… thank you, Professor.”

Because he couldn’t bring himself to walk back into the dining hall and face Jillian and Tracey, Remus made his way outside. He was hoping to find Trish and retrieve his lighter, but as he made his way out onto the pavement he found her long gone. Probably the smart thing too; Remus had already decided that the prefects were a bit too cliquey for his taste. So with nothing else to do, he walked. Doing so aimlessly brought back memories of his first year at Hawkings, when he’d walked and walked just to avoid having to return to his own dorm room. Remus imagined that if he’d gone back in time and told himself that he’d one day be in love with that stupid roommate of his, that his fifteen year-old self would’ve said to fuck right off. How could he be in love with such an intolerable bastard? Someone who played music at full-volume all hours and insisted on calling him names like ‘wolf-boy’ and ‘Moony’. But that was the reality of it; the Remus from back then and the Remus that was now were just separate enough to want different things.

And what is it you want now? Vicious Moony asked.

Sirius. Only Sirius.

But you kissed Tomny.

Remus stopped walking. He’d made it all the way to the library. It was going to be daylight for some time still, but he almost wished it were night. Night made confessions easier somehow.

I’m going to tell him, he decided, as he pulled open the library’s doors and slipped inside.

And if he hates you for it?

He won't, was Remus' first inclination, but really, who could know for sure?

The Hawkings library was quiet on an average day, thanks to its loyal librarian's continued effort to oppose any and all tom-foolery within its sacred halls, but without any students mulling around, the hall was as silent as a grave. Ms. Pince was perhaps the only person the Marauders were actually afraid to cross. Her library had been unofficially declared off-limits ever since a seventh-year James and Sirius had thought it hilarious to release several jars of crickets into the romance section. They were lucky that McGonagall didn't allow for corporal punishment, or Pince might've force-fed the tiny insects back to them.

"Made prefect this year, did you Mr. Lupin?" The librarian observed, after spotting him on his way in. Remus nodded, and after he declined her offer to help him find a book, Pince waved her hand in the direction of a cart of unshelved books. "Might as well make yourself useful then. Those are the new books purchased for this term. Put them away for me and I might just let you take one out a day early."

He wasn't all that tempted by the offer, but with nothing better to do and no desire to attend Jillian's prefect party, Remus took the cart and began wheeling it off. Most of new texts and didn't interest him, but he did come across a few feminist manifestos that Lily or Marlene might've found interesting. He was actually enjoying the mindless work, the up-and-down pacing of the aisles, until he'd neared the end and reached for the cart's bottom shelf. Bending down, he retrieved what he assumed to be another mundane text full of haphazard facts and citations, but when he turned the book over, the words The History of Sexuality stared back at him.

Remus fumbled the book. It landed face down on the library floor with a thump and for several long seconds he couldn't even move. It was like he was back in that bookstore in Fitzrovia, holding a queer book with a queer look on his face and being stared at by a man who knew nothing about him, and yet decided to judge anyway.

Fuck you, Remus wished he'd said. You don't know me, fuck you!

Suddenly angry, Remus scooped up the book and shoved it onto a random shelf, spine facing in. He never wanted to see it again, never wanted to think about effeminate tendencies, or issues with temperament, or familial despondency ever again. Wasn't it enough to just like someone? To make it through everything life threw at you and still be whole enough to love? It should be.

Pushing his cart away, Remus paused at the end of the aisle to collect himself. He could hear shuffling a row over and the last thing he needed was Ms. Pince to think that he'd been crying in the reference section. When he was suitably calm again, he rounded the corner and cleared his throat.

"I've finished with the—"

"JESUS F. CHOP—!" Sheila threw her arms up, scattering several books about the aisle. "Remus," she wheezed, one hand pressed to her heart; "You nearly scared the daylights out of me!"

"Sorry," he croaked, just as surprised to find her there. "Thought you were Ms. Pince."

"You too," she nodded. "I'm avoiding her actually, I've had these books out since May and she's likely to have me drawn and quartered if I don't return them before term starts. Her wrath is not just reserved for students, you know."

Almost smiling, Remus picked up one of the books that had slid toward his feet, The Memoirs of Hector Berlioz, and passed it over. The rest of the novels she carried were much the same; Living with Bach, Chopin's Letters, Conversations with Camille Saint-Saëns.

"You're in the wrong section," he told her. "This is philosophy. Memoirs and biographies would be two rows over."

"Explains so much. Couldn't find 'Vivaldi' anywhere," Sheila sighed. "I managed to swipe their record cards, but this bloody Dewey Decimal System still confounds me. Will you show me?"

He nodded and began backing up the aisle, leading the way.

"Did you have a good summer?" Sheila asked as they walked.

"Yeah," Remus said, "I did. Got to spend it with Sirius, actually."

"Ah, yes. I hear he's living with the Potters now, right?"

Remus nodded. "His parents, well—uhm… I guess I'll let him tell you, if he wants."

“That’s probably best,” Sheila smiled.

“Was your summer good?”

“Yes, actually. It was very nice. Colin and I got away to the sea for a bit. It’s the only place that seems to make him feel better.”

“Is he sick...?”

Sheila nodded slowly, dark eyes scanning the shelves of books. “Quite so. He has something called Huntington’s disease. Have you ever heard of it?”

Remus shook his head, suddenly regretting that he’d asked.

“It attacks the nerves in the brain. In Colin’s case, he has to use a wheelchair, and it’s hard for him to… remember certain things. He was diagnosed several years ago, when you would’ve been very small. I used to take care of him myself, but this job offered the best benefits and insurance and Professor McGonagall allows me to visit him often. The hospice takes good care of him too, of course.”

“That’s, uh… good? I mean—”

Sheila chuckled, stopping alongside him at the end of the proper aisle. “No, no, Remus, I apologise. It must sound terribly dreary, but you should know that this is entirely normal for me. A disease like this, well, you just find a way to live with it. That’s what love is after all.”

Remus licked his lips. Right…

No one bothered them as they busied themselves with re-shelving the books. Sheila hadn’t mentioned the paper stitches on his cheek, though he could tell she’d noticed, and he had no trouble reaching the highest shelves. When all the books were returned to their rightful places, Sheila dusted her hands on a pair of daisy-embroidered dungarees. “You were very helpful today, Mr. Prefect,” she declared. “If there’s anything I can do to repay you, you need only ask.”

It was a jest, but Remus’ mind automatically shifted to his most recent problem.

“Actually…”

To her credit, Sheila did listen intently. After leaving the library behind, Remus ended up following her back toward the Bellchant building, ranting the entire way about the unfortunate circumstance of having Regulus Black for a partner.

“I’m telling you, it has to be a mistake! Some—Some sort of sick joke!”

“I’m not so sure Professor McGonagall makes mistakes,” Sheila hummed. “Now sick jokes, on the other hand…”

Remus frowned deeply. He hoped he looked pitiful, at least that way she might feel more inclined to sympathy and get him out of this mess.

“But why Regulus?”

Sheila smiled like she knew something he didn’t. “Why not?”

Teachers! He thought; Devils! All of them!

“I would’ve thought that you and Regulus would have plenty in common,” Sheila said, admiring the sun as it got ready to set over the horizon. “You’re both very talented musically, you both like to read, and of course there’s a one Mr. Black… is that not enough to simply remain cordial?”

Remus squeezed his eyes shut. How could he explain to his teacher that Sirius was exactly the reason they couldn’t be cordial?

“I’m sorry, Remus,” she said as they neared the music building, “but if you’ve already talked to Professor McGonagall and she’s said no, then I’m not sure I’d be of much help.”

He suppressed an eye-roll. “Yeah… I figured.”

“If I were you, I’d try focusing less on the things you can’t do, and more on those you can. If Regulus needs a partner, then be that partner. If he needs someone to ignore, be that too. And if he just needs a friend… well, I assume you know where I’m going with this.”

“And what if Regulus doesn’t need me at all?”

“Everyone needs someone,” Sheila replied. “As Schumann once said, ‘to send light into the darkness of men’s hearts, such is the duty of the artist’. Is there no one who inspires you?”

Remus looked away, defeated and comforted all at once. It was startling how she was able to do that, more startling still when he remembered how much he’d missed it.

“Wait right here,” Sheila told him, “I think I’ve just the thing to lift your spirits.”

Slipping a jangle of keys from her pocket, she disappeared into a back door of the music building, leaving Remus to kick the toe of his trainer against the pavement while he waited. When she returned, just as bright and smiley as before, she presented him with a large leather case, and the accompanying ‘64 Fender Jazz Bass it carried.

“Call it an early gift for the school year,” Sheila said, as Remus practically whooped at the sight of it. Taking the leather case from her, he set it down immediately and flipped the top, running his hands over the lovely sunburst pattern of it. The entire thing was just the right weight, the strings just the right thickness. Oh how he’d missed this.

“Thank you,” Remus said, honestly.

“Don’t waste it,” Sheila smiled, before shutting the door. As Remus locked the case and turned for home, it occurred to him that perhaps she wasn’t talking about the bass guitar.

* * *

Thursday 1 st September 1977

“Regulus, do you have that list of names N to S?”

“…”

“Regulus, did you hear me? I need the list.”

Remus turned around, in search of his partner, but Regulus just strode further away, white-knuckling his clipboard with fervent displeasure.

Glaring after him, Remus apologised to the tiny seventh year girl before stomping across the lawn in pursuit. “Look, I know you don’t like this any more than I do, but we’re supposed to be doing a job,” he lashed, weaving between kids as they filed off their buses and flew into the arms of friends they hadn’t seen for nine weeks. “Regulus!” He shouted again, easily catching up with him through the crowd. “We can try fighting McGonagall over the pairing again later, but for right now we just have to—”

“Piss off,” Regulus hissed.

Remus scoffed; “Now that’s not very eloquent. Sirius would’ve told me to go suck an egg or something.”

It was the wrong thing to say, but he wanted to say it anyway and he got the reaction he’d anticipated when Regulus spun around and snarled at him.

“Get fucked.”

Remus almost laughed. Maybe he and Sirius were related after all.

“At least give me the bloody list!” He barked, as Regulus scowled and stomped off again. Sighing, Remus reached up and pinched the bridge of his nose. Starting off term with a headache of such magnitude had really set the tone, but it was nothing compared to how it felt to hear Lily Evans shout his name from across the berm.

“Remus!” She called happily; “Hey, Remus!”

He spun about-face just in time to spot Lily and Marlene as they rushed towards him, trunks bungling along against their shins. Seeing his friend again looking so eager and spritely only served to ignite his past answer.

“Lily!” He cried, making her entire face light up. “LILY, HOW COULD YOU DO THIS TO ME?!”

Both girls hit the brakes only a few feet from him, but Remus was not deterred. He surged forward, leaning in until he and Lily were nearly nose-to-nose. “WHY?” He wailed. “WHY DO YOU HATE ME SO MUCH?!”

Her face split into a puzzled smile, which only drove Remus crazier. “What are you talking about?” She snorted. “And what happened to your f—”

“YOU’RE NOT A PREFECT!”

Lily blinked and sudden realisation came over her face. “Oh, Remus…”

“Don’t you ‘oh, Remus’ me!” He pulled back with another dramatic wail, his temples thumping along to his vicious headache like some sort of vile drum solo. “You set me up.”

“I, what?!”

“I don’t know how you knew this would happen, but you absolutely did and it’s all your fault!”

“Alright, I know it's first day, but how ‘bout we try making some sense here?” Marlene suggested.

Remus ignored her. “Never—!” He swore; “Never in my life have I met such a cruel and wicked girl!”

Lily, who appeared confused and wounded all at the same time, shook her head desperately. “Remus, I told you I wasn’t going to be a prefect this year.”

“No, you didn’t,” he hissed, pointing a vicious finger at her. “You said nothing of the sort.”

“But I—there was no room in my timetable after I switched my courses around.”

“So you’d leave me to the dogs?”

She squashed a guilty smile. “You… like dogs?”

“You—! Absolute wicked WITCH!”

As Remus continued his fit and Lily reached up a pointless hand to try and console him, Marlene let out a great guffaw of laughter from behind. It was the same Marlene McKinnon laugh he remembered, but it was clear that her summer away in Morocco had left its mark. She was tanner, and her long blonde hair had been chopped shorter than a boy’s, leaving her to look like a more wind-blown version of Twiggy. She was still wearing her uniform, but she’d forwent the usual black stockings beneath her skirt, and her shirt had been left unbuttoned, revealing only a thin chemise underneath, no tie. A year ago Marlene might’ve called the outfit immodest, and yet there she was, laughing away like nothing had changed. Remus knew better; everything had changed.

“You really didn’t tell him, Lils?” Marlene asked through her snickering.

“I thought I did.” Lily whirled on him, poking him hard in the shoulder. “If he were only better at picking up the phone.”

“I am not the betrayer here,” Remus snapped. “All it would’ve taken was a single ‘hey Remus, I’m not gonna be a prefect this year, just so you know’!”

Lily winced. “I thought I had.”

“Well, you didn’t! And now I’m stuck working alongside Regulus as a bloody prefect—which I didn’t even want in the first place—all while dodging Jillian and the sure attempts Regulus is about to make on my life.”

Marlene’s eyes bulged. “You got partnered up with Regulus?”

“Yes! And he hates me, of course. I doubt I’m gonna make it through the first week—actually scratch that, I’m not gonna make it through the first day, because I’m totally quitting.”

“You can’t just quit, Remus,” Lily said.

“Watch me.”

“You made a commitment to Professor McGonagall.”

“Only because I thought you’d be doing it with me!”

“Think of the upsides,” she said reasonably; “This way you can give Potter and Black detention whenever they piss you off.”

“Or interrupt your homework,” Marlene offered. “Imagine it, you’re trying to study for A-Levels or one of Bilshin’s shit pop quizzes—they burst in and wham! Instant detention. You wouldn’t have to lift a finger.”

Lily and Marlene began to giggle at one another, while Remus fumed.

“Oh my fuck—you girls think you’re sooooo funny, but you’re not.”

“That sounds blatantly sexist,” Lily lectured.

“Auughh!”

Remus’ dramatics were interrupted very suddenly by a sharp toot of a whistle and they all turned just in time for Jillian to skip up to them, clutching her own clipboard and beaming.

“Hey guys,” she trilled, dropping her prefect’s whistle from her lips. “Remus, we’re about to regroup to lead our tours for the new seventh years. Regulus is already over there so I thought I'd come and collect you." She turned to Lily and Marlene. "That is, as long as I'm not interrupting anything?"

"Why would you be?" Remus replied blandly. "Lily's not a prefect anymore."

Lily sighed at him. "Remus, you know I didn't actually set you up, right?"

"Liar!" He scowled, as Jillian took his arm and began leading him away.

He wasn't satisfied by the tongue lashing—not by half—but it'd at least given Jillian something to snigger about. Remus supposed to anyone else it would seem quite funny, but he didn't feel much like laughing. After leading the tour, for which Regulus was mostly silent and made him do all the talking, Remus was finally free to retire to his own dorm, exhausted from the day's events and the effort it took just to coax a few measly curse words out of his partner. As he made his way back to Godric House, his prefect schedule crumpled tightly in his fist, Remus couldn't help but mutter to himself.

"Bloody Regulus… Bloody McGonagall… straight up planned this, didn't she… Some big fucking set up… ughhh —it's all Lily's fault…"

It wasn't really, but blaming Lily did make him feel slightly better. If there was an award for pettiness, Remus would win hands down, but in a competition of striking, well-proportioned people dripping in good looks, he knew exactly who would take gold.

It was almost frustrating how Sirius Black insisted on starting every year looking more bloody handsome than the last. Already he'd heard the whispers of Sirius' 'new look' flying amongst the other prefect girls, but unlike the September before, when simply seeing Sirius for the first time had stolen the very air from his lungs, Remus was able to contain himself some as he crossed their dorm room threshold and found the rest of his friends busy unpacking their trunks. Initially Sirius had been nervous over the haircut, but all it'd done was highlight the real finery of his features. Those dark eyes, a jawline that could cut glass. Yes, Remus was lucky. He'd seen more of Sirius than literally anyone, he knew what he looked like when he was dreaming, which he did constantly—awake or asleep, and also when he was at his most undone. Yes, maybe he was lucky.

"There he is!" James cried right away, standing up from the hutch at the foot of his bed with a football boot in each hand. “Been waiting on y—damn, what happened to your face?”

Tucked halfway behind his and James’ wardrobes with a tangle of stereo wires around his feet, Sirius straightened up immediately. “Don’t tell me my brother did that,” he called.

“Football accident,” Remus answered vexingly, shutting the door.

“Yeah, as if we’d believe that a second time,” Peter snorted, busy sticking his Cream poster to the wall with blu-tack. His drumsticks sat on his bed covers next to him. Peter was hardly without them these days. “So, how was the first day on the job, Moony?

“Shit.”

“We already heard why,” Sirius said. “Did ol’ Minnie really set you up with my brother?”

“Don’t look so smug,” Remus drawled. “If Reg kills me then it’ll be your fault.”

Sirius shrugged innocently. “Nice shiny new pin, plucky,” he sneered, before disappearing back behind the wardrobes. Looking down at himself, Remus bitterly ripped the golden prefect pin from the front of his shirt and shoved it in his pocket.

“Is there no way to change partners?” James asked.

“Already tried,” he moped, drifting over to his bed and sitting down. “McGonagall’s not budging, and ‘sides, everyone else is already paired up. Jillian did offer to be my partner, but I’m not sure I’m that desperate yet.”

“Jillian Stewart? You mean she’s still got the hots for you?”

The was bang, then a curse, as though Sirius had hit his head. “Not just the hots.” He called. “Pretty sure the crazy bird wants to have his babies.”

“That’s enough outta you,” Remus clipped, in no mood for Sirius’ favourite brand of teasing.

In answer, Sirius popped up from behind the wardrobe, turning to James and Peter. “Well, it’s the truth. She bloody wrote you every day of the summer. Left little lipstick kisses and perfumed the paper and everything."

"It wasn't every day, you arsehole."

"You're right, she took Sundays and bank holidays off."

As his friends laughed, Remus briefly considered chucking a shoe at each of them. "Yeah, yeah, yack it up."

"It wasn't all bad though," Sirius said, abandoning the stereo to light up a cigarette. "Some of those letters were worth framing."

While Remus shot Sirius the bird, James hauled a large haversack out from one of his trunks with a loud rattle of clinking bottles. "Wish I'd gotten to see. You're lucky, staying at Moony's. He never let us come over."

"It's nothing special," Remus said, eyeing Sirius warily. Sirius returned the look, but just kept smoking.

"Right," James declared, flipping the haversack's top. Each pocket was stuffed to the brim with bottles, all of them alcoholic. "I think we've got enough to last until the first Craigtyre trip, at least."

"At least," Peter agreed, pulling a large baggy of loose hash (courtesy of Simeon) from his own luggage.

Right, Remus thought. He'd almost forgotten. As upper-sixth students they'd have free-reign of the tiny Scottish village on select weekends throughout the term. He'd only ever been the one time, when they'd all snuck out to visit the pub, but he'd been dating Marlene then, and Sirius had been with Chastity. Now that they were both decidedly without female attachment, Remus imagined how it might feel to go about the cobbled streets with just himself and Sirius. They wouldn't be able to do things like hold hands or snog each other out in the open, but they could explore and… And there was a corner shop! No more breaking his fingers on dodgy handrolls. Bliss, truly.

"When's the first village trip again?" Remus asked.

"Seventeenth," James answered, busy sorting his bottles. "Hey, Pete, do you have that bottle of—"

Suddenly a knock sounded from the door, making them all jump.

"Surprise inspection!"

“Shit!” James hissed, ; “It’s McGonagall!”

“Since when?! I thought inspections were your job now!” Peter cried, rushing to shove the weed beneath his pillow.

Sirius, who’d been smoking quietly up until that point, began to cough as he struggled to get the window open. Unfortunately the wood always swelled some after several months without use, and as the door flew open he was forced to suck back his hacking as he quickly squashed the cigarette on the windowsill.

“Jokes!” Mary announced, as she and Lily flounced inside. “It’s only us.”

“F-F-Fuck, Macdonald,” Sirius sputtered, releasing several smoke-filled coughs across the bedroom.

Lily waved her hand in front of his nose. “I see you’re still busy unpacking.”

“We’re christening the room,” James said, pulling out a bottle of whisky and holding it out to her. “Care to join us?”

“We’re supposed to be in a meeting right now, actually,” Lily told him. “Thought I’d drop in and get you.”

James lowered the bottle. “Meeting for what?”

“Lily’s the new Rowena dorm monitor,” Mary said keenly. “Liz Hopkins backed out last second, so she stepped up.”

“No shit, that’s great!” James came around the side of his bed, collecting Lily in a tight embrace.

“Did you really forget your own meeting?” She sighed against his shoulder.

“No,” James lied, “I was just on my way over, as matter ‘a fact. My sixth sense told me to wait for something good to happen, and here you are. Something good, dropped right in my lap.”

He tapped his forehead keenly and Lily rolled her eyes, but she was smiling which meant she was obviously pleased.

“Oh?” Remus sneered, as they turned to leave. “So you have time to play babysitter every night at curfew but not for a prefect meeting every other week. Makes sense, sure…”

Lily turned to him. “Remus, you know it isn’t the same thing.”

“Hmph… yeah, whatever.”

“Ooh, Evans—getting the cold shoulder from Moony? That’s tough nuts, that is,” Sirius ragged, still fighting with the window.

“I’m going to make it up to him,” Lily reasoned. “Remus, how about I tutor you in biology for the rest of the term?”

“Not taking biology this year,” Remus answered haughtily, then; “Didn’t you say that the two of you have a meeting to get to? Really, don’t mind us, wouldn’t want to make you late.”

“Vicious,” Mary laughed, before passing an envelope along to Sirius. “Here, Black. I got that photo you asked for.”

“Photo?” James and Lily echoed, at the same time as Sirius cried; “Yes!”

Coming around from the wardrobe hutch, he ripped into the envelope eagerly. “Pete, can I borrow some ‘a that blu-tack?”

Peter tossed him the pack, and all of them watched as Sirius bounded up onto James’ unmade bed, sticking something to the roof of his four-poster. “There! To replace good ol’ Farrah. You can thank me later, Prongsie.”

“Oh no,” James moaned, while the rest of them gathered around to find Lily’s portrait from the year before tacked up over his pillow.

“What in God’s name…” Lily squinted. “Wait, who’s Farrah?”

“She's his very beautiful lover from France,” Remus replied dully. “He keeps her photo up over his bed to wank to. She’s got top marks on all of her A-Levels and passed the bar exam at sixteen. Also she gives great hand-jobs.”

“MOONS!” James wailed, as Lily’s mouth dropped open.

As Sirius and Mary began killing themselves with laughter, James quickly guided his girlfriend from the room, already doing damage control as they retreated down the hallway.

“No, Daisy, he’s just being an idiot. There is NO Farrah…”

“I like mean Remus, he’s frisky,” Mary said, still ambling around the room. She stopped before a pair of white underpants, which had been left on the floor between James and Peter's beds. "Please tell me that none of you actually enjoy wearing tighty-whities."

"Thank you, Mary! That's enough now!" Peter shrieked, scooping the underpants up from the floor with a face like a tomato.

"Alright, je vais faire ma sortie," Mary sighed. "I've a date anyway."

"That was quick," Sirius snorted.

"A summer away always brings the boys out to play," she mused. "And don't think I haven't noticed your own exploits. Word on the street says that Pepper Doyle's already got her eye on you."

"Pepper's alright, sure, but she's a girl," Sirius smirked. "I'm a man. I have manly needs."

Peter made a retching noise, and Mary wagged her finger in Sirius' direction. "You best get this heart-breaker image of yours under control, Black, or no girl's going to want anything to do with you this year. Then you'll be sorry and lonesome. Now too-da-loo."

Waving a goodbye, Mary made a graceful exit, and after stuffing his underpants away in a drawer Peter announced he was off to see Moira. This left Remus and Sirius alone in the room. Finally.

" 'Manly needs'?" Remus echoed. "Really?"

"Well, you'd know all about that, wouldn't you?" Sirius winked.

Remus didn't waste a second.

He was across the room in two long strides, pressing Sirius against the window with his hands at his shirt collar and his lips on his mouth. The desperation with which he kissed him would've made anyone think that it'd been three years since they'd touched each other, not just three days, but Remus mourned each of them. He hoped there wouldn't come another day—ever—that he was not kissing Sirius Black.

It felt a bit different to touch each other in the dorm; the motions were the same, but the feel of the sheets against their skin, the sound of the creaking bed and distant noises of life further down in the dorm were all new and predictably jarring. More than once the sound of an opening door had Remus pulling away, but there were four dorms to a floor in Godric, and even as other boys came and went, theirs remained snuggly locked.

Afterwards they dressed quickly and Remus helped Sirius finish wiring up the stereo. Sirius even let him choose the first album, and with the Beatles playing in the background, they cracked James' whisky and christened the room all over again. It almost felt natural; being back in their dorm, listening to music while friends came and went, all of them anticipating the lessons that would start up again in the morning.

'Hold me, love me,
Hold me, love me,
I ain't got nothin' but love, girl—'

Sirius tipped his head back; "EIGHT DAYS A WEEK!"

"You're ridiculous," Remus laughed.

"Ah, I know," Sirius sighed wistfully, as they sat tucked up against one another. He wiggled a bit and Remus moved away to give him more room.

"You uncomfortable at all?"

"Nah," Sirius answered, pulling Remus back by his shirt. "Bed's just a bit small, s'all."

"We could always try the floor?"

"And fuck up my back? No thanks. You're just going to have to find a new favourite position."

Remus smiled. The light was coming in through the window just right, hitting Sirius' grey-blue eyes and turning them to glass. They were so close he could almost see his own reflection in them.

" 'Hold me, love me'," Sirius hummed, " 'hold me'—"

"Love you," Remus whispered softly.

The corners of Sirius' mouth perked up. He blinked and Remus' reflection vanished. "Love you too."

Blissfully, Remus kissed him again. As he did, Sirius slipped him his tongue and he was reminded of exactly why they started all of this in the first place. Sirius was sound, but he was also taste, and touch, and everything Remus needed to function. He could've breathed in Sirius like smoke. He was addicted.

"Are you gonna tell me how you actually got this now?" Sirius asked. He was sliding his thumb gently along the cut on his cheek, and Remus sheepishly reached up to cover his hand with his own.

"Mm… s'almost healed."

Sirius gave him a look. It could've been the look, for all intents and purposes.

Remus sighed.

"I went to see Tomny… and uh… Something happened."

"You mean he did this to you?"

"No!" He kissed Sirius' knuckles hastily. "No, it was Lee. And he was high—not himself. Tomny stopped him. He… He took me back, Sirius."

Sirius softened, but there was a glaze to his eyes, not quite a reflection, more like he'd been expecting something else. "Oh. That's… That's great, Moons."

"Yeah, we forgave each other, everything's good now."

"So you're gonna go back to see him?"

Remus considered his words. "Things are a bit more complicated than that, I think, but he said I could call him."

"Well, that's a win then." Sirius shifted next to him, fingers rubbing circles along the side of Remus' neck. "As long as you're safe."

Tell him. God, tell him now. He deserves to know what you did.

"I am."

"Good." Sirius kissed him again, and again, and Remus fell into it like rain through a cloud. Soon he'd tell Sirius the truth— soon— he just wanted to enjoy this for a little while.

Another rattling set of keys came from behind them, and Remus broke away sharply. It turned out to be the neighbour across the hall, but still he stared at the door; watched it. Sirius caught the look, and nudged him.

“Oi, pass me my fags?”

* * *

Tuesday 13 th September 1977 – Two Weeks Later...

Remus was trying. He really was, but being partners with Regulus Black was like being partners with a brick wall. A brick wall that hated your guts, that was. The two of them had had their first real on-duty session as prefects just barely two weeks into term, and while they’d been given the job of organising and shredding all of the student records from the previous year’s outgoing alumni, Remus had been confined to a single corner of the room, where he was not permitted to touch so much as a stapler.

“I can help,” he said to Regulus.

“Piss off,” Regulus told him.

And so the hours passed, and by the time he was making his way back across campus for supper, Remus had gnawed his nails down to the quick out of boredom. Because that wasn’t enough, on his way into the dining hall he was pulled aside by a small group of prefect girls. Not Jillian, thankfully, but three eleventh years with hopefully looks on their faces.

“Do you know if Sirius has invited anyone to the village?” The mousy one in front asked.

Dear fucking lord, could he not catch a break for five minutes?!

“Sirius isn’t looking to date right now,” he told the girls, before leaving them distraught and bleary-eyed by the front doors.

Already annoyed and not all that interested in playing nice, Remus tried sitting diagonally from Lily at their usual dining table, budging in next to a very bewildered-looking Peter. Lily made a face when she noticed, which he ignored, and after calling his name—which he also ignored—she finally got up with her tray and moved directly across from him, forcing James out of his seat and onto Peter's other side.

"Oi, enough with the musical chairs, some of us are trying to eat," Peter complained.

"Blame Remus," Lily huffed. "I can't believe you're still mad at me."

"Of course I'm still mad at you," Remus replied.

"Well, what can I do to make it up to you?"

"Have you got a time machine?"

Lily frowned deeply. "I'd do it with you if I could, you know I would! But I've got an extra seminar three days a week and I'm still taking Advanced Maths."

"Is that supposed to make me feel better?"

"You're really making Evans feel the burn today, aren't you, Moons?" Sirius snarked from his seat beside him.

"Yeah," James cooed; "Can't you see how sorry she is?"

"Butt out," he told them.

"I understand why you're upset," Lily said; "This is on me! I didn't realise I hadn't told you my plans. End of term felt so crazy last year, but if there's anything I can do…?"

Giving her nothing, Remus went back to shredding his chicken piccata to bits. He understood better than anyone just how mental the last few weeks of school had been, but in between pranking and kissing his best friend, he'd still managed to let everyone know his plans for the following term. Surely Lily Evans deserved some punishment.

Before Lily could begin to whine some more, Jillian appeared at the end of their table, showing off her new lack of braces with a bright smile. "Remus," she said, poking him, "are you almost ready to walk back to the dorms together?"

Remus dropped his fork, and both Peter and James made this sort of garbled noise of surprise as they chewed. The question was so bold, and she'd asked in front of an entire audience.

"Walk... together?" He squeaked. "Like the two of us?"

“Mhm! You said it’d be a great idea this morning.”

Remus wracked his brain. It was true—he had spoken to Jillian the morning, but she’d waylaid him during his free period, just as he was on his way to meet Sirius. He would’ve probably said yes to her hand in marriage if it’d gotten her to go away.

“I’m so sorry, Jill,” Lily cut-in, graciously, “but Remus agreed to help quiz me after supper, so I’m going to have to borrow him tonight. I hope you don’t mind.”

“Oh… No, not at all.” Jillian gave her a tight smile. “Next time then.”

Trying not to look too disappointed, she flashed all of them a small wave and quickly scuttled away.

“You’re welcome,” Lily said smugly.

“Don’t think this means you’re off the hook,” Remus said, flicking a potato at her. “This is still your fault.”

“Evans isn’t the one who said yes to walking home together, is she?” Sirius added, before popping a piece of chicken into his mouth.

“I didn’t!” Remus whispered back.

“Uh-huh, sure. Next you’re gonna be dodging proposals.”

Remus groaned inwardly, hoping that this was just Sirius being Sirius and that he wasn’t actually mad. Before he could say anything else though, Sirius got up from the table with his dinner tray, muttering something about the loo.

“You’ve got to tell her you’re not interested,” Peter said, when he’d gone. “And soon, we’ve got the village trip this weekend.”

“You don’t think I’ve tried that?”

Lily leaned in. “Saying things like ‘maybe later, Jill’ and ‘I’m really busy right now, Jill’ is not the same as telling her that you’re not interested.”

“I haven’t just been doing that!” Remus reasoned. “Yesterday I told her I wasn’t keen on dating anyone and that she’d be better off looking elsewhere. Pretty sure she just took it as a challenge.”

James pointed his fork at him, mouth still full. “I ‘ffink ‘oo should try beatin' 'er at 'er own game," he suggested, before swallowing; "Like, you could start quoting your dusty old novels at all hours and only talk about the shows and songs you like—heck, just fucking shout the lyrics in public. Maybe then she'd be too embarrassed to stick around!"

"Or at least finally grasp that you have nothing in common," Peter added.

"I keep hoping that she'll just get bored," Remus said pathetically. "Realise that I have no idea what she's talking about half the time and move on."

"Then you're a fool," Lily added, helpfully. "Jillian's persistent, I'll give you that, but this is a problem of your own making. If you didn't want the attention you should've shut it down last year so she could move on straight away, but instead you left her to pine over you all summer. For someone so stubborn you really can't say no to anyone."

"Me—stubborn? God, the rest of you should really look in the mirror some time."

"Don't tell Black that," she smirked, glancing around for Sirius. "The last thing we need is him looking in the mirror more often."

"Daisy's right," James grinned. "Tosser might just propose to himself, and then where would we be?"

"Well, Remus would still have an admirer in Jillian," Peter added helpfully.

"Oh, fuck off."

Lily giggled. "You know, Remus, you have this funny way of turning the smallest problems into such world-ending events."

"He does!" James agreed. "But then when he's met with a real issue, he just shrugs his pretty little shoulders and acts like it's nothing. It's crazy—you're crazy Moons."

Aside from being decidedly crazy, Remus could've told them how wrong they were; that he was an idiot and Sirius Black was a catastrophic hornet's nest of a problem that he still had no idea what to do with, but instead Remus just kept quiet.

Wiping her mouth on a napkin, Lily cleared her throat. "You can't let it go on, Remus," she said. "Maybe it would just be best to tell Jill that — THAT'S IT!"

Her shout made the rest of them flinch so badly that Peter spilt his tea and James practically slipped off the end of the table bench. " Holy— what're you going bonkers over now?" He faffed.

"You! Or—you gave me the idea. You and Farrah, that is." Sneering at her boyfriend lightly, Lily stood up and reached across the table, clapping Remus around the shoulders. "I'm going to help you solve this!" She declared. "And afterwards, you're going to love me!"

Scooping up her tray, Lily immediately started across the room toward the dining hall's doors. "Daisy!" James shouted after her; "Where're you gonna do?!"

"I'M GOING TO FIX REMUS' LOVE LIFE!" She hollered. "SEE YOU TOMORROW!"

"For fuck's sakes," Remus groaned, as the several dozen kids who'd overheard her began to point in his direction as they sniggered into their supper.

"Don't know what the crazy bird's on about now!" A voice called from one table over. "I would'a thought that Loony's love life is a lost cause! Seems lonely enough!"

It was Barty Crouch of course, along with his favourite band of cronies. Remus wasn't surprised to find them tittering wickedly at his expense, only mildly shocked that they'd waited so long into the term to start making trouble. Regulus was among them, but he was pointedly turned away, unwilling to lower himself to interacting with Remus in public.

"Ha! Lost Lonely Loony!" Yaxley echoed impishly after Barty; "Try saying that five times fast!"

"Might be hard," Peter replied, "what with a tongue as thick as a toad's and a brain to match."

"Ooh, good one," James said, bumping his knuckles.

"Yeah, Pettigrew, good one!" Barty heckled. "Have you finally figured out how to do up your own fly this summer or does Mummy-Potter still do it for you?"

Remus swivelled around in his seat. “Can we fucking help you?”

“Obviously not, lost cause."

“Jesus, it’s like you’re magicians,” Remus replied sarcastically. “You really only appear to add misery to people’s day, but the rest of the time it’s like you don’t even exist. Do you exist? Do you have wants and wills of your own? Or are you just controlled by some evil overlord like a bunch ‘a shitty little pimple-ridden puppets?”

The boys all scowled, even Regulus. “Wouldn’t you like to know, nob-gobbler!” Travers cried.

Remus looked to Regulus. “Oi, partner, isn’t this all a little beneath you? I didn't think the great Regulus Black would associate with anyone earning marks below the national average.”

In answer, Regulus stood up with his tray and marched straight off. Barty appeared disappointed by his sudden exit, but after a few more nasty quips, got up to join him, and eventually the table had emptied.

“Did you see Regulus’ face?” Peter said to Remus. “He looked about ready to take your head off when you called him your partner.”

“Thank you for that startling revelation, Wormtail.” Sighing, Remus leaned his head on his hand. He was just glad Sirius hadn’t been around. Every day the Black brothers were forced to pass themselves in the hall, he was reminded of Sirius’ ordeal in Belgium, and how Regulus had most definitely known what was coming. It made Remus want to hate him, but there wasn’t even room, Regulus was just sort of… sad.

“Guys, what am I gonna do?”

James was wiping his hands on a napkin. “Wish I could tell you, mate. I mean look, I know what we did to Reg last year was pretty bad, but he hasn’t always been innocent.”

“Yeah, he’s started fights with Sirius too,” Peter said. “And he says way nastier shit when he’s angry.”

“Pete’s right,” James said, “Regulus has stood back and watched as Sirius took the fire from their parents just as many times as he’s stepped in, and he didn’t say anything when they kicked him out this time. Didn’t look for him, didn’t call… What we did was personal, I get that, but Reg is just as much Sirius’ brother as Sirius is his. And if he doesn't want the title then fine, we'll take care of him, won't we?"

Remus pressed his lips into a thin line. "Yeah, you're both right."

"It's okay to be sorry," James told him, reaching to pat Remus on the shoulder, "but those two have had plenty of spats. This ain't the first and it won't be the last, just sucks that you're in the middle."

As they all gathered their trays and returned them to the rubbish bins at the back of the room, Remus' head began to throb. It hadn't even occurred to him that he was in the middle. Regulus had just as much reason to hate him as he did his brother, though he was hardly Remus' favourite person either. But James was right, they had to be loyal to Sirius. Regulus was never going to be their friend anyway.

"I'll wait for Sirius," Remus said, as they stopped outside the hallway toilet. The other two nodded him on, and as they left for the dorm, Remus leaned back against the wall. Peter's words from earlier were nagging at him; it would be smartest to squash the Jillian problem before the trip into Craigtyre, but more than that, Remus was lagging behind on his promise. He'd meant to tell Sirius about the Tomny kiss ages ago, but the timing had never felt right.

"I'll tell him tonight…" Remus mumbled to himself. And he would, he promised.

"You're in the way."

Remus looked up. Instantly he wanted to shout; first Barty and now Snape. The miserable boy was glaring scornfully at him with his arms crossed over his chest. It seemed like Snape had also grown over the summer, but included in that was his nose, which remained about two sizes too big for his face.

"Then go around me," Remus snarled, indicating to the bathroom door with a jut of his head.

"Do you make it a habit to hang out around men's toilets, Lupin?"

"Do you make it a habit of being such a twat?"

Snape started to sneer again, but before he could say anything, Remus remembered his newfound power.

"Detention," he said.

Some of the colour drained from Snape's face. "Since when—"

"Detention," Remus said again, feeling his inside jacket pocket for the little pad of pink slips, "for harassing an on-duty prefect."

"You're—You're not on duty!" Snape spluttered.

"You don't know that. Now piss off before I make it two." Whipping the pad out, Remus clicked his pen and quickly scribbled down over the top slip. As he tore it off and held it out to him, Snape flushed.

"Fuck you," he snarled, snatching the paper. "It was a mistake making you a prefect."

"Don't I know it. Now shall I give you another?"

Snape lunged forward slightly like he might try something, but Remus only raised his pen in threat and he was forced to storm around him, straight into the bathroom. Feeling smug, Remus almost relaxed, until he remembered what he was doing outside the toilet in the first place.

"HEY!" He heard Snape scream, along with a severe banging noise. "You can't smoke in here!"

"Shit," Remus grunted, streaking inside. There he found Snape hammering his fist on one of the cubicle doors.

"Who's in there?!" He demanded. "Get out here now!"

"Piss off!" The occupant called. Sirius.

"Dammit, Snape, why can't you just stop bloody bothering people?" Remus demanded, marching up and getting between Snape and the bathroom stall.

"Ha!" Snape scoffed, leaping away from Remus like he had some sort of disease. "Alright sure, come on over now, Lupin! Let's see you hand this crackhead idiot a pink slip!"

"Just get out!" Remus barked. "Or I'll make sure you're in detention until July!"

"You're gonna regret this."

"OUT!"

Scowling, Snape turned and retreated from the bathroom, leaving the air thick with cigarette smoke and unuttered insults. Remus let out a heavy sigh when he'd gone, and turned to gently rap his knuckles against the stall's door twice.

"I'm okay," Sirius answered, before opening the door a crack. "Just needed a break. Figures Snivelly would come knocking."

"Can I come in?"

Sirius peered at him, before opening the door the rest of the way. It was tight inside the stall with the two of them, and the light overhead was busted, leaving them in an overcast blue-toned dimness. Sirius offered him his cigarette and Remus took it, breathing in deeply.

"Love you," he said on the exhale.

In answer, Sirius arched a brow and Remus knew he was in trouble.

"You're… upset about Jillian, aren't you?"

"Wow. Am I that transparent?"

"I've tried talking to her." He handed the cigarette back. "It's the same for you, y'know. I keep having to deter girls who are losing their bloody minds over your new haircut."

Sirius swept his fringe out of his eyes pointedly. "Okay sure, but it's different with you."

"How could it be different? I've always had to watch you with girls."

"Those girls just like the idea of me. What I can give them, or how I'd make them look. Stewart and the rest—they actually like you."

"That's not true."

"That's love. At least that's how I see it."

"That's a horrible way to think about love," Remus frowned. "Do you think I like you like that?"

"Obviously not, since you've told exactly zero people."

Remus reached up to rub the back of his neck. "That's… probably not all true…"

Sirius pulled the cigarette away from his lips. “What? You mean you actually told one of the others?”

“Not exactly.”

“Then who?”

“I didn’t say anything about us really, but…” Remus dropped his arm. The toilet’s low lighting had made him think it’d be a good idea to say it there, but he and Sirius were nearly chest to chest. Barely enough space to breathe.

Sirius arched a single brow, impatient. “Are you waiting for an audience reaction or…?”

“I didn’t want to do this here,” Remus said, “and now you’re mad at me, so this probably isn’t the greatest idea in the first place, but yeah... I have something to tell you."

“Then stop beating around the bush and bloody tell me.”

“It—” he winced; “It might affect how you feel, y’know, about me… I wouldn’t even blame ya none if it did.”

“Spit it out, Moony, you’re making me nervous.”

Alright.

“I kissed Tomny.”

Sirius gave real pause. Then his eyebrows knit together in their centre, as though Remus were speaking a language he didn’t understand.

“What?”

“It wasn’t a real kiss,” Remus started, shaking his head so vigorously he banged it on the bathroom stall behind him. “Augh—Fuck! … Or I mean, it was a kiss, but it was different from how I kiss you.”

“Different kissing? How’s that?” Sirius demanded, biting anger seeping into his tone. “Do you measure it by the tongue’s depth? Or is there some richter scale for the ferocity with which you swap spit that I don’t know about?”

“It’s not like that—”

“Why wouldn’t you just tell me that you kissed him at that fucking party?! Why make me worry that you were losing your goddamn mind when really you were just happy to get your rocks off?"

"It wasn't at the party!"

Sirius drew back, as much as he could in the tight space. "You kissed him when you went back there?"

"Yes," Remus frowned. "But nothing happened, I swear. Will you let me start over so I can explain myself?"

Sirius crossed his arms, unusually calm. "Fine. Go on then, spin your tale."

And so he did. He told Sirius everything, right there in that shitty student bathroom. From the trip home with Giles, to Lee and his dead brother—to Tomny in the churchyard and then all the way back to school again where he found out he'd be stuck with Regulus as a prefect partner for the foreseeable future. They were lucky supper had ended and no one was around to interrupt. Sirius never stopped him either, instead he'd clambered up onto the back of the toilet, boots perched on its seat as he leaned his chin on his hands and stared at the floor, the ceiling, the door—anywhere but at Remus.

"So it was an impulse?" He'd asked, when Remus had finally finished.

"Yeah."

"Gotta be honest, not sure if that's worse than if you'd actually meant it."

"Yeah…"

Sirius began sucking on his bottom lip. "Do you love him?"

"No, not like that."

"But you love me?"

"I do, I know I do," Remus said truthfully. "I just made a mistake. It was like I was feeling everything all at once and I… Look, Sirius, I don't know how to tell you how sorry I am."

"Sure you do, you've been doing it for the last half an hour."

"I need you to know that I mean it though," he pushed, "and I know it might not make you feel any better, but Tomny didn't kiss me back."

“You’re right, that doesn’t make me feel better at all,” Sirius replied staunchly. “I’d rather he be madly gone for you, and know that you’d still pick me in the end—that’s Shakespeare! But how do I know any of that’s the truth? How do I know that if he hadn’t refused you, that you’d still be here with me?”

Remus frowned. “Because I… I love you.”

“Right.” Sirius sniffed, then wiped his nose. “Well, I’m gonna need a little while, I think. Sort myself out and all that. I'll wager you should probably do the same.”

“I don’t understand what you mean. Time for what?”

“Christ, I mean time to think—figure it out. Decide what it is we want.”

“But I want you.”

The answer felt so blatantly obvious that Remus found himself surprised when Sirius didn’t automatically reply with the same thing.

“Do you not want me?” He asked, terrified.

“Didn’t say that,” Sirius mumbled. “Just said I needed some time…”

Sirius stood up then, manoeuvring past Remus and unlocking the stall door. They’d been in there for so long that the sky outside had gone dark, dimming the room enough to leave shadows on their faces.

"For how long?" He asked, following Sirius out of the stall.

"I don't know. A while."

"Sure," he nodded quickly. “A little while then, s’not a problem. I’ll sort out all of the Jillian stuff too—for real. I just… Can you tell me long you need?”

“For fuck’s sake, Moony, I don’t know! There isn’t exactly a statute of limitations for this sort of shit…” Sirius began backing away slowly. “Just give me some space to think, alright?”

“Okay.” He said in a tight voice. “Sure, take—take your space. I’ll be here. Or—not like ‘here’ here, just… you know.”

Sirius looked him up and down, like he was trying to burn the sight of him into his memory. The he turned away.

The door squeaked as it swung closed after him.

It'll be okay, Remus thought. He just needs time. It'll be alright… It'll be just fine…

He expected the voice to come to him, to provide some sort of jaded dialogue he could fight back against with his own feeble hope, but there was nothing. Just him and an empty bathroom.

Remus looked up at the bathroom window. The sky was still dark. He could not see the stars beyond the clouds, and as he craned his head to search for a hint of them, an insurmountable loneliness washed over him like a chill.

It'll be alright...

Right?

Alone in the bathroom, Remus Lupin hugged himself tight.

Chapter End Notes

Relationships stay messy.

I'm going to return to posting about once a week on Fridays/ Saturdays. Hopefully after my term finishes in April they will be a little more frequent, but thank you for sticking with me over this break. See you next week! <3

Chapter 73: On Dating

Chapter Summary

Stupid fucking idiots. Discoveries are afoot.

Chapter Notes

Don't lie, I know you're loving the drama ;)

CW: References to homosexuality (argument), vomit, & smoking.

Also, because I forgot last chapter: here's the Spotify playlist for Year 13. Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

So messed up, I want you here,
In my room, I want you here;
Now we're gonna be face-to-face,
And I'll lay right down in my favourite place;
Now I wanna be your dog…

- "I Wanna Be Your Dog" The Stooges, 1969

Friday 16th September 1977

It was official then, Sirius was angry. Maybe livid, even. Aside from the fact that he was clearly keeping Remus at an arm's length, Sirius had hardly spoken to him at all in the past few days. Remus tried telling himself that it was normal—whenever they'd fought in the past, they'd always needed space apart to find their way back together again. But as the hours turned into days and Sirius showed no inclination of returning to his side, Remus began to grow antsy.

"I hope the weather holds out for tomorrow, it'd be such a shame to get washed out during our first trip off campus," Mary said, holding a hand over her eyes as she surveyed the dark grey clouds looming outside the common room window.

"Wear a mac and some boots, you'll stay dry enough," Marlene said blithely, her legs kicked up over the arm of a Rowena-blue armchair.

Mary spun around and seized the book she was reading, only to start fanning herself with its cover. “A mac and a pair of wellies do not make for a cute date ensemble, Marlene.”

“Give that back! Who even says it has to be a date anyway?”

“Uh—everyone? That’s literally what these weekends off in the village are for. In fact I wouldn’t be surprised if a group of parents banded together originally and commissioned them. How else are they supposed to ensure that their kiddies find themselves a fruitful match?”

“You’re insane.”

“And you’re naive. C’mon, you tell her, Remus.”

Remus looked up at the pair, only half listening. “Uh?”

“Tell Marls that one cannot look cute with their hair smashed beneath a rain bonnet.”

Remus just blinked, and Marlene reached over the back of her chair to snatch the book back. “Bring an umbrella then, you drama queen.”

As Mary primped her hair, smiling like a cat, Lily reached over and tapped Remus’ notebook with her pencil. “Remus, that one’s incorrect.”

“What? Oh.” He looked down and sighed. All afternoon he’d spent in the girls’ common room—just one of his new perks as a prefect—working on homework, and yet he’d barely made a dent in any of his assignments. But really, how could he be expected to focus on school when Sirius hated him?

He doesn’t hate you, Remus reminded himself; He just hates what you did. Give him time.

He’d been recounting similar thoughts ever since Tuesday, since their conversation in the bathroom. Before then he’d stupidly assumed that they were on the same wavelength, that they were both in love but acting consciously to ensure that no one ever came close to figuring it out . Now it was clear that Sirius expected more. He expected Remus to want whatever it was they had just as much as he—and Remus did! He just didn’t know how to prove it.

Am I not enough for you? He also wanted to demand of Sirius; Is it not enough to just have me? Is this love not enough?

God, how Remus was starting to hate love; it was the excruciating polarity of it all. Love made everything more complicated, it made you miss people, even when they were standing right next to you. It was like an endless sea, and he was the inexperienced sailor, adrift blindly amongst its waves. He didn't have enough luck to bet on calm waters. He might've, except real luck didn't favour selfish people.

And Remus was selfish. So horribly selfish that if someone were to cut him open, his bones might've been blacked with the sin of it. He'd always known he wasn't a saint, but being with Sirius made him realise he was a worse person than he'd thought. He was selfish and greedy because he wanted all of it—he wanted the freedom to have Sirius with him, but also the secrecy of no one else knowing. He wanted that one more a million times over. He would've been willing to do almost anything to get it, except perhaps tell the truth.

I like you so much, but there's always a limit, ain't there?

It made him feel guilty, and the guilt made looking at Sirius hard, but it shouldn't be hard for normal friends to look at one another, so Remus forced himself to do that too. That left him tired and depleted, like a skipping record. James had noticed—James, the real saint—and more than once during that first week of classes, he'd leaned across a desk or table and asked Remus if he were alright. Remus always appreciated the quiet tone in which James asked, and sometimes he even imagined telling him the truth;

No, I'm not alright. I'm not alright because I'm in love with my best friend —no not you*, James—Sirius. I'm in love with Sirius Black and I can hardly bring myself to say it out loud when it's just the two of us, so how could I say it in front of anyone else?*

"I'm fine, just tired," Remus would answer instead.

Lily noticed too—effervescently stubborn Lily—though she seemed to chalk it up to his general distaste of being a prefect and therefore current distaste of her. As she leaned back from Remus' notebook, her expression read as worried. It'd been her idea to study together, and Remus had accepted because he couldn't stand another afternoon of returning to his dorm room and not speaking to Sirius—but now he was starting to regret it. Lily fretted like Mrs. Potter, and yet somehow remained twice as overbearing.

"Are you sure you're feeling alright?" She pressed, as Remus scratched out the incorrect answer and accidentally ripped a hole in the centre of his paper.

“Fine,” he grunted.

“I hope you’re not still angry with me over the prefect thing. You're not, right? What if I were to do all of your essays until Christmas?”

“I already told you, I’m not mad anymore,” he said tiredly. “You don’t have anything to make up for, Evans.”

“Liar!” Lily practically shrieked. “You’ve been sulking ever since we got back, so just let me do your essays and then you can call me ‘Lils’ again and everything’ll be fine!”

“I like doing my essays.”

“Ooooh! You—You’re Satan incarnate, Remus John Lupin!”

Maybe. But he doubted even Satan was as greedy as he was.

Obviously enjoying the show, Mary strolled up from behind and leaned down over Lily to hand her a tissue. “I thought you already solved his Jillian problem?”

Still pouting, Lily swatted at the tissue, not really needing it. “I didn’t work.”

“Well, what did you do?”

“Just never you mind.”

Mary shrugged, pulling out a chair at their table and sitting down. “Whatever. Do you want my advice?”

“ ‘No’,” all three of them answered at once.

“Rude. I was only going to suggest that if Remus really wanted the girl to leave him alone, he should try actually finding himself a girlfriend. I’d do it—for a little while, that is—except I just agreed to go to Craigtyre with Petyr Tarnowski, and I'd hate to double-book myself.”

“Because Petyr’s such a great catch,” Marlene mumbled from her chair.

Mary laughed; “Ha! Bitch—love you. But really, I do know a few girls who’d be interested. None of them are as crazy as Jillian either. Just say the word, Remus."

"No thanks, Mary."

She shrugged once more. "Suit yourself. I'm going to go find something less boring to do. Not that watching you lot do your homework isn't terribly thrilling. C'mon, Marls."

"But I'm reading."

"And I'm a leo. So glad we had this conversation. Now, chop-chop!" Forcibly hauling Marlene to her feet, Mary beamed as she laced their arms together and led her best friend from the common room. Lily turned to watch them go, before glancing at the chalky grey sky outside.

"Mary's right, I hope it doesn't storm. We deserve a nice day in the village."

Remus grunted, eyes busy boring a hole through his notebook.

"Have you given any thought to what you'd like to do tomorrow? Craigtyre's pretty nice in the daylight too, you know."

Another grunt.

"You could always come with James and me. He's been talking about Madam Puddifoot's, it's this little tea shop. Of course there's also Broomsticks. Some kids take boats out onto the local pond as well, and there's shopping and—"

A sudden rapping came on the window next to their table, and both Remus and Lily looked up to find James standing outside with a goofy grin on his face. He was wearing his running clothes, with a thick red sweatband around his forehead.

"Speak of the devil," Lily said, slipping out of her chair and unlatching the window. "Aren't you freezing? Where's your coat?"

"Nah, just about to go for a run, thought I'd check in on you two first," James said. "Alright there, Moons?"

Remus waved him off, still scribbling down his notes.

"I was just inviting Remus to the village with us," Lily professed loudly; "Isn't that a fine idea, Potter?"

“Oh, sure!” James trilled. “ ‘Course you should come, Moony, with you there we can make it a real party. You, me, Lily, Peter, Moira, Sirius, and Nydia.”

That got Remus to look up.

“Nydia?” Lily echoed for him.

“Yeah, you know—Nydia Burke. She runs the theatre club? Her dad owns that crazy chain of bookstores based out of London. Anyway, she asked Sirius to go to the village with her this morning, so guess she’ll be tagging along too.” James craned his head to see past her. “Ain’t that great, Moons?”

Remus could only gape at him. “I–I…”

“At least we know Sirius is finally back to normal,” James kept on; “I was starting to worry about him—what with all this shit with his parents, and how often he’s been skiving off with you. Speaking ‘a you, is there anyone you got your eye on, Moons? Or are you flying solo again?”

Remus stood up from the table. “I have to use the toilet.”

He left before either of his friends could start asking questions, abandoning his school things and taking the back door out of the dorm. The wind nipped icily at the back of his neck in just his school jumper, but Remus barely noticed it. His mind was operating at warp speed, and he was dangerously close to crashing. Sirius said yes to Nydia? He actually agreed to a date with her? But he’s—? And we’re—!

Remus forced himself to take a breath. Maybe he was reading too much into it… Maybe it wasn’t a date at all! James had called it a group thing—but everyone else going was dating someone, weren’t they? No—yes? Fuck. He needed to hear it from Sirius. Even if they hadn’t talked probably in days—he would force the truth from his very lips if he had to.

Taking the back path to Godric, Remus stumbled into the dorm, trousers wet to the kneecaps from navigating through the tall grass. The stairs he took two at a time, only slipping once, and when he reached dorm 4A he fought to free his keys from his pocket and shove them home in the door’s lock.

“Sirius?!” He cried when he was finally dashing inside.

“Nope, just me,” Peter called, as the door fell shut with a decisive click. He sat up on his bed, setting a comic book aside, but when he took in the state of Remus, his eyes widened slightly. “Boy, you sure look wild. What’d you do to your trousers?”

“Have you seen Sirius?” Remus demanded, still breathless from the stairs.

“No, but I expect he’ll be back soon.” Peter checked his watch. “He’s gonna meet us for dinner. You’re coming right? James says you can’t survive on cigarettes and tea, you know.”

Remus spun away, too frantic to entertain Peter’s weak wit. Fully intent to storm the rest of the school until he found Sirius or even Nydia herself, Remus reached for the door, but before his palm could meet it, it swung open on its own to reveal Sirius Black stranding in the doorway.

“Ah!” Sirius gasped, surprised to find Remus standing so close. “Fuck, what are you doing, Moony?”

“I need to talk to you,” Remus said. “Now.”

In that great big brain of his, Sirius must’ve understood. His eyes flitted to Peter and he cleared his throat. “Uh… hey, Wormy? I think Moira’s downstairs looking for you.”

“She is? What for? I just saw her.”

“I dunno, but she seemed pretty mad. Something about a forgotten anniversary? I’d get a move on if I were you.”

"What anniversary?!" Already alarmed, Peter threw himself off his bed and was out the door without even grabbing his shoes. Sirius shut it after him and then turned to Remus, looking hapless.

“That should give us a few minutes,” he said. “What do you want to talk about?”

Remus threw his arms out. “Just… Nydia?!”

Sirius’ eyes slid away. “Oh. That.” He moved around Remus then, shrugging off his jacket and tossing it across his bed. “What’d you wanna know?”

“How ‘bout—what the actual fuck?”

He heard Sirius snort. “Still Moony…”

“Don’t gimme that shit,” Remus lashed. “Turn around and tell me the truth!”

Sirius spun around in front of the stereo. “What truth?”

“I don’t know! Maybe an explanation—a bloody excuse?!”

“I don’t have any excuses,” Sirius replied, in that same cutting tone he’d used in the bathroom. “Why would I need them? S’not like you and I are dating.”

“Dating—?!” Remus stopped himself. If he exploded now there’d be no calming down. “Alright,” he managed; “Why then? Why do this—why do it this way? Are you trying to punish me or something?”

“It’s not always about you.”

“Do you think this is gonna make it better? You just going out and snog—”

“I haven’t snogged anyone,” Sirius seethed. “You did.”

"It was a kiss!" Remus cried. "One kiss! And I fucked up royally, I know! But it didn’t mean anything! I just needed someone, and he was there.”

“And I was there—that very fucking morning!”

“I’m sorry!”

“No, you’re not!” Sirius said. “You’re… You’re ashamed of me.”

Remus’ eyes bulged. “What?”

“You’re ashamed to be seen with me.”

“Sirius, I’m seen with you every day!”

“Not like that!” Sirius threw his arms out, like he wanted to hit something but nothing would satisfy. “You know what I mean, you’re just playing thick ‘cause you want to be the victim here. You’d rather hold my hand under the bleedin’ table than let anyone know that you’re even slightly different!”

The words cut deep, possibly even more so because they were true.

Remus swallowed his guilt. He was selfish, after all.

“Are you in love with her then—Nydia?”

“No, I’m not in love with her! But unlike you, she actually wants to be seen with me. She wants to hold my hand in public!”

“She’s a girl! She’s a girl and you said that you weren't even—”

“Oh, are you really the one to be policing my sexuality? Mr. ‘I like you but not like that’? You're such a bloody hypocrite. Since when does gender have anything to do with wanting to really be with someone anyway?”

“Since always!” Remus shouted. “Since forever. Since they sent Oscar fucking Wilde to the slammer for writing poetry to another man! I’m not embarrassed to be seen with you, I’m just a guy! I thought we’d agreed that that was enough? That it was what we both wanted?”

“You agreed,” Sirius retorted, “I just went along with it.”

It hurt, but Remus still fumed. How easy it was for Sirius to put all of the blame on him.

“This is so typical for you! ‘Moony, I did it for you’—‘Moony, we did it for you’!”

“Yeah well, this time I’m pretty sure you asked me for it!”

“So what now? We’re just over? You're gonna go off and date Nydia because I won't admit to being something I'm not?"

Sirius threw up an arm in exasperation, pointing at Remus viciously. “You know, that’s exactly what’s wrong with you! You say we, but really it's 'I'. 'I, me, mine'—Remus Lupin! It's like this every day, there never even was a ‘we’, not really! It was always 'us' and 'them'. Well, I'm fucking tired of it! I get to be 'them', as much as the next guy!"

"Who is them?!"

"Them—everyone! Everything you're afraid of! You can't admit what it is you really are, and now that I’ve branched out you act like you’re losing something!”

“I would say going out with someone else is a lot more than just ‘branching out’!”

“Call it what you want then, but remember, I asked you! I asked you if this is what you really wanted, and you said yes!”

“I said yes to you dating other girls?!”

“No! You said yes to keeping us a secret, and I said alright. You said we wouldn’t be boyfriends—I said alright! But I never said I’d just be okay with sitting back and being another one of your dirty little secrets! Shutting up and living blind and silent while you go crazy in your own bloody head!”

“Alright, sure,” Remus said, voice cracking slightly; “Go ahead, keep telling me everything that’s wrong with me. But remember, I also said that I loved you—and you said it back.”

“Yes, except you can’t even kiss me without looking over your shoulder first.”

“You want me to tell people, is that it? You want me to shout about us from the bloody rooftops?”

“I want you to want to!” Sirius cried, like a deep wound was opening within him. “That’s the difference, isn’t it?! I never expected you to just start coming out to everyone and their mother, but you’re ashamed of me! You’re no different from Miles!”

“Stop comparing me to him!” Remus wailed. “You do it constantly! Maybe not always out loud, but in your head—I can see it! You compare me to this guy that I don’t even know, and that you haven’t known since you were basically a fucking child! So tell me, Sirius, how can I live up to your imaginary idea of the ‘perfect man’—HOW?!”

“Don’t be a fucking coward for starters!”

Remus pressed a hand to his forehead. He was so tired, he hadn’t slept well the night before and shouting with Sirius always left him feeling like he had a gaping hole in his centre.

“Tell me you don’t want me to go out with Nydia,” Sirius said lowly. “Tell me, like you couldn’t with Kimmy. Or Stacy. Or Viv. Or Chas—”

“I’m sorry, if you could refrain from listing off all of your conquests, I actually have things to do between now and next Tuesday.”

“Fuck you,” Sirius spat. “I’m tired of you putting all your damage on me. I've got enough of my own."

"That much is clear."

Sirius waved him off angrily, snatching his jacket up from the bed. "Fine. Whatever, be miserable—keep your fucking secrets, but do it on your own."

"Oh, I will!" Remus shouted, as Sirius marched around him toward the door. "And I hope you and Nydia have tons of fun together tomorrow!"

Sirius grabbed the door handle. "We will!" Then he slammed it, and Remus was alone again.

Because he couldn't think of anything else to do, Remus padded into the bathroom and slammed the door himself. For a split second he thought he might be alright, but then it was like someone had taken a shovel to his insides, impaling him and bringing it all to the surface. Stomach heaving, he bent over the open toilet and expelled everything. It was disgusting. He couldn't tell if his eyes were watering or if he were actually crying. His ears burned, his entire face felt tight, and he was gripping the toilet bowl hard enough to chip fingernails.

When it was finally over, Remus sat back and breathed. Stomach acid still burned the back of his throat, and his nose was suddenly clogged. He didn't want to come apart right there on the bathroom floor, next to a bowl of his own vomit, and so he hauled himself up to the porcelain sink, where he tipped his head beneath the faucet and chugged deeply, desperate to rid himself of the taste. Afterwards, as he huffed, he splashed water on his face and neck. It didn't soothe him, only made him wet, and as he leaned across the taps to stare at his own reflection in the mirror, Remus began to count. It was an old technique a school nurse had once advised when he'd have one of his outbursts; make a list of things that might calm him. It felt stupid but there was really nothing else to do, and his stomach was already empty.

One… Sirius Black. There would only ever be one Sirius Black.

Two… I love you's. Two I love you's whispered in the dark.

Three… moles. Three moles behind Sirius' left ear.

Four… calls. Four calls he'd ignored from Giles, worried they'd be from his father.

Five… weeks. Five weeks they'd spent at each other's side.

Six… friends. Six friends they'd been missing.

Seven… braids. Seven times he'd braided Sirius' beautiful hair.

Eight… days a week. I ain't got nothing but love, babe… Sirius had sung it to him days ago. Did he remember?

Nine—

Come now, is this not getting rather pathetic?

Remus slammed his fist into the mirror. It cracked along the edge. Go away! He told the voice. Just fuck off!

Now that's fine manners. You talk to your mother with that mouth?

Nearly undone, Remus glared at his reflection. "You aren't real," he gasped. "You're just inside my head. No one else can hear you."

Of course I'm inside your head, but why should that mean I'm not real? Remus Lupin, Remus Dean, Moony, we're all real. In fact, it's getting a bit crowded in here… Might want to empty some of us out soon…

Remus splashed water over himself again. It did not help. He was tired, and wet, and he didn't want to think of Sirius or Nydia or anyone else anymore... but it was impossible. The longer he stayed in that room, the worse the thoughts seemed to get.

And so he walked.

Aimlessly.

People called out to him, asked him where he was going. Remus didn't have an answer. He only wanted to be angry. Angry at Sirius whom he loved, at Nydia who did nothing, at Tomny for being so far away, at Lyall for marrying someone else—at his father for not knowing him! … And his mother who knew both and had left them all.

Remus Lupin was angry at the world. He had been for a long time. He hadn't been raised like James, to know anger and also forgiveness, or Sirius who felt anger and knew to demand retribution. He knew only how to be angry, and anger made for stupid lovers. Jealous, bitter lovers. And that was entirely the reason why he called out to her from across the berm.

“Hey, Jill… do you have a moment?”

* * *

Saturday 17th September 1977

It felt a bit like being back on acid. He was drifting, physically there but mentally somewhere else. He imagined he was back at the estate. It was early August, James and Peter were still away on holiday and Giles had taken Lyall and Sandra out on some day trip. The staff had the day off. It was Sunday. Their day. Remus was burning the eggs, Sirius was flicking through the radio. It was Sunday.

“You could’ve come inside, you’re a prefect now,” Jillian said to him, as she appeared out of the front door of Bronte House in a pretty blue peacoat.

“Oh. Forgot.”

She took his arm. “Don’t worry. Now you’ll know for next time.”

Remus swallowed. Somehow next time wasn’t as appealing as one more.

They started up the lane together, following a train of other upper-sixths, all on their way to make the buses that would carry them down to the village. It was cold—a storm was bound to be rolling in, but none of their classmates had been deterred anyway. A pair of Rowena girls whipped past, jostling Remus accidentally and stopped just long enough to apologise before giggling and moving on.

“Will we be seeing your friends today?” Jillian asked, once they’d made it to Castle Hall, where a string of yellow buses were lining the curb.

Remus shook his head. They’d asked him to join them, of course, but he’d declined on precedent. He already refused to be within ten feet of Sirius within their own dorm, no way he was going to share a table with him at some stupid teashop. It was Saturday.

“No, they’re… doing their own thing.”

“Oh, too bad.”

If he'd been paying attention, Remus might've noticed the look of satisfaction on Jillian's face, but the crowd had him distracted. Professor McGonagall was at the head of it all, checking names, while younger prefects mulled about, trying desperately to keep the excited bunch of sixth formers in order. Skirting the edges of it all was a very gleeful-looking Mr. Filch, who'd already apprehended Barty Crouch and Aaron Travers for trying to stowaway on one of the buses. As Filch dragged the moaning boys away by the ear, Jillian tapped him on the shoulder.

"I'm gonna chat up Tracey for just a sec, can you check us in?"

He nodded and she pressed up on her toes—simultaneously yanking Remus down by the shoulder—to kiss him on the cheek.

"Be right back," she cooed.

As Jillian slipped away, Remus cursed himself. It'd been an impulse to ask her to the village—one he should've ignored. After all, since when had his impulses ever panned out the way he'd wanted?

"Lupin and Stewart," Remus grunted, after fighting his way to the front of the mob surrounding the nearest prefect with a clipboard. At his words, she turned around and he realised then that it was Trish.

"You're off yer head, Remington," she exclaimed. "Dinnae tell me you actually asked Jillian out?"

Remus scowled. "Why don't you say it louder, don't think she heard you."

"Tis your funeral," she sniggered, checking their names off the list. "Bus three. Now who's next?"

As other kids shoved forward to get their names down, Remus went back around to the correct bus. He was glancing around for his date when Peter appeared with Moira, and that quickly multiplied into the two of them plus James and Lily.

"Moony, you're coming after all!" Peter said.

"Uh, yeah," Remus said awkwardly. "Thought I'd give it a go."

"That's great, I can't wait to see everything," Lily smiled, grabbing his coat sleeve. "C'mon! Our bus is this way, you can ride with us."

He followed her obediently, and was fine with the situation until James and Lily took it upon themselves to link their arms through his.

“So, Moony… are you and Black fighting again?” James asked.

“Yeah, he’s been weird all morning,” Peter called.

Lily scoffed; “What those two are trying to say is, are you alright? You and Sirius aren’t talking, and we’ve sort of noticed.”

"Definitely noticed," Peter added.

“It’s fine,” Remus insisted, pulling away from all of them. “We’ve just had a little spat.”

“You mean a big spat?” James echoed.

“No! Just—ugh… Just let me deal with it, alright?”

“Okay,” Lily said, taking his hand again. “But if you need a lawyer, don’t call Potter. He’s failing criminal court already and it’s only week two.”

“That is a grievous falsehood, Evans. I could sue you for slander.”

“You’d have to be able to understand the paperwork first,” she teased.

“Moony!” James rounded on him. “Who’d you rather have defending you? Me or Lily?”

“Of course he’d pick Lily,” Moria said, making Peter snort. “Any sane person would.”

“Moira, you wound me so,” James moaned. “I’ll have you lot know that I am planning to ace our next test in—”

Just then Jillian reappeared, stepping between Remus and Lily and taking his arm fondly. “Thanks for checking us in,” she said sweetly, then; “Hey, guys.”

Lily snatched her hand back. The last time Remus had seen that look on her face was when Sirius had showed up with Chastity on their way to the village the very first time.

“Oh. Hi, Jill,” she chirped. “Are you two… together?”

Remus hated how Lily had asked the question, but Jillian only seemed to glow. “Yes, Remus asked me to go to the village with him.”

James reached across his girlfriend, gently knocking a fist against Remus’ shoulder as a friendly rapport. “Way to go, man,” he said. "Knew you had it in you."

“Are you two coming on our bus?” Moira asked, absentmindedly picking a stray pine needle from Peter’s hair. Though Peter had insisted hand over fist that he’d grown over the summer, Remus suspected it was only a half inch at most. Conversely, Moira had grown. She was still sporting her same straight-across fringe, but she’d gained at least an inch and a half on her boyfriend in the last year, maybe two. If Peter had noticed, he’d made no mention of it to his friends.

“No!” Remus answered quickly. “Or—What bus are you guys taking?”

“Three,” Lily replied.

“We’re four.”

Peter glanced around. “But there’s only three buses.”

“—I meant two!”

“Shame,” James said. “I’m sure we could squeeze you in.”

“No… we—”

“POTTER!”

They all turned. Sirius was waving his arms from outside the doors of the very last bus, trying hard to get their attention. Next to him stood Nydia Burke, looking very pretty with her hair arranged neatly over one shoulder. She wore a white wool overcoat that seemed to make her brown skin glow, and was standing very close to Sirius, as if leaving too much room would prevent people from understanding that she was the lucky winner of his undivided attention for the day.

“Impatient, that one,” James chuckled, waving back and already steering Lily and the others towards him. “See you in the village, Lupin?”

“Yup,” Remus answered, as Jillian took his arm and did the same.

“I could tell you were lying,” she said, as they neared the front doors of the bus. “You don’t want to be around your friends.”

“It’s not like that…”

“No, it’s okay! I get it. It’s sort of sweet—how you want us to be all alone. I never would have pegged you as such a romantic, Remus.”

Resisting the urge to correct her, Remus glanced back over his shoulder. Through the small crowd he could just make out a head of midnight-black hair. It occurred to him that he didn’t want to want Sirius to turn around, but perhaps if he thought hard enough…

Come back… Turn around. Come back.

But Sirius Black did not turn around. Rather, he stepped back the gentlemen he was to allow Nydia to board the bus ahead of him, and then he climbed its steps, and Remus could stare no longer.

Jillian was nudging him. “Remus? Remus, are you listening?”

“Uh, sorry, what were you saying?”

“I was asking you what you’d like to do today.”

“Oh. Well, Lily mentioned there was a bookshop.”

“Bookshop it is,” she agreed. “And afterwards we can get a spot of lunch. It’ll be fabulous.”

Yeah… fabulous…

So the day went on. And on. And as tumultuous as Remus felt inside, it was admittedly not entirely terrible. Lily had been right, Craigtyre was charming in the daytime. Its roads were cobbled and windy, boarded on either side by rows and rows of look-alike cottages. Every yard had a garden and every garden had a fence, though most were made of stone and covered in soft cushions of moss. Street lamps lined the busier roads, all of them leading into the centre of town like a bead of rain running across a spider’s web. The heart of the village held most of the shops and much of the comings and goings were centred around there, along with the main road in and out, where the buses had dropped them.

As baffling as Jillian was most moments, Remus found himself grateful for her unwavering ability to chatter on. She literally never ran out of things to say, but never complained when Remus’ attention wandered or when he thought to distract himself with a fag or otherwise. And she didn’t insist on having tea in that ridiculous Madam Puddifoot’s, an immense relief. They'd walked past the shop earlier in the day and the sight of all those tacky frills along with the overpowering smell of potpourri was enough to turn Remus' stomach for the second day in a row.

"That girl, Lily Evans?" Jillian said, as though she didn't already have every facet of Lily's life recorded to memory; "She tried telling me the most egregious story about you the other day."

Remus pulled his cigarette from his lips. "She did?"

"Yes! She said that… Well, it's hardly worth repeating, it was so silly. I think you might need to check in with your James friend though, she might have a crush on you. Wouldn't want that now, would we?"

She hugged his arm again, which was really starting to wear out its welcome. Remus thought he might have bruises around his elbow by the end of the day.

"Look, Remus, I've found your bookshop."

Jillian kindly pointed across the street, to a small line of shops all brightly decorated. Remus lit up when he saw it. There was indeed a bookshop, but that wasn't what had caught his attention. The building that adjoined the bookshop on the left-hand side was painted all over in rich colours of navy and plum. It had a sign that bore the words Dervish and Bangers! Records & Tapes and its windows were plastered with posters advertising the latest album releases. He could hardly believe it—a record shop, right there in Craigtyre! It was positively mouth-watering.

"Blimey! I didn't know they had a music shop here!" Remus gasped, already dashing across the street. Jillian came with, only because she'd refused to release his arm, though the noise she made as they stumbled across the street was less than impressed.

"Appears it's new," Jillian said when they'd reached the front windows. She pointed at a flyer taped to the glass, advertising the shop's grand opening, and as they stared the door opened towards them and a small group of their classmates shuffled out, each clutching different LPs to their chests and chattering excitedly.

"Hey Jill!" A few of the girls trilled, sizing Remus up as they passed by. He barely noticed, itching to get inside.

"You coming?"

“I’ll be right there,” Jillian said, waving at the giggling girls. “I’m just gonna catch up with Donna and Sandy first.”

Not about to complain over the sudden offer of privacy, Remus pulled away from her and slipped into the shop. It was small inside, but warm enough, with each wall painted a different neon colour and decorated with posters and thin shelves displaying various albums. On the floor in-between were rows and rows of vinyl records and tapes, each of them stacked together and just waiting to be sifted through. Music was playing, naturally, and apart from a few other browsers, the only other person inside was a young guy busy organising a milk crate of dingy LPs behind the shop counter. It reminded Remus of summer, when he and Sirius had wasted away hours wondering through the shops around Camden and Carnaby. And as soon as he thought about summer, he began to miss Sirius all over again.

On the upside, without Jillian around to bother him, Remus was able to spend some time sorting through the rows like he did in the shops back home. The shop attendant never really paid him much mind, he was too busy bobbing his head along to the music as he price-stickered each record. It was a folk song, which didn’t appeal much to Remus, but he wasn’t used to a music store being so quiet. The guys in London were always trying to upsell you some newest release.

“Who’s the band?” He asked, making the shop attendant perk up.

“Oh, uh—” He spun around, picking up the album cover. “New group —husband and wife duo, looks like. ‘The Long… bottoms’. Hm.”

Remus nodded—the name was definitely folky enough—and suddenly a knock came on the window behind him. Jillain was outside, waving like she expected him to come outside and join her. She had a group of her girlfriends with her too, each of them looking keen.

Come on! Jillian mouthed through the glass. She gestured to the girls, clearly wanting Remus to make an entrance.

Pulling a random record off the shelf, Remus raised it like he’d yet to pay. Jillian crossed her arms, but motioned for him to go on and Remus slunk back toward the pay counter, sheepishly dropping the album down in front of the seller.

“KC and the Sunshine Band, eh?” The guy said, turning the record over.

“Er—no, s'a mistake,” Remus said quickly. “Do you have any Sex Pistols?"

He nodded, and turned around to shuffle through a pile of albums on the back counter. "Aye, yer in luck. Just got a fresh shipment in yesterday. Still going through it, in fact. But those Sex Pistols—hard tae come by."

"I'll take whatever you've got," Remus said, watching patiently as the guy sorted through. He wanted to celebrate when the stack finally revealed the band's single, Anarchy in the U.K., but what came after just about made Remus' eyes roll out of his head.

"That the new Bowie release?!" He asked breathlessly, pointing at the album, which was still fresh and untouched in its plastic. Across its front read, Restricted release for promotional use only. Not for sale.

"Mhm, a pal 'a mines helped me get my hands on a merchant copy," The guy picked it up, passing it over to Remus to let him run his hands across it. Heroes, it was titled. Remus could hardly believe it.

"Will you sell it to me?"

The guy shook his head. "Na, can't sell it. Against the rules. This baby won't hit shelves for an'nur month or sae. Check back then."

Remus did the math in his head. Sirius was quite possibly more livid with him than he'd ever been. It wouldn't negate the seriousness of what was done, but showing up with a fresh-off-the-presses Bowie album just might soften the blow.

"I'll pay double for it!"

"Sorry, pal. Cannae do it."

Jillian knocked on the window again, looking impatient.

"Please! I'll do anything! I'll... well, next time I'm in I'll sort five crates of stock for free! You're a brand-new shop, I'll bet you're busy enough without having to sort through a million copies of KC and the Sunshine Band."

The guy squinted at him, before smirking slyly. "Ten crates."

"Seven."

"Eight."

“Deal.”

He emerged on the street with both albums, feeling victorious, but with little time to reveal in the glow of the still plastic-wrapped LP. Jillian was waiting for him, arms crossed and tapping her foot like a scolding professor. Luckily her friends had gone.

“Sorry, I had to haggle with the guy,” he supplied meekly. Jillian looked him up and down, then swept her hair out of her eyes.

“That’s alright. I wanted to introduce you a bit more, but girls had a reservation at Madam Puddifoots.”

“Next time?” He winced.

She nodded. “What’d you get then?”

He showed her.

“Bowie? Never much cared for him.”

“He’s great once you get used to him.”

“Really? I always thought he was a bit too ostentatious. Overzealous, maybe.”

“Oh, he totally is, but he’s also pretty… uhm…” He trailed off. Suddenly Remus didn’t feel much like talking about music. “Lunch then?”

Jillian beamed.

They took tea in some random café just off the main drag, and throughout the meal Jillian continued peppering him with questions about his life and growing up in the city. She never forgot to interject with bits of herself though.

“My mum’s family is from London, but we never see them,” she sighed, sipping from her Coca-Cola. “I hate spending the summers in Chippenham, it’s so boring. It’s like, you grow up there and the only other people around for miles are those with babies and their grandparents.”

“Chippenham, that’s close to Bath, innit?”

“Yeah! Have you been?”

He quickly changed the subject; “Do you read much?”

Jillian sat up straighter, apparently pleased that he’d finally contributed to the conversation some. “Not really, I love the theatre though. My favourite is ‘My Fair Lady’. It’s a musical. Have you seen it?”

“Er—no.”

“That’s too bad! I saw it first in London actually, and I loved it so much that I went to see it again when I was in New York. Only then I realised that it wasn’t actually ‘My Fair Lady’, but the original play it was based on. ‘Pygmalion’, or something.”

“Oh yeah,” Remus said, his memory jogged; “Like that guy in Ovid.”

“In what?”

“The Greek figure? Ovid writes about him in… y’know what, never mind.”

Jillian propped her chin up on one hand and grinned at him. “You're so funny, Remus."

"Nah, not really."

"You are," she insisted. "And you have such handsome curls.”

“... Thanks.” Oh god, was he supposed to compliment her back now? “You’ve got nice hair too. Very... a nice colour."

Despite the lame attempt, Jillian laughed. Maybe he was funny. Then she reached across the table, thumbing a piece of his hair, which had fallen down over his temple. “So soft too,” she praised, before gently running her thumbnail down the side of his cheek.

Remus immediately shivered. He couldn’t do it anymore. He shouldn’t want to. He was in love with Sirius, even if Sirius was off with Nydia.

“Jill—”

Perhaps it was women’s tuition. Before Remus could even get the words out, Jillian was popping up from her chair. “Look at us—we’re wasting the day,” she declared, grabbing her handbag. “Don’t worry, this one is on me.”

She left their table to pay, and Remus was left dejected and disappointed. He wondered where Sirius had taken Nydia. To the Three Broomsticks, maybe? Where they could get a booth along the back so that no one might interrupt? Or maybe he'd taken her to the joke shop James had been chittering on about—the one that supplied gag toys and rubber snakes-galore. Was he telling her of their band, their plans for the future? Was he complimenting her beautiful brown skin, or singing to her, or talking about flats and Jagger and his lovely new life at the Potters?

Was he calling her the sky?

You could almost be considered a masochist at this point, what with all the emotional turmoil you churn out, Vicious Moony said. Are you sure you're a seventeen year-old boy? Sounds more like a lonely housewife to me… Shall I fetch you an apron?

You're not fucking funny.

I think our audience would disagree.

"Ready?" Jillian asked, reappearing beside the table.

They walked around the village some more, even stopping in to the local confectionery to line their pockets with various sweets. Remus looked everywhere for Sirius—a hint of him among the village's passersby—but never spotted him.

"Oh, Remus! We should take a boat out!" Jillian said, as they crossed into the eastern half of the village. The crowds were less dense there, mostly because of the small lake that took up all of the space on the edge of the nearest neighbourhood. It was nothing compared to Lake Dubh, if anything it was more of a large pond, but there were tiny fishing boats left along the shore by the local authority and they had leave as Hawkings students to use them as they pleased. No one was out on the lake today though, which was a good thing. The weather had turned again and it was clear that a usual Scottish storm was on its way.

"I dunno, Jill," Remus said, surveying the sky. "Looks like it'll rain soon."

"I've brought my brolly," she said, pulling a small telescopic umbrella from her bag. "C'mon, it'll be fun. I won't even make you paddle the entire time."

And that was how they ended up floating across the tiny loch in a wooden dinghy. The water was pitch black and the entire thing swayed precariously in the shifting breeze, but Jillian only appeared ecstatic. “You can swim, right?” She’d asked him, as they drifted further from shore. He could, but the water was already icy despite being only September, and Remus didn’t much fancy a dip.

"James and Sirius seem funny," Jillian said, while Remus rowed and she sat across from him. It wasn’t raining yet, but she kept her umbrella balanced carefully on one shoulder as though it were a parasol and they were two amorous lovers who’d only just escaped the prying eyes of their snub-nosed rivals. Staring at her, Remus wondered what the probability was that she’d be struck by lightning before they returned to shore.

"They are."

"I've known them both for a while, obviously." She eyed him, like a cobra sizing up a meal. "But you don't seem to have much in common."

Remus tried not to appear affronted. "We have a lot in common. We all like music."

"Oh, but I didn't really mean interests. It was more like, they're... active, and you're reactive."

He didn't understand her meaning, and wasn't entirely sure he wanted to, so Remus just focused on paddling. "They're best friends. Bound to be alike, I guess."

“And is Peter your best friend then?”

“He’s one of them,” he answered sharply. “James too.”

“But you just said that James is Sirius’ best friend.”

The comment made Remus grumpy; as if he and Peter were the leftover Marauders, and must’ve been closer because of it. The things that I know—that I’ve seen*—that James Potter hasn’t.*

“There’s also Lily,” he said; “and Marlene.”

“Your ex-girlfriend?”

“She’s just a friend now.”

Jillian nodded quickly. “Of course. I didn’t mean to insinuate otherwise." She bit her lip. "Oh, look at that, it's starting to rain!"

Despite not having an umbrella of his own, Remus had yet to feel a single drop, but that didn't stop Jillian as she quickly scrambled across the dinghy to take a seat next to him. With all of their weight now transferred to the back, the boat lurched dangerously and Remus clung to its edge, trying to keep it from overturning and dropping one of his oars in the process.

"Uhh—Jill, I don't think we're properly balanced anymore!"

"It's rude to comment on a lady's weight, Remus," Jillian teased, snuggling in close. Eventually the boat stopped rocking, though they were tipped precariously to one end. As Jillian coddled him, Remus peered miserably over the water's surface, mourning the loss of his oar. At least it floated; he could see it several yards away, bobbing aimlessly like a taunt. What else have you lost? It seemed to say; Let us count the ways. You've lost your friends, your mind, your boyfriend, your self-resp—

Boyfriend...?

Boyfriend?!

"Remus."

He looked back, and Jillian was right there. She was looking up at him, their faces only mere inches apart. It was almost dark under the umbrella, he doubted any rival could've seen them even if they were trying to spy.

"I really like you, Remus," Jillian confessed abruptly. How easy it was for her to say such things. He might've commented on it, wryly—as if to defuse some of the sudden tension—but before he could she was stretching her face up toward him.

Oh god. She was going to kiss him!

He pulled back sharply, his only thought being—Sirius! And as he did so, his hand missed the edge of the dinghy and fell onto empty air. There was a sudden shriek—Jillian—then a splash, and just like that Remus Lupin was in the lake.

* * *

It would be funny later when he was looking back on it, but in the moment, Remus was nothing other than humiliated. Jillian seemed equally so—her face was splotchy and red the entire row back and she didn't say a word, but she had helped him clamber back into the boat so that was something.

"I'm s-sorry," he told her, as he stood shivering on the shore.

Jillian didn't meet his gaze. Her peacoat was stained with lake water, and she was fiddling with the strap of her umbrella. "It's alright," she murmured.

"I didn't m-mean to of-f-fend you," Remus said, already working on his incoming cliché. "And it's n-not even you, it's j-just that… there's s-someone else."

Jillian's meek look turned into a deep, frustrated frown. "Oh Jesus—I knew that."

For a moment Remus stopped shivering. "You did?"

"Yes!" She huffed. "If you must know, Lily told me. I thought it was just her way of keeping you to herself at first… but I guess now I know she was telling the truth."

Remus couldn't believe it. It felt as though the entire world was caving in. How could Lily have possibly found out? And how could she have told Jillian?!

"I… Jill, we—!"

"Yes, yes, I understand." She glanced bitterly at the lake. "Family matters, and all that. So rare that these things turn out, but you can't help who you like, even if they're French."

"I—" Remus drew up short once again. "French?"

"Lily told me all of the details."

She didn't tell me the details! Remus scrambled to make sense of what she was saying. He was French? That's what she was focussed on? What did Sirius being French have anything to do with it? He would've thought she'd be more caught up over the fact that they both had a—

"You can tell Ms. Farrah that I'm not going to try and steal her fiancé," Jillian said. "Now that I know she's actually real. Though if I were her, I would've never let you come back here without me. Too many girls, too few eligible boys."

Jillian began wiping off her coat, while Remus ran circles in his head. "Farrah?"

"She must be pretty beautiful," she said, "to make a guy stay so faithful when another girl is openly trying to kiss him. I understand why you hid it though—the fact that you're engaged and have an actual fiancée. I mean, we're only seventeen and it is 1977. I wouldn't want to be engaged this early, no offence."

Suddenly the dots were starting to connect. "Farrah…" he mumbled. Lily… Lily and her egregious story… oh—

"OH!" He cried. "That fiancée."

Jillian rolled her eyes, like his unanticipated dip in the lake had turned him daft. "No need to play dumb anymore, Remus. I get it. You were actually pretty decent, all things considered. I've heard that I can be sort of… overbearing."

"Heh, you? Nah…"

It began to rain, spattering them with fat raindrops and further darkening Jillian's sky-blue coat. "I do wish you'd have told me before I refused Roy Nilssen's invitation to the village," she drawled, opening her umbrella. "Why did you ask me anyway?"

Remus licked his frozen lips. Lily's lie was already spun and Jillian was believing it; there was no need to tell her that he'd done it only to make the best friend he was simultaneously sleeping with jealous.

"Well, I was hoping that we could… still be friends?"

She gave him another hopeless look. "Of course we can still be friends." She pat him on the arm, and Remus got the sense that it was more of a pity-offer than anything else. "I'm gonna go now, I think, see if I can catch up with Roy before we have to get the bus. You going to be okay on your own?"

He nodded, lake water still dripping off the tips of his hair. "I'll be fine, don't worry about me. And I'll pay you back for lunch too."

"Keep your money," she said kindly, as she passed him back his records. “Spend it on your fiancée in Paris. Bring me back a croissant or whatever.”

She left him there on the edge of the Scottish loch, and despite the fact that he was sopping wet and had most definitely ruined the fresh package of cigarettes in his pocket, Remus had never felt more relieved.

Lily Evans, you are forgiven and then some! He promised, as he made his way back up the rain-covered cobbled streets with a new spring in each squelching step. He’d just turned onto the village’s main thoroughfare when a voice called out to him, and he turned to find Marlene standing beneath the awning of the same cafe he and Jillian had eaten at earlier. She was bundled up against the weather in her oversized leather coat, but her hair was spiked up with gel and she was without her stockings, instead having traded them for thick black knee socks and heavy workmen boots. Perhaps even more surprisingly, she held a cigarette between two fingers.

“What the fuck happened to you?” Marlene asked, looking him up and down. “Why're you all wet?”

“Marlene,” Remus said, equally unable to believe his eyes, “are you smoking?”

Like she were embarrassed, Marlene straightened up and flicked the cigarette away. “As if you can talk,” she mumbled, casting a worried glance at the cafe behind her.

“Waiting for someone?” Remus asked.

“No!” She answered very quickly, coming forward. She took his arm, despite the fact that he was still wet, and began steering him away. “C’mon, I was just about to head back. You’ll catch a cold if you stay like this.”

“I’m looking for Sirius,” Remus said as she led him; “Have you seen him?”

“Mhm, a while ago though. Think he went to Broomsticks with the others.”

Remus nodded thoughtfully. He didn’t want to make a scene in front of all of their friends—certainly not Nydia. He could wait, clean himself up, and then maybe he’d have a chance to make all of it right again.

“You sure you want to go back so early?” He asked Marlene, as they made it to one of the waiting buses.

“Yeah,” she said, pushing him aboard. “Wasn’t having much fun anyway…”

They sat, and the doors closed as the driver—Stan, the young guy with all the acne who’d driven them to their very first live gig in year eleven—pulled away from the curb. The weather was terrible, a real storm had begun to lash at the bus’s windows, but Remus felt hopeful for the first time in days.

“Marlene,” he said.

She looked up from her seat across the aisle. She’d been drawing on her boot with a pen and had the cap tucked between her teeth. “Eh?”

“Just wanted to say... that you’re pretty.”

She stared at him, then capped the pen. “Delirious already. Right, that’s it—straight into the bath with you.”

Back at the dorm, he took a shower to warm his frozen skin—because a bath would’ve wasted more time—and hightailed it back to Castle Hall with his hair still damp, where he waited in the rain to apologise to Sirius. Each returning bus might as well have been a ship pulling in harbour, but when their passengers piled off and none of his friends were among them, Remus always felt a pang of disappointment.

“Has Sirius Black returned yet?” He eventually asked the waiting prefect—not Trish, thankfully. The boy glanced over his clipboard and shook his head, and so Remus waited. It was nigh seven o’clock when he checked his watch to find that supper had come and gone without him. His legs and arse were aching after spending so long leaning against the cement retaining wall alongside the road, but just as he was considering giving up, another bus pulled up the lane. Among the exiting students were James and Lily, and they spotted him immediately.

“Remus!” Lily declared, rushing over and stepping beneath his umbrella. “Did you have a nice day?”

“Yes,” Remus told her, before all but dropping the umbrella and pulling Lily into a tight hug. “You’re insane, Lily Evans, but you’re also a genius!”

“What did I do?” She asked, voice muffled by his shoulder.

Suddenly another pair of arms enveloped them.

“I’m not sure why we’re hugging,” James said, “but cheers!”

“It’s Jillian,” Remus said, when they’d finished. “She’s done with me. And all because someone told her I was already engaged.”

“You’re engaged?! Oh my god… Can I be best man?” James gasped, while Lily whipped him playfully on the arm.

“He’s not really engaged,” she said quietly. “I just told Jillian he was so that she’d leave him alone. I can’t believe it worked, she so totally didn’t believe me before!”

Remus shifted from one foot to another. “Yeah, well… she definitely does now.”

“This is too funny,” James chittered. “Black! Come and get a load ‘a this!”

At James’ call, Remus shot upright, spraying Lily with the rain that had collected on top of his umbrella. He hadn’t seen Sirius get off the bus, but now that he were paying attention, he could see Sirius across the berm, standing next to Nydia.

Sirius threw a hand up in answer, and paused slightly when he noticed that it was Remus James were standing next to. Remus thought about throwing up a friendly hand of his own, but then Nydia tapped Sirius on the shoulder and said something into his ear that had him turning into her. He smiled, that amused smirk of his, and Remus felt his heart plummet.

“They certainly look like they had a good time…”

“Right?” James trilled. “I was gettin’ a bit worried about him—always spending all his time with you.” He elbowed Remus lightly in the stomach. “Guess we know he’s back to normal after all.”

“You’re always encouraging him,” Lily scoffed, as Nydia placed a peck on Sirius’ cheek and strolled away. “Just watch as he breaks her heart.”

“Nah, he won’t break it,” James said, “Nydia’s tougher than that. It’s why he said yes to her in the first place.”

Remus bit down on his thumbnail. Dammit.

“Can’t have five minutes without you interrupting,” Sirius said, as he wandered over. There, he looked Remus over. “Get caught in the rain, Lupin?”

“Fell in the lake, actually.”

The barest shadow of a smile crossed Sirius’ face, almost giving Remus hope, but it vanished by the time Lily was rounding on him.

“You fell in the lake?!”

“It’s not that big of a deal…” he murmured, suddenly more shy.

“Go on, tell him the good news, Moony!” James prodded. Sirius eyed them both.

“What news?”

Suddenly very nervous, Remus baulked, and it was Lily who stepped in.

“Remus is finally free of any and all persistent admirers!” She announced.

Sirius raised a brow. “You mean Stewart?” He said, and Lily nodded.

“You heard me, Jillian Stewart is no more! Remus is much too busy with Farrah to be bothered with silly school-girl crushes.”

“And by Farrah, you mean…?”

“His beautiful French fiancée, of course!" She chittered. "But be careful, she’s a secret. Wouldn’t want to embarrass him.”

“I’d say that ship’s sailed,” Remus muttered.

Raising his chin, Sirius slipped both hands in his pockets. “Great. Happy for you.”

“Me too,” James agreed, clapping a hand on both of their shoulders. As he did so, Remus nearly fumbled his albums, which he’d been keeping tucked under one arm.

“Got these in the village,” Remus said, passing the first record onto James and Lily to get a look.

“Sex Pistols—nice!” James declared. “Bet they’d be just mental to see live.”

“Yeah…” Sirius answered, keeping his hands in his pockets but peering over as though he didn’t want to appear too interested.

“Might be a bit wet,” Remus said. “But there’s also this.”

Trying to keep his fingers from trembling, he raised the other album, and Sirius’ eyes expanded to twice their usual size.

“Holy shit,” James gasped for him; “Is that a new Bowie record? Black, you think you would’ve told me it’d come out.”

“It hasn’t,” Sirius echoed. “Not until the end of next month.”

“Convinced the guy to give me his merchant’s copy,” Remus said, eagerly holding out. Sirius took the album and flipped it over, taking in Bowie’s black and white image.

“Fucking hell…”

“You’re still so full of surprises, Remus,” Lily giggled.

“Really is,” Sirius agreed quietly.

Trying not to let the comment get his hopes up, Remus cleared his throat. “Practically sold myself into servitude to get that, but you can call it an early birthday present.”

“You mean you got it for me?”

“Well, I didn’t get it for myself, did I? Figure you’re the only one in all of Scotland with a copy.”

“I…” Sirius bit his lip. “I can’t accept.”

“Sure you can, we keep our records in the same place anyway.”

Sirius looked like he wanted to argue, but if there was anything in the world he liked more than attention, it was Bowie.

“Thanks,” he said. “This is pretty fucking rad.”

“Don’t mention it.” Remus smiled, and Sirius returned the look. It was a chastened smile, but Remus took it as a good sign. Perhaps they weren’t entirely down the tubes then. If Sirius could forgive him for

Tomny and he could overlook Nydia then maybe they—

“Sirius, darling,” Nydia called; “we’re heading back to the common room now. Are you coming?”

Sirius raised his chin. “Yeah, be right there,” he told her. “Catch you guys back at the dorm.”

“Don’t stay out all night, tiger,” James laughed, slapping Sirius on the behind as he turned away. Sirius scoffed at him, before raising the record in Remus’ direction.

“Thanks again, Moons. Super cool.”

And just like that he was gone. Remus wanted to scream.

“Don’t be too disappointed, Moons,” James told him, as they headed back to Godric with Lily in tow. “It was good on you for trying. Black’ll come around, you’ll see.”

“And if he doesn’t, then we’ll just sue,” Lily added fondly.

His friends’ lighthearted sympathy aside, Remus was still lost. He’d known that things between him and Sirius weren’t just going to magically heal themselves after Jillian’s departure, but he’d been anticipating that it would at least make it easier to talk about. Judging from Sirius’ reaction though, it’d been a false hope.

“Did ya make a mistake, Lu?” Tomny asked later, when Remus had plucked up the courage to phone him. He'd been nervous ever since Tomny had seen him off at the station, like seeing him slip out of sight had been some great goodbye. He'd even avoided calling, afraid the line would come up dead again, but now Remus felt stupid. Tomny had picked up on the third ring, and he'd been the same as always. Friendly, kind. Just so Tom.

“… Yeah, I made a big fucking mistake..." Remus murmured. He heard Tomny sniff, then chuckle lightly.

“Little sop. Don't cry."

"I'm not crying!"

"Right, right. But all 'ah this is about that friend of yours, yeah? The tall glass ‘a water yer always goin’ on about… Sirius?”

Involves you too, he wanted to say. When he didn’t, Remus began to gnaw on the inside of his cheek. He knew Tomny had a vague idea of what he meant by the relationship, but so far he'd been tip-toeing around actually calling it what was. He supposed the kiss had been evidence enough.

"Yeah, that's him."

"Orright then, so whatchu gonna do to fix it?" It was such a Tom answer; you break it, you fix it.

"I dunno. Doesn't really feel like a 'right' or 'wrong' thing."

"Those are 'ard, them." Tomny stopped to cough. "But nah' impossible. S'like when yer feelin' down, and you want to feel up again, right? But ya've mixed up all yer pills—just gotta figure out which one's which. Trial 'n error, 'n all that jazz."

"I feel like I've just been 'erroring'."

"That's 'cause yer 'ere, whingin' to me. You should be out there—whingin' to 'im."

"You saying you don't want to talk to me?"

"Nice try, ya plonker. I'm just no good wiff love advice."

The comment made Remus spin around to make sure he was alone in the hallway. He was; everyone else was taking up space in the common room, or else had moved on upstairs for the night.

Remus exhaled, jaw trembling. "You know I'm not gay, right, Tom? I'm just sorta… queer for him…" He laughed suddenly, ashamed. "Does that even make any sense?"

Tomny was quiet for a moment, then; "Well, who am I to tell ya what you are and what you aren't? S'long as yer you, I'm satisfied."

Like with so much of Tomny, Remus carried the conversation with him as he laid down in bed that night. Sirius had always loved him for who he was, he knew that, but as he stared up at the roof of his four-poster, he began to recall all the times he couldn't. Couldn't love Sirius as he was, or more properly, couldn't himself as he loved Sirius. Over and over again it went;

Sirius, I can't do that.
Sirius, I can't be that.

But what could he do—who could he be? It made him wonder if Sirius had ever asked himself the same things.

The next morning, Remus approached Sirius in the common room. He had an entire spiel prepared, but Sirius had always been quicker to the mark. Before Remus could even begin to explain himself, Sirius was charging on ahead.

“Haven’t seen my light, have you?” He asked. He was busy rooting through the cushions of every sofa in the room. He’d already amassed an impressive collection of shrapnel, lint, and the odd calcified biscuit or two.

“Here, use mine.” Remus felt for his pockets. He had a lighter, but realised at the last second that it was the one Tomny had given him. Somehow it felt like a faux pas. “Er… never mind, I don’t have one after all.”

“S’fine. I’ll ask James for his.” Sirius piled the cushions back into place and moved to go around him. Seeing his chance slip away before his eyes, Remus grabbed his wrist. He dropped it quickly, too conscious of any prying stares and how Sirius might react to their first touch in days.

“Can I talk to you?” He murmured.

Sirius looked at his hand, the one he’d used to grab him, and then shrugged. “I dunno, can you?”

Remus didn’t even have time to read too far into the hostility; James and Peter appeared in the room’s doorway and called them away to breakfast, and the opportunity was gone.

In the breakfast line up, Marlene fell into step with him.

“You look terrible,” she said.

“Love ya too, Cherry.”

“Did you get any sleep at all?”

“Not really.”

“What's a'matter then? Nightmares keeping you up?”

“No. I don't—"

"Right, right. Forgot—you don't dream. Guess that extends to nightmares too. How lucky."

"It's a small mercy in a world so cruel."

Marlene smirked at his sarcasm and reached for a bowl. "Fry-ups again," she complained, as Remus loaded his plate with bacon and sausages galore.

"Since when do you not like back bacon?" He sneered, tucking a piece between his teeth as he moved up the line. Marlene followed, grimacing and pinching him on the side for good measure.

"For your information, I've gone green," she said.

"As in vegetarian?"

"Yes!" She illustrated by ladling her bowl full of over-ripe fruit salad. "It's so much better for the environment. You'd switch over too if you paid any attention to the abysmal conditions that our country's livestock suffer. I learned about it in Morocco, their traditional farming habits are so much more sustainable than ours, though they are driven mostly by exports. But did you know that pigs here—just like the one on your plate—have been genetically altered to such a degree that they reach slaughtering age before they're even six months old?"

Remus swallowed his bacon. "Ohhh-kay… and you enjoy those strawberries picked by five year-olds in Peru."

"You just pulled that out of your arse," Marlene grumbled. She might've said more on the matter, had Chastity Bell not cut between them in the line. The sight alone had Remus backing away, but it wasn't him she'd come for. Chastity stepped right up to Marlene, tossing her long brown hair over one shoulder, one hand on her hip.

"You're a real bitch, you know that?"

"Good morning to you too," Marlene replied, dully.

" 'Good morning'?" Chastity echoed, furious. "How dare you—what the actual fuck was that yesterday? You just left me there! What—thought it would be funny to walk away without saying anything?"

"You didn't seem all that bothered when you were making eyes at Chris Lambert from across the room."

“Oh? So that’s what this is about?!”

Remus was flummoxed. He didn’t think Marlene and Chastity had ever said a willing word to one another. Their conversation wasn’t exactly friendly, but it implied a little more than passing gestures. As he stared, along with several other kids just waiting to collect their breakfasts, Marlene caught his eye and quickly cleared her throat.

“Could you go?” She asked Chastity boldly. “You’re causing a scene.”

“Oh, I’m causing a scene?”

“Yes, as per usual, and I… Well, I don’t much feel like arguing about some dumb group project in the breakfast line either.”

Chastity’s eyes doubled in size. “Group project? Ugh. Grow up, Marlene.”

She stalked off, and Remus thought it was lucky that Marlene hadn’t ended up wearing her tea. “What was that about?” He asked.

“You heard—class project,” Marlene mumbled, budging him further up the line. “She wanted me to do all the work. I told her tough. Just forget about it.”

“Alright…” Remus turned back to his tray, picking an apple off the buffet table. “Look, I’m green,” he said, mostly trying to cheer her up. He took a bite and she smiled at him.

“Do you want to hang out today?” She asked. “It feels like it’s been so long since it was just the two of us.”

“Uhm, sure. What do you want to do?”

“Anything. We can even skip mass.”

“Skip mass?” Remus gaped. “Who are you and what have you done with Marlene McKinnon?”

“Sorry to surprise you,” Marlene giggled. “The world is a very vast place, Remus. You learn things when you venture out, sometimes even become anew.”

“Only seventeen, and yet so wise.” Remus glanced across the hall, to where James, Sirius, and Peter were sitting at their usual table. They were currently using the back of Barty Crouch’s head for target practice, firing bits of cereal across the room with plastic forks while

Lily groaned and Lottie reapplied mascara in her favourite compact mirror.

“They’ll never change, will they?” Marlene sighed, after following his gaze.

Setting the apple down on his tray, Remus turned to her. “You’re right, it has been a while. C’mon, let’s you and me hang out.”

The grin that split her face was warmer than the sun.

With the late-September storm still beating their windows and nothing else to do on a Sunday other than skip communion and be irresponsible, Remus and Marlene packed up their things and made the trek across campus to their old spot.

“I don’t want to stay at the dorm,” Marlene explained, shouting over the noise of the rain. “Mary’s bringing Petyr back and I can’t stand the guy.”

“Does that mean the two of you fought?” He called back.

“Only a little.” She raised the umbrella so he could keep dry. “Did you and Sirius have a row? Things have felt a little tense between the two of you.”

“They’re fine,” he’d said, steering her inside.

Tucked up on their little window seat, legs all a-jumble, Remus stared out at the storm. The flower gardens they overlooked had been battered to a muddy pulp, but such was the way in Scotland.

“Alright!” Marlene announced with a tired sigh, as she snapped her book shut. “Twenty words or less—go.”

“Nah, you first,” he insisted, having been waiting for her to finish. “I wanna hear this.”

Setting aside the book he’d leant her, Marlene rolled her eyes and held up her hands to count. “Alright, let’s see then… Gonzo eats entire sheet of acid. Stupidly tries to electrocute himself… uh…”

“Careful, you only have nine words left,” he teased.

“Shaddup… Erm… Oh! Threatens Duke guy with knife. Passes out in catatonic despair.”

“That was twenty-one words!”

“Eh, I’m pretty sure it was twenty.”

Remus laughed. “ ‘Catatonic despair’?”

“It’s your book!” Marlene raised it like it were a dead rat she’d found drowned in the eaves gutter. “ ‘Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas’,” she scoffed; “What in God’s name would’ve made you want to buy this book?”

“I enjoy fear and loathing, it’s very relatable.”

“Mhm, sure.”

“You said you liked the last chapter.”

“I did like it—because I heard only twenty words of it.”

He chuckled while reaching into the bag of crisps Marlene had brought with them. Dusting his hands off after, he said; “Alright, my turn then. Let’s hear what your chosen pinnacle of literary genius had to offer.”

As Marlene sat up in earnest, Remus cleared his throat; “Ahem!” He began flipping through the pages, before becoming suddenly nervous; “Erm… so this chapter, it…”

“Are you counting those as part of your twenty?”

“No! It’s just…” He stared at the page. “It’s talking about how aliens shag.”

Marlene laughed at him. “It’s science fiction, Remus. These aren’t real people.”

“I know! But it was like…” he scanned the words; psychosexual, ambisexual, manwoman; “reading an essay on mating rituals.”

“That’s exactly what it was,” Marlene said, before sighing and taking the book. “This chapter was like an excerpt to help us understand why the Gethenians are the way they are. In their alien society, anyone can have children, therefore no one is a ‘man’ or a ‘woman’. They simply exist as they are, all equal.”

“But the author uses ‘he’ for all of them.”

“It doesn’t matter, the Gethenians are genderless. See here—‘the Gethenians are not ‘it’, they are potentials’, as in ‘endless potential’. We’re just seeing them through the narrator’s eyes, and he’s a human and clearly a misogynist, so you see, the entire thing is about unpacking our own biases.”

“… You’ve read this before, haven’t you?”

She gave him an impish look, bending the worn-down spine between her hands. “A few times, yeah.”

“I love it,” Remus said, because he could tell she did too. “Read the next chapter and tell me what it’s about?”

She smiled. “Alright, but only for you.”

Remus took his own book back, flipping to the correct page. He’d just set eyes on the first paragraph when Marlene spoke again, calling him back;

“Remus, do you remember what you told me last year—before Christmas?”

He shook his head.

“You said that you should like someone as a person first. Do you still believe that?”

Remus considered; he’d been sixteen then, stupid and naive, and mostly pissed off over Sirius’ ever-rotating train of paramours. He hadn’t really liked any of the girls he’d seen over the summer either, had hardly known anything about them. But he liked Marlene, and Tomny, and Sirius. Oh how he liked them.

“I suppose there are some exceptions, but yeah, I still think it’s true.”

Marlene nodded thoughtfully, and then returned to her book.

They read on like that for much of the day, and into the afternoon and early evening. When they’d both learned a considerable amount of alien politics and the effects of LSD and other methamphetamines on the so-called American Dream, they left their little perch and retreated back into the reality of everyday life.

“I wanted to stop by the library on my way back, do you want to come?” Marlene offered, as they donned their jackets and wellies.

He went with her, because there really wasn't anything better to do other than return and play hopscotch around his and Sirius' broken feelings. While Marlene was off in search of some book on Advanced Theology, he meandered toward the reference section, innocently curious about some of the words he'd seen in the sexy, not-so-sexy alien book. It wasn't a queer thing, he told himself, it was a literature thing. And there was no reason to be afraid of a dictionary.

The first entry, 'psychosexual', led him to a lengthy definition coined by Freud that he had no real interest in further extrapolating upon, but the second word, 'ambisexual' did not seem to exist in the dictionary at all.

Returning the dusty tome to the shelf, Remus flicked his finger down the line of books until he found a dictionary that seemed more modern. Inside, he carefully scanned each page but again came up empty. Thinking that it was simply a word the author had come up with herself, he gave a last-ditch effort and flipped further back, to 'S'. There he found what he was looking for.

Sexuality /sekSHōōˈalədē/ n. (pl. -ities) 1. the quality or state of being sexual. 2. identity in relation to the gender or genders of which they are typically attracted to; sexual orientation. (See also: heterosexuality, homosexuality, bisexuality.)

Remus gave pause. He read the definition over, then over again, until the thump of his heart in his ears had drowned out the rough purring of the library's overhead vents.

Gender or genders.

As in… more than one.

Slowly he began to to turn the page, then faster, until he'd dropped to his knees on the carpeted aisle and pinned the book to the floor. There he all but tore the feather-light pages from the spine, furiously trying to find it.

And then, like a lightbulb turning on, there it was.

Bisexual /bīˈsekSH(ōō)əl/ ajd. (pl. -s) 1. *being sexually attracted to both men and women. (Compare: heterosexuality, homosexuality.)

Remus couldn't breathe, but at the same time, he could. He was finally breathing. Bisexual—not straight, not gay, but somewhere in the middle... an option he'd never known he could have. It was like waking up after a coma and being told the meaning of life. Suddenly he had all the answers, and right there on that mulish grey library carpet, Remus felt more like himself than he ever had before.

Finally, an answer. Something to give people when they asked—if they asked—but more importantly, something to give to himself.

"What are you doing on the floor?"

Marlene had reappeared at the end of the aisle, clutching a fresh book to her chest. Remus looked up at her, alive and breathing and no longer a nameless thing. Glorious.

"Marls, have I ever told you how much I love you?"

She gave him a funny look. "Weirdo. C'mon, they're serving chocolate cake for afters."

Chapter End Notes

I personally prefer Bowie's live version of "I Wanna Be Your Dog" over the original, but that's just me, lol.

A 'mac' is a raincoat.
A 'brolly' is an umbrella.
'Wellies' are rain boots.
'Shrapnel' is loose change.
'Afters' is dessert.

The book Marlene is reading is "The Left Hand of Darkness" (1969) by Ursula K. Le Guin. It's a science fiction novel that paved the way for many women writers. 100% would recommend to anyone interested in the genre.
Also, the actual definition of 'ambisexual' varies, but it would be either a subset of bisexual or defined even as 'of indeterminate gender; androgynous'.

And you're crazy if you aren't into Marlene/Chastity's subtle enemies to lovers to enemies like,,,, if I'm writing any chapter from another character's POV it's this one. Maybe in the summer, lmfao. See you next week.

Chapter 74: Up and Down, Interrupted

Chapter Summary

Chapter 74, in which Remus discovers that Snape makes a GREAT wingman.

Chapter Notes

Dedicating this chapter to Becca, who can always be counted upon to answer even my dumbest questions <3

CW: Lots of emotions in this one. Allusions to mental illness and neglect. Sexual content (non-descriptive).

Also, Remus alludes to his BPD without really having a word to call it what it is. I've had a few people ask me if Remus will ever fully 'know' about his disorders (as in a diagnosis) and yes, he will, but not for a while. If this is at all upsetting to you, I've placed '>>>' to mark the beginning of the conversation and '<<<' for the end portion for you to skip over. It's a very short portion, but I hope this helps.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Well, I'm sorry for the things that I told you,
But words only go so far;
And if I had my way,
I would reach into heaven,
And I'd pull you down a star, for a present;
And I'd make you a chain out of diamonds,
And pearls from a summer sea;
But all I can give you is a kiss in the morning,
And a sweet apology…

- "Tomorrow's Gonna Be a Brighter Day" Jim Croce, 1972

Monday 19th September 1977

This was it, he'd decided—this was the upswing. Remus Lupin was finally going to get his life together. He woke up the morning more sure of anything he'd ever known; this was it! He was going to make up with Sirius, prove that that the only person he was truly gone for was him and finally things would start to fall into place. He'd even taken the dictionary out of the library, which Ms. Pince only let him do because he was a prefect. He had everything now, everything to explain himself and what he'd been feeling. He still had to own up to the Tomny kiss, but he'd do it. He'd do it as many times as Sirius needed him to, because Sirius was worth every word.

He just wished Sirius was willing to make things a little bit easier.

After his discovery in the library, Remus had rushed back to the dorm and all but begged Sirius for a few minutes alone, but he'd been brushed off in favour of dinner and a rerun of Pops. Remus told himself to be patient, that eventually he and Sirius would be alone again and he could make everything clear. It was reassuring to know at least that Sirius was not spending all of his free time with Nydia, though whether that meant their date had gone well or not, he was not sure.

Come Monday, Remus felt like a shaken fizzy drink ready to burst. He'd tried again that morning to talk to Sirius—no dice—and now they were sitting in class, assigned a worksheet while Professor Bilshin took one of his so-called 'conference calls'. (Everyone knew this was just his way of saying he was stepping out for a mid-morning fag.)

Since no sane professor would dream of allowing any Marauder to sit within ten feet of one another, Remus had to turn around in his seat to watch Sirius from the front of the room. He looked handsome today, he noted, though Sirius looked handsome everyday—the prick. He and Marlene were working together, but while she'd already busied herself in work, Sirius appeared bored, sitting with his boots up on the desk, shirt untucked and tie loosened around his throat. As he distracted himself by balancing a pencil on his top lip, Marlene reached over and smacked him, muttering something Remus couldn't make out. Sirius just grinned at her, guilty, and Remus felt a pang of jealousy. At least those two got to be seat partners; he hadn't been so lucky.

"You should take a picture, Loony," Snape sneered, from the seat over.

Remus glared at him. Figured that out of all A-Level classes, he'd get stuck with Snape in Classics. "You should piss off, Snape," he told him, in no mood.

"I've yet to decide if it's distracting, watching you ogle your mates from across the room, or just plain pathetic. Tell me, do you stare at everyone like a lovesick pansy?"

"Not everyone. Some people I stare at with disdain and loathing. You might even know some of them, you miserable toe rag."

Snape smirked, like he'd just won a prize at the faire, but despite the haughty reaction he turned back to his work and said nothing more. Remus was relieved, the last thing he needed was Snape noticing how much attention he was paying to those of the same gender. Still, too tempted, he glanced back at Sirius' seat once more and felt his heartbeat quicken when he realised that Sirius was staring back. He flashed a meek wave, which Sirius returned, more cool and collected than anything else.

Dickhead, Remus mouthed, rolling his eyes dramatically and jutting a thumb at Snape. Sirius smiled then, a small one, and mimed hanging by a noose around his neck that left Remus sniggering into his palm. It felt good—the reaction. It felt like them, and it gave Remus hope.

Today, he swore. Today we fix this mess.

And if he doesn't want you back? If he's tired of you?

Remus felt a chill. Friends. Then we'll be friends. Anything is better than this.

"Quiet down," Professor Bilshin called, reappearing in the classroom doorway. "Mr. Snape—eyes on your own paper."

Snape scowled, and Remus had just enough time to pocket a grin when Bilshin was calling his name.

"Lupin, come see me at my desk. I'd like to talk to you about this latest essay of yours."

"Get caught plagiarizing, Loony?" Snape asked.

"Piss off," Remus grumbled, getting up from his desk. He met his teacher at the front of the room, while Professor Bilshin leaned back in his cracked leather desk chair, holding his essay and peering at it through half-moon spectacles. Remus thought he smelt a lot like cheap cigars and stale sweat stains.

"I've read your essay," the professor said, stroking his stubbly chin. "What made you want to write on Pygmalion?"

Remus bit the inside of his cheek. "Just sorta popped into my head..."

"I haven't assigned the 'Metamorphoses' yet this term. Does this mean you've already read it?"

He nodded.

"All of it?"

"Uh... no, not all. Just some. What we have in the library."

Professor Bilshin eyed him warily.

"Is something wrong with the essay?" Remus asked. " 'Cause I made sure to list all my sources. I know it's mostly an opinion piece, but—"

"No, it's good," the professor said finally. He adjusted his glasses; " 'Pygmalion's Obsession, a Critique of Love as Justification for Hatred'. It's good. Captures the poem exquisitely. Have you considered continuing with Classics in university? I'd be willing to write you a letter of recommendation."

Remus' lips parted in surprise. It was a generous offer; other students would've leapt at the chance, but…

"I... Well, I wasn't exactly planning on going to university, sir."

"Pity." Bilshin set the essay down, before opening the bottom drawer of his desk and pulling out two books. "Here. Books Seven and Eight of the 'Metamorphoses'. These are my personal copies. Take them—have a read. Perhaps Medea or Odysseus will inspire you into writing an entrance essay or two."

He wanted to refuse, if not just to avoid raising the professor's expectations, but the library's collection on Ovid was incomplete, and Remus wanted badly to read them.

"Thank you, sir."

Bilshin dismissed him with a wave, and Remus quickly retreated to his desk, feeling somehow giddy. He mentally kicked himself for it. What use was academic validation if you were trying to become a rock star?

"Done being reamed out by Bilshin?" Snape sneered. "Your idiot friend, Black, left something on your desk, by the way."

Remus looked down to find that Snape was, for once, right. A note had been left atop his textbook. Turning away so Snape wouldn't get a chance to spy, Remus unfolded it in his lap, heart racing.

Meet me in the west wing toilet before lunch. We need to talk. Alone. - S.

The note was hastily scribbled, but Remus hardly noticed. He was already spinning around in his seat to gape at Sirius. Apparently he'd meant to keep the whole thing under wraps though; instead of staring back, Sirius had challenged the guy behind him to an arm wrestling competition. He won—just barely—and afterwards Sirius looked up. Their eyes met, and he gave Remus a single quick nod, before turning back to Marlene.

Yes! Remus thought. Finally!

Finally they were going to clear the air. He'd get his chance to explain himself, and for once he and Sirius would be on the same page. It didn't matter if the 'we need to talk' drove fear down into his very bones, Remus was not going to let himself dwell on it. This could be good—great, even! They could be back to normal by dinner.

Invigorated by his and Sirius' mutual desire to get it all out on the table, it took nearly every shred of Remus' willpower to make it through his next two lessons. Once everyone else had broken off for lunch, he high-tailed it over to the west wing bathroom of the Gallilei Block where he found a ‘closed for cleaning’ sign hanging over the door. It was just like Sirius—fake everyone out to give them some privacy.

Pushing the door open, Remus made his way inside. “Sirius?”

Sirius was there already, sitting on one of the sinks and smoking. “Hey,” he said.

“Hey,” Remus answered, suddenly nervous. “You… doing alright?”

“Yeah, fine. You…?”

“Mhm!”

The air turned awkward, and Remus wished he had thought of something else to say. His bag felt heavy on his shoulder, the weight of the dictionary pulling him down like an anchor. Maybe he should just whip it out? Explain everything at once—or was that too crude?

Humming stiffly, Sirius hopped down from the sink, but leaned back against it. “I got your note. What d’you want to talk about that’s so urgent?”

Remus frowned. “What? I didn’t pass you a note.”

“Sure you did. You asked me to meet you here.”

“No.” He pulled his own note from his pocket, raising it for Sirius to see. “You asked me.”

Sirius took it, spreading the paper out between his beautiful fingers. “I didn’t write this.”

“Then who did?”

Just then a click sounded from behind them—the door. Remus turned and pushed one arm against it, but the lock had bolted shut from the outside.

“Fuck!” He cursed, as Sirius came to join him. They both threw their entire weight against it, but the door would not give. Outside, Remus could hear the faintest bit of laughter.

“I’ll bet it was Snape,” he growled.

“OI, SNIVELLY!” Sirius shouted, banging both fists against the door. “YOU LET US OUT OR I SWEAR I’LL TAKE THAT GREASY HEAD OF YOURS AND SHOVE IT RIGHT UP—”

“I’m not sure threatening him is the best way to get what you want,” Remus interjected.

“Well, what else should I do?” Sirius snapped. “Haven’t hardly spoken to the foul git since we got back!”

“Snape!” Remus cried, ignoring him; “I don’t know what you think you’re doing, but you’re making a mistake! Open the door now or you’re gonna regret it!”

“How’s that any different from my threat?”

“Yours was a promise of violence, I’m a prefect.”

“Oh, right. And shall I fetch your crown and sceptre, my lord?”

Remus scoffed, turning away from the door. “Of course we would end up fighting.”

“If you weren’t so easy to fight with,” Sirius grumbled.

“Piss off.”

“You piss off.”

“Ugh. You’re so bloody immature!” Feeling pouty, Remus turned around and scanned the toilet. The entire thing was outfitted in white tile like the London Underground and there was a single window overhead that let in the blue-cast of outside’s sunshine. It felt like last time, when he'd told Sirius about Tomny, and instantly Remus felt dread. There was a faint whistling coming from somewhere too, like air escaping. The pipes, maybe.

With nothing else to do, he crossed the bathroom and sat down against the far wall. Meanwhile, Sirius, who was still fighting with the door, spun round and frowned at him.

“What? You aren’t going to help me?”

“Help you do what?” Remus blagged. “He’s probably padlocked it. They do it at night so kids don't smoke in the toilets.”

“So we should yell, shouldn’t we? Hope someone hears us?”

“No one’s gonna hear us—they’re all at lunch. It’s why he waited. All you’re gonna do is give him the satisfaction of hearing you whine and cry.”

Unable to argue, Sirius grumbled something Remus couldn’t hear and thumped a fist against the door one last time for good measure.

“Best bet is to wait until the next bell and everyone heads to their next lesson,” Remus told him. “Here, come sit.”

He’d patted the ground next to him, but Sirius was stubborn. Instead he just returned to his earlier spot at the edge of the sink, still pinching his cigarette between two fingers. Remus didn’t let it bother him. At least he’d gotten what he wanted; they were alone.

“What’d you do to get on Snivilly’s bad side then?” Sirius asked.

“Your question implies that Snape must have a ‘good side’, which I’m positive he does not,” Remus answered.

“… I can’t believe you let him prank us.”

“You fell for the note too!”

Sirius took a long pull, appearing dismissive. “Guess it hardly counts as a prank… All he’s done is lock us in here.”

“Someone’ll find us eventually,” Remus said, then; “Aw, shit.”

“What?”

“… I’m supposed to be in the library.”

“Meeting Evans? Tell her it was Snivelly’s fault, she’ll understand, I’m sure.”

“No, it’s prefect duty. We cover Pince’s desk sometimes…” And Regulus was bound to kill him if he skipped out. Even if Regulus didn’t want him there, he wasn’t the type to give anyone a ‘get out of jail free’ card either. If he was to suffer, then Remus was too.

“Can’t believe you haven’t begged Minnie to let you off,” Sirius said, sounding almost amused.

“I have. She’s a menace.”

“Too right. But the fact that you’re still trying to contend with my baby brother? Now that’s pure masochism.”

“It’s not my fault. He might actually be more stubborn than you are, you know,” Remus replied. “Won’t accept help from anyone.”

“He’s a Black, stubborn is in his nature. They raise us on mules’ milk so that when we’re old enough we can ‘crush the common cow’.”

“That’s horrendous.”

“We’re a pretty horrendous bunch.” Sirius began swinging his feet out ahead of him, like a child on a swing. “So… How have you… been?”

After days of not talking, the question was as good as dangling a rope ladder into the bottom of a deep, deep pit. Remus grappled for it.

“Alright,” he answered, dishonestly. “You?”

Sirius shrugged once more. “Fine. You heard anything from your dad or Sandra?”

“Been ignoring all their calls,” he said. “Have you… heard anything from your parents?”

Sirius shook his head. “Glad for it though, who’d want to hear from them.”

“They’re still your parents.”

“Could say the same thing to you.”

“Right…” Remus looked down at his lap. “Look, I’ve been doing some thinking, and—”

“Prongs has been talking about Christmas,” Sirius said suddenly. “It’s a ways off, but Effie keeps bothering us to get our plans together. I think even Evans’ll come. Effie says you should too.”

Remus bit his lip. “Really? You want me to come?”

“Well, they invited you, didn’t they? Should be a good time. We can eat mince pies and go carolling.”

“You actually want to sing Christmas carols in public?”

“Fuck no, but we can throw snowballs at the bible-thumpers who do.”

Remus smiled weakly. “Sirius—”

“You should come!” He said again. “Let Giles pick you up or whatever, but don’t stay with your bloody dad. I don’t care how hot Sandra is.”

“She's not hot!”

“Yeah, yeah, whatever helps you sleep at night. But I’m serious—heh —James keeps saying it’ll be the best Christmas ever, all of us in the same place… Should be nice.”

Remus thought about going back to the Potters’, to that little beach-themed bathroom. It all felt rather null when he imagined what it would be like not to be able to touch Sirius—he’d let him touch him, right?

“We’re on the ground floor, you think you can boost me through that window?” Sirius asked.

Remus glanced up. The window overhead wasn't that small, certainly wide enough to fit a body through—but he wasn't done. They hadn't even begun to fix things.

"Reckon we could talk first?"

"Too starving," Sirius dismissed, grinding out his cigarette and hopping down from the sink. "Here, help me up. Swears I'll come back for you."

"I just think we should—"

Sirius gave a great sigh, tossing his head back. "Look, I know it's awkward, but I really don't want to do this right now."

Oh. Remus stood, feeling pathetic. "When then?"

"When are we gonna talk?"

"Yes. When?"

Sirius pressed his lips into a thin line. "Later. Just not here. Now will you help me?"

Defeated once again by Sirius' blithe intemperance, Remus sighed and locked his fingers together, dropping down into a squat. Sirius came forward, using Remus' hands and shoulders to push himself up into the air. Remus struggled a bit, but mostly because it was the closest he and Sirius had been in days. Feeling his thighs pressed against his shoulder... his heart began to beat loudly in his chest.

"Hold on, latch is being stubborn," Sirius grunted.

"Hurry up, you're no feather."

"Try bracing yourself against the bloody wall then." Sirius continued to fight with the window, almost losing his balance. He leaned one hand on the top of Remus' head to catch himself, and Remus immediately felt his patience thin.

"Hurry up!"

"I am! Lift me higher!"

"Ugh—! How 'bout you grow some!"

"How 'bout you grow less!"

“HA! Says the guy who secretly likes it when I lean down to him so he can whisper in my ear.”

Sirius sputtered; “I–I—geh!—I do not!”

“You totally do!”

“Shut it, bean pole! Just fucking lift me, already!”

“Bean pole?! You…” Bracing both legs, Remus used all of his strength to shove Sirius upwards. Unfortunately, he had just gotten the window open, and as Sirius cried out in victory, his forehead clipped the edge of the open frame and he hissed horribly.

“FUCK! Thanks for that, you bloody—”

“You told me to lift!”

“Not like that!”

“How else would I lift? What, did you expect me to fly you out the—”

“Shh! Shut it!” Sirius ordered, then; “... Do you hear that?”

Remus drew up short. With his head pinned between Sirius’ thighs and the wall, he could just make out a sort of high-pitched whistling noise, like the sound of air escaping. He'd heard it earlier, only now it was much louder, almost threatening.

“Is it coming from outside?”

“Nah, doesn't sound like it.” Sirius craned his head. “I think it’s coming from one of the stalls.” He began to wriggle back and forth and Remus let him down again.

“Oi,” Sirius called, “if anyone’s in there, you better come out now!”

The idea that someone had been hiding alongside them the entire time was horrifying. Remus hadn’t exactly exposed them—Sirius had never let him get that far—but the conversation was certainly worth a rumour or two.

Slowly they both approached the middle stall. The hissing noise kept up, even got louder, like it was building to some sort of crescendo.

“Open it,” Sirius said.

“You open it.”

“But what if it’s a bomb?”

Remus suppressed an eye-roll. “It isn’t a bomb.” He reached forward, nudging the stall door open. “Someone’s just probably busted the lever —what the hell?”

Sirius peered over his shoulder. “What the fuck is that?”

If he were being honest, Remus wasn’t sure what it was. Someone had stuffed the toilet bowl with an array of rainbow-coloured balloons, though the one on top was slowly deflating, causing the hissing noise from earlier. But that was not even the strangest part; the psycho had also left a burning candle atop the toilet roll, like some gross, alternative seance. It was mostly burned down now, but leaning up against it was a single plastic tube, just big enough for the candle to fit through. It looked like some sort of make-shift slide, all meant to act like a—

"It's a fuse," Sirius said. And he was right. The entire time they'd been locked in the bathroom and fighting, the candle had been slowly burning down, and when the weight of the wax had finally boiled over and the bog roll began to tip, they had a front row seat.

Remus saw it in slow motion. The candle tipping—it falling. His first instinct was to reach out and grab it, but luckily for him, Sirius had already called the whole thing. He wrenched him back, probably saving his hands, as the balloons burst and created a fireball big enough to fill the entire bathroom stall. The heat was insane—it was gas, someone had filled the balloons with gas!

They hit the back wall, falling on top of each other and cowering beneath the sinks as the fire temporarily blinded them. Pieces of shattered toilet bowl whizzed past, pinging off the tiled walls and their bodies with bruising force. The entire explosion lasted only for about half a second, but what they were left with was a blackened ceiling, a flooding toilet bowl, and two rather shocked expressions.

"It was a bomb," Sirius breathed, sitting up from Remus and pushing his hair from his eyes. "It was a bloody bomb!"

"Well, it was..." It took Remus a moment to get his mouth working again. "It—It... yeah. Bomb."

There was a thumping noise—several running feet in the corridor outside—and then the sound of a key sliding home in a lock. The door opened, and it was Professor Bilshin staring them down, along with a huddle of several dozen shocked students.

"I hope you boys have an explanation for this," the professor said grimly.

Sirius just looked to Remus, his expression a cross between fury and disbelief, and as Bilshin ordered them to their feet, it occurred to Remus that perhaps they were not the only ones at Hawkings capable of a revenge prank.

* * *

Two Hours Later...

“He could’ve killed us!”

“But he didn’t.”

“I think my bloody eyebrows are partly singed off—how could McGonagall not have believed us?!”

“I wonder.”

“You know,” Sirius seethed, already up to his elbows in soap suds. “It wouldn’t kill you to be on my side for once.”

Remus raised his hands, which were currently dripping water onto the floor while donned in a pair of yellow marigolds. “Trust me, Sirius, I have never been more on your side.”

Scowling at him, Sirius returned to his punishment. The pair of them were to keep scrubbing until every vial, beaker, flask, and cup in the entire science wing were squeaky clean. It wouldn’t have been so bad, except Snape kept finding more glassware for them to scrub.

“Foul little git…” Sirius grumbled. “Pretty sure he’s making ‘em dirty on purpose at this point!”

Remus didn’t have the energy to agree or argue. It'd have been a fitting punishment had they really been the ones at fault, but despite their proclaimed innocence, they'd been caught red-handed at the scene of the crime. And crime it was.

Along with the toilet, several of the bathroom's pipes had burst, leaving a small ocean to leak out into the hallway of the west wing. The note, the lock on the outside bathroom door—all of it had been strategically planned. Of course it hadn't been enough just to lure them to the toilet and lock them inside, instead Snape had designed his own trick to give them a real fright and consequently lay the blame directly at their own feet. The balloons had been filled with gas from the school's bunsen burners and set up with a controlled flame just like a bomb with a timer. Luckily no one had been hurt, but the same couldn't be said for the poor bathroom. As far as Remus could tell, McGonagall had been merciful. Without any real proof that Snape had done it, she'd had no choice but to punish them. On the bright-side, it meant Remus did not have to spend his afternoon being hissed at by Regulus, though this did not seem to deter Sirius from doing just that.

"You've missed a spot," he said, handing Remus back a glass beaker he'd only just set out to dry.

"Stop nit-picking me!"

"I wouldn't have to if you'd just do it right! Or is even that beyond the capabilities of the great Remus Lupin?"

"And since when have you been such an expert on washing dishes, you spoiled—!"

"Ah, listen to you two, quarrelling like an old married couple." Snape strolled into the science classroom, clutching a tray of filthy beakers and grinning like the cat who got the cream. He set the tray down across from them and crossed his arms smugly. If Remus blamed McGonagall for anything it was that she'd allowed Snape be the one to oversee their punishment.

"I wouldn't try coming near, Snivelly," Sirius growled; "There's more than enough hazardous material in here to deal with the likes of you." He followed the threat up by brandishing a cracked test tube, which they'd already broken against the side of the sink.

"Don't," Remus snapped, taking the glass from him. "You'll just hurt yourself."

"Yeah, suppose that's exactly what he wants," Sirius snarled.

Snape only grinned righteously. “I’m glad McGonagall’s finally seen what a pair of wash-outs you are. Maybe next time she’ll have you shipped off for good.”

“There won’t be a next time, Snape!” Sirius shouted, as Snape set the tray of dishes down beside the rest and turned to go. “Mark my words, your greasy days are numbered!”

“Professor Slughorn wants all of these finished by suppertime,” Snape called flippantly. “I’ll be back to make sure you get the job done. Best work hard or you’ll be here through the night, ha!”

As the other boy retreated down the hall, his nasty cackling following him like an echo, Sirius slapped his hands back down into the sink. His frustration only succeeded in splashing Remus across the chest, making him just as irritated.

“Watch it, will you? This water’s disgusting!”

“I hate him,” Sirius seethed.

“No, you hate that he beat you.”

“I can hate more than one thing at a time! Like you, for example.”

“Oh? You hate me?”

“You’re not exactly my favourite person at the moment, no!”

“Well that’s good, ‘cause I hate you too.”

“Fine.”

“Fine!”

With a sharp huff, Sirius began scrubbing another beaker. “… Snape’s a fucking arsehole.”

“Right piece ‘a work,” Remus agreed, busy scrubbing his own. “Probably bathes in bleach.”

“He doesn’t bathe. Maybe he drinks it.”

Remus felt a smile tug at his lips. The enemy of my enemy is my friend…

“We could pay him back, you know,” he suggested. “Just a little…”

That got Sirius' attention.

"How?"

Remus glanced down—at the sludge that had collected at the bottom of his sink, practically clogging the drain. "I just mean, who knows what's in this stuff."

Sirius grinned. "Moony, my dear, I think I'm experiencing what the people call déjà vu."

They worked quickly, setting their quarrelling aside long enough to fetch a bucket and chair. By the sink, Remus ladled great scoops of soapy water out of the sink, leaving behind just the grey ooze at the bottom. "Feels like silt," he said, "like mud, mostly."

"Knew it, he's just dirtying them on purpose," Sirius grumbled, as he used his gloved hands to scoop the sludge into a large bucket. "You sure he'll fall for it?" He said later, as he manoeuvred the bucket up onto the top of the doorway.

"He'll fall for it," Remus said, holding the chair and helping Sirius down when they were finished. The plastic pail teetered ominously on the edge of the open door, its yellow colour shadowed with the threat of all the nastiness it held within. It was certainly childish—not at all up to the Marauders' usual standards, but it was good for short notice.

"Hope you enjoy your shower tonight, Snivelly," Sirius said, standing back to admire their handiwork. As he did so, Remus couldn't help but admire him. The sharpness of his jaw, the way his hair curled perfectly around his ears, and the three little moles there, like a scattered constellation.

"I don't actually hate you," Remus said. "Just… so you know."

Sirius looked at him, and for the first time in days it felt like they were really seeing each other.

"Me neither," he said.

"I was just angry."

"Me too."

"I miss you."

Sirius came up short then, and Remus scrambled to fill the gaps. "I've got something to tell you, if you'll just listen—"

"Moony." Sirius looked up, covering his face. "I don't—I don't think I can do this right now."

"Then when?! Now—later? Because if it's not soon, then something's gonna give, and I'm afraid it's gonna be me."

Sirius pulled his hands away, looking sad and frustrated. "I don't know how to talk about these things," he confessed. "I'm not James or Peter —I'm definitely not Evans or McKinnon, and if this is how we have to do it then I'd rather we just fizzled out. Less fighting that way."

"I don't want to fight," Remus pleaded. "Not anymore, and if you'll please just listen, I think we could sort it out—really!"

"Have you sorted out what it is you want then?"

"Yes!"

Sirius let out a breath. "So have I."

> > >

It might not be you, the voice warned. You could've still ruined it all.

Then what else is there to lose? Remus replied.

“I can’t really explain it,” he said to Sirius, desperately. “But I think something’s wrong with me. I just get… nervous? No—wrong. I feel wrong all the time. Tired and empty, and I used to think the only one who could make it better was you... but I think it’s just me, Sirius. I’m empty because of me.”

“You’re not empty, Moons.”

“No, but I am. And that's just part of it. Some days I even wake up feeling full, like today. But when I’m not… It’s like I look for it in other people. In you, and in… him. Because you're full, Sirius.”

< < <

"Look, Moony—”

“I know I fucked up big time.”

Sirius gave a dry chuckle. “Yeah, we’ve been over that part…”

“J-Just please! Please let me finish?” Remus pleaded. “There’s still so much to say, and I haven't even apologised yet.”

He appeared surprised at first, but slowly Sirius acquiesced. He stepped back, leaning one hip against the counter, while Remus tried his best to psyche himself up. He’d never been especially self-aware, but if vomiting up these thoughts and feelings had even a chance of fixing things, then he’d babble until the sun went down.

“I fucked up, kissing Tomny. Even more so, I think, with the way I told you. I should’ve admitted it right away—told you when it happened. But I felt guilty and I—well, I just wanted us to be okay for a little while! I really hate not being okay with you, Sirius.”

Sirius glanced down at the ground. “I hate not being okay with you too…”

“I don’t know what I’m doing,” Remus said; “I might never know, but I like you for you, not for what you can give me or how it’d make me look. I like you for the way you treat your friends, and the devious way you plan pranks, and the way you take a sad thing and make it bearable—every time! You Sirius! You make me feel like the luckiest person in the world, and I could never, ever hate you. I’m sorry if how I’ve been acting has made you feel even the tiniest bit otherwise, but I want to hold your hand. God—do I want to.”

Sirius shook his head like he didn’t believe him, but then startled both of them when he laughed. “You’re too good at that,” he moaned, covering his face again. “When’s it bloody gonna be my turn to apologise with some grand confession?”

“You could try right now,” Remus said, laughing nervously and on the verge of tears once again. "Not that you... you know."

Sirius pulled his hands down, exhaling heavily. “I won’t apologise for being upset—”

“You don’t have to.”

“—But… I underestimated you, I think. I know that none of this has to do with me—that it’s not me you’re ashamed of.”

It’s yourself. The words seemed to hang in the air. And Remus nodded, because of course Sirius was right.

“Earlier in the toilet, I thought you were going to tell me that you didn't want to be with me anymore," Sirius said. "Was I wrong?"

"What? No!" Remus gasped; "I mean—yes! I wasn't going to say that at all, I only meant to tell you that… Tomny is my best friend, my oldest friend, but you... I'm so grateful for you, Sirius. You don't just make me whole, you make me better."

Sirius wiped beneath his nose, then the corners of his eyes. "You're patient."

"What?"

"I love it about you—that you're so patient. Even when you're griping and grumbling, you're patient with me. With everyone. And you always tell things how they are, not just how they appear, but you never intentionally hurt anyone's feelings. And you have great taste in music—even if you can't stand more than three Bowie songs in a row."

"I would say three is generous."

Sirius smiled, hopelessly. "And you're so fucking tall. You're like a giant, but you never make anyone feel small. People feel comfortable around you, it's why they like you instantly. It's why strangers talk to you in the street. You've a trusting face."

"Is that a compliment?"

"Dunno," he shrugged, stepping forward and closing the space between them. "But I love it about you. I love all those things. And I love you."

"I love you too, Sirius."

Sirius raised a hand, trailing it across Remus' forehead and pushing a curl out of his eyes. Slowly, as Sirius' thumb dipped to trace the scar over his nose, Remus reached out and grabbed him gently by the hips. His hands were shaking, and he didn't even care. Oh, how he'd missed this.

"I forgive you," Sirius said, after a long moment in which they just held each other. "And I believe you too. I know that if you could do it over again, it'd be different. I believe you, Remus."

Remus felt like he could've held up the world. But he had to know.

“Sirius, I'm not angry, but I need to ask... All that stuff with Nydia…?”

Sirius’ expression fell slightly. “You were right," he said glumly, hands still cupping Remus' face; "It was only about making you jealous. I thought giving you a taste ‘a your own medicine would make me feel better, but it didn’t. I apologised to Nydia for it after we got back from the village. And I’m sorry for doing it.”

“You were never serious about her then?”

“No. And I didn’t kiss her, in case you were wondering..."

He had been wondering, of course he had, and the relief when he found out he was wrong was imminent. Remus let his head fall forward, until his forehead met Sirius' and they were both laughing.

"Can I kiss you, Sirius?"

Sirius smiled. "Thought you'd never ask."

In a second arms were around his neck, and Remus felt lips on his own. Sirius' lips. Perfect, soft, right—how right it felt to be held by him. To be kissing him. They went slow; the same sort of clumsy as their very first time, but sure enough Sirius' mouth began to open wider—his tongue pushing deeper. Remus didn't want to pull away, but there was one more thing left to discuss.

“I found something,” he said, when he'd finally managed to pry the two of them apart. Sirius watched breathlessly as he turned for his bag, and the look he gave him when he returned with the half-soaked dictionary was surely a sight to behold.

"Did you take that from the library? Pince's likely to skin you alive."

Remus chuckled. "Might be worth it," and pressed the heavy book into Sirius' hands. Sirius stared at it.

“Why are you handing me a dictionary?”

“Just—” Remus sighed, opening it to the correct page; “Read there.”

A moment. A breath. Then;

“ ‘Bi… sexual’?”

Sirius looked up.

"What's this?

“I think it's what I am, Sirius,” Remus said—believed. “I think I finally figured it out.”

Sirius' brow furrowed. “But… I'm a guy. And... Tomny’s a guy?”

“I know!" Remus half-laughed. "That’s just half of it, you see? Bisexual —as in both. I could like both, and it doesn't even have to do with Tomny. It’s me. I’m… this.”

It seemed as though the cogs were moving behind Sirius’ eyes. “Huh,” he murmured. “So not gay…?”

“Not all the way, anyway…” He rubbed his hands together anxiously. “Does it make sense?”

Sirius read the page over again. “I-I mean… sure, yeah? Why wouldn’t it?”

Remus realised his jaw was trembling. “I’m not gay,” he said. “But you… are, aren’t you? Like... fully queer?”

Now it was Sirius’ turn to look nervous. He clutched the dictionary tightly, before shaking his head. “Bloody hopeless you are," he muttered. "Of course I’m fucking gay. Are you blind?”

Remus suddenly felt very stupid. "No! I just thought that maybe if I was—this, then you... And there were all those girls... Man, it just felt like maybe you could…”

“No,” Sirius said firmly. “I’m a queer, Moony. A poof. A bloody shirt-lifter. Never felt a thing for a girl in my life.”

“Never? Not with Kimmy or Chastity or any of the others? Like—not with Mary?”

“Nah. I liked being with them, but not being with them, ya know?”

“Uh, yeah.”

“Feels a bit weird to have to say it. After—you know—shagging for this long.”

"What can I say, I like to give people the benefit of the doubt."

"Ha. Idiot." Sirius kissed him again, using one hand to pin Remus in place by the collar of his shirt. As they snogged, the warmth spread until Remus could feel his heartbeat in every inch of his body.

“Sirius," he mumbled against his lips; "if you’ll still have me, I want you to be my boyfriend.”

There was a moment’s pause, and then Sirius pulled away. “Actually?”

“Yes." A thousand times yes. "I’m sorry it took me so long to get the words out, but I want you all to myself, forever.”

“I won’t share you,” Sirius swore. “If you’re mine, you’re mine for good.”

“Yes.” Please. “Please.”

“No more girls—no more Tomny. None. Just us.”

A nod. “Just us.”

Looking almost shy—and Sirius was never shy—Sirius snapped the ruined dictionary shut and tossed it onto the nearest table. “I suppose then,” he started, “that this must mean we’ve fully made up.”

“I hope so."

“Does this mean I get a make-up kiss from my boyfriend?"

Remus felt his mouth go a bit dry at the word 'boyfriend'. Who knew it'd be so nice to hear him say it.

"Haven't I already been giving you make-up kisses?"

"No," Sirius scoffed; "I was giving you pity kisses. Obviously."

Cheeky prick. Remus leaned in, already reaching for Sirius’ waist again, but before he could get close enough to brush their lips together, a voice rang out;

“I hope you haven't started cleaning up!” Snape called, as he pushed open the classroom door. “Because I’ve got plenty more where—”

The bucket tipped, flooding the spot where Snape stood and leaving him covered from head-to-toe in muck. In the same magnificent cascade, the sludge arched out across the science room floor, and Sirius leapt up onto the desk to avoid having his shoes ruined. “It fucking worked!” He cried, delight plain in every word. Across the room, Snape was not so pleased. He began spitting, screaming as he wiped the wet grime from his eyes.

"Fucking bastards!" He wailed. "I'll kill you! I'll—I'll have your badge for this, Lupin, you fucking lunatic!"

"You're welcome to it," Remus said, already cracking up.

"Ooh, hold that pose, Snape!" Sirius began to play at looking around. "Now, where did I leave that camera?"

Snape fled, howling about how they'd only made more mess for themselves, but Remus wasn't the least bit bothered. With a sickening squelch, the door fell closed and he had Sirius pinned up against one of the tables in an instant.

"You're too devious," he murmured, hands already laced into black locks. "What'll I ever do with you?"

"Mmm, dirty talk already, Moons?" Sirius hummed, suddenly fisting the front of Remus' shirt. "I think you'll find that you already know exactly what to do with me, Mr. Boyfriend."

It was insanity—they'd only just gotten rid of their worst enemy and it was broad daylight in the middle of a public classroom—but Remus was up. Both physically and metaphorically. Today he wasn't empty, and for however long it lasted, he wanted to enjoy it.

"Trousers—off," Sirius grunted into his mouth.

"We can't fuck in the middle of the science wing," Remus said back, though he did begin fighting with the buttons of his shirt at the same time.

"Not fuck," Sirius corrected, as he turned his mouth into the crook of Remus' neck; "just everything else."

Lord.

As lips and tongue began to dance their way across the hollow of his throat, Remus tipped his head back and moaned. He heard Sirius hum back, obviously thrilled, and then a hand suddenly found itself clasped tightly over the crotch of his trousers. Flinching at first, Remus shook his head before clasping Sirius around the jaw and pulling him back until they were nose-to-nose.

“Devious.”

Sirius clicked his tongue. “Do something about it, stud.” He blew in Remus’ face like a taunt. “I dare you.”

He puckered, so, so pleased. “I’m not your toy, Sirius Black. You can’t just—”

Sirius squeezed and Remus flinched again.

“Ah!”

“You were saying?”

Remus let out a heavy breath, and then a staccato-like laugh. “Alright,” he nodded. “Alright.” Then, keeping Sirius in place against the table, he prised his boyfriend’s hand away from his trousers and slowly bent down.

Sirius’ eyes flashed greedily, and then he was biting his lip. “Oh fuck, Moony…”

That was another Remus loved about Sirius; he was so articulate in bed.

* * *

“Think Snape’ll tell McGonagall what we did?” Remus asked later, as they emerged from the Gallilei Block into the cool night. Snape had been right about one thing—cleaning up the aftermath of their gag had taken quite a while. They’d scrubbed right through dinner, and now Remus was left wondering if they’d be able to scrounge anything up in the Godric kitchenette. Soup, maybe. Tea, definitely. Toast and biscuits if they were lucky.

“Nah,” Sirius said. “It’d mean he’d have to admit to getting fooled again. He won’t say anything.”

Nodding, Remus looked down between them and reached for Sirius’ hand.

“Are you sure?” Sirius asked, when their fingers were intertwined.

“No one’s around,” Remus said, gesturing to the darkness. “And besides, I want to hold my boyfriend’s hand.”

“Oh.” He could’ve sworn he saw Sirius blush. “Well, I suppose that’s fine then.”

Remus felt his heart skip, and then he thought he should ask that fatal question. “Sirius, does this mean we're really dating?”

Sirius whipped his head up. He blinked at him for a moment, then he raised their clasped hands and bit Remus right on the wrist.

“OW! What—?”

"Are we dating? Are you joking me?!"

"I didn't mean it like that!" Remus laughed. "I meant like, I dunno... you're all mine?"

Sirius gave him a look. The look. “You are an idiot, Remus Lupin.”

“I... I love hearing you say my name.”

Like he couldn’t help himself, Sirius laughed too and then smacked Remus in the side once more. “Don’t steal my line!”

“Ow! … I’m almost tempted to take this abuse as a yes, you know.”

“Go ahead.” Sirius’ smile fell slightly. “You sure you want to date a man though?”

“Of course I do,” Remus replied. “It’s you.”

“Mhm, right. Because you’re in love with me?”

“Because I’ve only ever been in love with you.”

Rarely ever speechless, Sirius Black opened his mouth and closed it again. “Well, we—uhm…” He cleared his throat. “Took our sweet time, didn’t we?”

“Yeah, but we had some fun along the way.”

“We sure did.” Sirius lifted his hand, this time placing a kiss over the spot he'd bitten. “Do you want to go somewhere with me? There’s something I’d like to show you.”

He’d been expecting some prank, or maybe a second tryst in the astronomy building, but Sirius had always been able to surprise him. He led Remus to the Bellchant building, which was already locked up after hours but still had some of its lights on. Jimmying the lock with one of the pins Sirius had been using to keep his fringe back , they got inside and snuck down the main hallway to music room #2.

“This is gonna be so great,” Sirius said, so giddy he was practically skipping. Remus watched him, a smile pinned to his face. He’d been trying to keep up, but somewhere on the walk over he’d begun to feel tired. It was late, he told himself, he’d be fine in the morning. Sirius just wanted to show him something first.

“C’mon, Moons!” Sirius said as he began to fall behind. “I wanna show you this before Filch catches us.”

“I’ll…” Remus slowly came to a stop in the middle of the hall. Sirius was already at the music room's doors. “I’ll be right there!” He tried again—impulsively. “Just… gonna use the loo first.”

Sirius nodded; “Don’t take all night,” and disappeared inside.

Taking a moment to breathe, Remus finally turned and made his way back down the dim hallway, except he did not stop at the washroom. Instead he carried on, deeper into the building where the walls gave way to old photographs and even older memories. Halfway there, he began to realise how clammy his hands had become, which was silly of course, because well—she was dead.

“Not really sure why I’m here, he’s waiting for me after all…” he murmured, standing ahead of the frame but not really looking at it. “But I guess you could say that I've been waiting for this. Like, I can’t tell anyone else, but what are you gonna do—not love me? That ship’s already sailed, don’t ya think?”

The hallway was silent; like a grave.

“I’m in love with him,” he announced, more boldly this time. “Yeah, that’s right. I love him! Can’t hardly describe it. Almost makes me afraid of what’ll come next. Like… how could I ever love him—or anyone—more than this?”

Smiling bitterly, Remus began picking at a hangnail. What else to say?

“I figure one day James and Lily’ll get married... Makes sense, right? It won’t be like you and him though, it’ll be a good sort of marriage. They’ll get married in some pretty church or James’ backyard or whatever, get a mortgage and a house, have babies, be happy…” He winced, then; “Fuck… this was stupid. I wish you’d fucking say something now, not just in my bloody head! I mean, c'mon—what the fuck? Why? … Oh god, I know why… You always did have a way of making me feel crazy…"

C'mon, if you're gonna blame her for all of your crazy, at least say her name.

Not real, Remus reminded himself; Not. Real.

Around him, the dim lights of the hallway buzzed. Real. He pinched himself. Real.

"You know," Remus breathed shakily, "I used to tell myself that I'd never get married. I mean, what'd it do for you? Dad's perpetually miserable and you clearly weren't any better off. But if I stay with him then I suppose I'll never actually have to worry about it—getting married. And really, who cares?! I don't want to be miserable—you hear me? I won't be miserable anymore! I won't be like you—sick and… ngh … unhappy... And I would never do to anyone what you did to me. You know, you should've—" He whimpered again, like a kicked dog; "I–I wish you'd never told me… I wish you weren't my mum… Well…? SAY SOMETHING!"

But of course, she didn't.

Remus dropped his head into his hands, agonisingly tired. The hangnail was bleeding now, and he could feel its sting as blood welled up around his finger. Coming there had been stupid. He'd thought it might bring some closure, but all it'd done was ruin his up. He hadn't even talked to her since he was a kid, scared and lonely at night without anyone to tuck him in to bed, and the women in the photograph wasn't even the Hope he remembered. This Hope, sitting in front of a piano, happy and with her best friend Sheila at her side—she didn't even know he existed.

Reaching into his pocket, Remus slowly withdrew a second photograph. He smoothed out its rumpled corners, taking in the image of the three smiling faces; Hope, Sheila, Tad. Best friends. He hadn't shown it to anyone since Sheila had given him the year before, not even Sirius. It felt like a secret—it was a secret. And if Sirius tried asking him about it, he wasn't sure he could stand lying to him.

Remus looked back up at it. At Mr. Derry's year 13 Music Class, 1954-55. At his mother.

"Why did you marry him?" He asked. "Why did you do that to both of us?”

She was silent.

“… Nice talking to you, Mum.”

Wiping beneath his eyes, Remus shoved the photograph back into his pocket and left the scattered memories behind where they hung on the wall.

“About time,” Sirius called, he pushed the door open and walked inside. “Get lost on the way to the loo?”

“Something like that.”

“You okay?”

Remus looked up to find Sirius staring back at him with a raised brow. He’d been sitting on the bottom riser of the orchestra stand, hastily scribbling across a piece of paper.

“Yeah, I’m great,” Remus murmured, not wanting to worry him.

“You’re sure?” Sirius stood, looking him up and down.

“Absolutely.”

“What are you thinking about then?”

“You, mostly.” Remus reached out and hooked a finger into the pocket of Sirius' trousers, pulling him close. As he did, Sirius cracked a small smile and pressed upwards to kiss him on the mouth. He tasted sweet.

“I want to play for you,” Sirius said as they broke apart.

“But we don’t have our instruments.”

“Don’t need ‘em. Come see.” Leaving one last peck on the corner of his mouth, Sirius snatched up the paper he'd been scribbling on and leapt up the music risers to the raised platform that housed Sheila’s grand piano. Weaving amongst the scattered drums and percussion instruments, he took a seat on the bench and waved him over.

“Come join me, Moons!”

Remus did so. It made his heart soar a bit, to see Sirius so eager to play again. As he slid in next to him on the bench, Sirius cleared his throat and let his delicate fingers settle across the keys. He still had his black nail polish on, now chipped and worn.

"I tried my best to remember what I'd written, but the rest of it is back at the dorm," Sirius said, flexing his fingers. "This is just the first half."

“What is it?” Remus asked, scanning the paper.

“Just listen. And go easy on me. I am a bit rusty, after all.”

Remus didn’t even have the chance to tell him that he was being silly, the fervent little melody that came next was already transporting him. Sirius’ music did that; made you feel like you were somewhere else—someone else. It was a reset of an otherwise disappointing reality. It was just so Sirius.

“I love it!” He called.

“Just wait,” Sirius said back, fingers picking up speed like a sports car approaching its first turn. Remus could hear the song on the electric guitar already—perfected by James’ colourful ear and aided by a funky backing track from Peter. He almost said as much, but then Sirius began to sing.

“Hey, have you seen my friends around? Oh, I swear they’re pretty hard to miss… One’s yay-high with flowers in her hair, and the other you’d likely kiss.”

Remus laughed. Sirius’ voice stayed light and airy, like he were slightly gassed and telling a story to a gaggle of pub-goers.

“They’re those downtown girls, ripping n’ roaring along, neon lights pale in their midst… Yeah my girls are free and wild and young—pretty as porcelain, shiny as glitz… Made their names ruining marvellous times, chasing the handsomest guys, performing new crimes… Sharing broken heels and kisses in the bathroom, never left the party—how could they?!” Sirius flashed him a smile. “They’re high off the moon!”

“Stupid!” Remus chuffed, face going red.

Sirius kept on, making the notes practically dance for him; “Yeah, those are downtown girls, ripping n’ roaring along—flashing neon lights pale in their midst… They’re free and sprung and wild and young… Pretty as porcelain, shiny as glitz…”

He repeated his chorus a few more times, weaving its story like a

Hollywood film. Remus loved every second of it. He loved Sirius more. And when Sirius had finished and dropped his fingers from the keys, his heart was still racing.

“I sorta wrote it for Mary,” Sirius said, catching his breath. Smiling, Remus leaned into Sirius on the bench, bending his head so his lips shyly grazed the top of his ear.

“Careful, play that and she might actually fall in love with you.”

A tremble ran through Sirius’ shoulders, and Remus felt it before Sirius was swatting the air in front of his nose. “Augh—god, don’t make me shiver while talking about Mary, you nob.”

“Why’s that so revolting?” He teased. “Mary’s hot, right? Even you can admit that.”

“Yeah, sure," Sirius drawled. "But don’t tell her or she’ll want a page-long dedication on the back of our first album.”

“Tell you what, we’ll tell her when the song actually sells.”

“She’s bound to be insufferable.”

“Mm, bit like you. You're too jealous, Padfoot.”

“Says the nob."

To shut him up, Remus bent down and kissed him. Their lips were still warm from earlier, and Sirius acquiesced for the moment, slipping his tongue in before suddenly pulling away as though he’d remembered something very important.

“Speaking of jealousy—‘Farrah’? … Really?”

Not at all satisfied, Remus chased Sirius’ lips. “I’m sorry, whomst?”

Sirius pushed him away. “Don’t fuck around, Remus Dean. Farrah, your ‘super sexy French fiancée’ that everyone’s been talking about. You should hear the rumours already! Heard about half a dozen ‘a them just yesterday—apparently she’s twenty years your senior, to boot!”

“Ah,” Remus mused, “that Farrah.” It felt so good to tease him.

“Yeah, her!” Sirius smacked him in the shoulder. “Didn’t know you were into cougars too. What do you call a sexuality for old bints?”

“Oh c’mon, you know it’s a rumour!”

“Mhm sure.”

He snorted, leaning in and kissing him. “A rumour, Padfoot.”

Sirius pulled away stubbornly. “I hate her.”

“Oh good, ‘cause she’s not real. You can blame Lily.”

“Ugh, Evans, always mucking up my love life. First McKinnon, now Farrah. Honestly... And I can't believe you didn’t even play at inviting me to a threesome with your sexy Parisian lady-friend!”

He kissed his neck. “Mm… Try some French pillow talk next time and we’ll chat.”

“You’d like that wouldn’t you, you little pervert.” Smirking, Sirius turned back to the piano and began to play. This song had no words, and it wasn’t anything either of them had composed, but Remus still recognised it instantly.

“ ‘Clair de Lune’?” He asked, straightening. “Really?”

Sirius continued on smirking, his fingers a poet on the keys. “I like Debussy. He broke all the rules, just like us. I like to imagine what sort of nonsense was going through his head when he wrote. Him and all the masters. Fill the silence between their agape, you know?"

"Can you give me an example?"

"Sure." Sirius changed tempo, launching into a brisk, staccato-like piece. "For example, Tchaikovsky definitely just thought about barking dogs and train crashes.”

“Is that right?”

“Mhm. And Schumann imagined himself surrounded by the cries of dying children. But it’s just a hobby, really.” Sirius transformed back into "Clair de Lune", picking up where he left off with such fine precision that even Debussy himself would've been impressed.

“Only you can make jokes while playing music like this," Remus said, still admiring his hands.

“Just special, I guess.”

“So what do you think Sheila thinks about when she plays then?”

Sirius started into the piece’s rolling arpeggios, humming softly to himself. “I’ll bet you anything it’s something sickly sweet, like baby bunnies rolling in daisies.”

Remus didn’t say it, but he almost disagreed. Any time he’d heard Sheila play, which was usually in brief stints to start off a warm up in class, she always played with her eyes closed. He couldn’t imagine anyone who pictured rabbits in spring would have to keep their eyes shut. Regulus played with his eyes closed, he remembered.

As Sirius continued his song they both lapsed into silence, and eventually Remus leaned back in, wrapping his arms around Sirius’ waist and gently resting his head on his shoulder. It hurt his neck a bit, Sirius being considerably shorter in the torso, but he liked touching him too much to stop.

“I told my mum about us."

“Oh yeah?” Sirius’ shoulder continued to drift back and forth under him as he played. “And how’d that go?”

“I think it shocked her a bit. She couldn’t get a word out.”

“Ha, funny. Bet my mum would have enough words for the both of them. She’d probably start with ‘you shameful little bastard’. But I still think it’d be nice to throw it back in her face a bit. The old hag…”

His fingers slowed, and Remus reached out a hand to trail over his knuckles, soothing the tightness there. “Don’t stop, Sirius. Don’t let her ruin it.”

As if for comfort, Sirius took his hand and squeezed it. A moment later he lifted it to his lips, placing a gentle kiss on Remus’ own knuckles before returning to the keys. He picked up where he’d left off, rolling the harmonies together into that perfect cadence the piece was known for. Remus never wanted it to stop, but eventually it did, as Sirius hit the final note and let out a long sigh, leaning back on the bench.

“I wish I’d kissed you here,” he said. “Ages ago, when I first played for you. I don’t…” He leaned away, so they could look one another in the eye. “I don’t think you don’t know what you did for me then.”

“That’s okay,” Remus said. He doubted Sirius knew what he’d really done for him either. “I didn’t know you wanted to kiss me then.”

“Well, I bloody did. It sure would’ve made a better kiss than that one in the toilet anyway.”

“Oh I dunno, sort of thought it was pretty decent for how pissed we were.”

“You looked good in that tiny rainbow t-shirt.”

“Are you really going to make me bring up Mary’s tube top?”

Sirius’ eyes twinkled wryly.

“If you’re so worried about not having our first kiss here,” Remus started slowly, “then well… I wouldn’t mind pretending.”

“That we kissed here first? Like what, some sort of stupid do-over?”

“Sure.” Remus straightened up and held out his hand. “Hi, I’m Remus. You are?”

“You’re actually gonna pretend you’ve never met me?” Sirius snorted. “Are you sure about that? I’ve sucked your—”

“OH, I’m sorry, have we met? I think I would’ve remembered. I’m certain we’ve never kissed before though.”

Shaking his head, Sirius took his hand. “Well, enchanté, Remus. I guess we better change that.”

Yanking him forward, Sirius threw his arms around his neck and they met in the middle, pressing their lips together as though they could drown in one another. Remus wouldn’t have minded; he would have gladly let himself drown in Sirius any day. But unlike that first first time in the bathroom, this kiss wasn’t fervent or desperate. They’d had each other before—tasted each other before. Yes, this kiss was like the gentle cadence of Debussy, estranged to everyone else but perfect for them. There were no barking dogs or train wrecks or rabbits in spring, there was only Sirius.

Sirius, Sirius, Sirius, Sirius, Sirius.

Maybe he was drowning.

“Want you,” Sirius told him, his voice gruff and mumbled between their lips.

Remus groaned. “We just—! … Ngh… We’re not desecrating every piano we see."

"Not 'desecrating'—'christening'."

"Ha."

They broke apart, still so close Remus could feel the heaving of Sirius' chest against his own. Maybe he wasn't down again after all, maybe this was just what it meant to be loved.

"Sirius, do you think any of this will ever get easier?"

"Guess that depends what you mean by 'this'."

"I mean all of it. Like… us, and life and all it's shit?"

Sirius pursed his mouth thoughtfully. "Sure I do. I mean, it got better today, right? Stands to reason that sometimes it just has to get worse first. Then when you've made out to the other side, well… you have nothing to worry about."

"Is that where we are? The other side?"

"I hope so." Sirius smiled, comfortingly. He grasped Remus' jaw gently. "Hey, don't worry about it. Eventually none of it'll matter. Eventually, it'll just be okay."

And because he wanted to believe him, Remus said;

"Okay."

Chapter End Notes

Marigolds are rubber gloves.
(As referenced in the chapter before) 'Pgymalion' is a Greek figure who fell in love with the statue he created.

Re, my posting schedule: I cannot commit to more than one chapter per week currently. I know it feels slow, but I'm still rewriting parts of this year as I post it, and life is busy, busy, busy. Hope you guys can understand. In the meantime, I'm always active on tiktok and I reply often to asks/post chapter hints on tumblr (both @motswolo). Shoot me a message on either if you want to chat!
See you next week for a fun chapter. Peace <3

Chapter 75: Slow Ride

Chapter Summary

Surely you're not adverse to a little grand theft auto, Remus?

Chapter Notes

WOW... okay so not really sure how it happened but not only did we pass 100k hits, but we've got over 500k words now... I'm actually rocked to my core, you guys are all so amazing. Thank you for the love :')

CW: Marjiuana references/smoking, Jesus, car crash (??), smooching, mentions of homosexuality (though for once it's happy!)

Also note, I cannot drive manual. So for story purposes... fml.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Me and you and you and me,
No matter how they toss the dice, it had to be;
The only one for me is you, and you for me,
So happy together;
I can't see me lovin' nobody but you,
For all my life;
When you're with me, baby the skies'll be blue,
For all my life…

- "Happy Together" The Turtles, 1967

They had to be more careful at school than they'd been over summer. There were more people around to catch them, and few were strangers. Someone was bound to notice if they were constantly sitting with their legs pressed up against one another ankle to hip, or eyeing each other suggestively from across the room when they were supposed to be concentrating on class work. Luckily, Sirius had always been a flirt, so they did get away with some things in public.

"C'mon, Moony, take it!" Sirius crooned, mumbling around the baby carrot he was dangling in front of his face with his lips. Remus pushed him away by the cheek, but stole the carrot and snapped it in two with his teeth, making Sirius purse that perfect mouth wryly and look away.

He was glad they'd talked. More than glad, even—Moony was over the moon. Since making up Sirius had been as bright and sunny as ever, back to teasing his friends with fervent pleasure. Remus wasn't really sure where they were going to end up, but as long as it was somewhere together, he was content. And he liked this Sirius—he liked the Remus he could be with this Sirius. Even if it had him missing summertime, unable to wake up and witness the way the morning sun dusted across his dark eyelashes.

"James said he's glad you're out of that 'funk'," Sirius told him, the first time they'd stolen away to the astronomy room together. "He told me yesterday in class. Asked if I knew anything about it."

Unable to deny his 'funk', Remus hesitated in the dark. "And so did you…?"

"I told him it was something to do with your London friends, but that I didn't know what. He pretty much let it rest after that."

Well, it wasn't entirely un-true. He still wasn't sure what to make of Lee, and then there was the kiss with Tomny—which was totally over and done with, as far as Remus was concerned.

"He's been more curious lately," Remus said. "Yesterday he wouldn't leave me alone at lunch. I think he's noticed how much time we're spending together."

"He'll get used to it," Sirius reassured him. "Keep telling him we have detention or something."

"And how long do you figure that'll work?"

"Long enough to come up with a better excuse." Sirius turned toward him, smoothly sliding one leg across Remus' thighs until he was straddling his waist. "You're making a liar out of me, Lupin."

"And you've already made a thief out of me," Remus said, leaning in. "I'd say that makes us even."

"Hmm... Sounds like we're a bad influence on each other." Sirius pressed his lips against the corner of his jaw. As he did, Remus reached down and took Sirius' wrist, pulling him closer until they were entirely chest to chest, lips moving against one another in slow, thoughtful movements.

"Mhm," he murmured around Sirius' tongue, "the worst."

Remus would've been lying if he said it hadn't taken them a bit to warm up to one another again, but once they were over the shy coddling and nervous reassurance, they'd thrown themselves at each other like they had that very first night on the Underground. In front of others they had to be careful—coy—but any chance they had alone was a free-for-all. They tried to keep it out of the dorm room, but the afternoons James had practice and Peter was busy with club activities were just too tempting.

"Got a light?" Sirius would ask after each time. Having a post-romp fag became a way to keep things grounded in reality. It was the switch from Remus and Sirius to just, Remus and Sirius. And despite the fact that Sirius most definitely had a light, Remus would always lean over with his zippo and light the cigarette for him. Occasionally the intimate closeness of the otherwise trivial gesture would lead to another pointed glance, and after checking the clock to make sure they had the time, Sirius would stub out the cig and pull Remus back in behind the bed curtains.

Their equal enthusiasm was comforting. Despite his initial concerns, Sirius seemed to need his touch just as much as Remus craved his. He was respectful, never going any further in front of others that couldn't be explained away with a simple excuse or Sirius' generally coquettish disposition. When they were alone he liked to lead, and Remus was more than happy to let him; but that didn't mean he didn't get his end-away either. It would usually start with kissing, then touching—fisting each other's clothes until they were all but tearing them off one another. Things were always aggressive and fervid, but Remus didn't mind. It made things harder to over-think, easier to lose himself in.

And when 'get on me' began to feel like old hat—oh the things they said to each other.

It wasn't just the hooking up that had Remus relieved either. Once he and Sirius had gotten over their joint 'funk' ("It was joint and you know it.") they were also free to be with their friends.

"Ah, finally joining us, are you? What was it this time—did you glue all of Filch's brooms to the ceiling?" James had said, when they'd reappeared after an afternoon spent hidden beneath the football stands.

“No, but that would be a good one,” Sirius said, falling into him on the common room sofa. It was only natural that James be slightly overbearing. He’d never said it, but Remus got the sense that he now fully considered himself to be Sirius’ keeper. They were almost real brothers now—the Potters were Sirius’ family as much as they were James'. After their first week Effie had sent them all care packages, but she’d signed Sirius’ card with ‘love from Mum and Dad’. Sirius had denied it, but Remus was pretty sure he’d cried over it later.

They’d spent Peter’s birthday with just the four of them, crowded around a telly in the AV room and playing Pong on the Atari system his parents had sent as a gift, as he couldn’t really get much use out of the drum kit while at school.

“You said it was a sports game!” James wailed, after losing his third game in a row.

“It is! It’s like tennis! All you gotta do is bounce the little dot back,” Peter cackled.

“Well, if this dial weren’t so damn sensitive! It acts like my nan when you tell her she looks any older than thirty-five.”

“Who would’a thought we’d see the day that Pete would beat you at a sport,” Sirius cackled, promptly missing the dot and making the telly beep in displeasure.

“We should do a prank,” he said later, as they were sneaking their way back across the campus. In continued celebration, they’d broken into the dining hall and lifted a plate of biscuits, several mini chocolate mousses, and an entire pint of mint chocolate chip ice cream. They’d justified the theft on birthday grounds, but Remus had seen James leave a few quid taped to the freezer with a short note of apology.

“What sort of prank?” Peter asked, carrying the ice cream with one hand and munching on a biscuit with the other.

“A good one. One that’s bound to be noticed. Our reputation’s on the line, after all.”

“But Moony’s a prefect now,” James pointed out. “And you’ve already gotten him enough detentions this term.”

“We told you—that was Snape.”

“You mean to say that all of those detentions were Snape’s fault?”

Of course they weren’t all Snape’s fault—the detentions in question weren’t even really detentions at all. They were just excuses to get away together. Knowing this, Remus nudged Sirius from behind. “Any ingenious pranking ideas then?”

Sirius smirked. “I may have a few…”

“I just hope it doesn’t involve Regulus this time,” James ragged. Scoffing, Sirius snatched the ice cream from Peter and pressed it to the back of his friend’s neck, making James howl in surprise.

“Get back here!” He lashed, as Sirius tossed the ice cream tub back to Peter and took off across the lawn. Remus watched them, falling into step with Peter and imagining all of the devious ideas Sirius was hatching in his brain. Even if the two of them were now officially a secret item, it was still fun to be stupid with their friends. Music, pranking—it didn’t matter. The pleasure came from knowing that even when they weren’t able to be together as Sirius and Remus, they were still together as Moony, Wormtail, Padfoot, and Prongs. As Marauders.

It was the best.

* * *

Sunday 25th September 1977

“It’s the fucking worst,” Sirius hissed, as they shuffled into their pews for Sunday mass. “Five quid says they spent my entire year thirteen tuition on it.”

“I can think of a million other things to spend that kind of money on,” Remus agreed scornfully.

“Like a car. Like a debut album. Like a bloody cool motorbike. Fuck, the things I could do if my entire family wasn’t on Satan’s payroll.”

“It certainly is ‘in your face’ enough,” James replied, from his spot next to Sirius.

“Speaking of faces, is his supposed to look like that?” Asked Peter.

All four of them tilted their heads to the side, peering quizzically at the freshly-carved statue of Christ standing behind the heads of the student choir. The ten foot tall carving was a new addition to the church, one generously commissioned by the Black family, as thanks for ‘the school’s continued dedication to corrective instruction and established education’. It had appeared just the Sunday before and Sirius had wasted no time making fun of the garish sculpture—comments that only got worse once he’d found out that his family was the one to donate it in the first place.

“You guys staring at the new kid in class again?” Lottie teased, shuffling down the pew with the other girls in tow. Lily quickly slipped down the line, taking a spot between James and Peter and giving her boyfriend a quick peck on the cheek in hello. After she’d passed, Sirius threw a hand out, scoffing;

“It’s positively hideous. I mean, if they’re going to find a way to rub their money in everyone’s faces isn’t there a better way to do it than dangling a half-naked bloke in front of all our noses?”

“I think the son of God is a lot more than some ‘half-naked bloke’,” Marlene said pointedly.

Sirius shrugged his shoulders. “Whatever. Didn’t think you cared all that much for western religion after your trip down south, McKinnon. Didn’t you discover Ghandi or something?”

“Not Ghandi—Allah. Plenty of Moroccan people follow Islam, Sirius. And no, I’m not suddenly converting.”

“What about you, Mary? Still Buddhist?” Remus asked.

Mary winked. “Only on Sundays, love.”

“I bet if they had it their way, it’d be me nailed to that cross instead,” Sirius continued, grumbling loathsomely.

While the other girls all frowned in sympathy, Lily reached across James’ lap to take Sirius’ hand. “You don’t have to worry about it anymore, you’ve got us now,” she said comfortingly.

“Yeah,” Sirius mumbled, squeezing back, “yeah, I do. And besides, we won’t have to look at the ugly thing for much longer. At least not for today, anyway.”

“What do you mean?”

“Oh nothing,” he smirked.

Lily pulled her hand back suspiciously, turning on her boyfriend. “Potter?”

“Sorry, Daisy, I’m not saying anything.”

“What have you lot done now?” Lottie asked, nudging Peter.

“No idea,” he answered dumbly. “Moony, any thoughts?”

“No, not really. But I did wake up to find my private stash a bit light today. Anyone know anything about that?”

James and Sirius both swallowed their smiles.

“Oh, this ought to be good,” Mary scoffed playfully, crossing her arms over her chest.

When all the other students were settled and Professor McGonagall had stood up to call order, the priests filed in for their entrance procession followed by the altar bearers, each of them swinging the heavy metal thuribles ahead of themselves. Remus watched as the smoke from the censer burners wafted between the rows, purifying the students and raising their prayers up to Heaven. It was subtle, but as they reached midway down the aisles, one of the altar boys reached up to rub at his nose. Steadily, more and more kids began to blink in the light haze, expressions of recognition coming over each of them that ranged from confused to aghast to amazed.

“Nice,” Remus sniggered, once he’d gotten a whiff for himself.

Next to him, Lottie whirled around in the pew, her eyes wide. “It smells like—”

“WOAH! WHO BROUGHT THE WEED?!”

The amused cry went up very suddenly, making every priest and teacher shoot up in their chairs. What followed was a cacophonous roar of laughter as the procession came to an immediate halt, the head priest shooting down the aisles toward the confused altar boys, snatching the smoking metal pots from their hands. But it was too late. By now the entire room could smell it, and Marlene gaped at Sirius and James, who were falling into themselves with smug laughter.

“You didn’t!” She trilled.

“Of course we didn’t,” Sirius snorted, clearly lying.

She smacked him.

“James!” Lily blagged.

“He just said we didn’t do it! … But if we did, it would’a been real funny.”

“Real funny,” Peter agreed, knocking his fist against his best friend’s happily.

“I can’t believe you guys,” Marlene gasped. “You’re so going to get caught.”

“Why? It’s not like Sheila’s around to pin it on us. She's stepped out this weekend,” Sirius said smugly. Leaning back with his hands behind his head, he put his feet up on the pew ahead of him while the priests fled the church with the stinking censers in hand and the room continued with its chaos. Remus eyed him, before turning back to a very blanched Marlene.

“Yeah, Cherry, don’t worry, they got no real proof anyway.”

* * *

“Agh—! Damn it…”

Hissing, Remus pressed the tip of his thumb into his mouth before withdrawing it to examine the small cut. The silver thuribles had edges that could cut glass, and the little notched holes in the side that were meant to allow the smoke out acted more like the blades of a cheese grater. He might’ve thrown more of a fit, had the prank not worked out so masterfully. Though McGonagall must’ve thought herself pretty smart to choose him out of all the prefects to stay and clean up; if she couldn’t directly pin it on all four Marauders, then the single prefect among them would have to do. Remus was just thankful Regulus wasn’t asked to stay. He didn’t need any more animosity where he was concerned.

“Fuck this,” Remus griped under his breath, tossing the charcoal-smudged rag at the pile of metal censers they had left to clean. The metal bowls went down with a grand clatter, scattering themselves across the front dais of the church. Behind him sat the chancel in all its golden glory, and beyond that—the Blacks’ statue of Christ. Remus glared at it, flipping the crucified man off for good measure.

“Well, that was rather dramatic,” Trish drawled, appearing out of the vestry hallway with two more thuribles tucked under each arm. They were to clean every piece of silver in the entire church, it seemed. Déjà vu all over again.

“This feels like detention,” he scowled, kicking away one of the censer lids that had rolled toward him and turning to dangle his long legs off the side of the raised dais.

“This is pretty normal prefect stuff, actually. They always get a couple o’ us tae sweep up after mass.” Trish set down her load, before pushing up onto the edge of the stage next to him. “Ye’v just added to it.”

“It’s still shit,” Remus grumbled. So much for not throwing a fit.

“Meh, it’s not that bad.”

“Why are you even here, Trish?” He asked. “McGonagall didn’t force you to stay—why the hell would you volunteer?”

“Maybe because I actually did have prefect duty today, ‘n I’d rather be ‘ere than chasing kiddies around the primary campus with Jillian breathing down my neck.”

“Oh, so you just wanted to get out of other prefect stuff?” He asked gingerly.

“Yep.”

“No… other reason?”

“Na, why?”

“Well, you just… you don’t happen to… have a thing for me do you? Because—er—it just wouldn’t work.”

Trish gave him a deep frown before bursting into laughter. “ ‘A thing fur yeh’? Whit? No offence, Loonarny, but I barely ken who you are—you could be an axe murderer for all I know. Or some stuffy loud-mouth with an Adderall addiction."

Remus hung his head, horribly embarrassed. "Oh. Wow—um… Yeah, sorry. That—That was weird… hah…"

"Are you that used tae strangers openly declaring their love for ya?"

"What? No, I—"

"Ah mean, I guess you're braw enough, though that might just be the fact that you look like yer related to a tree, but—"

"It was weird!" Remus interjected. "I'm sorry. I just… bad track record lately, that's all."

Trish gave him an amused look. "With Jillian, right? She's said a lot o' stuff about you."

Embarrassed, Remus picked up one of the rags and began absent-mindedly polishing one of the thurible pieces. "Yep…"

"She really had a thing fur yeh."

"I know. Didn't think the two of you got along all that well, actually."

"S'a girl thing," she giggled. "She's bearable on her own. Yer a lad, so you wouldn't get it."

Remus thought of Regulus, who hated him whether they were alone or not. "Yeah…"

"So…" Trish mused, "how's that 'fiancée' o' yours then?"

"You heard about that, huh?" Remus snorted.

"Aye. Heard she was a solid ten outta ten actually. Real 'peng'."

"Really?"

"Mhm, oh yeah—absolutely gorgeous. French, with locks down tae her bum 'n a real affinity fur English bad boys."

"Jesus Christ."

"Canny, or he'll hear you," she sniggered, pointing at Sirius' favourite ugly statue. Remus looked back, smiling and a bit amused by her.

“Look,” he started, “don’t tell anyone, but I’m not actually engaged.”

Trish gasped sarcastically. “Nah, ye don’t say!”

“Ha, ha. Yeah, it was just something my friend Lily came up with to let Jillian down easy, so keep it to yourself?”

“Meh. She’s dating that jimmie in my year, Roy Nilssen, anyway now, so I wouldn’t worry about it.”

“He on the football team?” Remus asked, trying to recall his face.

“Na, that’s Troy Michaelssen. Roy’s on the rowing team.”

“Oh. I see…”

“Suddenly feeling jealous?”

“No!”

Trish grinned evilly at him. She reminded him a bit of Tomny, but that might’ve just been the accent. She rolled her ‘r’s just like he did, though Tomny’s brogue wasn’t ever as pronounced.

“On the subject o’ lying,” Trish started, before turning away and rummaging around in her blazer’s pockets; “I may have had an ulterior motive for staying behind in church—one that doesn’t have tae do with yer handsome puss anyway.”

Intrigued, Remus straightened up to get a better look, and Trish came back with a joint tucked between her lips, which she lit off a pocket lighter and puffed to life.

“Trish!” He gasped, whipping around to make sure they were alone.

“Whit?” She blagged. “No one’s here—everyone cleared out after you and those muckers o’ yers tried hotboxing God’s living room.”

“You knew it was us?”

“Everybody knew it was you. Ye’ve actually got quite the reputation, Remington.”

Remus scoffed. “Please enough, I do not need any more nicknames.”

Trish let out a breath of smoke. Then she held her hand out to him. “ ‘ere, think this belongs tae ya.”

He glanced down, letting her drop the item into his palm. “My lighter!” He exclaimed, turning it over and pressing his thumb to the engraving there.

“Did’nae mean tae nick it,” she said. “Found it in my bag ‘n couldn’t remember who it belonged to. Luckily Black has your initials memorised.”

“Oh, well, you could’ve just given it to Sirius then.”

“Na, meant Regulus.”

Remus blinked. “Regulus?”

“Mhm. I did have ‘a go trying to give it to him actually, but he’s gey stubborn.”

“Right…” Remus pocketed the lighter. “We aren’t exactly friends.”

“Hey, I get it.” Trish took another drag. “So… how’d you do it?”

“You mean the prank? Well, the hardest part was just not getting caught really. We did it this morning before anyone else was awake.”

“You must be tired then.”

“Always.”

Looking him up and down, Trish took another long puff on the spliff before reaching over and offering it to him. “C’moan,” she teased, “not like anyone’s gonna notice the smell. Not until they start airing the place out anyway.”

He eyed her a moment and Trish shook the weed pointedly. “Well? Don’t tell me yer frigid?”

Smirking lightly, Remus took the joint from her and brought it to his lips. “You’d be surprised by the things I’ve done, kid,” he told her. Then the delightful smoke was enveloping his throat like a warm blanket—nothing like the dry, nasty stuff they’d used on the thuribles. Sirius had had to bribe that crap off some random tenth year just to avoid draining their entire stash, and the stuff tasted like it’d been left in a sock drawer for a decade.

“That’s some nice hash,” he said immediately, blowing smoke out his nose before handing it back.

“I know, right? Got it from my cousin, Clyde. He lives in the village actually. Every now ‘n then he brings me his maw’s cooking, but sometimes it’s the fun stuff.”

“He taking on clients?” Remus asked. “I’m in the market for a new fence.”

“Nah, not really. He’s a bit stingy.” Trish passed him the joint again. “But I’m sure I can put a good word in.”

She winked, and Remus accepted the weed with humble gratitude.

“You know, Trish, I kept thinking this school couldn’t surprise me anymore. I think I might’ve been wrong.”

“Oh, Remington, is there really any point in a life that can’t surprise ye?”

“No,” he said lightly, puffing on the end of the joint, “no, I suppose there’s not.”

She smiled at him, before tossing a rag at his head. “Okay, time tae get back to work, naughty boy.”

By the time they’d finished, they’d smoked and scrubbed themselves right through lunch. Father Minsin, the priest who’d caught them the prank’s first time around, had been pleased with their progress when he’d finally returned, but Remus was still given a week’s detention for the stunt and the smell it left. He wasn’t bothered. It’d been a good day nonetheless.

“Pretty sure that silver’s ne’er been so clean,” Trish said, stretching her arms out above her head as they skipped down the chapel’s front steps.

“Moony!” Sirius barked. He jumped up from beneath an oak tree across the courtyard, waving both arms over his head, James and Peter at his side.

“I’ll see ya later then,” Trish said, “ ‘n don’t worry, I’ll make sure to pass yer name on to Clyde.”

“Thanks, Trish,” Remus said, breaking away from her and crossing the lawn, hands tucked into his pockets.

“Who was that?” Sirius asked, staring after the twelfth year.

“Trish. She’s a prefect.”

“Did you get detention too, Moony?” Peter asked.

“Yeah. I think McGonagall's actually starting to regret making me a prefect. She gave me a whole week.”

“That’s bollocks, we got two,” James snorted, rolling an apple between both palms.

“Favouritism,” Sirius scoffed.

“Favouritism, my arse,” Remus said. “Just look at my hands, they’re rubbed raw from punishment.”

“Here, I’ll kiss ‘em better.”

Sirius made a grab for him but Remus just side-stepped, accidentally tripping the other boy and sending him sprawling into the grass.

“You wanker!”

Remus smirked in Sirius’ direction. “So, what, you guys have detention or should we practice tonight? I wanna get a jump on Sirius’ new song.”

“We could…” James started, glancing at a smiling Peter.

“Or—”

“—We could neglect our future careers just long enough to do something fun!” Sirius declared, springing up from the ground. “Moony, you drive, yeah?”

“You know I can, I—” Remus stopped short. “Why would I need to drive anywhere?”

Sirius ignored the question; “Cool! Potter’s been around the block a few times too, havent’cha, Prongs?”

“Yep, Dad took me out over the summer,” James surmised.

“But Pete and I,” Sirius smirked, “we’re total virgins.”

“Ugh, why do you have to say it like that?” Peter squirmed.

“Oh, get over yourself, you ninny. We all know you and Moira finally got your end away this summer—about time if you ask me—I meant driving."

"Why would we need to drive anywhere?" Remus asked again. "Where would we even go?"

"Don't get your knickers in a twist, Moons—just around the lake and back."

"Oh-kaaay, in what car? Or are you planning on taking one of Kettleburn's ponies out onto the road?"

"Ha, no." Smugly, Sirius held up a small ring of keys, each one glinting in the fresh afternoon sun. "While you were busy shining silver with Penny Prefect, McGonagall had us helping Stan replace the tires on one of the trolleys in the garage."

"You stole Stan's keys?"

"Borrowed," Sirius eased; "bor-rowed. And besides, they're the spares! He had me hold 'em and then forgot to ask for them back! So you see, it's perfectly legal."

"Define 'legal' for me!"

"I thought it was insane too," James interjected, "but then Stan practically dared us to do it."

"Wha…?"

Peter held up one finger in imitation; " 'As if any of you posh poncers could drive such a beast. You'd likely just ram 'er into a tree as you would run a stop sign'. Can you believe it? There aren't even any stop signs on school property."

Remus could picture Stan saying the words perfectly; though his trolley wasn't all that bigger than a milk float and could hardly be considered a 'beast'.

"So you see, Moony? He was telling us to take it," Sirius insisted gleefully.

"This is how people end up in prison."

"Oh, excuse me for thinking you wouldn't be adverse to a little grand theft auto."

“That—” He drew up short. “That was different. And this doesn’t count as a prank.”

“So it’s not a prank.” Sirius dangled the keys in the air again, letting them chime. “That mean you don’t want to go for a nighttime joyride?”

Remus sighed, and while sensing his crumbling resolve, the boys crowded in.

“It’ll be fun!” Sirius grinned.

“Just one teensy-weensy whip around the lake!” James prodded.

“We’ll even go the speed limit!” Peter added.

“I don’t even know why you’re acting like you need my permission! I’m a prefect not your mother.”

“No, you’re right, that’s Potter,” Sirius nodded; “You’re our Moony. Can’t do a thing without our Moony.”

I hate you, Remus thought. I hate you and I love you and I hate you.

“We’re gonna be in detention until Wormtail’s next birthday.”

“Probably!”

“We could crash.”

“Maybe!”

“Stan’ll kill us.”

“Absolutely!”

“This is a bad idea.”

All three of them grinned. “PLEEEEEAASE, MOOOONYYY?”

“Alright!” He cried. “Alright! Just shut your gobs before someone overhears!”

“YES!” Sirius tossed the keys in the air in celebration. “You hear that, lads? Moony’s gonna teach us how to drive!”

“That was definitely not what I said.”

“I like to read between the lines,” Sirius said, “saves time. And besides, there’s no way you’re going to resist barking at us from the passenger seat anyway.”

“There is no passenger’s seat in a bus!” Remus shouted, but the lads were already off—racing back toward their dorm in earnest glee.

Because they weren’t total thickheads, they waited until midnight and once James had finished his nightly rounds as dorm monitor and the common room had emptied out, they snuck out into the darkness and the prank-not-prank was on. After making sure the coast was clear, Remus got the garage door open and they slipped inside, weaving between the small fleet of trolleys until they found the one their set of spare keys belonged to. Pushing the bus doors open, James bounded up the steps and dropped down behind the wheel, pattering it with his fingers.

“This’s gonna be great!” He announced. “A few turns around the lake and back, just like we agreed on!”

“Yeah, yeah,” Remus sighed, trodding up the steps after Sirius. “Just keep the headlamps off until we’re out of the garage and try to keep the noise to a minimum.”

“Us, noisy? Really, Moons, who do you take us for?” Sirius asked, before dropping a portable cassette player down on the bus’s dashboard.

“Where’d you get that?” James asked in awe.

“Borrowed it off some twelfth year kid over at Crowley House named Fergus. Thought our first drive together deserved some ambiance.”

“Can’t believe he just gave it to you.”

“Of course he did, I’m cool like that. Oh and by the way, we owe him a date with Mary.”

“I think you need to reevaluate that ‘we’,” Remus scoffed, before turning back to James. “Make sure you’ve got your feet on the clutch and break before you turn it on.”

Gingerly, James glanced at the pedals before sticking the key into the ignition and giving it a sharp turn. The bus rumbled to life beneath them, yellow lights striking on. They immediately illuminated the huge garage doors, as well as Peter, who was waiting by the wall switch to open them up.

“Damn!” He cried, throwing his arm up over his eyes. “Warn a guy next time!”

“Sorry, Pete,” Remus called, reaching over James for the right dial and turning the lights off.

“Kay… right, let's do this,” James breathed, grabbing the gear stick.

Remus stopped him; “Hold on, you forgot to make sure you were in neutral first.”

“I need to do that?”

“Uh, yes? Haven’t you ever driven a manual before?”

“No, Dad’s got an automatic.”

“Maybe Moony ought to be the one to drive her out of here,” Sirius said, draping himself over the bus seat behind them.

Shrugging, James got up and he and Remus traded spots. Sitting down, Remus quickly realised that Stan’s seat sagged in the middle and smelled horribly of stale cigarettes and old coffee, but he managed to adjust the mirrors, catching a wink from Sirius in them as he did.

“Okay.” He started. “Pete, open the doors!”

Peter did so, hitting the large button on the wall that left the entire room shaking as the garage doors curled up overhead. A moment later, he scuttled up onto the bus and pulled the doors shut after himself.

“Everyone ready?”

“Ready!”

“Hold on just a sec, Moons!” Sirius cried, just as Remus was getting ready to shift the gear into second. He popped up from his seat and hit play on the cassette deck, letting it shriek for a moment as the tape caught hold and the sound of a warped kick drum echoed out from its measly speakers.

“Fucking hell,” Remus chuckled, as Sirius threw his head forward and screamed; ‘WAH-HOOO!’

James and Peter screamed with him, and as Remus drove the bus out of the garage and down the street, they all began singing over the band;

'Slow ride, take it easy!
Slow ride, take it easy!'

"There, Moony, take that right!" James said, pointing to the side street that would lead them toward Lake Dubh's docks. He turned, blowing past one of the empty trolley stops and down towards the deep dark of the lake's wilderness.

'I'm in the mood,
The rhythm is right;
Move to the music,
We can roll all night!'

It was pure adrenaline, rumbling on as the paved school streets turned to cobble, then rubble, then dirt.

"You sure this thing can handle this sort of terrain?" Peter asked, sounding nervous as they all bounced along, barely twenty yards from the edge of the lake.

"Oh yeah, she's a beast after all!" Sirius cackled.

Smiling, Remus finally flicked on the headlamps and threw the tram into a higher gear, narrowly avoiding a patch of gravel that had given way at the edge of the road. Trolleys never came down so far, but Filch and the school's other greenskeepers regularly took their lorries out along the back roads. The ground would hold.

"Anyone else want a turn?" Remus offered, after they'd made it to the western side of the lake. The road had grown windier, snaking around Lake Dubh like a racing circuit, but it was more than wide enough for the trolley to fit. They made Peter go first, only because he was the most sceptical, and after all of them had crowded around the front seat for a quick lesson and to get a look at the clutch and the gas, Remus stood up and traded him spots.

"It's a bus so it's going to take more effort to turn the wheel than a regular car," Remus instructed, as Peter limped the tram along. "Don't worry about overcompensating, the wheels'll correct themselves."

"Okay!" Peter said, before yelping as the entire bus gave a particularly bad lurch. Remus didn't think he was doing all that bad, but barely five minutes into Peter's stint, they hit a deep pothole in the road that had him nearly tumbling down the stairs. After that Peter thought it was time for James to have a go.

"C'mon Prongs, let's see how fast you can get her to move," Sirius egged, flipping the tape in the cassette deck and hitting play again.

"Shut your gob, Padfoot, I'm trying to concentrate!"

"There, double pump the clutch like I showed you," Remus said.

Smoothly, James switched gears and Peter congratulated him on it, as Remus slid back a few rows and relaxed back in the seat next to Sirius to enjoy the ride. "See," Sirius said, "aren't you having fun?"

"Yeah, I am," Remus admitted. Though the cassette's volume could barely be heard over the tram's rumbling, he was glad Sirius had brought it along.

'You're my all day study, you're my midnight dream,
You need love I need love, rock me baby 'til I scream!'

Remus felt Sirius' hand on his leg. He just brushed it at first, like a comfort, but then Sirius slid his hand higher, toward the inside where he gave Remus' thigh a light squeeze through his jeans. Turning rigid in his seat, Remus glanced forward at their friends. Both were squinting eagerly ahead at the road, while James drove and Peter did his best to provide back-seat advice.

"Padfoot, you don't know what it is you're doing," Remus murmured.

Sirius slid his hand higher. "I think I do."

'I need somebody, save your loving for me!
I need somebody, save your loving for me!'

In one fluid movement, Remus had Sirius pushed onto his back against the bus seat.

“Oh!” He gasped, as Remus crouched down over him, the music and rattling filling their ears. “So eager.”

“Shuddup.” Remus kissed him and Sirius laughed against his mouth. He let his head lean up against the metal wall just below the window while Remus cradled his neck with his hands, holding Sirius between himself and the bus seat as his boyfriend’s wicked tongue slid further and further into his mouth. It was terribly cramped, trying to keep all their limbs hidden behind the seat ahead of them, but in the moment, Remus didn’t care. He hadn’t kissed Sirius since the day before and was due for a top-up anyway.

Sirius ran his hands up Remus’ sides, only playing at peeling his clothes away before dipping his fingers deeper into the waistband of his jeans. It was tempting and evil, and Remus just ground his hips forward for more, until he could feel the outline of Sirius between both of their trousers as they traced each other’s lips and neck.

Distantly Remus thought he heard James calling his name, but Sirius had moved on—running his teeth along the edge of his jaw and ear and—

“LUPIN!”

That was definitely James.

“YEP—!” Remus blurted, shooting up in the seat and pushing a hand on Sirius’ chest to keep him down. “Sorry! Just er—dropped my… pen?”

“There’s someone coming!” Peter said desperately, before James popped the clutch and the entire trolley started skidding down the gravel road to a stop.

Significantly less aroused, Remus leapt up from the bus seat and threw himself down the aisle where he grabbed the back of James’ seat and peered out into the dark. “What do you… oh shit.” Perhaps a hundred years away or so, a pair of headlights were rounding the side of the lake, dipping in and out of view behind the trees.

“Cut the lights!” Sirius called, appearing behind him, all rosy-cheeked and breathless. He grabbed the cassette player, slamming his hand over the stop button as James put out the headlights. The bus continued to thrum beneath them—if they didn’t sort out what to do and fast they’d be caught for sure.

“We’re still in the middle of the road, he’s gonna drive right over top of us,” James fretted.

“There was that little cut-away path a few yards back,” Peter supplied. “Maybe we can drive down it and hide until they pass!”

Remus took charge immediately. “Potter, outta the way so I can back this thing up. You and Sirius go to the back and make sure I’m not driving us into the lake. Pete, keep an eye on that car.”

Eagerly, James popped up from the seat and he and Sirius took their places at the back of the bus while Remus tried not to let his hands shake as he put the gear stick in reverse.

“Hurry, Moony,” Peter urged, clenching the back of his seat with both hands, “I can see the lights getting closer.”

“I’m gonna keep her straight!” Remus called, slowly beginning to back the bus up down the road. “You two tell me when I need to turn.”

“Got it!” Sirius said. A moment later; “To the left—WAIT—no! I meant my left—your right!”

“DON’T DO THAT!” Remus wailed. He could see the lights directly ahead of them now. Whoever it was would be on them in seconds if they didn’t hide.

“Faster, Moony!” Peter pleaded, throwing himself forward to fist the back of Remus’ shirt.

“To the left!” James cried. “Now the right!”

Remus spun the wheel desperately.

“No, not that far! Left—left! Now right again! Careful or you’re gonna drive off the road!”

“There, I see it!” Sirius shouted. “Just a bit more, then you can ease off at the fork!”

Remus grunted; “Peter, you’re choking me!” A second later, James and Sirius were racing up the aisle, pointing out the window to a small side-road that led deeper into the trees. It was pitch black, but if they hesitated any longer the headlamps from the other car were going to light them up like a Christmas tree.

“Turn!” Sirius cried, as Remus threw the gear shift back into forward and wrenched the steering wheel as far to the left as it could go. The tires gave a nasty squeal, but rolled forward and quickly they were shooting down the side path. When they were just far enough to be hidden amongst the trees, Remus cut the engine and made sure all the lights were off before joining his friends at the back of the bus. As they all peered out and watched the dim headlights creep closer and closer through the foliage, he could feel the thump of his heart beat drumming in his ears. They'd be safe as long as the headlamps didn't catch the reflection off the bus's windows, but he wasn't sure their luck was that good.

The lorry kept coming, and all four Marauders held their breath. Then suddenly, the lights halted at the edge of their trail, the noise of an old vehicle purring in the dark. The driver had stopped.

"You think McGonagall'll expel us for this?" Peter whimpered, making Sirius jab him in the side with an elbow.

"Shhh!"

Remus was still holding his breath. All it would take was for the car to turn into the mouth of the path, then they'd be spotted it'd all be over. Expulsion seemed very likely, indeed. He began to imagine how Lyall would react—disappointed, no doubt. And Giles…? Oh, he'd be furious.

There was a sudden clatter as Sirius fumbled the cassette player and dropped it, knocking the play button and starting the tape up mid-song at full volume. Peter screamed, and James had to clamp a hand over his mouth to silence him.

"Shut it!" Sirius cried, scooping up the player and wrenching open the tape deck to stifle its noise.

"You shut it!" Peter replied, already pushing James off.

"Both of you, be quiet!" James hissed.

"Look," Remus said, pointing, "it's moving off."

They turned to the windows again, but Remus was right. He'd thought for sure that the end was coming, but after a few more seconds of dreadful anxiety, the truck mercifully began to move forward again, plunging on down the road and drawing away from the trolley until its headlamps were lost to the dark.

They all let out a sigh of relief, sagging into different bus seats as calm finally settled over them.

“Bet it was Filch in his bloody lorry,” Peter grumbled.

Sirius sat up straighter; “Bugger—How does he always know?!”

"Maybe he's magic. Pretty sure he communicates with that cat of his telepathically."

“I don’t care, let’s just get back to the garage before he decides to take another lap around the lake,” James moaned.

After Remus had backed the bus back onto the main path and they’d decided it was safe to switch their lights on again, he turned to Sirius.

“You want a try?” He asked. “There’s only a bit of lake left to go—you can take her back to the garage.”

Humbly, Sirius accepted and dropped down into the driver’s seat, tracing his hands across the gear stick and steering wheel before throwing it into drive. As he did, the engine heaved and the bus shot forward jerkily before catching, making all of them squeak in surprise.

“You just stalled,” Remus murmured. “You gotta depress the clutch.”

“Pfft—I knew that,” Sirius scoffed, before doing as Remus said and getting the tram moving again. Despite his shaky movements in the beginning, he was a graceful driver, tapping his fingers along the wheel as the cassette played its music.

‘I feel hazy and it’s crazy, forgot everything I know,
Before I leave, give me one more for the road;
All the sad songs and the bad songs the jukebox played tonight,
A little rock and roll will make everything alright;
Drive me home, drive me home!’

“So where does this rank on your scale, Moony?” Sirius asked from his seat.

“And what scale would that be?” Remus asked. He was sitting next to James, watching the way the moonlight cut across the front windshield and highlighted the blue tones in Sirius’ hair.

“You know, the scale of absolute insanity? As comparable to your mates back home? Don’t tell me Good Tom’s ever stolen a bus before?”

“Bus, no, but I’m afraid he’s still got you beat in the stolen car ratio,” Remus chuckled.

"Fucker."

“Your friends sound absolutely insane, Moony,” Peter laughed.

Remus smiled. “You are insane.”

“Aw, my heart.” Sopily, James wrapped an arm around his neck and pulled him in close. Remus let him.

“Considering none of us have had a drop of alcohol, I’d call this a tame stint,” James added, making Sirius sigh in irritation.

“It hurts to know we’ll never live up to their lunacy. Next time we should get drunk first.”

“And end up in the lake?" Remus drawled. "Nah, you make up for it in other ways."

Sirius eyed him playfully in the mirror. “Hey, anyone dare me to go faster?”

“No,” Remus and Peter said together, while James cried; “Yeah!”

Already appearing smug, Sirius threw the bus into a higher gear, making the engine squeal with effort as it got up to speed. The edge of the road fell away from them in a dark blur, and Sirius took every bend at top speed, skidding the back wheels until they were all grabbing onto the seat ahead of them to remain upright.

“You’re mental!” Remus cried.

“All the best people are!” Sirius cried back.

“I see school!” Peter said, pointing out the window to a row of low-cropped buildings used as storage rooms for the rowing team. At the same moment, the bus hit a horrible pothole, launching all of them out of their seats as the tires came back down to earth and Sirius scrambled to keep the steering wheel straight.

“Bloody—wow!” He laughed. “Did you see—”

“SIRIUS, WATCH OUT!”

Spurned by Remus’ cry, Sirius looked up just in time to see that a section of the road ahead of them had caved out. He didn’t have time to swerve around it before their front tire caught the dirt and the whole trolley was toppling off to the right, diving downwards off the road. They crashed down the embankment with four erratic screams, and might have flipped entirely had Sirius’ forward momentum not kept them soaring across the dirt hill and toward the stone-covered edge of Lake Dubh.

They hit the water's surface with a great smack, sliding into its depths with such speed that the icy lake was instantly flooding into the cabin, leaking under the door and rising up over the stairs in seconds.

“FUCK!” Sirius cried, scrambling to free himself from the driver’s seatbelt.

“Out the back!” James yelped, grabbing Peter and pushing him ahead of himself.

Dazed—he’d smacked his head on the seat ahead of himself—Remus reached for Sirius, grabbing him by the back of the shirt. “Sirius, come on!”

“I can’t find the tape deck!” Sirius moaned, before letting out another screech as the freezing water leaked up to his ankles.

“Forget the bloody tape deck!” Fisting the back of his shirt tightly, he hauled Sirius down the bus’s aisle toward the back doors. They had to practically climb to do so; the trolley was sinking nose-first toward the endless bottom of Lake Dubh, and it wanted to take them with it.

James and Peter had reached the back doors first, throwing the emergency handle wide and flooding the cabin even further. “SWIM!” James ordered, and a second later all four of them had thrown themselves into the freezing water.

“Kick, Peter!”

“I am kicking!”

“Don’t let it suck you down!”

Sputtering over a mouthful of water, Remus looked left and right, desperately trying to spot Sirius’ flailing arms and legs in the pitch darkness. “Sirius? SIRIUS?!”

“I’m right here!” He called, pushing him on by the shoulder. “Swim, Lupin, swim!”

As shocking as the accident had been, they weren’t all that far from shore. Haggard and stunned, they dragged themselves onto the banks of the Dubh and turned, breathlessly watching as the trolley’s back end bobbed in the water for a few moments like a fishing lure, before gurgling and disappearing beneath the surface. Remus could see as the headlamps slipped down into the deep, before ultimately sputtering out and leaving all evidence of the trolley lost to the lake.

“Well,” James breathed, his black curls damp and sad, “sure wasn’t expecting that.”

"You jinxed us, Moony!" Sirius wheezed. Remus glared at him. “You must like bloody lakes more than I thought!”

“Is everyone alright?” Remus grumbled.

“No,” Sirius answered; “What am I gonna tell Fergus about his tape deck?”

“That’s what you’re worried about?!” Peter guffawed. “We just sunk an entire bus in the lake! We are so fucked!”

James held his head in his hands. “Pete’s right…”

“You sure about that?” Sirius asked.

At his words, Peter began to splutter; “O-Of course I’m sure! An entire bus—just gone!”

“Gone,” Sirius echoed, nodding. “Gone with no evidence…”

“Oh my god.”

Sirius threw his arms out. “I’m right though, right?! No evidence! I don’t see a bus! Do you?” He looked to James. “Did you see what happened to Pete’s mysterious trolley, Prongs?”

James looked down like he was weighing his entire future and career as football captain before raising his head; “No, Padfoot. As a matter of fact… I didn’t.”

“Well, Wormtail? Do you happen to see the missing trolley

anywhere?"

Peter moaned, he looked like he wanted to argue, but Peter had never been much good at that. "No… No, I do not."

Everyone looked at Remus.

"And you, Mr. Prefect?" Sirius started, smiling guiltily. "Did you see what happened?"

Remus rubbed his eyes. He was wet and cold and miserable, and yet he couldn't bring himself to care all that much.

"… What trolley?"

Sirius snorted and pushed himself to his feet, clothes dripping on the stone beach. "Well, I feel a bit bad, but who knows what could've happened? Maybe Filch took her for a whirl."

"This is insane," Peter said. Sirius helped him to his feet, patting his friend on the shoulder.

"Don't worry, Wormy. We just went for a midnight swim, s'all. Perfectly innocent."

Still in varying states of disbelief, they started up the beach to the road. Trailing behind, Remus shook his head; "If anyone finds out about—"

" 'If'," Sirius said quickly. " 'If' they find out."

Peter and James started laughing simultaneously, and Remus just started after that beautiful lunatic of a boy. They were lucky, really. Lucky they hadn't gotten caught, lucky none of them had been hurt, lucky they'd found each other in the first place.

"C'mon, Marauders," Sirius said finally, using his hands to clamber up the embankment to the road, "let's go write a song about all this."

"And get drunk or something?" James offered.

It was Sirius' turn to laugh.

"And get drunk."

* * *

Tuesday 11th October 1977 – Two weeks later…

Remus thoughtfully tapped the tip of his pencil against his songbook. He wasn't really sure when he'd started referring to it as that, but it was what Tonya had intended the journal to be for, and its pages didn't hold anything other than his nonsensical scribbling anyway. Some of it though, some of it wasn't bad.

So bring me back to July,
Warm and rich with soft orange skies;
There we could talk about anything we want,
But now we're left—
We're left with winter;
You say not yet,
It's only September…

He'd written 'September' for the month that never seemed to end. For all those days he and Sirius had spent off-kilter. When those had passed and they'd finally talked, he'd looked at it again and decided that it somehow still fit. Remus didn't think they'd ever have another summer like the last, but that just meant that they'd have to try to make the next one even better. If you were to get specific then they'd really only been together for the tail-end of July, but very few things rhymed with fucking 'August' anyway.

Dropping the pencil, he turned back to James' acoustic guitar and began plucking away at the gentle piece he'd been toying with for the last couple of days. It was much easier to write songs on the guitar, the melodies came so much quicker and all it really took was a bit of chord progression to make a decent sounding lick. So far Sirius hadn't caught on to his sudden interest in the new instrument, and he hoped it would stay that way. It'd be nice to get to surprise him on his birthday. There was no way he would be presenting him such a song as sappy as 'September' though.

"Could you please stop with that incessant strumming?" Regulus hissed from the other side of the office.

"I thought you weren't talking to me," Remus said haughtily.

"I'm not, but your poor attempt at a pentatonic scale is making my ears bleed."

"Oh, you mean this?" He strummed the guitar furiously.

"Yes! It's horrid!"

"I'm so sorry, m'lord, shall I find you some ear plugs?"

Regulus scowled bitterly before turning away from him, back to the pile of files they were supposed to be organising for the records department. All it had taken was one grumbled complaint from Remus over the right to child labour for Regulus to tell him to buzz off, but Remus suspected he'd have done as much regardless.

"If you'd actually let me help we'd be out of here a lot quicker, you know," Remus said.

Regulus promptly ignored him, and as punishment he gave another harsh strum. Not even a glance this time.

Unsatisfied, Remus clamped his hands over the strings and huffed. He knew neither of them wanted to be there, and it all felt rather moot anyway. Simply trying to talk to Regulus was impossible. He often wondered if it was his fault—for encouraging the cruel prank they'd played the year before—but Regulus had always been sour. There wasn't anything he could do to change that.

Bored and about ready to fall asleep in his chair, Remus stared up at the clock and watched its hands count down. Absent-mindedly, he began plucking his D string in time with the seconds; dun, dun, dun. Quickly that descended into the opening riff of "Smoke On the Water"; dun-dun-dun! Dun-dun-DUH-dun!

"God—don't you know any real music?" Regulus snapped.

"It was a fucking D chord."

"... 'D' for 'dickhead', I suppose."

Remus' patience was thinning. "Tell me, what constitutes 'real' music, Reg?"

"Something that doesn't sound like you picked it up off your back porch!"

He almost brushed the comment off, but that vicious part of him that was always lying in wait managed to dig itself to the surface. Quickly he tugged the folder of sheet music from his bag, throwing it open on the desk to his right.

“Sorry it’s not ‘courante’,” Remus said snidely, before giving his best rendition of Bach’s "Solfeggiettio". The piece obviously wasn't written for guitar, but he really only knew a couple of the arpeggios anyway, and he only wanted to be stubborn in the first place. It sounded terrible, all clunky and nothing like the sweet serenata he’d caught Regulus playing the year before, but it was enough to shut the other boy up for a little while.

When he’d finished with the parts he knew, Remus looked up. “That ‘real’ enough for you? Or is your witch of mother gonna show up and beat me with a stick until it sounds right?”

It was subtle, perhaps even a trick of the light, but for a second Regulus’ eyes turned glassy. He turned away for the third time, back to his stacks of papers, only this time his usually-nimble fingers slipped and the records scattered across the classroom’s tile floor. He cursed, embarrassed, and Remus let out a sigh as he slowly set the guitar aside and came to join him across the room.

“I don’t need your help,” Regulus rumbled, as Remus began gathering the papers together.

“Yeah well, I actually want to make it to supper on time.”

“I said I don’t need help!” Regulus raised his hand, but Remus saw it coming from a mile away. Before he could bring his palm anywhere close to him, he snatched the other boy’s arm out of the air, holding it tightly as Regulus tried to wrench himself free.

“You were really gonna try and hit me?” Remus breathed in moderate disbelief.

Regulus grunted pitifully. His wrist was thin, like a bird’s.

“Let me go!”

Remus did as he demanded, releasing the fragile wrist and letting Regulus fall back on his butt on the floor. Tired and absolutely finished with the pointless squabble, Remus matched him, sitting back and cradling his knees very casually.

“Okay, you’ve had your chance at a swing, now is this the part where we actually have a civil conversation, or do we need to go a few more rounds?"

Regulus glared back at him, but didn't try anything else. He wasn't stupid, at least.

"Why are you even still here?" He spat.

"Because it's part of our job," Remus shot back.

"Ha, yeah right. I'll bet you're just afraid your crazy girlfriend'll hunt you down the moment you walk outside."

Remus rolled his eyes. "Jillian isn't my girlfriend."

"You should tell her that then. Maybe then it'd get her to stop coming around. She's annoying."

"So are you, you sour sod. Jillian stopped coming around weeks ago, we're just friends now."

"How easy that must be for you. 'Remus Lupin—friend to the masses'."

"You know, this attitude of yours is getting a bit old."

"You know what's getting old? Having to listen to you yammer on."

"As if. You're like if Ms. Pince and Filch had a baby. I never thought I'd feel bad for Barty."

"I feel bad for your face!"

Remus laughed. "Is this the same brain that got you top marks in your year?"

"At least I know what a top mark looks like."

Remus' laughter faded. "At least I've had my first kiss."

"Bragging about being a slag, Lupin? That's new. And here I thought you were frigid."

"Can you even get a stalk-on?"

"Can you? Or is that just a baby carrot you dropped down your trousers?"

“That’s pretty crude, coming from you.”

“Oh, I’m sorry, did I use too many syllables? I’ll try to keep to three or less so as to not confuse your tiny brain.”

“You know what? You’re not as smart as you think you are.”

“And how smart do I think I am?”

“Nice. Now you sound like a real toff.”

“Takes one to know one.”

Remus slapped his hands down on his thighs. “God, you’re incessant!”

“No, just more clever than you!” Regulus hissed back.

“This is about last year, isn’t it? I know it is, because you weren’t nearly as intolerable back then!”

“Oh, because I’ve always wanted to be tolerable for you!”

“It was a prank!” He wailed. “A fucked up prank, I know! But I’ve tried apologising—dozens of times! You just won’t get off my bloody back about it!”

“I don’t want your apologies,” Regulus scoffed. “Eventually everyone’s gonna realise you’re just as slimy as the next chav, and it’ll be them you’ll have to deal with.”

“You sound like Snape.”

“You sound like an idiot.”

Remus shook his head. Lord, how you test me.

“I’m surprised you even care about this,” Regulus kept on; “Everyone knows you’re only agreed to be a prefect because McGonagall made you. Either that or you were out on your arse, isn’t that right?”

“Okay, fine. Tell me then, Reg, why are you a prefect? As far as I can tell you have about as much interest in other people as you do the dust on that windowsill. I mean, do you even like anything? Anything at all?! Or does your apple not fall that far from the Black family tree?”

Regulus’ mouth grew even more pinched and he looked away again, shoulders square and tight like a cornered animal. Remus hated it, but he instantly felt bad.

“Sirius does the same thing, you know,” he started, more softly. “He gets this guilty look when he’s angry—eggs us on until we’re angry too, that way he doesn’t have to feel so bad about yelling. I think it’s just a fear thing. If we’re mad at him it means his guilt is justified and he doesn’t have to kill himself wondering why he felt so awful in the first place.”

Regulus was on his feet in an instant. “Don’t—! Compare. Me. To him.”

“Wasn’t comparing you," Remus replied cuttingly. "Only said that you do the same thing. It’s up to you how you want to take it.”

Regulus scoffed at him again, snatching up the papers from the floor and setting them back in order. “Are you done with your shitty life lessons yet or are you going to make yourself useful and go get the damn secretary?”

“Didn’t realise you were finished.” Remus sighed, pushing himself to his feet. He paused at Regulus’ side, watching him furiously tap papers into neat piles.

All year, a voice rang, you’re going to be dealing with this all year.

“We are sorry for what we did,” he told him quietly, “all of us. If you… If you actually talked to him, he’d tell you that himself.”

“Just go away.”

Remus did. After collecting his bag and the guitar, he left Regulus to his bitter silence and made his way through the Flamel Block feeling frustrated and defeated. He wished he didn’t care so much. A part of it was self-preservation, sure—he was going to have to spend the next several months at Regulus’ brooding side—but the rest felt like a favour to Sirius. Which was stupid because Sirius had never asked him to mend the broken bridges between him and his family in the first place. It was so exhausting that it should’ve cured his insomnia on the spot. The Black brothers were meddlesome and exhausting in their own right too. In a lot of ways they were similar like that. Remus hoped he never had to meet the rest of the unsavoury clan.

As he was rounding another corner, a door clicked open ahead of him and none other than Chastity Bell stepped out. Before she could spot him, Remus slipped behind a display of academic trophies and watched as she glanced around, as though she were making sure she was alone. He felt a little silly; it was after lesson hours, everyone else should've been at study hour. Plus, there was the added fact that the doorway she'd come out of belonged to a supply cupboard.

Apparently satisfied that she was alone, Chastity turned back to the cupboard and picked up a bag. As she did so, Remus got the perfect view of her leaning back into the doorway as if she was talking to someone. Finally she shut it and began promptly straightening out her uniform, adjusting her finger-mussed hair and dabbing at her lipstick before setting off down the hallway away from him.

Oh. Well, that's juicy. Someone else must still be inside. He imagined how it would feel to tell Sirius that his ex was having secret trysts in the janitor's closet and immediately got a little thrill. Remus wasn't a gossip, but who could resist this?

Would it be someone from their year, he wondered, as he laid quietly in wait. There were fewer of them than last year, it being A-Levels, but there were enough eligible Hawkings boys to make it story-worthy. Was it Lance Brady, maybe? Preston Ross? Someone with enough money or prestige to make Chastity look twice, surely. God, he really hoped it wasn't a teacher.

Several agonizingly-long seconds passed and no one had emerged from the closet. Getting impatient, and very aware of the grumbling in the base of his stomach, Remus finally left his hiding spot and strolled down the hall, careful to keep his footsteps quiet. Perhaps he'd been seeing things and the cupboard was empty after all, but then why would Chastity…?

Remus reached for the door handle. A millisecond before he was about to grab hold of it and twist, the door shot open, narrowly missing his nose as he fell back away from it. His eyes shot wide when he realised who it was, and she looked up at him, horrified.

"Marlene?"

"Remus!" Marlene gasped, clutching at the front of her school shirt. "Oh my god—you just about frightened the fucking life out of me! What are you doing here?"

"I think the better question is, what are you doing here?"

Marlene straightened up, clearing her throat a bit as a blush crept up her neck. Her shirt was misbuttoned and untucked from her skirt. and her short, wheat-blonde hair had been mussed like she'd been running her fingers through it.

"It's nothing," she muttered quickly, coming out of the supply cupboard and nearly tripping over a mop bucket. As Remus reached to steady her, she flinched and then sheepishly shut the door before attempting to do up her school tie with nervous fingers. "You didn't happen to see—uhm…"

"Chastity?"

"Y-Yeah! Did you see which way she went? She—er, forgot her study notes!"

"You were studying in a closet?"

Marlene's tie unravelled and they looked at each other for a moment. Remus got chills. All of the colour had drained from her face; she was utterly caught. It was that inevitable waterfall moment, and only he could catch her.

"Marls—"

"Please don't tell anyone."

He wasn't sure why, but Remus baulked. Never before had he thought he'd find himself on the other side of such a dreadful conversation.

"I…"

"It was a mistake," she whimpered, tears lining her lashes. "It didn't—I-I'm not… Chastity's just… oh god."

He could feel her fear like it was his own. She was terrified. Any second now she'd pitch herself off a cliff—Remus had pictured it in his mind more times than he could count.

"It's alright," he said quickly. "I understand. I won't tell anyone."

That was when Marlene really began to cry. She clamped her lips into a thin line and then covered her face with her hands, falling into him so she might sob in the embrace of another. Remus held her, and it was like holding himself. Not healing, just… enough for the moment. They stayed there a while and he counted each second, listening to her sobs.

"I won't tell anyone," he murmured into her hair. "I won't tell. I won't tell. I won't ever tell. I'll… I'll die first."

Marlene pulled away. She wiped her cheeks. Then she smiled at him, faintly.

"You dramatic fool. You can't die, I need you. You're my bestest friend, Remus."

Remus sighed—pure relief.

"Then I'll wash James' football kit. Or I'll tear out my own fingernails, and let Mary play me her mixtapes. Jump into a tank of man-eating sharks. I'll even partner up with Snape for a lab project and pay him a compliment—and I'll actually mean it."

"Will you start going on morning runs with me and Potter?"

"Okay, so there are some limits."

She laughed, sadly, and looked down, wiping beneath her eyes again. "Ugh. I hate crying."

"Me too."

"I look so ugly when I cry. Mum used to say the toilet's the only good place for crying... at least there you can wash your face."

"... Hey, Marls?"

She looked up at him. "Yeah?"

You're pretty, he almost said. Almost.

"You really don't have to worry about me telling anyone 'cause… Sirius and I… we…"

Realisation dawned on her face, and Marlene's entire body fell slack at once, stepping back as though the shock was travelling to every inch of her body. Remus felt a bolt of panic, but before any horrid thoughts could surface in his mind, Marlene opened her mouth.

"Holy shit." She clapped a hand to her forehead, blinking incredulously. "I mean—HOLY SHIT!"

"Shhh!" Remus hissed, grabbing her other wrist. "… I know."

"You and Black?" She whispered harshly, wiping her face once more—tears all but forgotten.

"Yeah."

“Like, for reals?!”

“For reals.”

“Jesus-fucking-christ.” A smile exploded onto her face. “You and—fuck! You know, this actually makes so much sense. I’m just—like, wow. Holy shit...”

His jaw was trembling from nerves, but Remus found that he was smiling too. “I know,” he said sheepishly; “It’s kind of insane.”

Marlene took both of his hands. “For how long?”

“Since summer. Maybe a bit before that, but things were… messy.”

She sighed, and then sniffed again, rubbing at her tear-streaked face. “I can’t believe I didn’t clock the two of you first. You’ve been fighting like a pair of angry hens—I knew something was up! Mary said it was just your usual drama, but I thought… Oh man, this is… just—wow!”

“You can’t tell anyone.”

“I won’t!” Marlene said quickly, locking her lips and throwing away the key. “Never. I… I’m just so glad you told me. Does anyone else know?”

“No one aside from Sirius.” He bit his lip. “And if it’s alright to say, I’m really not sure I’m ready for that. For others to... you know.”

“I get it,” she nodded. “You don’t want them to look at you differently. Neither do I.”

Of course she gets it, Remus thought. They were the same, always had been. They’d been each other’s first time, and now they were each other’s keepers. It felt almost like fate.

“Hey, Marls?” Remus said again. “You’re really, really pretty.”

“Fuck off, ya poof.”

“You are. I’m not just saying it.”

She cupped her cheeks then, embarrassed, and sighed happily. Thank you, she mouthed.

You're welcome, he mouthed back.

She laughed at him then, Marlene, pretty like the sun. Even with eyes rimmed red and snot lining her upper lip, it was the truth. It didn't matter that one day they'd be wrinkly and old, smelling of prunes and maybe even voting Tory over Labour; as long as she was Marlene, Remus would love her forever.

Chapter End Notes

A 'milk float' is a milk delivery truck. 'Lorry' is also a truck. Trish is Scottish and uses some Scottish slang. I am decidedly, not Scottish, so if anyone who is thinks her delivery is somehow over the top, lmk so I might tone it down ^^

Songs are: "Slow Ride", "Save Your Love (For Me)", and "Drive Me Home", all by Foghat. The one after the lake crash is a song I've written for fic purposes (see below).

It's been asked a few times, but just to clarify for those who are curious—every song "written" by a character in this fic is a song that I've written. Unless explicably stated within fic or in the chapter end notes, then I've probably written it. That being said, I am NOT a song writer lmfao. I can't even write poetry (a true bane, to be sure) so if they're lame, I really can't help it askjhfkjdh I had decided early on that I didn't have any desire to 'repurpose' modern songs for this fic because it felt,,, idk,,, outside of the canon I'd built? Maybe I just like making more work for myself... (see you next week xx)

Chapter 76: Communication Breakdown

Chapter Summary

Remus and Marlene grow even closer, while others... unknowingly drift apart.

Chapter Notes

Chapter picks up almost directly after Remus & Marlene's "discovery" the chapter before. Maybe re-read if you're having trouble remembering any of it.
I open the chapter with a Beatles song, but [personally] I love the 1995 Oasis cover even more, haha. Just a rec.

I'm not super confident in this chapter, like maybe I was trying to juggle too many things, but it came down to just posting it and letting it go or going crazy over it for forever, so here it is, meh.

CW: Difficult conversations throughout regarding sexuality and religion. Sex discussed in passing conversation and sexual content toward the end of chapter, though I'd consider it relatively mild. If you're not interested, stop reading at '> > >'.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Everywhere people stare,
Each and ev'ryday;
I can see them laugh at me,
And I hear them say;
Hey, you've got to hide your love away,
Hey, you've got to hide your love away…

- "You've Got to Hide Your Love Away" The Beatles, 1965

Later that evening…

Remus had never known another queer person aside from Sirius, and that had never really counted for much, considering they were both so dense when it came to things such as queer matters. Marlene, on the other hand, seemed to know everything. Within the first few hours of coming out to each other, she'd told Remus all there was to know about gay and lesbian rights within the UK. It got to the point that he was starting to feel stupid. Marlene had clearly done her research, and considered herself a part of those communities, even if no one else knew it. It was harder for Remus—thinking of himself as the same as those who campaigned for their rights. And well... baby steps, he supposed.

“Homosexuality is still technically illegal here in Scotland, but for England and Wales, the age of consent for gay men is twenty-one,” she’d informed him; “Which is complete bollocks too, of course. It’s only sixteen for heterosexual couples. The laws are more murky for lesbians—they always are, it’s the misogyny—but generally there’s still the threat of conviction if you’re caught. I’ve looked into it and Hawkings doesn’t have any rules prohibiting buggery, but they’re bound by Scottish laws, so…”

It was a dreary conversation, one Remus would rather not be having, but a part of him felt blessed. The information burst out Marlene like a geyser. She talked about how sexuality was a ‘spectrum’ and gender was ‘subjective to the majority party’—that was, whoever held the power decided what gender was to be. She had all these theories too, like about how Hollywood was always covering up its stars' 'queerness' and that everyone was at least five percent gay. Remus realised early on that he’d have quelled much of his emotional turmoil had he just come out to her sooner. She knew exactly what he meant the moment he described the sort of attraction he’d felt not only for Sirius, but for other boys and girls as well.

“So you’re bisexual?” She’d asked, simple as that. Remus still had trouble saying the word himself, but he’d nodded timidly and she hadn’t pressed the matter any more.

Afterward they'd made their way toward the Flamel Block, skipping dinner and setting up in their regular spot. Remus enjoyed it, and the familiar place provided a sense of calm amidst such a worrying conversation, but as reluctant as he was to discuss his own sexuality, Marlene seemed to hold no such qualms. They’d talked well into the evening about how Marlene had always known she were gay, but like so many, she’d tried squashing the feelings—the urges—hoping they’d dissipate on their own.

“I honestly thought I could like you,” she’d told him, blue eyes turning glassy again. “You know, the way Mary likes all of her boyfriends, but it never felt quite right. I’m sorry if this hurts your feelings.”

“It doesn’t,” he’d replied. “I liked you, but Sirius was always there, even, I think... when I didn’t understand what that meant."

"And now?"

"It’s always been him, Cherry... But yeah, I still liked you.”

She took his hand and gave it a squeeze. “God, if I could put you in Chastity Bell’s body…”

Remus had laughed then, and then Marlene filled him in on everything to do with her and Chastity. It turned out that the two of them had been innocently paired off together for a class project and because Chastity found it hilarious to tease everyone, she’d waited until they were alone in the library to dare Marlene to kiss her over their textbooks. Apparently she hadn’t been banking on Marlene actually doing it. The little peck had ignited something between the two of them, but no matter how well things went under the covers, they couldn’t help but argue the moment it was over.

“It’ll never turn into anything serious,” Marlene said; “She’s not like… you know. Not really. I don’t even think she’s bisexual, just likes the attention, maybe. Is Sirius like that?”

“No,” Remus said. “He’s queer.”

“But he’s dated so many girls.”

“He’s queer, Cherry.”

Marlene fell quiet a moment, before ultimately nodding in understanding. “Have the two you told anyone else?”

“Not really. There’s one friend back home that knows—Tomny—but that was mostly a mistake.”

“Did he catch you walking straight outta the closet too?”

“No, I sort of kissed him.”

“Oh shit—ballsy!”

Remus shook his head. “No. I told Sirius I loved him for the first time, and then kissed Tomny the same bloody day, like a royal fucking idiot. Completely ruined everything for a while there.”

Marlene grimaced. “I take it Sirius didn't react very well?”

“No, but that’s hardly his fault. We figured it out in the end though. You sorta helped actually.”

She perked up. “I did?”

“That book of yours—the mating ritual one? Helped me figure out that I was… erm… bi…”

“As in, bi… sexual?”

“Yeah, that.”

Marlene giggled faintly. Then she took his hand and kissed it. “Well, I’m honoured.”

“Have you told anyone else?”

“No. I can’t help but imagine myself telling other people though. Like I could say something to the girls, but… nah.”

“You don’t think it would go well?”

“It’s not that. Obviously I know they’d still love me, but it’d be different. And I don’t want everyone to always be thinking about it, you know? I don’t want to miss out on the big moments of their lives just because I wasn’t… like them. I want to walk in their weddings, and be a good aunt to my nephew—and I want to be proud of who I love, but I also want to spend holidays with my family and live in relative peace, and…” She broke off, wiping a single tear from her cheek. “I don’t want to just be ‘Marls the lesbian’.”

Remus nearly shattered. How excruciating it was to hear his own thoughts said aloud.

“I’m the same way. Telling people is…”

“Hard,” she sniffled, sadly. “It’s hard, I know, and maybe it sounds ridiculous, but I sorta used to wish that my family would just figure it out on their own. That way at least they’d have saved me the torture of having to say it myself. But I'm pretty sure they don’t suspect a thing. Perks of living far from home, I guess.”

“And you won’t ever tell them?”

She shook her head. “Truly, I think that would be it for me. It's like, a few years ago there was this guy at our parish… His name was Adam. He helped run the youth ministry. And I—I really only ever saw him at Christmas or during the summers, but I remember he used to be there every time we had church. Never missed a single mass. But then one day, he just… didn't show up."

Remus stared down at his hands. He already knew where her story was going, and he couldn't bring himself to look at her as she told it.

"Everyone was talking about it, of course," Marlene scoffed. "They called him such horrible things. A dirty queer—filthy homo. Said he was going to Hell… but my mum—oh god, my mum, ever the faithful servant—she said that we should pray for Adam! Beg God to forgive him for his sins. And I… Well, I did! I prayed every day. I prayed that he'd get better, as if he were broken, as if he needed to be saved. But then I began to realise how big of a hypocrite I was, so I started praying for myself too and I was terrified. I mean—fuck! I literally tried to 'pray the gay away', can you believe that?"

He could sense her spiralling, and so to save them both, Remus slid across the window bench and gathered Marlene into his shoulder. "Hey, hey," he told her, "I understand. It's alright."

"No, it ain't alright—it's fucking laughable! I just feel so stupid! I still talk to God, but I don't know if He even hears me anymore."

"He does," Remus swore. "He has to. Doesn't God love all of his creations—even the queer ones?"

"That's what they like to tell us, but then they get spiteful when we turn it around on them." Marlene wiped her cheeks. "I love my family, Remus, for whatever they may be. And I love my faith too. I know you don't believe in God, but I love talking to Him. He makes me feel good."

"You don't have to explain yourself to me, Marlene. I love your faith. It inspires me... You inspire me."

She looked up at him, and then pushed the chair from his face, holding him by either cheek. "You're amazing, you are."

He cupped his hands over hers, and let himself breathe. It was peaceful.

"Tell me what it was like for you," he whispered; "To kiss a girl for the first time and really know."

"To 'know'?" She echoed wryly.

“Yeah, I need to know—is Chastity Bell really such a great snog? Have I missed out that badly?”

Marlene laughed, and though it was more like a sigh, Remus was relieved. After she released his face he helped her wipe her tears away, and that Marlene smile shone through. “How’d you know Chastity was the first girl I ever kissed?”

He gasped; "Cherry! So this means you’ve kissed someone else then?”

"Maybe."

"Well? Don't leave us in suspense."

Marlene leaned back against the window, eyes drifting off wistfully. “I never even knew her real name actually, everyone just called her ‘Dee’.”

“How daring. Where’d you meet her?”

“Morocco—over the summer. But she’s actually from London.”

“Shit.”

“I know, small world. But she was volunteering too, and I really just saw her and… mhm…”

“She must’ve been really something, to put you at such a loss for words. What’d she look like?”

“Oh—gorgeous! She wore her hair in locs with these beautiful glass beads and cowrie shells, and... and she had just the best style. She liked music too, knew so much about it. You would’ve liked her.”

“Well, you said she’s from London. Have you tried looking her up?”

Marlene shrugged haplessly. “Dunno, felt a bit weird. She ended up leaving first and we just sorta… said goodbye. Seemed like the end of it.”

“Does this make her the one that got away?” He teased.

“Nah, more like the one I was lucky to find.”

Remus thought that it was a beautiful way to look at it.

“But what about you and Sirius?” Marlene prodded. “I’ve heard your other story—about how you bravely rescued him from his family—but it must've been a hot couple of days before heading over to the Potters, eh?"

Remus swallowed a smirk. "Well…"

He'd never seen Marlene so scandalised. Even afterwards, as she mocked him, she was kind. She never pushed for any detail he wasn't more than willing to give, and always waited patiently so that he could find the right words. That was the best part about Marlene—she never demanded the heavy stuff, but was always strong enough to help you carry it.

It seemed as though they'd run out of night before they'd run out of things to talk about, but eventually they were both struggling not to fall asleep on the window bench. They had to dodge Filch's lorry on their way out, but by the time they were coming up on Rowena house it was the dead of night and the cool air had turned their cheeks pink.

"You're sure I look alright?" Marlene asked, fretting over her swollen eyes. "I don't want them to know I was crying in case they're still awake."

"You look great," he told her. She rolled her eyes (with love) and a second later they'd stopped beneath her bedroom window.

"I'm so grateful for you, Remus. Seems like you're always looking out for me. You're like a gay guardian angel."

"I think you mean, bisexual guardian angel."

"Oh good, so you can say it aloud." She wrapped her arms around his neck, and Remus hugged her back.

"Thank you," Marlene said. "I can't wait to talk to Sirius."

"Me neither," he said, meaning it.

There was a short clattering noise, and they both looked up to find Mary sticking her head out the window, night bonnet and all. "Blithering Christ, do you know what time—oh." She squinted in the dark. "Is that where you've been then—off shagging under the moonlight?"

"Ugh—no!" Marlene scoffed, springing away.

“Mhm, alright. Does this mean the two of you back together then?”

“Marls may have suggested it,” Remus called, “but I’m a simple bloke, and she’s just a bit too high-maintenance for me.”

"Shut up." Marlene pushed him then, and Remus went down on his arse in the damp grass. “We just got caught up talking, now move your fat head outta the way so I can come inside,” she grunted, while climbing onto the electrical box.

Mary sniggered; “Jealous Remus was the only one who got to ‘come inside’?”

A shriek cut across the night as Marlene reached up to tug on Mary’s bonnet and let it smack back into place over her eyes.

“I’m blind! She’s blinded me!” The girl wailed, as she ducked back out of sight. Inside, Remus could just make out the voice of a one, sleep-addled Lily, telling her off for being so dramatic.

“I’m never going to date you again, you know,” Marlene said, pausing with her hands on the edge of the window.

Remus stood up from the grass. “I know.”

“—But I do love you.”

He smiled. “Sleep tight, Cherry.”

She blew him a kiss, and then clambered up inside, shutting the window after her. He had to watch back to Godric alone in the darkness, but Remus didn’t feel the least bit lonely. He was actually entertaining the idea of waking Sirius up and telling him the good news right then, but luckily Sirius was practically a mind-reader.

“There you are!” He called, nearly making Remus jump out of his skin as he passed by the common room archway. Sirius swung himself up from one of the sofas, where he must’ve been waiting, and draped his arms across the back, looking irritated.

“Finally back from prefect duties, I see. Thought my brother had killed you.”

“He wanted to,” Remus said. “Suppose his conscience won out today.”

“What conscience?”

Remus chuckled. The common room was empty apart from the two of them, but he was already feeling daring. He strode straight up to Sirius and grabbed him by the collar of his nightshirt, pulling him in for a much needed kiss. Naturally Sirius reciprocated, and after a few seconds, grabbed hold of Remus' arms and all but hauled him over the sofa back.

"Blimey," he panted, when they'd finally broken apart again. "Not that I'm complaining, but what's brought all this on?"

"I told Marlene about us."

Sirius' mouth dropped open, clearly astonished. "You... You did?"

"I did."

"Holy shit."

"That's exactly what she said when I told her."

Sirius gave him a hopeless smile, as though he still couldn't quite believe it. "You really told someone," he said.

"Yup." Raising a hand, Remus pushed a piece of hair out of Sirius' eyes, stopping to stroke the skin over his eyebrow with the pad of his thumb. "I'm sorry it wasn't James or Peter. It's different with them, you'll—you'll see why, and... I'm still sorta working on this. I swear, I am."

Sirius kissed him again, this time on the mouth, then again across his neck and collarbone. "Don't be stupid, this is good news."

"I thought so too," Remus said, biting his lip over a moan. Sirius had moved upwards and was tracing the shell of his ear with his tongue. He felt every breath, and Sirius' roaming fingers across the front of his chest were doing wonders. "Now at least this way, if we have another fight, you'll have someone to vent to," he mumbled. "Marlene's a—ah! —a pretty good listener..."

Sirius broke away, mouth open to show a single, pink tongue. "You want me to vent to your ex-girlfriend?"

"There have been weirder relationships," Remus said, already chasing his mouth. "Trust me."

They kissed again, and Sirius moaned against Remus' lips; "You're mental."

"Mm… Mental makes art… Right, Black?"

He retaliated with a single strategic bite—directly over Remus' bottom lip, and they were both done for after that. Sirius pulled him down on top of himself, already reaching for Remus' belt. There was a metallic rattle, only distantly heard over the sounds of their kissing, and then a second as Remus began ridding Sirius of his own. It was foolish, he knew; they were right there in the open—anyone could come down during a late-night spell of sleeplessness and catch them directly in the act, but in the moment Remus did not care. It was a fleeting shred of recklessness, otherwise disguised as bravery, and he wanted to feel Sirius upon him everywhere.

"Sometimes I think I've thought you up," Sirius said after. They were fully dressed again, but with a blush still impressed on both their cheeks. "That one day I'll open my eyes and you'll have never existed at all. All the time, I have to check just to see if you're real, else I'll go absolutely insane."

Remus tongued the inside of his cheek. He could've explained to Sirius how mental it was, but he understood better than anyone how it felt to wake up without the person you loved most there beside you. So instead he took one of Sirius' hands in his own and pressed it to the centre of his chest, between the open buttons of his shirt, and just over his heart.

"Real," he said. "Always real."

Sirius splayed his fingers wide, and slowly he raised his gaze from Remus' beating chest to his face. His eyes were so grey—and so, so beautiful.

"Remus Lupin," Sirius said, "you are the sky."

* * *

Wednesday 19th October 1977 – A few days later…

Remus had to hand it to McGonagall, when it came to keeping the dorm kitchenettes stocked, she did not cheap out. There was always tea and biscuits galore for those late-night study sessions, but that evening, the only thing that was getting schooled was their arses in a game of poker. He really didn't know how Lottie did it, but they'd never managed to catch her cheating no matter how many rounds she won. He already owed her three packs of cigarettes for that evening alone, but it'd been a while since they'd all had a night-off together, especially a Wednesday.

"Need any help?" Marlene said, appearing at his side while Remus set to arranging their drinks on his tray.

He glanced at her. "Thought you were gonna head out?"

"Nah. Decided I didn't want to deal with Chastity's bullshit tonight. Rung her dorm and she said pretty much the same for me."

"I still don't get why you continue to see her. You don't even like each other."

She glared at him lightly. "You really don't get it? I thought you'd be the only one to get it—get it?"

Remus puckered, slightly abashed for picking on her. Of course he got it. "But I thought you said she wasn't…"

"I said she wasn't gay," Marlene muttered, "not that I wasn't gonna see her. Now do you need any help or not? 'Cause Lily's going on about binomials and Oxbridge again and I can't take much more exams-talk in flippin' October."

Sighing, Remus put the sugar tin away. "I don't know why she's freaking out so much. She's already sent off like two applications, you'd think she'd have relaxed a bit. Pass me those napkins?"

"You'd think." Marlene passed the paper napkins over as requested. "But what about you? You seem pretty 'relaxed' about all of this. Were your predicted marks just that good?"

"They were fine. Decent."

"Any plans on where you'd like to apply then?"

"Nah. Dad wants me to go for Manchester—that's where he went. But I don't care, he can go top himself."

"So you're really not going to apply anywhere?"

"Hadn't planned on it. You?"

“Maybe a few places…” Marlene replied shyly. “But to be honest, I’m not sure either. I think I’d like to volunteer some more, maybe take a gap year. It’ll give Mum a heart attack, but maybe then I can move out and she’ll finally get off my back a bit.”

“Fucking parents, am I right?”

She laughed, and then because it was Marlene—pushed him, nearly causing Remus to knock over the tray of teacups. “Oh shit,” she snorted, rushing to fix them as Remus also burst into laughter.

“Oi, McKinnon,” Sirius called, appearing through the kitchen doorway. “You best not be coming on to my man.”

“Voice down, Black,” Marlene said, “I was just checking that he didn’t get lost on his way to the fridge.”

Sirius pressed his hands into his pockets, looking amused. “Lottie’s won again, by the way. Hope that’s not why you disappeared, cause I wasn’t done comparing notes.”

Remus cracked a smile. “You suddenly interested in Oxbridge and binomials too, Black?”

“No,” Sirius grinned. “We were talking about shagging, naturally.”

“Ah, yes, naturally.”

“It’s actually so fun though—watch,” Marlene keened, before leaning in to Sirius and nudging him with her elbow. “Hey, Black, have you noticed that silly little face Remus makes right before he—you know? It’s all like—”

“Yeah,” Sirius cut-in, “I always thought it was the sexiest thing though!”

Marlene gasped wickedly. “Are you serious?”

“I’m always Sirius, McKinnon!”

They might have kept going, except Remus had already caught on. “Stop, stop, stop!” He yelped, waving his arms between them like a wall. “What the fuck are you doing?!”

“We told you, Moons, exchanging—”

“When I said that I thought the two of you talking was a good idea, I meant talking about yourselves, not me!"

"That is an entirely unfair thing to ask of us," Marlene blagged, before leaning in and whispering; "After all, we've both sucked your nob."

Remus' mouth dropped open, and as did Sirius'. "You gave him a blowie, McKinnon?" He replied hushedly.

"Once. He lasted like thirty seconds. Made a real mess too."

"OH MY GOD." Remus buried his face in his hands, completely mortified. "Right, that's it." Spinning around, he picked up the tea tray and marched out into the hallway with it.

"Where ya going, Moons?" Sirius called after him.

"To find Chastity and compare your sexual abilities!"

"Kay, but maybe bring her back round here then? We can play spin the bottle and massage each other or something."

"Oh, I would love a foot rub," he heard Marlene cackle.

Leaving his intolerable lovers behind, Remus emerged into the common room, breathing deeply to cull the flush that had surged into his face and neck. He set the tea tray down on the table in front of the rest of his friends, who all perked up happily.

"Cheers, Moons," James said, before picking up his cup and gingerly tasting it to make sure it wasn't overloaded with sugar. Remus took up a spot on his and Lily's other side, across from Lottie, Mary, and Peter, who were lounging on the carpet in-between the coffee table and the fire.

"Anyone for another round?" Lottie said, while counting her winnings, which were mostly made up from rumbled notes, plastic poker chips, and cigarettes. Next to her, Peter shuffled the cards, looking only slightly bitter.

"Sure, but you have to play blindfolded."

"Why?"

"Because you're totally counting cards!"

"One cannot simply learn card-counting overnight," Lottie retorted. "And besides, card-counting should almost be legal anyway. It's just maths. Basic probability."

Peter rolled his eyes, but began dealing again. As he did, Mary reached over the table in a long stretch, batting her eyelashes coyly. "I heard a little rumour today," she said, in that Mary voice of hers. She began eying Remus purposefully, and he knew he was in trouble.

"What sort of rumour was it?" James prodded, busy checking over the cards in his hand.

"A juicy one."

Please, Remus silently begged, Please don't let this be about Marlene. Or any of us. Actually, none of us would be best.

"Go on then, Macdonald," Sirius said, reappearing behind the sofa with Marlene in tow; "Give us a story."

Mary looked at Lottie, who giggled while twirling a blonde ringlet around one finger, clearly in on the joke. "Remus, when were you gonna tell us that you're dating a model?"

Remus choked on his drink. The others began to laugh, but Sirius just leaned over and flicked Remus in the back of the head, looking coy. "Yeah, spit it out, Moons. Where did you possibly find the time to woo such a lush ol' bird?"

"Eugh—give it rest!" Remus moaned, swatting at Sirius with one hand and wiping his mouth with the other. "I fucking hate these rumours."

"Sounds like this fake French fiancée of yours has really taken on a life of her own, Lupin," James said. And it was true. By either Lily's will or Jillian's, everyone seemed to know about 'Farrah' and Remus' whirlwind romance. Talk had spread like wildfire, but at least Sirius didn't seem all that bothered. Yet, anyway.

"I came up with the part about how she kept leaving fake tan on the seat of your father's Cadillac. I mean, the girl has to have some flaws," Mary grinned, exchanging cards with Lily as dealer.

"How about the fact that she finds Remus' morning breath really sexy?" Lottie added.

"I thought the part where he saved her from drowning in the River Seine was pretty good. Especially considering he's never even been to France," Peter said.

Marlene rapped Remus on the shoulder. “Don’t worry, some of us are looking out for me. I’ve been telling everyone she’s got a body and face like Jerry Hall.”

“You’re all viciously enjoying this,” he hissed.

“Well, of course!” Mary conceded. “I haven’t heard something so spicy in ages. It’s delightful.”

“It’s a lie—perpetuated by this one!” He thrust a finger in Lily’s direction. Up until that point she’d been shuffling her cards around innocently, but she tsked when Remus called her on it.

“Me?”

“Yes, you! You solved one problem by creating another!”

“I told you from the beginning,” Lily replied mercilessly, “tell Jillian you aren’t interested and avoid the whole thing. But did you listen to me? Nooo. Well, now you suffer.”

“You’re getting coal for Christmas, Evans, mark my words.”

Sirius cleared his throat, snatching up one of the teacups and sipping from it innocently. “So tell us, Lupin, how does French chatte taste?”

“The joke doesn’t land if no one knows what you’re saying,” Remus snarked.

“Shouldn’t you know? Your fiancée is French, after all. How are you going to baise-la stupide if you can’t even understand the difference between ‘give me more’ and ‘that’s the wrong hole’?”

While everyone else moaned in distaste, Mary amicably leaned in, translating into Remus’ ear. “You’re assuming she’d ever say anything apart from—” he bent down again; “What d’ya say? … Ah—say anything other than, ‘je suis ta petite pute’.”

Sirius spat tea everywhere and Mary howled with laughter. “Slag,” he said to Remus, wiping his mouth.

“Tart.”

Sirius’ eyes glinted devilishly and Remus felt a slight tug just behind his navel. Perhaps he’d be hearing more on the subject in private, but for now he couldn’t be caught tossing knowing smirks back and forth with his best friend turned boyfriend.

“Gonna step out for a smoke,” he said eventually, standing.

“We’ve only just gotten into the game,” Peter pouted, automatically picking up Remus’ cards to give them a once-over.

“Lottie’s already winning anyway.”

“He’s right,” Lottie said, flashing her hand. “Straight flush. Pay up, suckers.”

James slumped back in his chair. “Do you take credit?”

Cigarettes in hand, Remus made his way out onto the front steps of the dorm. The sky had long-since gone dark, but the air wasn’t freezing at least. On his way he passed a few boys heading in for the night and one even stopped him to ask after their history homework.

“Finished it, yeah,” he said. “You can borrow my notes if you want.”

“Cheers, Lupin,” the boy, Ramsey, said. He pat Remus on the shoulder and walked on, and Remus was left feeling oddly satisfied. His younger self would’ve been embarrassed to know that others were coming to him with help on their homework, but there were worse things to be known as than a swot.

“Mind if I join you?”

Remus looked up from his spot on the steps to find Sirius hanging over him.

“You sure you won’t be missed?”

“Of course I will. But the only one who can rival my staggering wit is you, which means I was feeling a bit underwhelmed when you left.”

Remus pat the step next to him. Sirius sat, looking pleased, and accepted a cigarette when offered. “Moony, can I ask you something?”

“Shoot.”

“It’s pretty serious though. Are you sure you’re ready for it?”

Remus raised an eyebrow sceptically. “What’s the question?”

“Are you…” Sirius leaned in very close; “secretly a wizard?”

Remus sighed, and reached into his pocket for his zippo. “You age me every day."

Sirius snorted, and popped the cigarette between his lips as Remus went in to light it for him. "Really though, I'm starting to wonder if you put a spell on me," he mumbled around the filter.

"Sod off."

"For real, it's too easy to like you. Farrah should really watch out."

"You're stupid."

"Mhm. Still, if I'm being honest, I sorta thought I was gonna be the one who'd have to find myself a beard. Figures it's you though. Surprising bastard."

As Sirius exhaled and let the smoke hover up between them, Remus tucked his zippo away and pondered the idea. "What d'ya mean by 'beard'?"

"You know, someone you date to make it look as though you're not queer as a clockwork orange. Like you and McKinnon."

Remus paused, his own cigarette halfway to his lips. "Marlene wasn't a 'beard'… she was my girlfriend."

As if surprised, Sirius pulled fag from his lips. "Actually?"

Remus nodded slowly.

"Oh, I just thought that… oh." Sirius coughed into his elbow. "Ahem —! Right, 'course…"

"Did you forget that I'm—"

"No! Just… having a laugh, s'all. Forget I said anything."

Pursing his lips, Remus began to pick at the filter of his cigarette. "So, uhm… can girls have beards too?"

Sirius laughed—bright and foolhardy—and Remus had to fight to not be offended.

"Oh, Moons, you're really so cute."

"What? It's just a question!" Remus crossed both arms and Sirius nudged him, already grinding his cigarette out on the steps.

“Do you want to skip away for a bit?” He asked.

“What about the others?”

“They’re fine, won’t even notice, I’ll bet.” Sirius grazed his fingers along the top of Remus’ thigh. “It’ll just be us…”

Remus swallowed. “We can’t go upstairs.”

“Obviously. But there are other places. It's only just gotten dark, the astronomy building should be guaranteed free for a while…”

He glanced back at the dorm, its windows turned a golden orange with all of the vibrant life going on inside. Distantly, he could hear laughter. There would probably be questions later if they just disappeared…

“You’re worrying—stop worrying,” Sirius urged; “Look, I got these, even!” He held up a baggy of wrapped spliffs.

“You got those from my drawer,” Remus scoffed.

“Obviously. You’re the best at rolling ‘em.”

“Thief.”

“Prude. C’mon, I’ll do that thing with my tongue you like so much.”

That was certainly convincing enough. Remus popped to his feet. “I hope it involves swallowing it.”

“Guess that depends on what it is I’m swallowing,” Sirius mused, already skipping down the rest of the steps with eager glee. Remus followed, and they’d just made it to the end of the lawn when a voice hollered after them;

“Hold on! Where are you two going now?”

They spun around. James was standing in the dorm’s doorway, arms raised in question.

“Moony left his book in class!” Sirius called back. “But just in case we don’t feel like coming back on time, don’t wait up!”

“I thought we were gonna finish cards and then go over that song again?”

“Tomorrow! We’ll do it tomorrow, swears!”

James dropped his arms. “But it’s almost headcount soon.”

“And I’m sure you can cover for us, o’ prestigious dorm monitor,” Sirius grinned. He nudged Remus again. “Quick. Ándale, Moons—before he catches us.”

They made real haste, scarpering around the side of the lawn and up the road toward the rest of campus.

“You might want to tone it down,” Remus said, once they’d stopped and he’d had time to catch his breath. “At this rate he’s bound to get jealous or something.” Or notice.

“What, Prongs? Nah, he’s cool,” Sirius said, gently toying at Remus’ hand with his pinky. “He knows we’re friends—me and you. It’ll be fine. I’ll make it up to him, you’ll see.’

“If you say so.” Glancing down at Sirius’ wanting hand, Remus took it. It was dark enough now, and the smile it put on Sirius’ face was worth all the risk.

* * *

Friday 28th October 1977

Somehow between classes, band practice, and the frequented snogging sessions, October had flown by. There’d been little time leftover for pranking, which was probably a good thing, since McGonagall had launched what appeared to be a very real investigation into the missing trolley. As the resident prank masters extraordinaire, she’d grilled every Marauder individually on its whereabouts, but not even Peter managed to break. Now, with the headmistress of their back and less than three days until Halloween, the boys of room 4A had plenty on their plate. There was to be a massive party, and if Sirius was to have his way, then they'd be playing not only hosts, but also entertainment. So far none of the teachers seemed to have caught on, and so all that was left was to remain casual and make it through the rest of their lessons for the week. This, of course, was easier said than done, at least where James Potter was concerned.

After spending half the lesson drilling them with notation and endless rounds and canons, Sheila had parked herself in front of the piano and ordered James to sit next to her. There she patiently let her fingers dance up the scale, singing while he stared at her like a dead fish.

"Do-re-mi-fa-so-la-ti-do! Now James, what note did I hit on 'fa'?"

"F."

"And on 'do'?"

"C."

"Good." Sheila pointed to a note on the sheet music on James' music stand. "And what is this note?"

"A… squiggly line."

"Yes, but what does the squiggly line mean?"

"Do... not pass go, do not collect two hundred pounds?"

Remus and Peter broke down in laughter as Sirius spun his chair around backwards and dropped down between James and the piano. "Sheils, you're wasting your time, really. It's his ears that do all the work, not his brain."

"Oi," James scoffed, offended. "I know it's an 'F' because of how it looks in here." He tapped his skull. "That's brain-power! Now you tell me how this squiggly line is supposed to make any more sense."

"It just does!" Peter said.

James crossed his arms, uncharacteristically bitter. "Yeah, well it's stupid."

Sheila pat him on the shoulder comfortingly. "Considering you all have a quiz on musical notation next week, I suggest we keep at it, Mr. Potter, no matter how stupid." With a warning smile, she stood up from the bench and strolled off across the room, to where Debbie McGuire was tripping her way through a concerto piece on her clarinet.

"It almost feels like you're getting 'em wrong on purpose now," Remus said, making James glare at him.

"I'm not! I just don't understand how you can keep it all straight! Quavers, semiquavers, demisemiquavers—it's worse than maths, it's mental!"

"Don't forget the infamous 'demisemihemidemisemiquaver'," Peter snorted.

"The what?! You've gotta be fucking joking me."

"Cool it, Potter. You'll do fine," Sirius said, replacing Sheila on the piano bench. "Just remember your note rhymes, EADGBE— 'every alter-boy deserves God's big erection'."

Peter grimaced horribly. "What's wrong with 'every amateur does get better eventually'?"

"I'm partial to 'every acid dealer gets busted eventually', meself," Remus said.

Seemingly unimpressed, James slumped back in his chair, his '69 Stratocaster still draped across his lap. "What's it matter anyway? We agreed to play rock music, not symphonies."

"Nah, can't think like that," Sirius said, kindly reaching over and balling up James' sheet music, tossing it over his shoulder; "What are 'Kashmir' and 'Achilles Last Stand' if not symphonies?"

"Bloody hard to play, that's what," Peter mumbled, already scribbling repeating music staffs in his notebook to study.

Stretching out his legs, Remus leaned back in his chair and raised his hands up behind his head. "So that means we're practising later, yeah?"

"Hell yeah, gotta be ready for Halloween," Sirius winked. "If we're to put on a real show, that is."

"You mean we're still doing that?" Peter asked, glancing at Remus nervously. Remus did have some sympathy for him. Sirius had been chattering about throwing a Halloween bash for days now, but he wasn't sure when talk had shifted from simply getting drunk to getting drunk and also performing live in front of their classmates. Just like Peter, the idea both thrilled and terrified him. He didn't think he had stage fright, but then again he'd never been on a stage.

"Obviously!" James said, more enthusiastic than before. "We're totally ready! I've never heard a group of amateurs sound so good."

“Only covers though, right?” Remus pressed. James was already nodding, but Sirius sighed.

“Come onnn, I still think we should play some of your songs.”

“No, they’re not ready.”

“You mean you’re not ready.”

“Same difference. Everyone’s gonna be pissed anyway, do you want to be booed off stage?”

Sirius crossed his arms with a haughty expression, but luckily James Potter was to the rescue. “Let Moons off the hook this once,” he said. “He's right, and besides, we don’t want to push him too hard, lest he quit the band before it’s even started. Artists are sensitive like that.”

“Watch it, Potter, or I’ll tell Lily you’ve kept her photo up and kiss it goodnight every time you go to bed,” Remus threatened.

James opened his mouth to reply, but was cut off by a sharp ticking of a metronome. Across the classroom, Sheila began rapping her conductor’s baton along the front of her podium. “Okay class, individual practice is over. Now everyone break out ‘Newcastle March’ and we’ll see how that run-through’s going—and yes, Mr. Potter, that means you too.”

“Have some mercy, Mrs. Buchanan,” James moaned, dragging his music folder out as Peter popped up from his seat and went to sit next to the rest of the percussion students.

“I want to hear my percussion section first,” Sheila instructed, “and a one, and a two.”

Peter kicked the song off, lazily tapping his snare and symbol along to the tempo they’d been practising since the beginning of term. Remus didn’t mind it as much, it was upbeat and loud, but it was far too easy for his friends, who all danced through the chords and beats with more ease than a greased-up seal. They were lucky that Sheila allowed them so much time for solo practice. A more stringent teacher would have driven the group of Marauders up the wall long ago.

When class finished and they all got up with their instrument cases slung over their back, Remus approached his friends. “I asked Sheila and she said the room can be ours during dinner hour. She doesn’t mind if we eat in here, either, but no fizzy drinks. Not after Peter spilt last time."

"Well, if Sirius hadn't honked that trumpet behind me while I was walking up the risers," Peter grumbled.

"Just trying to improve your pitch, Wormtail."

"Oi, Lupin," another kid called, "your girlfriend's here."

Alarmed, Remus spun around to find Marlene waving at him from the doorway.

"Not his girlfriend," Sirius muttered as Remus shut the Fender into its case and crossed the room to meet her.

"Hey, you."

"Hey." Marlene wiped the hair from her face. Her cheeks were pink, but that just might've been the cool breeze they'd woken up to that morning. "Do you have any time before dinner? I just have something I wanted to run by you."

Remus checked his watch. "Yeah, sure, why not? I don't have anything to do in private study anyway."

"Moony!" Sirius was giving him a pointed look. "What's tricks, then?"

"I'm gonna go with Marlene, I think."

Sirius appeared indignant. "But what about that thing we were gonna do?"

" 'What thing'?" James and Peter echoed together, making Sirius cringe.

Remus smiled half-heartedly. He and Sirius had of course made plans to sneak off together, but they could surely do that after supper. "It'll just be for a little while," he reassured him. "Catch you guys back later here for practice. Do something useful, why don't you, and help James study."

"Yeah," James said, "help James study. God knows you're always disappearing lately."

"It's true. We miss you," Peter added.

Sirius rolled his eyes. "Oh, piss off."

“We do!” James declared, hopping up from his chair and wrapping his best friend up in a large bear-hug. “We miss you, Padfoot! Quick—serenade us with your beautiful song!”

“Ugh—get off!” Already busy fighting James off, Sirius spared a moment to raise his fist in Marlene’s direction. “Oi, McKinnon, you keep stealing Lupin away and I’m gonna have to start charging you a renter’s fee!”

Taking Remus by the arm, Marlene poked her tongue out. “Don’t be greedy! You get him the rest of the time!”

Sirius shook his fist at her. “That’s my bassist you’ve got there!”

“ ‘Your bassist’?” James and Peter exclaimed.

They left them there, the idiots, and slipped out of the classroom along with the rest of that morning’s bustling mob. Outside, Remus and Marlene pulled their coats up tighter around their chins and leaned into one another to ward off the chill.

“A few weeks ago I would’ve thought he were just acting jealous,” Marlene mused. “Now I know he is, but not of you—of me. Quite territorial, that boyfriend of yours is.”

Remus fought a blush. “What'd you want to talk about?”

Looking shy, Marlene turned and led him away from the clusters of kids mulling between each school building. They went the long way back to the dorms, around the Scamander Greenhouses and campus gardens, where the paths were made of worn stone and scattered leaves. There Marlene drifted a bit, absently picking the leftover wildflowers that had yet to wilt along the path and collecting them in her palm. Remus watched her, switching the Fender’s case into his other hand and waiting expectantly.

“Cherry…? What is—”

“Nicole asked me to go to the village with her!” She burst.

“Oh… Oh!”

Marlene nodded vigorously. “Yeah!”

“Wow, I…” Remus swallowed his surprise. Nicole and Marlene had been on the football team together for years, but he’d no idea that she was… well, now it seemed almost obvious. “That’s great—Nicole’s great,” he blabbed; “But we don't have our next Craigtyre trip until November..."

“I know. She's offered to sneak out with me tomorrow,” Marlene explained. “Almost feels a bit daring, right? Now I guess I know what it’s like to date Black—not that you weren’t terribly daring too, of course.”

“Thanks for saving my pride.”

She glanced down at the daisy again. “I was hoping to—er… tell her about the hole in the eastern wall if that was okay. I wasn’t sure if you wanted anyone else to know about it, but I’m sure she’d keep it quiet.”

“Don’t matter to me. Ain’t my wall.”

“Well, considering what Sirius calls it…”

“Sirius is an arse.”

“True.” Marlene picked another flower and paused to admire it. “Nicole’s sweet. She’s got cute dimples… pretty hair. We like a lot of the same things too. I think I could actually like her.”

“Really?”

“Yeah. Is that too crazy?”

“Of course it’s not.”

Marlene nodded, like she was trying to convince herself more than anything. “Remus, have you ever gotten that feeling before—the one where you get so excited that you feel dizzy?"

"And it's hard to breathe?"

"Yeah! And you just want to shout and cry at the same time, but all you can do is think about drinking in the very sight of them?”

He grinned. "Have you met Sirius?”

"Ugh. Romantic twat."

Suddenly Remus felt very proud. “Is that how it feels when you're with Nicole?” He asked.

“Mm-hm, I think so! … And I know I shouldn’t get my hopes up or anything, but do you reckon this could be an actual date? Like between Nicole and I?”

“You mean you don’t already know?”

“It’s harder than that!” She insisted. “Girls ask each other out all the time! Doesn’t mean it’s always, like—a romantic thing.”

“Well—er… Marls, no offence, but I wasn’t there when she asked you. Did it sound like a romantic thing?”

“Uhm, yes? … Maybe? Ugh. I just figured that she wouldn’t go to all the effort of asking me to sneak out with her for just a regular hang-out, right? But I dunno… She could’ve just wanted to go to the village. I just thought that since you’re so good with people, maybe you’d know—”

“You do realise that the only girl I’ve ever legitimately dated is you, right? I think that kind of says something.”

“I suppose it does," she laughed, running a nervous hand through her choppy hair. "Honestly, I’m lucky it was you who caught me and Chastity, and not Lily or James or something.”

“Why am I the lucky option?”

“You have less reason to tell people—after all I already know your guilty secret.”

“You do?”

“Yeah, I’ve seen that little face you make when you finish in bed.”

He was relieved and horrified all at once. “There is no ‘face’!”

“Sure there is, it looks like this.” Marlene contorted her face up as though she’d just shut her finger in a closet.

“Ohmygod—don’t ever do that again.”

“I wasn’t finished! You also sort of make this little noise too, like ‘nghnn!’”

“NOOO!” He knocked her in the shin with the Fender’s case. “Shut up! God, all my friends are bullies.”

“Ah, you love us though.” She puckered her lips at him and they kept on down the path.

“Did you ever… finish?”

“With you? Do you want the honest answer?”

“Oh, alright. Fuck me then.”

“Eh, been there, done that.”

She smiled at him, and Remus reached over, plucking one of the flowers from her fingers and reaching up to tuck them behind her ear. “I can’t say if this thing with you and Nicole is a ‘date’, Cherry, but she’d be stupid not to absolutely love you if it is. Not everyone has someone who wants to ‘drink in the very sight of them’.”

Marlene sighed happily and took his hand in hers, pulling it over her shoulder as they continued past the gardens. The leaves crunched under their boots as they walked, a million different autumn colours blurring into one. He could see how happy she was, and without realising it, Remus that contagious happiness overtake him. When they finally circled back for lunch and emerged in the Hawkings dining hall, they met their friends at their regular table, waiting for supper to be served. James and Peter were engrossed in a heated debate on whether or not Arsenal had a chance at the FA Cup that year, while Lily sat on the other end of the table with the girls, debating Lottie over the ethics of dating a man twice her age.

“He’s already got a stable job. I could drop out and move in with him tomorrow if I really wanted to,” Lottie blagged. Lily appeared about ready to throttle her.

While Marlene took a seat next to Mary, Remus stopped at the head of the table and looked around for Sirius, who was mysteriously missing.

“Where’s Padfoot?” He asked the other lads.

“Over there.” Peter jutted a thumb to where Sirius was standing, mixing a cup of tea. Remus made a beeline for him, strutting up from the behind and leaning in.

“Hi.”

“Hey,” Sirius said, turning on him fondly; “Thought you’d be along.

Made you a cuppa, four sugars just how you like it." He raised the mug, and Remus took it and set it back down on the counter.

"Come away with me?" He asked quietly.

Sirius' eyebrows shot upwards. " 'Away with you?' Wow, don't you sound romantic. Has my birthday come early?"

"No…" Remus drawled. "I just suddenly feel very greedy, and I just might want you all to myself."

Sirius tilted his head, like he couldn't believe what he was hearing. "Really?"

"Really, really."

"Are you sure? I already told Prongs we'd sort those Halloween costumes after dinner. Figure out the party."

Remus held his gaze. "Come away with me," he said again.

"Mm... And what, pray tell, will you do with me?"

"Whatever I want."

Remus could tell that Sirius was resisting one of his looks. "We have friends around, Moony," he said teasingly; "people who are counting on us."

"What I want to do with you, I can't do with friends around."

Sirius bit his lip over a silent nod, and Remus knew he'd won. They abandoned their freshly poured teas, and escaped out the back doors, throwing all caution to the wind. Remus was thrilled. For so long now they'd been making silent, frustrated passes at one another and spouting any excuse that would get them even a moment alone together. It was as though each time he talked to Marlene, a new fire was ignited within him—a fire only Sirius could put out. Remus had never prayed to God, so what was the point of repenting? He might as well embrace all of the sin and have his way.

They left the dining hall entirely, going one building over to the science wing. There Sirius pulled him into an empty classroom where they could finally satiate their voracious appetites. They had each other pressed up against one of the front tables within seconds, attached at the lips while their hands roamed up and down. It wasn't as though they'd planned to have it all out with each other right then and there, but these things tended to bottle up when one was hiding every careful glance and fleeting touch from view.

"What's gotten into you lately?" Sirius asked, when their lips parted long enough to get a word out.

"Nothing," Remus panted, cupping his boyfriend's jaw, "just want you."

A grin split Sirius' face. He wrapped his arms around Remus' neck, holding him tightly. "Then have me."

Remus folded. He would have him—right there—the same way he'd had him in the common room. He lifted Sirius up onto one of the lab tables, nearly toppling a tray of beakers and test tubes that had been left out. Sirius didn't even notice. He was too busy kissing a line up Remus' tender throat, finishing at the corner of his mouth where he plunged a kiss in so deep it was as though they were breathing for each other. This was what it was to want someone you shouldn't. To be star-crossed in a plight you could barely explain. Remus couldn't bear it. Every inch of Sirius he had, and yet he still wanted more. He would have it too, he would.

But then the door opened.

Remus had expected—and Sirius had probably hoped—that it would be one of their friends who discovered them first. At least that way they'd be expected to fess up and suffer whatever consequences, but it seemed as though neither of them had counted on being found out by an outsider. Remus saw him first, over Sirius' shoulder. He watched in slow motion as the door opened and the other boy walked inside. It was Corban Yaxley, innocently carrying a stack of textbooks. The worst possible outcome, curated just for them.

In a scramble to separate himself, Remus lost his footing entirely, slipping on the linoleum floor and knocking a tray of beakers to the ground with a thunderous crash. Sirius gaped from his seat on the desktop and Yaxley just about threw the armful of textbooks across the room.

"What are you two bloody doing in here?!" The other boy shrieked, as Remus stressed over the shattered glass.

"None of your business, you bleedin' twat!" Sirius barked back, more harshly than he might've had they not just been caught in such a compromising position.

“Sneaking around like a couple of bloody queers,” Yaxley spat. “Probably just another shitty prank. Why don’t you and your loony boyfriend find someone else to piss on, Black?”

“You don’t know what you’re talking about—now get out of here!” Sirius roared, picking up another beaker and actually throwing it at the wall next to the door. It shattered on impact and Yaxley quickly retreated from the room with his books and another frenzied yelp.

Remus wasn’t able to do anything. It was as though Yaxley’s words had driven ice into his very veins. He stared wide-eyed down at the bits of glass, the image of his warped and ugly reflection leering back at him.

I had to pray for myself, Marlene’s voice echoed. I was terrified.

“It’s okay, it was an accident,” Sirius said urgently, slipping down from the countertop to begin carefully sweeping up the mess with his hands.

I was terrified.

“Moony.” Sirius grabbed him by the shoulder. “I’m gonna fix this.”

But what could Sirius have possibly fixed? Yaxley had seen. He’d seen them. He was probably on his way to tell everyone and their mother right now.

“Wait here,” Sirius told him, then he withdrew his hand and just like that, was gone.

For a while, Remus was just, maybe had even blacked out. When he finally came to he was scooping up the glass with rigid fingers. He’d cut himself—just a little slice across the pad of his thumb.

“Good lord! What’s this?” A voice called. It was Professor Slughorn. He’d strolled into the classroom and yelped when glass began crunching beneath his oxfords next to the doorway. “Is that you, Lumby?”

Remus stood, the tray of broken glass in hand. “Was an accident…” he mumbled.

“An accident?” Slughorn spluttered. “Well now, you’re not even supposed to be in here, are you?"

When Remus didn't answer, Slughorn dabbed his forehead with a handkerchief and then handed him a broom from the corner cupboard. "I trust you'll be able to clean up after yourself. Honestly, Lumby, I do hope Professor McGonagall hasn't made a mistake making you a prefect."

The professor left him, and Remus leaned his head against the tip of the broom. Perhaps McGonagall had overestimated him. It would not be the first time.

By the time he was outside again, Remus couldn't not remember sweeping up the rest of the glass. He considered briefly returning to the scene of the crime to check, but he was interrupted.

"You alright, Remington?" Trish asked. She'd emerged from the science building behind him, tapping a book against one shoulder casually. "You look like ye've seen a ghost."

Remus shook his head. "Did you—I mean, have you seen Sirius?"

"Ye mean bigger Black? Na. What, you looking tae batter him? Don't tell me he nicked your girl? I heard about that by the way—wicked funny. Can you even steal someone who's not real? I mean I know you blokes can be desperate, but fighting over an imaginary girlfriend? That's a right laugh."

She giggled just as she said she would, and before he could stop himself, Remus' temper boiled over.

"Can't you say five words without insulting someone first?" He growled. "Is this why you don't have any friends?!"

Trish stepped away immediately. The harsh scolding had evaporated her usual grin, and she looked suddenly very small. "Wow. Didnae mean to offend ye so bad."

Fuck. Remus huffed, hands clenched at his sides. "I'm—"

"Don't bother," she murmured. Then she spun around and she was gone, back the way she'd come. Remus felt like an instant idiot. He didn't like being unkind, it was just Yaxley and Sirius and Marlene and everyone else all at once! … Goddammit.

"Where'd you piss off to then?" James asked, when Remus drifted blindly back into the dining room. He realised then that Sirius had told him to wait, but the walls of the science classroom had begun to close in, and now the dining hall was doing the same. It was like he was suffocating.

“Fag break,” Sirius said, unceremoniously appearing behind him. Remus just about jumped again, and Sirius muttered a quick apology before leaning in.

“I need to talk to you.”

Remus’ stomach plummeted. This was it, it was all over. Yaxley had seen and was probably on his way to tell everyone and their mother as they spoke. Remus felt like a colossal idiot—all that work just for one measly bout of snogging in an empty classroom? Oh why couldn’t he have just waited?

“Gonna take Moony to the nurse,” Sirius told their friends. A lie.

“Not feeling well, Moony?” Peter called. “You do look a bit pale.”

“Is it a fever?” Lily asked. Remus couldn’t reply fast enough, too stuck on the concern in their eyes.

Don’t look at me. Don’t look at me.

James was already standing up from the table, bag in hand. “I’ll come,” he said. “See if we can get the tosser feeling fit again.”

Sirius shook his head. “Nah, don’t worry yourself, Potter. I got it.”

“But if Moony’s sick then—”

“I said I got it!”

The look James gave Sirius was more than offended, it was pure hurt. All the rest of them shared a glance, even the girls, but Remus couldn’t take it either.

Don’t look at me!

“Whatever you say, Black,” James huffed, dropping his bag back down on the seat. Sirius held his best friend’s gaze a moment longer, but in the end he just turned Remus around and ushered him out of the cafeteria.

“I’m alright,” Remus said, when they’d made it back outside. The sun was setting now, turning the sky a deep blue like a thunderstorm. Sirius didn't reply, only clutched more tightly onto his arm. Was he just expecting him to lose it right there? Maybe.

"Sirius," he repeated dumbly, "I'm alright. I don't need the nurse."

"I know," Sirius ground out; "Fuck off while I try to keep it together some, will you?"

Oh. Remus swallowed thickly. Why didn't it occur to him that Sirius could also be upset? Scared, even? Idiot.

They didn't talk after that, not until they'd made it back to Godric and the door was shut tightly behind them. For a moment Remus was at a loss; he didn't know what to do, or whether he should touch Sirius or not. But thankfully, Sirius made the decision for him. He came up from behind, wrapping his arms around Remus and burying his face in his back.

"He didn't see anything," Sirius breathed; "Yaxley didn't see."

Remus almost came apart from relief. He spun around, forcing Sirius' arms off of him just long enough to hug him back. "I'm sorry," he whimpered. "It was my fault, I got reckless."

"It's not your fault," Sirius sniffed, pulling his face away from Remus' shoulder. "It's just fucked—all of it. I hate this. I hate hiding."

"I know… I know you're unhappy."

Then, Sirius looked at him. His eyes were stormy. Upset.

"Unhappy?" He echoed. "When did I ever say I was unhappy?"

"You didn't have to. I know it's hard—being with me and not telling anyone."

"Well, shit, yeah. But how could you think that—" Sirius drew up short. "You insensitive bastard. You think I wanted this? You think I was waiting for the day we'd get caught?"

Remus' lips parted in shock, then; "N-No!"

"Liar. You've been thinking it all this time, haven't you?"

"No, I haven't! I just thought I fucked us over—that it was all my fault. I know it's important to you that we acknowledge each other, and that not telling our friends is the exact opposite of that. But I… I can't. It's different with Marlene, and two months is just too short… I'm sorry, Sirius."

Sirius softened then, and began smoothing the wrinkles out of Remus' shirt as though he couldn't think of anything else to do. "I don't always want you feeling sorry, you stupid twat. And I'm not delusional either. I was scared too, Moony. You think I haven't dealt with this same shit before?"

Remus set his jaw. "You mean Miles."

"I'm not comparing you to him," Sirius said quickly. "But I know when I've fucked up too. And there's no way I could possibly want some dickhead like Corban Yaxley knowing our business."

"But you want other people to know."

"I want our people to know. And I want them to know when we decide to tell them—you and me. I know I fucked up before, pushing you, but I just think you've built up this idea of me in your head, Moons. That I'm some super-queer who can handle everyone knowing, when I'm not. I was scared today, you know. Fucking terrified, actually. But that didn't mean I was going to run from you."

"Me neither," Remus murmured. "Never from you. I just... I'm not as tough as you are."

Sirius sighed heavily. "I'm not tough."

"You are."

"No, I'm not... And I don't need you to come out for me either."

"You… You don't?"

"No, I don't. I… I did wrong by you—trying to force it. I gave you an ultimatum without hearing you out first. But I don't want to lose you, so I think it's enough just to have you like this."

Remus could not believe his ears. For so long he'd thought the only thing Sirius wanted was to come out, and now…

"What about James? The others?"

Sirius pressed his lips together, looking anywhere but at Remus. Finally he turned back to his bed and sagged down onto its edge, head in his hands.

“Alphard was queer, you know. It’s why he was kicked out of the family.”

“… oh. I... didn't know.”

“Obviously... but I can still remember the day it happened. He used to come to every family gathering alone—never had a girlfriend, always refused to take a wife. There were rumours of course, but the family was able to cull them for the most part. Then one day, on my dad’s birthday, he brought a ‘friend’ with him. His name was Elton, and Elton was queer—everyone could see it. He wore a velvet suit with a giant flower in his lapel and called everyone 'darling'. I didn’t really connect the dots until after Alphard died, but I remember after the funeral, Elton came to the house to pass along a few things and Mum spat at his feet.”

Sirius looked up at him finally, and took a long, shaky breath.

“If my grandfather hadn’t already died and named Alphard his successor, then Uncle Al would’ve lost everything. So you see, Moons, I get it. I know it’s hard, and I’m over it. Truly. All I need is you by my side. You. Just, Remus Lupin—full stop."

"It's the same for me," Remus swore. "Just you."

Just Sirius, Sirius, Sirius.

"Good," Sirius nodded. "Then it doesn’t matter, ‘cause I’m happy either way. And I’ll allow others to go on thinking that you’re just biding your time until Christmas, when you can see your beloved ‘Farrah’ and make furious heterosexual love to her. But in the meantime, I want you all to myself, no matter what Potter’s got to say about it.”

Remus tried for a meek smile; “I only get a pass for an imaginary fiancée, huh?”

“I know, I’m so generous. What can I say?” Sirius licked his lips. "C'mere."

He pulled Remus down towards himself, and the moment they were eye to eye, they were kissing. It was easier like this. The words 'kiss and make up' had never truly meant something before them. It was easier just to hold each other and whisper their comforts back and forth in the dark. Remus loved Sirius for all his vibrancy, but he knew his touch and taste when that eventually faded and all they were left with was the understanding that life was hard, and the only people in their corner were themselves.

“So what are we gonna say to the others?” Remus asked after, once they’d had time to dry their eyes and kiss each other silly.

“We’ll tell them you weren’t feeling well, just like we said.”

“And James? He seemed upset. I know he's noticed something's up.”

“So I’ll come up with another excuse to get him off my back,” Sirius shrugged. “Always do. We can tell him I’m failing some class, or that you’re failing and I’m tutoring you.”

“Neither of us would fail a class.”

“Okay, stingy. Then I’ll tell him you’re helping me work through some stuff—or me, you. Anything.”

“If you’re sure…”

Sirius nodded very firmly. “I’m certain. It’s Prongs—he’ll understand. Trust me.”

Remus wanted to believe him, but as good, and kind, and genuine as James Potter was, there was always a limit.

Their friends returned later on, each of them sporting a dour look. Peter was normal enough, but James did not say anything to either of them for several minutes, and when Sirius began providing his excuses, just as he’d said he would, it became very clear that James wasn’t about to let them get away with it again.

“No, I do not understand!” He growled. “You two have been fucking off for a while now, and it's time Pete and I got the truth! Now what’s going on—is it something to do with your parents?”

Sirius gave a great groan. “UGH! Come off it, Potter! I already told you, it’s nothing to worry about!”

James began to sputter; “What— How?! Nothing to worry about—are you fucking joking me? It’s like you’ve gone off the handle, Black! I don’t even know who you are anymore! You and Moony!”

“Leave Moony out of this!”

“How could I? I barely see him anymore! He’s always off with you doing—” Suddenly James surged toward the bed, grabbing Sirius’ coat and shoving one hand into his pocket. “A-HA!” He declared, waving Sirius’ cigarettes around in the air. “This is all you do now! Sneak around with Moony and smoke fucking fags until the cows come home! At this rate you’re gonna sound like a busted hoover by the time you’re twenty-five!”

Sirius snatched the cigarettes back viciously. “At least I won’t sound like a whinging hose-bag!”

“Hose-bag?! I’m just trying to be present in your life! I want to help or —or listen, whatever you need!”

“Alright, then listen to this—I don’t need a bloody babysitter!”

“Do you two really have to argue in our bedroom?” Peter groaned. “Isn’t there someplace else you can have this out? Moony has a fever and I’m trying to—”

“ ‘SHUT UP, PETE’!” Both boys yelled.

“God,” Peter grumbled, turning back to Remus on his bed. “I hate it when those two fight. It’s like spitting at your own reflection.”

Across from him, Remus pinched the bridge of his nose. He’d never even seen the pair of best friends yell at each other so maliciously. Sure, James and Sirius had had the occasional spat or two, they were only human—but fighting? Unheard of. It was more like, if Remus and Sirius were ever Remus and Sirius, then those two were JamesandSirius. It was why the Potters were perhaps the only adults Sirius had entirely trusted—they were, for all intents and purposes, an extension of James himself. And there was no one Sirius trusted more than James. Perhaps it was why it had hurt James so much when Sirius had stopped telling him everything.

“You’ve checked out,” he pushed further; “It’s like you don’t even want to be here anymore. You just want to fuck off and not talk to anyone. The only time we can get your attention is at bloody practice, and even then it’s like your brain’s on the fucking moon! Why don’t you come back to earth for a little bit and sit with us normal folk!”

The word ‘normal’ had struck a tender chord with Remus, and he could tell from Sirius’ reaction that it’d done the same for him. “You’re mental,” he snarled. “Me and Moony have just been hanging out like always. You and Wormtail have girlfriends, maybe you’ve just been spending too much time with them and haven't noticed!"

"That's bullshit and you know it!"

"Yeah? Maybe it is! And maybe —just maybe —there are some things that I don't feel like talking about! Why don't you try worrying about your own bloody business for once, Potter?"

"You are my business! You're my best friend!"

"Maybe I shouldn't be!"

James started, brown eyes turning to saucers behind his glasses. "Well —Well, fine then!"

"Fine!"

Looking more affronted than Remus had ever seen him, James turned to Peter and grabbed him by the arm. "Come on, Pete. I think it's time we leave, since we're clearly not wanted here!"

"What'd I do? It's almost curfew!" Peter tried to moan, but James had already dragged him from his bed to the door, which he slammed after himself.

"About time! Could use a bloody breather!" Sirius shouted. He threw a pillow at the door, but that was hardly enough. Looking about ready to implode, Sirius spun around and kicked the hutch at the end of James' bed hard. An immediate regret.

"FUCK!" He wailed, holding his foot.

Remus hurried up behind him. "Are you alright?"

"That bastard!" Sirius grunted, waving Remus off. "Who does he think he is? Acting like he's owed the skeleton key to my entire bloody life. I'm glad he's gone off—good riddance!"

"You can't actually mean that, Sirius."

"Sure I do. If he wants to act like a massive arsehole then he can do it as someone else's best friend."

Remus sighed. "Look, it's been a shit day. I think we just all need to calm down a bit."

"You calm down. I need a fucking cigarette." Storming over to his bedside hutch, Sirius threw open a drawer and began rifling through it. Thinking it better to just let him have his fit, Remus wandered over to the hutch himself and leaned over it to open the window.

“I just don’t know where he gets off acting like that,” Sirius continued, holding a lit cigarette between two fingers. He pushed the stereo aside, until it was teetering precariously over one edge, and raised himself up onto the hutch so he and Remus were eye to eye.

“He just doesn’t understand,” Remus said. It's not his fault.

“He looks down on me. He thinks I’m broken—that my family shattered everything, and now he’s the doll mender who’s come along to fix me.”

“No, Sirius. Don’t think like that.”

“Well, I can’t help it, can I?” Sirius snapped. “Everything's that’s happened and I still can’t even begin to scratch the surface of all the fucking bullshit! If he knew about us, then he’d ask about everything else and I don’t know if I want him to know! As far as he and Wormtail are concerned, I was just shipped off the summer and disowned, but there’s more isn’t there?! And I’m not— I’m not just gonna tell him about us so he can feel better!”

“Hey.” Putting his hands on either side of Sirius, Remus leaned in until their foreheads were pressed together. “I hear you. I’m here.”

Sirius exhaled, then nuzzled Remus softly. “It’s just shit,” he breathed, turning away to tap the cigarette ash out on the windowsill. “His family took me in, and now I, what—have to feel obligated to tell him everything? It’s like, I’m grateful—I am —but this ain’t like telling him my mum’s the mental one. That's different. This time, it’s something wrong with me.”

“Nothing,” Remus swore; “is wrong with you. Didn’t you hear yourself before? We’re just figuring it out, that’s all! And James doesn’t know a thing, so… don’t blame him for being ignorant. He can’t help it this time.”

“And here I thought I was going to be the sensible one today.”

“I think you’ll find I can be sensibly-unsensible at all times, Sirius Black.”

A smile flickered at the corner of Sirius’ mouth and little by little,

Remus could sense his anger crumbling away. He went to draw his hand back inside—to put the cig out or take a drag—but knocked his wrist on the edge of the window, fumbling and dropping it into empty air. Sighing after the wasted cigarette, Sirius turned back to him and gave him a long look.

“Don’t worry,” Remus said, trying for a smile. “I think it’s time we cut back anyway.”

Sirius glowered. “Fuck off,” he said, then he cupped Remus round the jaw and pressed their mouths together.

> > >

Remus melted. He knew instantly that this wouldn’t be the kind of kiss that filled him with butterflies—it would be the sort that left him bruised and raw, like a stone fresh from the fire. It went like their make-up kisses often went, furious and raced, as though they were two drivers grappling for the wheel. Sirius would pull him this way, but Remus would lean the other, each of them pushing the boundaries and testing to see what would make the other burn up fastest. He had no idea how long they had before the others returned, but that was nothing new. All Remus knew was that he wanted Sirius, and it was enough.

Pulling Sirius from the hutch, Remus turned them around and dropped him on the bed, clambering over top as Sirius grabbed hold of his neck and drew them back together. There was usually a process to their hookups, but this time all bets were off. Sirius’ trousers came off first, then Remus’ belt and shirt, revealing the chain necklace he’d worn since the day Sirius had given it to him. It had tarnished a bit since then, and had almost broken by clinging fingers on more than one occasion, but he refused to part with it nor the cheap pick dangling from its end. It felt like a culmination of them, patched together strangely but fitting none-the-less.

Remus pushed Sirius back into his pillows, squeezing him over his ribs and drawing his hands down to the narrow divots of his waist as he slid up between his thighs, trailing kisses along the sensitive skin there. Sirius—never one to be shy—knotted his fingers in the already mussed curls on the top of Remus’ head and pulled him in close, a shuddered breath already tracing his pouty mouth. So much of being together felt confusing, unsure, but this—this he could do. It was the easiest thing in existence, being with him and forgetting for a moment that they were not the only two people in the entire world.

When he'd run out of thigh to kiss, Remus moved to the other, moving his lips along until Sirius was trembling and practically cursing his name. Then he reached his middle, blew a cheeky breeze across his last kiss, and took Sirius in his hand, matching all the rest with a welcoming swallow of Sirius' heat.

"Oh Moony," Sirius moaned, pausing to clamp his teeth down over his lip, "fuck."

Remus could have bottled the sound. He pressed deeper, keenly aware that the stereo had stopped somewhere between then and the hutch, and the only echo was that of Sirius' voice—perfect pitch even as he came unravelled in his hands.

Remus had already learned to read the clues. Sirius pulled tighter on his hair every time he found that rhythm that drove him the most insane. His thighs twitched in anticipation when he lost it and shuddered when he found it again. He pulled up and down when he needed it deeper and tightened his grip when faster was the answer, and Remus, who needed all of it, was more than happy to yield. He squeezed each pale thigh with his forearms, leaving fingerprints that would be bruises by the time they were reaching for each other again. They were that burning stone—so on fire he could smell it.

Actually smell it. Something was burning.

And it wasn't the ashtray.

Remus pulled back, making Sirius drop his head back into the pillows with a frustrated whine.

"Do you smell that?" He asked.

"No!"

Sirius pulled his hair tightly, making Remus wince, but he definitely smelt something. He glanced up, scanning the room. "Something's burning."

"Burning?! If you try telling me that you're having a stroke to get out of finishing, I might actually kill you."

He looked up—at the stereo, half afraid one of the cords had short-circuited—and that's when he spotted the smoke, outside.

"Sirius!" Remus chirped, launching up from the bed and leaning over the bush. Thick grey smoke was wafting up from the ground, flooding into their dorm room and leaving him coughing. The bushes lining the dorm's exterior below had definitely caught fire, licking soot up Godric's brick wall—the interruption of the century.

"Fuck! Close the window!" Sirius cried, leaping up next to them as they hurried to shove the window pane down, both in equal states of undress.

"You don't think…" Remus started, eyeing the ashtray as they bent over the hutch.

"Nah…" Sirius scoffed, before exchanging a glance.

Inexplicably, Remus started to snicker, egged on by the clouds of smoke that floated up outside the window. "You are a true agent of chaos, Sirius Black."

Sirius tipped his head back and laughed, bold and beautiful. "Good thing I have you to bail me out every time, Remus Lupin," he told him, leaning forward and pressing a finger into Remus' mouth. Remus sucked it, before biting down with a single suggestive look, and Sirius grabbed him by the face again, pulling them together and back onto the bed. Remus let him, settling back down between the covers and reaching for Sirius' warmth.

Surely arson could spare a few more minutes.

Chapter End Notes

> Canonically Alphard died when Sirius was around seventeen, but for my story purposes he died much earlier.
>
> Obviously I know our boys aren't doing too well on the communication front, but things are messy. On the bright side, next chapter is Halloween, 1977! See you then xx

Chapter 77: Halloween, 1977

Chapter Summary

Halloween, in which James and Sirius work through some issues, Remus hooks up with a ghost, the girls play the long-game, and Peter looks for his missing eyebrow.

Chapter Notes

CW: 'F' slur used in smoking context, mild sexual content (mostly snogging, but skip past "> > >" to "< < <" if anything more makes you uncomfy.)

I was directed to this beautiful fan-art on tumblr by user @green-lights-33 and I felt the need to share :') greenlights, please message me if you want the link taken down!

And just a note for becca,,, it's not a toilet this time, babes xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I drank the potion she offered me,
I found myself on the floor;
Then I looked in those big green eyes,
And I wondered what I'd came there for;

She's just a devil woman,
With evil on her mind;
Beware the devil woman,
She's gonna get you!

- "Devil Woman" Cliff Richard, 1976

Monday 31st October 1977

Despite earlier plans and agreed-upon festivities, Halloween was looking to be a rather drab affair where the Marauders were concerned. It didn't really matter that the girls had all but made them take a blood oath that there would be no tricks or traps that year; Sirius and James were still not on talking terms, and without JamesandSirius there was little to be done in the way of pranking. For the first time since that summer, Remus found himself as their go between, tip-toeing around James and all but pretending that he didn't exist in front of Sirius. In comparison, Peter got off easy. He'd managed to declare himself Switzerland, which was just Peter for 'I'm with James'. Sirius didn't seem to care—he had Remus, and their relationship was much more intimate and therefore worth much more, even if no one else knew it. James and Peter might have known one another since they were in nappies, but they'd never discussed the historical discourse that existed between mods and rockers while lying arse-naked in bed with the Doors playing in the background.

"You'd totally be a mod," Sirius said, a cigarette hanging out of the corner of his mouth.

"I would not!"

"You would! I'd be a rocker, and you'd be a mod. And every night I'd ride my motorbike over to your house and kiss you under the cover of darkness, out of sight from all your mod-mates, lest they find out and gut me."

"A regular Romeo and Juliet, I see."

Sirius grinned, and then leaned over to kiss him for real. "There. Now you're catching on."

As wonderful as it was to have Sirius all to himself, Remus was worried. He tried imagining how James might have reacted if Sirius had told him the truth about their relationship; would he be relieved? More hurt that they hadn't trusted him in the first place? Or would he be disgusted? Not even Sirius had the answer. It was the same reason he'd never told anyone about Miles.

It's not what he'll say. It's what he won't say.

Remus carried the thought with him everywhere. It was almost gratifying to finally put words to the fear he'd been experiencing ever since that man had glared at him in the bookshop, but he couldn't say them aloud either, so what was the point?

Sirius never brought up the Potters again, nor whatever it was that he seemed to think he 'owed' to James. It seemed to become an out-of-sight, out-of-mind sort of thing; if he didn't talk about it, then he could avoid thinking about it, and if he didn't think about it, then it didn't exist. Remus never had it that easy, but he knew Sirius was hurting.

“We should start looking at flats soon,” he’d said, when they’d vacated the dorm long enough for James and Peter to have a turn. “I’ll be eighteen soon. That’s old enough to rent. We’ll just get a place on our own. Anywhere you want.”

“How about East Finchley?” Remus suggested. Sirius had glared at him, then looked away.

“Can’t go back there. He lives there.”

“You know that this fight isn’t going to last forever, right? Eventually you’re going to get tired of all this and be best friends again.”

“Oh yeah? Try me. I’ve the memory of an elephant.”

“And the stubbornness of a mule.”

Sirius didn’t seem to find this analogy entirely disagreeable, but he’d refused to talk on the subject of James for the rest of the day. Remus knew what it was that he was seeing—an overbearing friend who thought of him for only his faults and weaknesses—but that was not what Remus saw. The reality was that James Potter was jealous, and jealousy to him was probably a very new thing. Since he was eight years-old, James had only ever had Sirius at his side. He had the bestest best friend anyone could ask for so why bother with something as redundant as envy? It’d been easy to assume, what with his generally happy childhood, that he was without faults entirely, but that was simply not true. For all intents and purposes, James Potter had everything, and when one was used to having everything, losing even a bit of it tended to feel catastrophic.

The spat made living within the same five by five space much harder than usual. Any time all four of them were in the same place the air began to feel distinctly stifling, but James had made it a mission to spend as little time around Sirius as possible. He accompanied Lily to the library in the mornings, and made sure to sit at a different table for every meal. At night he camped in the girls’ room, which came as an initial shock to everyone.

"The lengths you two will go to avoid apologising, honestly," Lily huffed, when they'd all met for that Sunday's mass.

"I don't owe him anything," Sirius scoffed.

"Oh yeah, nothing at all! Not like I was your best friend or anything," James sneered. "Guess that's what I get for being concerned."

"Try being concerned for yourself for once!"

"A fool gives full vent to his spirit, but a wise man quietly holds it back," Marlene ground out, with heavy bags beneath her eyes. "Proverbs, chapter twenty-nine, verse eleven."

"Hear that, Potter? That's bible-thumper for get a life."

"Hey Marlene, got any quotes about being a massive twat?"

On the bright side, James' abdication of their bedroom and all things Sirius Black meant that Remus got his boyfriend's full and undivided attention. With one less roommate to worry about, the two of them had even more opportunities to do the unthinkable in the comfort of their own beds. They spent the weekend sleeping in and during the afternoons when Peter was off with Moira, they had each other. Again and again. When James ditched them to camp out in the girls' room for the third night in a row, Sirius had snuck over and slipped in behind Remus' curtains with him, where he stayed for most of the night. Remus wasn't worried, Peter was a heavy enough sleeper.

"You have to take him back," Marlene said, come Monday morning. It was finally Halloween and McGonagall had cancelled the following day's lessons to allow them to recover from whatever hijinks they were bound to get up to come nightfall. That year, it was Godric hosting the party, and even without its two most infamous pranksters out on the prowl, things were bound to get messy.

"It's been awful," Marlene continued, busy untangling the paper streamers they'd nicked from the art room. "He snores and Lily refuses to stick her fingers up his nose to get him to shut up. Next time I'm just gonna suffocate him with a pillow."

"James is nothing," Remus said, untangling the other end; "You should hear Peter."

"Yeah, well my snoring's still better than hearing you moan and whinge all night," Peter scoffed from behind the couch, where he was painting a life-sized Headless Horseman across a paper banner. "You actually sound as though you're in pain sometimes. Like someone's choking you in your sleep."

With a sputter, Sirius released one of the balloons he was blowing up and it zoomed across the room, smacking into the common room's grandfather clock with a great thwack! Two couches over, several ninth year boys they'd recruited to help tittered and let go of their own balloons, creating a whizzing flurry of colourful rubber. Watching, Remus couldn't help but grimace. Perhaps Peter wasn't such a heavy sleeper after all.

On their other side, Mary uncapped a metal thermos and poured a suspicious amount of clear liquid into the jar of mixer she was currently concocting. Lottie was next to her, furiously stuffing orange slices into a jug of her own. It appeared to be some sort of cider, but judging from the vodka to juice ratio, they were all in for it.

"Remus' sleep-moaning aside," Mary began; "You guys have got your costumes all sorted for tonight, yes?"

Remus nodded. "Think so."

"You still doing The Beatles?" Marlene asked.

At that, Remus deferred to Sirius, who was stubbornly stretching out a fresh balloon. "Of course, you think we slaved over those 'Sergeant Pepper' costumes for nothing?"

"You got the sewing club to make those," Peter pointed out, "and they still look like one of my mum's nighties."

"Stuff it, Wormtail, you're wearing the dress."

Peter shrugged and popped to his feet with the freshly painted banner in hand. "Whatever. I get to be Ringo."

"I think they're going to look pretty great on stage," Lottie complimented, tossing an orange rind forward and succeeding in getting it down the back of Peter's shirt. The 'stage' in question was really more of a roped off corner of the common room, which they'd cleared out to allow space for their instruments. It'd certainly been an onerous task to lug Peter's drum kit all the way from the Bellchant building, but as Remus glanced at the little set up, complete with amps and all, he felt a bit giddy. They'd all agreed upon sticking to cover songs, too nervous to play anything of their own creation, but they'd already spent weeks practising. It was bound to be great, so long as James and Sirius got their shit together long enough to slog through a single song.

As if on cue, James and Lily strode into the common room, carrying a box of extra decorations between them. Lily was already wearing her Wonder Woman costume, but had added a pair of trackie bottoms underneath to keep warm.

"It looks fantastic in here!" She cheered, as she and James set the box down next to one of the sofas.

"It was all Marlene," Peter called. "She's been bossing us around for hours."

Marlene raised her arms; "Your guys' idea of decorating is slapping a few streamers on the wall and calling it a day. Someone had to step in."

“Still, you guys really did do a great job,” James commended, stopping to admire the streamers she and Remus were currently hanging over the doorway.

“Yeah, no thanks to you,” Sirius quipped, appearing through archway with a stereo speaker in both hands.

“We brought your fake spiders, didn’t we?” James scowled after him. "Bloody had to dig for them in that theatre room."

"Yeah, and it only took you an entire hour."

"For your information—there was also an emergency dorm monitor meeting... Apparently McGonagall thinks we’re planning something.”

“Well, she’s right about that,” Remus said, jumping down from the ottoman he’d been standing on. “What’d she have to say? She's not shutting us down is she?”

The corner of James’ mouth quirked upwards. “Just don’t break anything.”

They knocked fists, and Remus did his best to ignore the look of irritation that Sirius was giving them. Across the room, Lily pulled her nose back from Mary's cider with a grimace.

“Oh my god. What did you guys put in this stuff—bleach?”

“Don’t be such a fuddy-duddy,” Mary told her. “It’s Halloween, and since we're decidedly not headed into the woods this year, I figure it's only right that we get absolutely trollied. Lot, did you remember to grab that bottle of Cointreau?”

“Left it in the room,” Lottie said, nibbling on an orange slice. “I’ll run and fetch it.”

As Lottie disappeared out into the hall, a group of sixth form girls from the baking club arrived, carrying with them tray after tray of baked goods. Lily and James directed them into the kitchenette like the helpful dorm monitors they were, and Remus took the opportunity to slip over to the far side of the room, where Sirius was currently hooking up the stereo. He wasn't going to mention anything to do with James, but unfortunately Marlene had followed him, and was determined to say her piece.

"I really think you need to cool it," she told Sirius, as he continued plugging cable after cable into the right slots. "It's been three days."

"Christ, why's everyone acting like it's the end of the world?" Sirius snapped. "Can't Potter and I have it out every once in a while?"

"I'm not saying you have to suddenly give up the ghost, you prat, but how're you supposed to play at the party tonight if you're still all up in arms?"

"I don't have to like him to play with him, McKinnon. Just look at Pink Floyd."

Marlene sighed and looked to Remus for support, but he had nothing, and eventually she left them to their plugs and records. It was still early in the day, and after a weekend of hassle Remus didn't much feel like playing mediator anymore, but he'd have been lying if he said he weren't worried for the evening's show. It was their first time playing in front of a real group of people rather than just each other, and with two of their members so horribly off-kilter, it was beginning to look like Marauders was headed the way of every other dwindling pipe dream of the 1970s.

With no small amount of teamwork, they'd managed to hang most of the rubber spiders from the ceiling by the time Lottie returned. She flounced back into the common room with her bottle of Cointreau in one hand and a well-chuffed smile on her face, as though she'd just won some sort of prize.

"Remus," she called. "There’s someone at the door looking for you.”

“Who?” He asked, climbing down from a precarious tower of ottomans. She shrugged, hooking a finger into her mouth as she stepped back out into the hall, and Remus reluctantly followed her out, stopping only to throw a cotton cobweb over Sirius’ hair. There he found her waiting in the dorm's entry way, standing next to a broad-shouldered guy Remus had never seen before. He was wearing a heavy work trench and matching boots, with a five o'clock shadow that couldn't have belonged to any sort of sixth form student, let alone someone from their well-to-do college. Just peaking out of the collar of his jacket, Remus could spot a tattoo in the shape of a swallow. It felt like hardcore stuff, and he was reminded of Doss.

“Here he is, the man of the hour,” Lottie said, presenting Remus to the stranger. He offered his hand when Remus approached, and Remus took it, though sceptical.

“Uh, hey. Can I help you?”

“I think ye mean, 'can ye help me',” the stranger said, in a thick Scottish accent. “My cousin Trish tellt me ye were lookin’ for a bagman. The name’s Clyde.”

Remus could hardly believe his ears. “Trish sent you?”

“She told me, aye.”

“And uh—how… How’d you get onto school grounds?”

“I do the deliveries,” Clyde said, jutting a thumb over his shoulder to where a large lorry was indeed parked out front of the dorm. “Trish tellt me tah keep edgy for a 'Remus Lupin'. Said I'd ken it was 'im when I found mesell staring at a guy that looks like a nose taped tah a fence post. Guessing that's you?”

Lottie gave a little giggle, and Remus managed to swallow his shock. “Er—yeah, I’m Lupin. And you’re definitely Trish’s cousin, alright.”

Clyde nodded. "Charlotte here's been telling me about you and yer mates. Said you got most o' yer stuff from Xeno, richt? He was your guy for everything?"

Remus looked to Lottie, who covered her mouth shyly. "Guess Charlotte has been busy."

"Aye well, I was Xeno's source anyway. You fandans been keeping the local circuit in business for years."

"Oh shit." Remus glanced around cautiously. "So you'll cut us in then?"

"He's thinking about it," Lottie mused. "Though I doubt he would've came all this way just to turn you down, Remus."

"I might have something oan me. Whit are ye using it fer?"

“It's Halloween, what else? We're throwing a party right here in the dorm."

" 'n whit's yer costume?"

"It's a surprise. If you want to know you'll have to come."

Clyde looked no less than pleased by the idea. He spared Remus a glance, before nodding his head in Lottie's direction. "She your girl?”

“Oh no." Lottie shook her head. "I consider myself more of a baby-sitter, where this one's concerned."

“Hm. Tall baby.”

“A bit too tall if you ask me. I tend to like my men about—” Lottie drew her hand up slowly, stopping just ahead of Clyde’s forehead; “Yeah, right there looks about good.”

“N’ere I thought all those Hawkings girls were wi’out any sense o’humour at all.”

“It’s dangerous to lump women together, you know. We start to realise how unfunny you blokes are.”

Remus raised a brow in judgement. Luckily Lottie caught the look and quickly raised her hands in surrender.

“Alright, I’m going. Mary'll still be waiting on her liquid courage anyway." She raised the Cointreau in accord and began backing up toward the common room. "Catch you later, Highlander."

"Definitely," Clyde replied, looking smug. Remus cleared his throat after, only mildly uncomfortable.

"So, uh—don't take this the wrong way, but you're a lot more... forthcoming than most of the other dealers I know."

"Ken many 'a us, do ye?"

“You'd be surprised."

“I trust Trish," the bagman said. "She wouldn’t send some jobbie my wey.”

“Cool. You got anything on you now then?”

“Always keep some hash in the truck—but ya didn’t hear that from me. Might have something else too if you’re guid fur it.”

“Can you get us more booze?”

“Aye, definitely.”

“And you can keep it coming after Halloween?”

“Offer’s guid til’ June s’long as you are.”

Remus quirked a smile. “Yeah, sounds ace. And if you can deliver like this we’ll make it worth your while.”

“Got a list?”

As Remus began shuffling through his pockets for a pen, Clyde’s gaze drifted up over his shoulder, toward the common room.

“And a’… yer bonnie, blondie friend—she single then?”

Later that evening, with enough hash and booze stowed away to choke a horse, Remus came out of the bathroom dressed head-to-toe in scintillating McCartney blue. The trousers were about six inches too short around the ankles, and his typically unthreatening biceps felt about ready to burst the fabric along the seams, but the get-up had been a favour of the sewing club, made mostly for their show anyway. Hopefully come midnight when everyone was well and truly bladdered, he could abandon the outfit for something more comfortable.

"You look fucking amazing!" Sirius crooned, the moment he'd gotten a look at him. Remus wasn't so sure he agreed, but he didn't object when Sirius began scribbling a rather unconvincing moustache across his upper lip using an eyeliner he’d “borrowed” from Mary.

“You’d probably be able to grow this yourself if you stopped shaving,” he suggested, holding Remus still by the chin. Trying not to smile, Remus batted at one of the shoulder tassels on Sirius’ equally-tacky costume. Though, the Lennon tea-shades were really selling the look.

“You saying I should grow a beard now?”

“I'm not saying you should come out as a member of ZZ Top, but you might look cute with a little lampshade on your top lip.”

“Maybe you should try it," Remus said, admiring the fake handlebars drawn across Sirius' mouth.

“Nah,” Sirius said, capping the liner; “ ‘fraid I’ll look like my dad. You’re lucky you don’t look much like yours.”

Remus nodded meekly. “Mm…”

Sirius turned away and came back with two glasses with a shot of vodka for them both. “Cheers,” he said, but before Sirius could down the shot, Remus placed his hand over the cup.

“It’s Halloween."

"I'm aware?"

"Tonight's the show. You know what that means.”

“Ugh. Moony—”

“You’ve got to talk to James, Sirius. Even if you don't make up tonight, it'll be your birthday in a few days—do you really want to spend it without James?"

"I've got you!"

"Okay, maybe I want to spend your birthday with James."

Sirius scoffed and took the shot without him. After he'd grimaced and recovered, he set the glass aside and straightened out his military dress.

“I don't care about my bloody birthday, Moons. Like I keep telling the rest of 'em, it’s not that big of a deal. If Evans can be pissed at him for a whole year, I don’t see why a few days is so diabolical for me. And besides, what would I even tell him? I can’t say anything about us—not that I want to—and he doesn’t believe me when I say it’s anything else."

"You really don't want to tell him about us?"

"Do you?"

Remus bit his lip. "I asked you first..."

Sirius gave him a very hard look, but then shook his head. "If I did tell him, it should be on my own terms, shouldn't it? And I—well, I don't want to tell him my biggest secret when we're... like this." Sirius voice grew fainter; "What if it... makes it worse."

Remus didn't really have an answer; he'd been thinking the same thing ever since the two of them had blown up on each other, but he was relieved to hear that Sirius wasn't thinking in extremes.

"Anyway," he huffed, "he's just being paranoid."

"He misses you," Remus said. "And I think you miss him too."

"It's been three days. I don't need to miss him."

He shrugged, haplessly. "Alright. But I know us spending so much time together has James worried. I think he feels as though he's losing his best friend."

"That's ridiculous."

"Is it? Remember how you felt when I was dating Marlene? 'Cause I certainly remember how it felt watching you date Chastity."

Sirius scowled off to the side like he often did when he knew he'd lost an argument. "I never got jealous when he started bunking off with Evans."

"James has liked Lily since year seven. I'd say you got a bit more time to get used to it."

"Fuck you for always being right."

"Easy." Remus leaned in, brushing the hair from Sirius' face and kissing the corner of his mouth. "Just try saying something before you're too off your trolley to walk straight."

As if to spite him, Sirius stole Remus' shot and downed that too before kissing him back. He felt the vodka burn his lips, but kissing Sirius always felt a bit like fire.

"REMUS! SIRUS!" Peter barked through the bedroom door, hammering it with his fist; "Something's wrong with the stereo! Can one of you come down already and fix it?"

"You go?" Remus asked, putting his hands together piously; "Gotta use the loo."

"Alright, sure. I'll catch you downstairs, rock star." Backing up, Sirius gave him one more once-over before smirking devilishly. "Oh, and Moons? Don't look now, but I can see your nob through those trousers."

"You never did!" Remus gasped, but Sirius had already gone—slipping out into the hall with a laugh.

Once he'd made sure that he was adequately covered—"Knew he was lying..."—Remus made his way downstairs to dorm's ground floor, where the party was already in full-swing. Kids were arriving in droves, carrying booze and pumpkins, and all wearing a hotchpotch of costumes scrounged together from whatever they could find when so far from home. Peter Frampton was blaring across the room from the stereo, and the entire room was alight. Soon they'd either be cheering for them or booing them off stage, but that was the least of Remus' worries anyway. On his way to get himself a drink, he heard familiar shouting from the kitchenette and followed the noise. There he found his boyfriend staring James down, a small crowd of curious students encircling them. Only Lily dared get closer, and was twisting back and forth between them, looking heated in her Lynda Carter get-up.

"Come on, you two, can't this be over with already? Just apologise to one another!"

Both boys ignored her, too viciously scorned to be of sound mind and reasoning.

“You’re a right twat, you know that?” Sirius hissed.

“I just assumed it wouldn’t be happening,” James shot back. “You know, since we’re not friends anymore.”

“Not even five minutes,” Remus sighed, already shoving his way through the crowd.

"Alright, that's enough. I thought we were here to party?" He grabbed Sirius' shoulder to pull him back, but Sirius dug his heels in. He had a point to prove, it seemed.

“Look at him!” He growled. “Can’t even commit to a fucking outfit!”

James crossed his arms. “I said I’d still play.”

“And how would that look, huh? Three Beatles and a—whatever the fuck that is?!”

Remus took a moment to look James up and down. He was not wearing his George Harrison/Sergeant Pepper get-up, and instead had changed into a... businessman?

“It’s Clark Kent, obviously,” James snapped, aggressively pointing at his glasses. He pulled his shirt back to reveal a crudely drawn 'S' for 'Superman' on his vest beneath, but Sirius remained unconvinced.

“You look more like you’re on your way to a fucking cubicle at your nine-to-five,” he lashed.

“Thought it was all about the music, Black. Or was that something you made up too?”

“Oh, fuck you!”

Chitters went up from the other kids and Lily waved her Lasso of Truth between them threateningly.

“Enough! God, I still don’t understand what this stupid fight is over!”

“ ‘ASK HIM’!”

“Hey, hey!” Mary trilled cheerily, shoving her way into the crowded room. Like Remus and Sirius, she was dressed up in shiny regalia, though her costume was an ode to Cher and featured an entire swan's worth of feathers rather than golden epaulettes. “When’s that show supposed to start?” She asked. “Lottie’s been telling people on their way in—they’re all excited to see Hawkings’ very own Marauders!”

“We’re coming,” James grunted, eyeing Sirius up scathingly. Sirius returned the look, tenfold.

“Guess it’s a good thing we changed the name to a ‘concept’ after all, Potter, since you don’t look like much of a ‘Marauder’ to me.”

“Let’s just get on with it, choir boy,” James replied cuttingly.

Looking indignant, Sirius spun on his heel and marched out, leaving James to glance sorely at a disapproving Lily and follow him.

“Was it something I said?” Mary asked after they’d gone.

Remus sighed. “I really wish it was, Mary.”

And then, because it was Mary, she handed him a drink.

“Bottoms up, darling. Night’s young yet.”

With a small smile, Remus accepted and knocked the side of his paper cup against hers before downing the entire thing. Afterwards he followed her out into the hallway, which was even more crowded than before. There they happened across Jillian and her new beau, Roy, who were both done up in matching sailor outfits. She waved, drink in hand, but simply passed him by on her way out of the common room.

“Solved that problem, did you?” Mary teased, wrapping an arm around his waist.

“Yes, despite what others might have to say, I’m not entirely hopeless.”

She threw her head back to laugh as they emerged into the bustling common room and a few of the silky feathers she’d clipped into her hair went up his nose. Remus sneezed, toppling sideways gracefully in the process, and just before Mary could reach out and help steady him he knocked into someone—nearly upsetting their drink.

“Oh shit, my bad.”

Trish turned around. “Na harm done—oh.”

Remus straightened up, suddenly very sorry. He and Trish hadn't spoken since that day he'd snapped at her outside the science building. He still felt bad, but between the JamesandSirius debacle, he'd yet to find time to apologise.

“Er—hi…” he said, while Trish pursed her lips, looking like she'd prefer to be anywhere else.

"Hi..."

Uninterested in their sombre affair, Mary tapped Remus on the shoulder. “Stefan D’Arcy is giving me the eye,” she announced; “This’ll only take a few. Meet you by the stage.”

She kissed his cheek and just like that was off—leaving him to his awkward fate.

“Whit are ye wearing?” Trish asked eventually.

“I’m supposed to be Paul McCartney,” he said, feeling stupid in the head-to-toe, iridescent polyester. “And you’re…”

Trish looked down at herself. She was wearing what appeared to be a white bed sheet and had wrapped a wreath around her head made out of real leaves. Over her chest was a red stain that looked a lot like cranberry juice. “I’m Julius Caesar,” she said. “After he got ‘imself stabbed, that is.”

“Cool! Nice... execution."

"Was that supposed tae be a pun?"

"No! I just meant—you know—the blood... You must really like history.”

"Oh," she looked down at herself and shrugged. “Not really. Just ken the feeling o' bein' stabbed in the back, is all.”

Remus Lupin, curse your big, fat gob.

At his silence, Trish turned to go, but Remus got ahead of her first. “Hey, I just wanted to say thanks!" He chirped. "Clyde came by today —helped us pull the rest 'a this together. You didn’t have to pass my name onto him, but you did, so—thanks.”

“No need tae thank me, Clyde was already making the deliveries."

“I know, but I was right awful to you. So you can…er—You can hit me if you want! I’d deserve it.”

She squinted at him. “Hit you for what?”

“For what I said,” he winced again. “It was gross—terrible. You caught me at a bad time, but I was still a right arsehole. I didn’t mean what I said. I'm real sorry.”

“Aye, you were an arse.”

“Yeah, so you can hit me—to make up for it.”

“That sounds like a cheap way tae make yerself feel better, not me.”

“Ha… maybe you’re right.”

Trish exhaled, shoulders relaxing as her usual frisky attitude returned. “Aw, Loonary, dinnae fash yerself. I wasn’t all that bothered by what ye said. You really think some walkin’ hooter on a stick can hurt my feelings? Not half-likely.”

Somehow the jab made Remus feel a bit better. “Do you really think my nose is that big?"

"It ain't small."

He smiled. "Well, thanks anyway. You're a fucking cool one, Trish."

"I know." Trish held out her hand, and Remus made to smack it fondly, but she pulled back at the last second and socked him in the stomach.

"Yer right, Remington, that did make me feel better. Good luck on stage, by th'wey. Should be worth a good laugh."

She left him behind, which was well deserved, and after a long moment of rubbing his ribs and smiling to himself, Remus made his way across the common room toward their little fenced off corner. Peter was already set up behind his drum kit. Moira was in his lap and Peter had his arms around her, using her hands to gently beat at the snare and cymbals as she giggled. James was standing next to them, sullenly fiddling with his guitar as he murmured back and forth with Lily. Sirius remained firmly on the other side, fiddling with the knobs on their amplifiers just to keep his hands busy.

"Where'd you disappear to?" Sirius asked when he approached.

"Sorry. Got caught chatting up Trish."

"Trish...? Oh—you mean that prefect. Peppermint Patty or whatever."

"Be nice. It's just Trish—you're Patty, 'Pattycake'." Remus pulled their set list out of his pocket and slapping it down over one of the amps.

"Ready to get this over with then?" James asked, strolling forward and picking up the plug for his amp.

"Try being a little less excited, why don't you?" Sirius replied sarcastically.

Resisting a groan, Remus strolled back to the wall behind Peter's drum kit and picked up his bass. After a quick kiss, Moira fled her boyfriend's lap and Peter leaned over.

"They still…?"

"Yup."

"Fan-tastic."

Up ahead, Sirius shoved James away from him and spun the microphone around in the air. A light screech of feedback echoed, making James and everyone up front flinch, but Sirius didn't so much as bat an eye. He cleared his throat and somewhere across the room, Mary cut the music.

"Oi, alright, so you all know us, but for tonight we ain't any ol' individuals —we're Marauders."

The crowd's response wasn't any more enthusiastic than Sirius' introduction. Kids shuffled about, but no one seemed to know what to say or how to act. Most of them had probably never been to a concert in their life.

"We're gonna be playing a few songs for ya. Y ou might know 'em, so try and sing along if you want, and er—happy Halloween, I guess."

"Could you be any duller?" James scoffed, prompting Sirius to flip him off about ten millimetres away from the end of his nose. The gesture got a few people up front to laugh, but the joke was short-lived, and Remus found himself praying that they just made it through the set unscathed.

"This is 'Communication Breakdown'," Sirius rumbled into the mike, and a moment later James had kicked off his fervent guitar riff. A few heads started to bob, and then it was Peter's turn. He came in with a crash, stumbling along until he matched James somewhat in rhythm, but Remus was so shocked by the initial disarray that he'd missed his own count by four bars. Cursing, he jumped in away, but by then the first verse had come and gone and Sirius had missed it.

"You gonna sing or not?" James called.

"Maybe I'll sing when you start sounding half-decent!"

Remus felt his his fingers begin to freeze up with apprehension. It was one of the most difficult songs they knew and it always took them a few moments to find each other in the rhythm, but they'd never been off in actual communication too. Already the song was proving an insurmountable challenge, and they were only thirty seconds in.

Please, you fucking toffs, he silently begged, get through it!

But there was no need to worry after James. Whether he saw the music as Sirius' challenge or as a whirlwind of thrashing colours inside his mind, he spun around to Peter's drum kit and stepped up to him with his guitar until they were playing side by side and matching frazzled rhythms. The gesture seemed to comfort Peter, who took a breath and finally started over at the beginning of the next bar. The moment he heard the drums level-out, Remus was able to find himself again in tempo, and he looked to desperately Sirius, who'd been observing them all from the front while swinging his microphone around lackadaisically.

"Right!" Sirius called, catching the mike out of the air. "Now that's what I'm talking about!"

Oh thank fuck.

As Sirius spun to face the front, igniting a few cheers, Remus finally exhaled. The longest intro in "Communication Breakdown" history, and just like that they were really playing.

"Hey girl, stop what you're doin'!
Hey girl, you'll drive me to ruin!"

Sirius might've sang with the same bluesy twang as Plant, but a bleating statue he was not. He gathered the microphone chord around himself so that he could skirt around the front of the stage, getting right up with the kids who stood to watch.

"I don't know what it is I like about you, but I like it a lot, Won't you let me hold you—let me feel your lovin' touch!"

Maybe it was their initial flop, or even the song itself, but whatever it is, most of the Hawkings' crowd remained rooted to the spot. They didn't know what they should be cheering for—the singing or the music? Both seemed so at odds. Sirius flitted around James and his guitar like he were an electric fence, both of them playing chicken with one another.

"Communication breakdown, it's always the same!
Havin' a nervous breakdown, drive me insane!"

James didn't so much as glance at Sirius, no matter how well he sang; instead he kept his head trained downwards, furiously ripping at his guitar. Thank god for Mary and Lottie, who pushed their way to the front and began to cheer as Sirius wailed into the mike. Their enthusiasm began to drum up some support, but the song ended to paltry applause. They stuck with it though, and though it took two more songs for most people to get into it, by the middle of their set, the nerves had gone and the room was actually moving.

Remus had initially thought going for a virtually unknown Sex Pistols single was a mistake (Mary had called “Pretty Vacant” an ‘assault on the eardrums’ the first time she’d heard it) but the lyrics were easy for others to pick out and easier still to scream while drunk, which Sirius certainly did. Halfway through, he whipped off his Lennon tea-shades and threw them into the crowd. Even James had begun to perk up. He hadn’t the experience of seeing the punk band live like them, but it was his favourite song in the set, and he came alive alongside the words;

‘We’re so pretty, oh so pretty! We’re va—CUNT!’

It was the excitement and rush of the music that made James into a true guitarist. He hit each bar with such liveliness that even Sirius was intoxicated by it. At one point Lily appeared off to the side of the crowd and James leaned towards her, accepting a kiss over top of the guitar that had everyone screaming. The moment the song ended Lottie held out a drink to Sirius, which he downed instantly and threw back into the crowd. The crowd of kids went wild, bits of costumes flying through the air as they cheered.

“Come on, Sirius!” Mary begged from the front row. One song—just one!”

With an exaggerated sigh, Sirius rolled his head to the rest of them, smirking pertly. They all knew exactly what Mary meant—she and the girls had been begging for it since they’d found out about their plans to play in the first place—and though they’d denied secretly practising it... there really was an ABBA song for everything.

Cheekily, Peter shrugged and kicked off on the drums, and Sirius spun back around, barking into the microphone;

“ROCK ME—! Give me that kick now!
Rock me, show me that trick now!
Roll me, you can do magic!
BABY—! And I can’t get enough of it!"

Every girl in the room screamed at the top of her lungs, each belting out the lyrics like it was their final confession. Remus nearly lost it and James absolutely did—bent over his guitar and laughing until it was finally his turn to play. There was very little to do in the song as a bassist, which meant Remus got to watch as the room came undone. It was intoxicating, and it wasn't just the drink. Music did that to a person; it made them forget their worst worries—even the sort that had them more angry with their best friend than they'd ever been in all of their seventeen years.

Remus could hardly believe it.

Before his very eyes, Sirius and James leaned into one another and head-banged in time with Peter's drums. No one would've been able to tell that they'd hating each other's guts only moments before—it wasn't about that. It was about the music.

Real, fucking music.

Sirius sang his heart out of course, leaving James' side only to weave between the other kids until he'd nearly tripped a dozen people with the microphone cord.

"Don't stop the rocking—don't stop the rocking!" He crowed; "I say don't stop the rocking!"— and James was with him the entire way. A whole three days of fighting, and Remus knew they'd be okay the moment they bent their heads together and began singing into the same mike. They were a band again. Moony, Wormtail, Padfoot, and Prongs.

Marauders.

All four of them were practically heaving by the time they'd finished the set. Sweat dripped down Remus' back in his vibrant, poorly-designed costume, and he'd never felt more exhilarated. Their concert of no more than a hundred kids had gone amazingly, or as Peter called it the moment they'd stepped away from their instruments—bitchin'.

While his friends and classmates pat him on the back for good show, Sirius appeared at Remus' elbow, his renegade-grey eyes alight.

"Moony, can I bum your smokes? Prongs and I—we're gonna go have a chat."

Remus handed the carton over immediately. "Cheers, love."

The ‘love’ had slipped out, leaving him embarrassed, but Sirius just squeezed his hand over the cigarettes and was off. Watching him go, Remus couldn’t help but wish he would be there, just to know exactly what was said and how Sirius was going to explain himself, but then it wouldn’t be the talk they needed—and worried or not, they needed JamesandSirius.

After the show and his friends' assumed reconciliation, Remus resolved himself to spend the rest of the evening getting royally pissed. It turned out that Clyde had indeed accepted Lottie’s invitation after all, and not only that—had brought several of his favourite village rabble with him. One of the lads had brought a funnel that was probably intended for car repair, but was passed around so everyone could guzzle as much beer as humanly possible. Remus himself spent more than a couple rounds down on his knees, while others wailed at him;

'Drink! Drink! Drink!'

As his head and stomach swam with dutch courage, countless people appeared to congratulate him on the show, ripping air-guitars in front of him and all but insisting on an encore. Dodging their praise and requests, he shared a spliff or two or three with Trish, not caring that he was double-dipping and would be absolutely wrecked in the morning. He was a Beatle for the night—a rock star, and rock stars didn’t sit around worrying about shitty things like stupid fights with friends and their sexuality. Rock stars drank and fucked everything in sight and paid for the consequences with a company credit card, and when that was maxed they simply got another.

Remus wanted to be maxed.

At some point he ended up on a couch with Lily, who left a large smudge of red lipstick along his shirt as she tucked her head under his chin. Someone had put on a Dusty Springfield album, but there was so much clamour that they could barely hear it.

“They’ve been gone for so long!” Lily complained, on her third glass of what Lottie was calling a ‘down and dirty martini’.

“Fuckers took my fags too,” Remus grumbled, though he’d already been offered by more than his fair share from other friendlies.

“How are James and I supposed to be together if we’re always apart?”

“They ditched us,” he agreed.

Lily shot up on the couch. “Maybe we should be together! I mean where is James? GONE!”

“You’re right! Sirius ain’t here either!”

“Well, fuck ‘em! OH—! We should get married!”

“Yeah!” Remus snorted. “I’d marry you!”

“I’d marry you too!” Lily shrieked, then whipped her head around; “MARY! Come marry us!”

Mary appeared out of the haze, a single hand of judgement set on her bedazzled hip. With the other she plucked Lily’s plastic drink cup out of her hand. “And just how many of these have you had, Lillian Evans?”

“Only a couple!” Lily pouted, reaching for it.

“Ahem. Are you forgetting something? You need to sober up if you want to make it to the end of the night.”

Mary said this last bit rather pointedly, but Remus was too busy laughing at her sudden abstemious attitude. “Since when do you lambaste others for getting pissed, Mary?”

“I’m only lambasting Lily. You, on the other hand, have my complete permission to keep on chugging.”

Properly sloshed, Remus raised an arm and pumped it like a train whistle; “Chu-chu.”

“Mary, we need you to marry us,” Lily whined, tugging on her friend’s wrist. “Remus proposed.”

“Oh did he, now? And where’s the ring?”

“Must’ve forgot it at home,” Remus sighed, patting his chest and current lack of pockets.

“Darn,” Mary tsked, snapping her fingers. “Remus, dear, why don’t you go get yourself another drink while I help Lily plan her vows. It’s Halloween—we can marry you at the witching hour.”

“That’s a fantastic idea!” Lily cackled. “Someone get the camera!”

Unable to see a flaw in Mary’s plan, Remus popped up from the couch and saluted the girls before ambling his way back to the kitchenette. They'd moved all of the drink and food in there after a group of kids had claimed the common room table for beer curling, but he happened to know of a single bottle of gin he'd tucked out of sight in the corner of the highest shelf. Excited by the idea, Remus didn't even notice the arm that reached out of the dorm supply cupboard until it had already grabbed him and hauled him inside.

"What the f—!"

Sirius had Remus pressed up against the cupboard wall in a second, hot breath filling his mouth as they kissed, fingers pressing up into each other's hair. A bucket clanged around their feet and there was a clatter as they knocked over a stack of brooms, making them both yelp and then laugh. It was dark, with only the light from outside spilling around the cracks in the door, but when Sirius pulled away Remus could see a dark smudge of his eyeliner-moustache on the other boy's upper lip.

"You're fucking mental—where have you been all this time?" Remus demanded, head swimming.

"With James," Sirius said, kissing him again.

"And?!" Remus managed around his lips; "How'd it go?"

"Good." There was pure bliss in Sirius' voice. "So good."

"What did you say?"

Sirius made a grunt of frustration and pulled back. "Well… we didn't say much actually. I raced him across the football pitch."

"You mean, you ran all the way to the field?"

"And back."

"Hold on—you didn't talk to each other?"

"Hard to gab when you're busy skidding over grass. See the state 'a my knees?"

Remus pinched the bridge of his nose.

"Aren't you going to ask me if I won?" Sirius asked with a cheeky smirk.

“I know you didn’t. But I hope you actually made up, because it would be kind of ironic if our band broke up right after its first gig.”

Sirius jabbed him in the sides. “Yes, captain smart-ass, we did do some talking. We both apologised. There might’ve been some slight homoerotic wrestling, but that’s besides the point. I told James that…” Sirius sighed, as if he was struggling for the right words in his inebriated state; "I told him that I’m just trying to figure myself out. We talked about the school—not the queer part, but the 'therapy' and the way mum and dad had me sent off. And I... well, we both felt guilty I think. Took it out on each other. A bit hard though—I forgot how hard it was to hate the wanker.”

“So you didn’t tell him that we're…”

“That we’re totally bent for each other? No.”

Remus exhaled.

“And are you disappointed that you didn’t tell him?”

“Nah, don’t think I needed to. I think this was more about him than us anyway. He's got this chip on his shoulder—thinks he has to be perfect all the time."

"No one can be perfect all of the time.

“Gives us more time to figure our shit out.”

“I don’t think I’ll ever figure you out, Sirius.”

Sirius squinted at him playfully. “You seem nervous, Moony.”

“I’m not nervous,” Remus said, entirely nervous. “I’m happy for you. You and James… you’re totally brothers. I’ve never known two better friends.”

Sirius simpered shyly, trailing a finger along the thin fabric hiding Remus’ collarbone. “Wanna know something, Moons?”

“What, Padfoot?”

“I like you… sooooo much.”

Sirius sniggered like a school girl and Remus’ need to pin him against the closest available surface surged—so he did just that, flipping them around so Sirius’ back was to the cupboard wall.

“Oh! I like it when you take charge,” Sirius preened. “Such a thug.”

“Please shut up.”

"Yes, sir."

> > >

Reaching down, Remus snaked an arm under Sirius’ thighs and lifted him completely off the ground, pinning him between himself and the wall as Sirius clung to his shoulders and wrapped his legs around his narrow waist. They stifled each other, tongue on tongue, grinding together and placing sloppy, drunken kisses across the lips and jaws while fisting their clothes to draw the other even closer. Sirius’ kisses still burned, but in that way that sent fire from Remus' lips down to his core and further still. He could feel the pronounced shape of Sirius’ prick through the flimsy polyester trousers and for a moment Remus imagined how the shiny yellow fabric would simply tear apart with the weakest bit of pressure. Then they could have at it right there, be damned everyone else. Remus almost did it too—he was already reaching around Sirius, his hands slipping past the too-tight elastic.

< < <

But then the cupboard’s doorknob rattled.

Springing apart, Remus half-dropped Sirius, who caught himself on a low shelf and knocked down a pile of clean linens in the process.

“Door won’t open…” Someone slurred on the other side, hiccupping several times. “Need a—hic!—buckeeeet…!”

“That door sticks sometimes,” another voice said. “Just gotta wiggle it a bit.”

Nearly screaming, Remus wrapped his hand around the doorknob and held on for dear life. Behind him, Sirius was untangling himself from the sheets, stifling his laughter behind one hand.

“This is not funny!” Remus hissed, dropping his weight into his knees to hold on as the door rattled and moaned viciously.

“It’s more even stuck than before now—hic!” The first voice whined.

“Someone must be inside—busy snogging!”

A thumping noise came next, like a fist on the other side of the wood.

"COME ON OUT, YA RANDY TARTS!"

Remus looked around for another exit—a grate they could pry off the wall and crawl into like rats in a sewer—but sadly it was just a broom cupboard.

“What are we gonna do?!”

“Relaaax,” Sirius whispered, pulling a watch from his pocket—James’ watch. He squinted down at it, before his face split into a grin. “Any second now.”

The doorknob strained under Remus’ grip, sliding with the sweat of his palms. Any second now—and they were going to be caught!

“Sirius—!”

"Wait for it..."

Thump! Thump! Thump!

"SIRIUS!"

"Three... two...!"

Remus couldn't help it; he held his breath, and a second later the deafening noise blew through the entire dorm;

BANG!

The doorknob was released instantly as another bang ricocheted across wood-planned walls, then another, and another—endless booms, back to back to back.

BANG—BANG—BANG—BANG!

Each blast was accompanied by the elated shrieking of kids and a rattling hiss, like fireworks going off, and Remus realised with a start that that was exactly what it was. He whirled on Sirius, who was beside himself with excitement.

“Prongs and I may have stopped to have a little chat with Little Bob on our way back,” he said candidly. “I really think he’s outdone himself this time.”

As more explosions echoed from outside, Remus let out a long moan of relief and peeked out into the hall. It was empty save a few kids, all of which were racing off to get a look at whatever was causing the noise.

“You slip out first,” Sirius told him, reaching for one of the bed sheets.

“What about you?”

Smirking, Sirius pulled the white sheet over his head and waved his hands at him in an attempt to look spooky.

“OooOooh! I’ll come out afteeerrr! No one’ll knooow it’s meeee!”

Batting him away, Remus puckered over a smile and escaped out into the hall as more explosions sounded off. He followed the crowd into the common room, where everyone was scattered around the front windows, watching as a group of boys stood around outside, setting off crackers and homemade roman candles like utter lunatics. It was a wonder Sirius wasn’t already among them.

“Remus!” Marlene hollered, getting his attention from across the room. She and Nicole were tucked up on one of the window ledges, the light from outside making their hair flash a new colour every time a cracker blew off. “I hear you and Lily are getting married!” Marlene teased loudly. “Have you found your dress yet?"

"You can always borrow mine!" Nicole offered, gesturing to her Bride of Frankenstein costume. Marlene howled, and then sat up again eagerly.

"OOH! OOH! Can I be the best man?”

“You’re already my best man!” Remus declared, fighting through the crowd to get to her and wrapping an arm around Marlene’s neck, grinding his knuckles lightly into the top of her head. She wailed and fought him off with a sharp right-hook right to the shoulder.

“Did you guys set this up?” Nicole asked, jutting a thumb at the fireworks.

“Not me—James and Sirius.”

“Those idiots,” Marlene laughed. “Always putting on a show.”

“Always.”

“Speaking of show—you guys gonna do an encore?” Nicole pressed.

Immediately one of the kids to their right struck up a chant; “Encore! Encore!”

“You should, Remus!” Jillian gushed, appearing at his side with Roy.

“But I’ve lost my band! I don’t know where they are!”

“I see Peter!” Marlene called, pointing; “Pete! You up for an encore?”

Blinking incoherently in their direction, Peter waved his beer overhead in drunken agreement, and several more kids turned to cheer as a firework loud enough to rattle Godric’s windows went off outside. They were positively too pissed to get through a single song intact, but that didn’t seem to matter much to the other kids that took up the chant, screaming over the thunderous bangs.

“ENCORE! ENCORE! ENCORE!”

Remus whirled on Marlene and Nicole. “Look what you’ve done.”

“It’s called peer pressure!” Nicole grinned. Marlene opened her mouth to add something, but suddenly perked up, eyes trained over Remus’ shoulder in question. Following her odd look, he spun around to find a sheet-clad ghost standing before him. He almost said Sirius’ name in a scoff, but was instantly thankful he didn’t as the ghost swooped in and captured his mouth in a kiss right through the sheet.

The sounds of surprise and delight from the kids around them was louder than the fireworks themselves. All demands for an encore were immediately silenced, but Sirius didn’t bother sticking around to take it all in. Just like that, he was off—sweeping out of the common room like an actual spirit in the night.

“Remus, who the hell was that?” Jillian screeched, sounding both scandalised and impressed.

“I—I don’t know!”

“AFTER IT!” Nicole shouted, leaping off her window sill with Marlene hot on her heels, racing in the direction Sirius had gone. Several watching kids followed, mostly girls, and several cries of ‘CATCH THAT GHOST’ could be heard over the fireworks as they stormed out of the dorm.

“Black, you better fucking run,” Remus murmured to himself, beginning to crack up just as James’ dropped an arm around his shoulder. He realised with delight that James was now wearing his Sergeant Pepper outfit, complete with an iconic eyeliner moustache of his own.

“That was fucking legendary, mate!” James cheered. “Who was it?”

“Dunno. Good kisser though.”

“Hell, Moony! Okay, you heard ‘em though, right? How d’ya feel about an encore?”

“You gotta find Sirius first,” he cackled.

“Sirius! Okay! I’ll find him!” James clapped him firmly on the back, too drunk to know his own strength, and Remus grunted. “And hey—sorry I was such a cunt before, but I get it now! Totally! And it’s cool! Love that Sirius—that Padfoot!”

James’ words touched something within Remus. “I love him too, Prongs.”

“Be right back then! Let’s rock!”

As James shambled away with a goofy grin on his face, Remus felt over the moon. Like he could laugh so hard he might cry. Love that Sirius.

“Remus, over here,” Lily called sweetly, appearing by his elbow with Lottie and Mary on either side of her. Each girl was smiling, and if he were more sober, he might have realised that they were knowing smiles—the kind that got you into trouble and still expected a thank-you in return.

“How are you feeling, deary?” Lottie asked.

Love that Sirius.

“Great—brilliant! You?”

“Fan-fucking-tastic,” Mary answered with a smirk. “Now, on a scale of one to ten, how drunk would you say you are?”

He looked up first, then down. The room spun. “Twenty-two.”

“Wonderful, let’s cheers to that!” Lily said, pressing another glass of tequila into his hand. He downed it—because why not—and the girls cheered, taking his arm on each side.

“Come with us?”

“Sure, but James wants to do an encore,” Remus told her, slurring a bit.

Lottie plucked the glass from his hand. “Don’t worry, you’ll be back in no time,” she promised. “You just leave it all to us. Ohhh Clyde..."

* * *

Tuesday 1st November 1977

Even hungover, Remus was a light sleeper. He couldn’t even remember making it back to their room the night before, but someone had drawn his curtains for him and left a bottle of water and a fresh set of pyjamas at the foot of his bed, which he thought was extremely kind. Probably Lily then, Lily was kind.

A wave of nausea hit him, and Remus turned over against his pillow and squeezed his eyes shut. He could feel it already—a legendary hangover. The kind that left you dazed and confused for days afterwards. The sweats would come first, then the bile would creep up the back of your throat, just threatening to spill over. Oh god—someone drown him in the Dubh now.

As he focused on not vomiting over his own sheets, Remus distantly became aware of a whirring coming from across the room. It was the sound of the stereo coming to life and sorting through a tape. The noise felt like a jackhammer against Remus’ brain, and he was tempted to sit up in bed and tear a strip off of Sirius for even considering music so early, but before he could, the tape started and the entire room was immediately accosted by disco pop at full volume.

‘HONEY HONEY, HOW HE THRILLS ME, A-HA! HONEY HONEY! HONEY HONEY, NEARLY KILLS ME, A-HA! HONEY HONEY!’

“SIRIUS!” James hollered; “TURN OFF THE BLOODY MUSIC!”

“It’s not me!”

Remus rolled over in his bed, hands over his ears. “SIRIUS, SHUT IT OFF NOW!"

"I didn't do it!" A pause, then; "WHAT THE FUCK— WHO CHAINED ME TO THE FUCKING BED?!"

There was a sudden screech—Peter—and Remus shot up in bed, ripping his curtains open. He regretted it instantly.

Icy water crashed down on him from above like a slab of cement, making him seize up and nearly tumble off the edge of the bed. Utterly stunned and unable to pick his jaw up from off the floor, Remus stared out at their bedroom. It was obvious—they'd been pranked. In true parent-trap fashion, someone had turned their room into one giant spider web, weaving string and twine around every available surface and making it impossible to take even half a step without getting tangled up in it. Because that wasn't enough, they'd also hung a bucket over his bed and tied a fishing line to his curtains so he'd be soaked the moment he pulled them open. Across from him, Peter's curtains were already open, but instead of a fair-haired boy, Remus found only a poor replica of a plucked chicken. Peter was covered head-to-toe in feathers and his ankles had been tied to the footboard.

His first thought was Barty—had Regulus finally stooped to real tricks? But then he spotted it; a single pink bra left atop the stereo like a calling card.

"What the fuck happened?!" Peter demanded over the blaring music. Apart from the feathers, he also had what looked to be bits of tape stuck to his forehead. Remus realised with horror that they were Mary's wax strips.

James, decidedly free of any binds and not at risk of being soaked, leapt up from bed and began fighting his way through the maze of webbing to reach the stereo, which cut-out right after 'YOU'RE A LOVE MACHINE!'

Huffing with relief and still fighting the mess of string, he turned around and Remus' eyes bulged.

"Oh my god, Potter, your hair."

"What?" James' hands flew up to his head. He relaxed when he realised he was not bald, but it wasn't the lack of hair that had shocked Remus. It was the single white streak of blonde now zipping off the front of James' forehead, off-setting his wild, black waves like the pattern of a skunk.

“What—What is it?” James demanded again. “Oh my god—where are my glasses?”

As James whipped around to look for them, Sirius gave a cry from behind his bed curtains. He was the only one with them still closed, and Remus had to fight to get to him through the knots of string and twine hung up everywhere, all while dripping water all across the floor. Half-afraid and half-excited for what he might find, Remus pulled back the heavy red curtains and clapped a hand over his mouth.

“Don’t you dare laugh,” Sirius threatened.

Remus pressed his lips together, but he couldn’t help it. Sirius had one wrist cuffed to his headboard with fluffy pink handcuffs and was wearing only his boxer shorts and a second lacy black bra. One of his legs had been shaved bare as well, but the real cherry on top was the words ‘mummy issues’, which had been written across his forehead in thick black marker.

"Holy shit..."

“Just get me out of here!” Sirius raged, rattling his little cuff against the headboard.

“I’m all wet though.”

“Remus-fucking-Lupin, if you don’t get over here RIGHT NOW—!”

Smirking, Remus peeled back his soaked t-shirt and climbed onto the bed, straddling Sirius and trying to tug at the flimsy cuffs. “We can probably just break them,” he said, giving Sirius’ wrist a few sharp tugs.

“Fuck—ow! It was definitely the girls,” Sirius hissed. “Payback for last year.”

“It’s good payback—you should see your forehead. You've been christened.”

Sirius clapped his free hand over his ‘mummy issues’. “They got you too!”

Looking down, Remus spotted the letters ‘LE’ drawn on the left side of his chest inside a small heart. It stumped him, but before he could wonder for too long, James let out another cry. He'd found his glasses —left innocently on his bedside and slathered in a thick layer of honey.

"Monsters!" James wailed. "Absolute she-devils!"

"Looks like the razor came for you too, Potter," Sirius said.

James instantly looked down at himself. His right leg was as bare as a baby's bottom.

"Oh my GOD!"

"Think of how good they'll look on the pitch," Remus offered. "You'll be so aerodynamic."

"HA!" Sirius cackled, as James started toward them through the web, looking about ready to strangle his friends himself. A sudden crash from across the room stopped him, and they all spun around to look. Peter had freed himself from his footboard, only to tangle himself up in the strings next to the bed, scrambling around on the floor like a trapped animal.

"Just kill meeeee!" He bawled, one of the wax strips clutched in his hand, his left eyebrow decidedly gone from his forehead.

* * *

A half an hour later...

Being pranked after a night of heavy drinking seemed to function a lot like getting scared while having the hiccups. The girls' trick had frightened the hangover right out of them, and once they'd managed to wrestle down all of the string and mopped up the water, Remus almost felt human again. The others might have been able to see more of the humour in it, had most of the jokes not carried such lasting effects. James' hair had indeed been dyed, and along with their matching lack of leg-hair, Sirius had to wear the remaining half of the handcuffs down to breakfast like a fuzzy bracelet. Peter refused to try and take off the other wax strip, fearing the loss of both of his eyebrows, and no matter how much soap he used, Remus couldn't get the little heart to come off his chest. He'd rubbed until the skin felt raw, but the marker they'd used on him was apparently made with stronger stuff than whatever they'd used to advertise Sirius' 'issues'. However, he did note with some satisfaction that Sirius' forehead still faintly gave him away.

When they finally dragged themselves into the hall and toward their usual table, they found all four girls sitting around with breakfast trays in front of them, looking startlingly fine and not hungover at all.

"There officers!" Sirius barked, pointing viciously; "There's the guilty slags!"

"Oh my god," Marlene gasped. A moment passed as the girls took in the sight of them, before they all burst into laughter.

"Yeah, yeah, yack it up," Remus huffed.

"No, this is amazing!" Mary guffawed, smacking her hands on the table top as the boys joined them. "You guys look amazing."

"You're all evil!" Peter seethed. "Look what you've done to my eyebrows!"

"What eyebrows?" Lottie teased. Peter gave her a sharp jab to the shoulder for it, which she returned, twice as hard. "Oh stop fussing—you can just draw them back on, Picasso."

"I'm surprised you didn't steal all our bloody trousers or something," James said. "What, not creative enough for you?"

Lily set down her tea, smirking. "Too much work."

"But you'd dye my hair?!"

At that the girls started laughing again, this time joined by several kids from neighbouring tables.

"What am I supposed to do with this?" Sirius demanded, waving his handcuff in the air.

"Ask one of the kitchen ladies for some lard," Marlene shrugged.

"If I were you, Black, I'd count myself lucky that I didn't get the rest of my hair shaved off," Lily added sweetly.

"You—!"

Before Sirius could finish, Mary pulled a lolly from her pocket and ripped the wrapping off, shoving it into his mouth. “You’re so much prettier with your mouth shut, love,” she cooed, making Marlene snort into her glass of water.

“Cow,” Sirius mumbled around the sweet.

Remus shook his head hopelessly. “Did you bloody roofie us or something?”

“Absolutely not—you were just that pissed,” Mary said. “Practically begged for that tattoo, didn’t you?”

“I’m sorry—the what?”

"Oh, haven’t you seen it yet?” Lottie asked innocently. “Clyde did such a good job.”

Stunned, Remus touched a hand to his chest. It twinged.

“You mean you actually tattooed Moony?!” Peter cried.

As if others kids weren't already staring, the dining hall went completely silent, and several more jaws dropped open. Feeling suddenly haggard again, Remus lowered his head slightly.

“Thanks for that, Pete. I can hear it now—‘heard he got it in prison’.”

“You said it didn’t even hurt,” Marlene blagged quietly; “Actually, your exact words were that it felt quite good. You were totally relaxed.”

“What a bloody masochist,” Sirius snorted.

“Oh, fuck off, Mr. ‘Mummy Issues’.”

He got the bird for that one, and Remus looked back across the table at the girls.

“But I don't get it, what does ‘LE’ even mean?”

“Oh? You mean you didn’t realise?” Lottie hummed.

Slyly, each of the girls looked to Lily, who was back to blushing into her tea.

“It stands for ‘Lily Evans’ of course.”

Chapter End Notes

This was a SUPER fun chapter for me, so I'm shamelessly going to plug my tumblr here. I answer curious questions and post incoming chapter hints upon request. Send me a msg even if you just want to talk about HP in general, I'm always around! <3

I hope you'll understand why Remus (and we, by extension) could not be present for James and Sirius' chat. It's important to realise that we are merely but the omnipresent observer looming over Remus' shoulder, and he cannot be around for every pivotal character moment that exists. I have an idea of what was said between the two boys, and perhaps I'll post a snippet of it on my tumblr or something when I get the time. We shall have to see <3

Songs sung by the band this chapter:
“Communication Breakdown” Led Zeppelin, 1969.
“Pretty Vacant” The Sex Pistols, 1977.
“Rock Me” ABBA, 1975.
And later we feature; ‘Honey Honey’ ABBA, 1974.

Chapter 78: Champions, Heroes, and Everyone In Between

Chapter Summary

It's Sirius' eighteenth birthday, and Remus has a surprise.

Chapter Notes

Okay uhhhhmmmm sooooo today is actually the fic's 1 year anniversary on Ao3, and some lovely anons/friends on tumblr convinced me to post this week's chapter early. I don't feel all that bad, since it's more of a short and sweet thing, but I really hope you enjoy. Thank you for all of the love and care you've shown me and this fic for the last year. Your kindness means the world.

Here's to one amazing year, and hopefully the next <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

If I was a sculptor, ha,
But then again, no,
Or a man who makes potions in a travelling show;
I know it's not much, but it's the best I can do,
My gift is my song, and this one's for you…

- "Your Song" Elton John, 1970

On the morning of his eighteen birthday, Sirius got two phone calls. One from Mr. Potter's lawyer (until then Remus hadn't been fully aware that lawyers needed their own lawyers in the first place) and one from his parents. Relief came when he picked up the receiver and found that it was not the stern, haunting voices of Walburga and Orion Black, but rather, the warm, jewel-toned accents of the Potters, calling to wish their second son the bestest of birthdays.

Sirius did not bother to hide his tears this time.

Really, they should've known when the call came straight to the dormitory that evening. The Blacks never called their line directly. Remus let Sirius have his moment with his family—joined by James as they shouted happily into the phone loud enough that they could be heard all the way in the common room. The rest of their friends were slouched around on the couches in front of the fire, sharing popcorn while Peter tried his best to sort out the TV James had managed to nick as dorm head for the special occasion. They had to negotiate terms outlining the sworn lack of alcohol just to get it, but considering most of the school was still reeling from Halloween, nobody seemed to mind much.

“Blasted piece of—” Peter grunted, smacking the top of the telly as it continued to fizzle with static. “Knew we should’ve grabbed the other HMV model.”

“What time is the show supposed to be on?” Lottie asked over a yawn.

“Seven,” Remus answered, slouched down very comfortably between Mary and Marlene. He was excited—they never got to watch the Pops on the night it showed, since televisions weren’t allowed in the dorms on school nights. Better yet, every single one of them had a hat to throw into the ring; Queen was showing it’s newest single, leaving Remus positively giddy in his seat, and ABBA and Bowie were playing as well. It was sure to be a stacked performance.

“Should you be smoking that inside? You’re still a prefect during off-hours, you know,” Lily said from a couch over, glancing pointedly at the cigarette in Remus’ hand.

“Unless you’re trading places with me tomorrow as Regulus Black’s baby-sitter, you can sit with the smoke, Evans.”

“You’ll never get over that.”

“It’s training for the future. I’m practising holding a grudge.”

“You’re practising being a nob.”

Remus smiled to himself and took another drag before Mary leaned over to pluck it from his fingers.

“Speaking of Regulus,” she started, taking a drag; “I wonder how he’s taking all of this. Sirius being practically adopted by the Potters and all that.”

They all looked at Remus pointedly.

“I don’t know, okay?” He huffed. “We only have to do prefects’ stuff alone together a few times a month and he usually just refuses to speak to me."

"What is it you're doing tomorrow?" Marlene asked, tucking her toes up under his thigh. Marlene's feet were always as cold as Lake Dubh.

"Music class," Remus answered, unenthusiastically.

"Like teach?"

"Mhm. Primary music teacher took ill, and Sheila's got choir practice. She asked if Regulus and I would do it instead. It was either that or gym class with the sixth years."

"That's brilliant though!" Lily applauded. "I bet you'll be a great teacher."

Remus didn't bother discouraging her, but it was hard not to think about the sour face Regulus had put on when they'd been asked to step in. So far neither of them had managed to say a kind word to one another, though Remus hardly thought it his fault. He'd tried apologising to Regulus, but the younger boy stood firm in his resentment. Remus had even tried putting himself into his shoes for a bit—even if he and Sirius were constant adversaries, he couldn't imagine losing your only brother to some other family felt very nice—but Regulus wouldn't have it.

Just keep your big nose out of my business, he'd said, the last time they'd been paired up for duties. And Remus had immediately resolved himself to do just that. If Regulus was going to stay such a sour sod, then he could do it on his own.

"I hope we're not late!" Sirius cried, appearing behind the rest of them. James followed a second laster, drumming his hands along the sofa back on either side of Remus' head in excitement. Sirius was still sniffling a bit, but he quickly wiped his cheeks and no one tried shaming him for it.

"How'd it go then?" Mary asked happily. "You filthy rich again?"

"Positively mucky," Sirius teased. Remus went to grab his cigarette back from Mary, but Sirius swung in, stealing it first.

"Monty's lawyer said I could access the funds as soon as we get back to London," he said. "It's all mine baby. Full pay-out."

"And what is the first thing you're going to buy, now that you're rolling in it?" Asked Lottie.

"I know," Remus replied snidely, but Sirius had already given him a knowing look.

"The first thing I'm gonna do when we leave school is buy us a great big flat in the middle of the city, that way we can peddle our music all day and all night. And then, I'm upgrading the stereo—and then! ... A motorbike."

"A motorbike?" Marlene exclaimed.

"Not this again," Peter groaned, still buried amongst the telly's wiring.

"He's been obsessed for weeks," Remus surmised, when the girls all turn to look at him. "Ever since Effie sent him that copy of the NME with a photo of Marc Bolan on the cover, riding some fancy bike."

"It was a Benelli seven-fifty, Moons! That's six-cylinders!"

"Marc Bolan," Mary echoed; "Ain't that the singer that just died?"

"No!" Sirius barked, waving his arms around. "I'll have no talk of Marc Bolan's death on my birthday! I'd much rather imagine him alive and poncy, as per usual—with me, myself, and I happy in my brand new flat, thank you very much."

"Good luck with that," Lily sniggered. "With the way you play music, I'll bet you'll have neighbours pounding on your front door within hours."

"I welcome the challenge! Perhaps they'll learn to appreciate the music of our generation," Sirius said, giving James a high-five of camaraderie.

"And what if they just complain?" Lottie sneered.

"Then I'll buy their flat too. Then you girls can move in!"

"In that case I'll be the one complaining," Marlene said, just as Peter gave a great 'A-HA!' and the television's screen cleared to reveal The Top of the Pops' logo.

"It's starting!" Lottie trilled, as Peter dove into the cushions in front, nearly upsetting one of the bowls of popcorn.

“Oh, shit—Moons!” James called right after. He jut his finger toward the dorm’s hallway. “Almost forgot, a call’s waiting for you.”

“Tomny?” He asked, suddenly hopeful.

“Uh-uh. Giles, I think.”

Remus settled back into the couch. “Oh, well don’t worry about it.”

“Shouldn’t you get it?” Marlene asked him.

“Nah, not interested. Been avoiding their calls. It’s just Dad wanting to preach about my marks anyway.”

“Smart move,” Sirius said, as James came around the side of the sofa and slid in next to Lily. Playfully, she reached up and twirled the strip of blonde in James’ hair around her finger, giggling when he kissed her wrist. James, ever the most-gracious prankster, had been the first to admit that he’d come around to the skunk-like appearance, even if his mum was likely to flay his arse when he got home. He was less impressed by Remus' new tattoo, but that could be said for most of them. Only Sirius had been excited by it—Sirius, who felt the need to drown himself in every societal-taboo he could get his hands on. Between talk of motorbikes and tattoos, Remus was starting to wonder what the odds were of Sirius moving to London and joining a gang, same as Tom.

Taking a moment to streak forward and toss the smoked cigarette into one of the other fireplaces, Sirius returned to the sofa and leaned over its back, trying to squeeze his arms in between Mary and Remus’ shoulders.

"C'moooan, Macdonald, budge up a bit!”

“You budge up, I'm comfortable,” Mary grumbled, busy watching the show’s host.

“It’s my birthday, you heartless hag.”

“Then sit in Remus’ lap or something.”

Appearing enticed by the idea, Sirius shot Remus a cheeky look before leaning forward, scooping Mary up around the middle and manoeuvring her onto his own lap as she shrieked in surprise. It was enough room for all of them that way, and Remus could feel Sirius pressed up against him from ankle to shoulder. If their friends weren't so close by, he'd have been tempted to do something about it.

“You’re impossibly cheeky,” Mary chastised, flicking Sirius in the nose as he kept hold of her around the waist.

“It’s why you love me,” Sirius said smugly, settling back into the sofa. As Mary shook her head and reached over to the popcorn bowl in James’ lap, Remus spared a glance to his right, gingerly, and found Sirius watching him.

"What?"

The show’s credits rolled and the girls all began to cheer at the flash of ABBA’s name. Still looking cheeky, Sirius leaned in.

“You haven’t given me anything for my birthday,” he whispered playfully.

“Gotta be alone first."

Sirius’ eyes flashed hungrily. ‘You’re filthy’ he mouthed, making Remus raise his eyebrows suggestively.

Suddenly a face appeared between them—Davey Gudgeon—and Remus nearly leapt a foot off the couch.

“Wicked! You guys got the telly in. Who they showing tonight?” The other boy asked, elbows propped up on the couch back.

“No one you—” James started, before Lily shoved a fistful of popcorn into his mouth.

“Queen, Bowie, ELO, Smokie,” Remus recited.

“And ABBA,” Lottie added.

“Champ!” Davey declared, before smacking Sirius on the shoulder. "Hey, heard it was your birthday, mate! Your guys' show on Halloween was ace too, by the way. Even you, Potter. Didn't know you and Pettigrew joined the group."

"Thanks, Gudgeon," James replied dully, mouth still full of popcorn.

In the end, Davey's entrance marked the first of many, and by the time they got to Queen’s promo, they’d been joined by a small army of kids. Word tended to get around fast when there was a telly available outside of weekends, and plenty of technologically-starved students from other Houses piled in, practically sitting on top of one another just for a chance to get a glimpse at the tiny screen. When Mercury's eyeliner-clad image appeared, Sirius grabbed Remus around the shoulders and shook him in glee as everyone cheered and sang along.

"Turn it up, Pete!" Sirius cried.

The song was brilliant—a real stadium anthem. It touched that part of Remus deep inside that felt just like that little washout from Blackheath, the one desperate to fit in wherever he could. He wasn't sure how he felt about Mercury's choice of spandex, but it was cool enough to leave Sirius enraptured.

"Just look how his mouth moves!" he crowed. "Man, if I could sing like that..."

Remus didn't say it, at the risk of embarrassment, but he thought that if Sirius wanted to, he could've sung just like that. And apparently he wasn't the only one. All around them kids leaned in to smack Sirius on the shoulders in eager praise, joining in when he began to belt out the lyrics with soppy dedication.

"We are the champions! We are the champiooons! No time for looosers—!
'Cause we are the champiooooons—! Of the woooorld!"

It was pure adrenaline—it was why Remus loved Queen. And then Bowie came on, and he knew instantly why Sirius loved him. It was the title track from his latest album, Heroes, which they must have listened to half a million times already, but seeing it performed live—there was nothing like it. As the Starman's gentle tenor spread out from the telly's speakers, James hushed the common room. Instantly every kid became slack-jawed with awe, and Sirius went instantly still. He was gone for it, a total fan. Watching him watch Bowie was like watching an artist marvel at his favourite masterpiece, and when Bowie hit his falsetto Remus was rewarded for his dedication when he felt Sirius shiver against his shoulder.

'And the shame was on the other side,
Oh, we can beat them forever and ever,
Then we could be heroes just for one day!'

Heroes. He liked the song. It was his favourite, he decided. But compared to the thrill he got from watching Sirius, it was all rather null. Slipping his hand down between them and the couch, Remus chanced the moment where he could hold Sirius' hand and feel the strength of his emotions in the gentle tremor of his fingers. This was what they were, what they were determined to be.

Champions and Heroes.

"I wonder what that felt like," Sirius whispered, turning his face into Remus' shoulder so his lips brushed him as he spoke; "To be there. To sing like that."

As the song came to a close, replaced by the loud bleating of Showaddywaddy and the other kids around the common room, Remus leaned into Sirius' ear, hidden out of sight by the high-backed sofa and Mary's hair.

"You'll know," he told him, "one day."

He left the barest breath of a kiss on Sirius' cheek and very quickly pulled back, refusing to meet his gaze for the rest of the song. It was embarrassment, but Sirius quelled all of it when licked his finger and stuck it in his ear in retaliation.

"I can't believe that's the single they chose to show on television," Sirius said, once they'd all sat through ABBA's promo and the show had ended. " 'What's the name of the game?' Try, 'he's just not that interested, doll'."

Mary spun around in Sirius' lap and smacked his shoulder. "I swear, you're the most unromantic musician I've ever met."

"You say that as if you've actually met other musicians."

She hit him again.

James hopped up from the couch. "Can you stop being a tosser long enough to sing or are we gonna have to start recruiting?"

A gasp went up from all of the girls, as well as several others.

"You mean you're singing tonight?" Lily asked.

Sirius glanced at Remus and gave a nonchalant shrug. "We got to talking yesterday—as we were cleaning up our dorm room, I might add —thought it was kind of a shame we didn't end up singing any of our own songs at the party."

"Nooo—actually?" Mary spun around on Sirius' lap again, nearly falling off the couch. “You mean you’re finally going to play something original?”

“Just one song,” Remus interjected sheepishly. “It’s Sirius’ birthday, so Sirius’ song.”

“I think you’ll like it,” Peter promised, hopping up and scuttling over the corner of the common room. Everyone turned around to watch as he dragged the sheet off of his drum kit, which they’d neglected to drag back to the music room for that very reason.

"Pardon me, love," Sirius said, before promptly flipping Mary off of his lap. She didn't even complain—too excited—and as the girls turned around on the sofa to watch, the four of them piled onto their instruments, flicking on the amps and testing each cord. It was a small crowd, made up of mostly Godric boys, but it was enough to leave Sirius looking giddy as he took up his microphone.

" 'ello, 'ello," he murmured, tapping the head until feedback echoed throughout the room.

"Yes, who's is it?" One of the boys chanted back, making everyone laugh. Sirius too, until he was practically shouting into the mike again.

“Oh, I almost forgot! Evans, you brought that camera 'a yours, right?”

Perking up, Lily nodded and reached over the side of the sofa for her bag. From there Remus got to watch as she pulled out her polaroid camera, cradled in its dingy leather case that was peeling at the corners. A hand-me-down from Petunia, she'd once told him.

“You want me to take photos while you play?” She offered, checking the film.

“Yes," Sirius drawled; "but I figured that now that I’m officially rolling in it on my own, I should send word back to Bath. Mum and Dad ought to know I'm doing alright for myself, yeah?”

“You mean to your parents-parents?” Remus asked gingerly.

“Precisely.” With a devious grin, Sirius grasped the mike and leaned in toward Lily as she held her camera up to her eye. “ ‘Toujours pur’ this, bitch,” he said, before licking the microphone and flipping the camera the bird. The entire room sniggered, and even Lily smirked as she snapped the photo.

“Like a real rock star,” Mary laughed.

“You’re cleaning that microphone,” Peter called after.

Sirius grinned, taking the photo from Lily and pocketing it. “Whatever you say, Wormy. Now you lot ready?”

The room cheered; ‘Yeah!’

“You don’t sound ready! I said—Are you ready?!”

“YEAH!”

“Alright then! This one’s called—”

James interrupted Sirius with a cheeky lick on the guitar, ripping up and down the strings and making everyone grin excitedly. “This is ‘Downtown Girls’!” He shouted.

“What the tosser said,” Sirius grinned. “Pete, be a dear and count us in.”

* * *

They were true to their word and only played the one song—except the girls liked it so much that they demanded that they play it twice more. They sounded better sober, but it wore on the nerves a lot more. By the end Remus’ fingers were tingling. Playing in front of others always brought a rush, but even he had to admit that there was just something about listening to people cheer for their own music. Lyrics and notes they’d created out of thin air—their art! It was validating somehow, like; Yeah, I did that! I did it with my friends—my band. Together.

A part of him wished he’d had enough courage to play the song he’d written for Sirius in front of everyone, but he hated his singing voice and was too worried about tripping up around the guitar. So he waited until late that night, when everyone else had gone to bed. By the time he was creeping back across their bedroom it was nearly midnight, a few precious minutes until it wasn’t Sirius’ birthday at all anymore. He wasn’t the least bit tired, and he knew Sirius wouldn’t be either, not after the looks they’d been giving each other all evening.

Sirius was slipping out from behind his curtains before Remus even made it to the foot of the bed, smile glowing in the blue light of the moon. While he grabbed a spare blanket, Remus nabbed Andy's guitar case, enjoying the look of confusion that flitted across Sirius' features. Together they slipped out of their bedroom, back down to the abandoned common room, where Sirius could finally moan and groan without anyone around to overhear.

"Fuck winter," he hissed, shivering in front of the hearth as he prodded the fire back to life. Once they had a decent flame going, he joined Remus back on the couch, draping a wool blanket across their laps for extra warmth. Remus sighed happily, busy tracing patterns along Sirius' ankle beneath the blanket. He'd left enough space between them just in case anyone wandered downstairs for a midnight snack, but their legs were tangled together, filling the space between them.

"This is nice," he said.

"Mhm. You sure you're not too tired though?" Sirius asked teasingly. "I know you have to be up early tomorrow."

"It's music class with a bunch of nine year-olds, not exams. I'll be fine."

"I meant spending time with my brother," Sirius snorted. "Takes years off your life, that one."

"Regulus is bearable," Remus said, rubbing Sirius' ankle beneath the blanket. "Have you thought about trying to talk to him at all?"

"He wouldn't give me the time of day anyway."

"Won't know unless you try."

Sirius nodded glumly. "Probably my job, right? Being the older brother and all that. I think I'm just bitter. It's like—I see him and all I can think about is the damage. How fucked up we both are. And then he talks like he hates me and I know that the damage doesn't even mean anything. It just means we're wrecked. That we've lost."

"Not lost," Remus said. "Maybe it just means that you could be better."

Sirius' eyes flickered to him, glowing in the light of the fire. "I think about him. I do—all of the time... but I don't know how to talk to him."

“Start with that then. Just be honest. Whenever you’re ready.”

Sirius took a deep breath. “Thanks, Moons. You always know just what to say. And you’re there for me, I don't think I've ever told you what that means.”

“You don't have to. I know."

They shared a small smile, and the tension broke a moment later, when Sirius sat up straighter on the couch and clapped his hands together. “Alright. You gonna tell me what this ‘surprise’ is now, or am I gonna have to guess? Because I’m guessing that it has something to do with Andy’s Gibson.”

“You’d be guessing right,” Remus said, glancing at the guitar they’d left sitting on the floor.

“Alright.” Sirius leaned down to pick up the acoustic. “What am I playing?”

“Well, actually…” Smiling shyly, Remus reached across the sofa and plucked the guitar from his boyfriend’s hands, setting it across his own lap.

“No way,” Sirius laughed. “You? Really?”

Remus shrugged. “I might’ve been doing some practising with James.”

“Colour me bloody… For me?”

He nodded, sheepish.

“Wow,” Sirius breathed. “What a great gift—never thought you’d look so sexy holding my guitar. Like a naked chick on a motorbike.”

“You’re so stupid.”

Sirius clapped his hands together once more in glee. “Well, fine then—go on! Don’t make me wait all night!”

Clearing his throat, Remus set his fingers on the strings. He hesitated, wondering why it was harder to play in front of Sirius than an entire common room of kids, and Sirius reached across and slid a comforting hand across his arm.

“Hey, it’s just me.”

Sirius' touch gave Remus goosebumps, which he had to shake off to keep going. "Alright," he said; "but remember, I'm not a singer."

Sirius only smiled at him.

Straightening up, Remus took a deep breath and began to play. It was a slow melody, one of the ballads Sirius was always saying he'd be famous for one day, but he was too nervous to play any faster anyway.

Just do it, he told himself; Over the waterfall.

"Hey, I bet you've heard the rumours,
You can only guess which ones of them are true;
But I've always liked how you talk of future
Yeah, I'd go anywhere if you asked me to."

He hit the bridge, and sparing a glance up at Sirius' handsome face, Remus found a grin waiting for him.

"Beautiful," Sirius gasped. "Christ..."

Keep going, he thought to himself. Don't stop now.

"You say want a nice place with enough space,
So we can sit and watch the sun rise and fall;
And talk about what comes next,
With you I'd do it all."

Sirius' lips parted. It was awe. Remus had to look down at the guitar to keep playing.

"And there's that future, always haunting,
Hangin' just out of our reach;
But if you had told me that you saw it,
I wouldn't second guess your speech;

And I can only have you if you love me,
So tell me now, please don't taunt me;
'Cause I won't reach for that future,
If it don't include you and me;

How nice a future like that could be…"

He looked up again, voice filtering out; "How nice it could be…" and all it took was Sirius' grey eyes, ignited orange by the fireside for his fingers to slip clumsily on the strings. Slouching forward with relief, Remus laughed inexplicably. He was almost wheezing, and when his nose whistled with a snort, Sirius laughed along with him.

"There's more," he fumbled, "but that's the first bit. It'll probably sound better when you sing it."

"No, it's brilliant," Sirius told him. "Brilliant like you."

Sirius leaned in to kiss him, and Remus glanced at the doorway, just in case. Cheekily, Sirius pinched his chin in one hand.

"If you're that worried, we could always go back into the cupboard."

Remus sagged again, exasperated and in love, and took Sirius' hand, placing a kiss on his palm before yanking the woollen blanket up over their heads. Hidden away, he could still see the glow of the fire peeking through the holes in its weaving, scattering little stars of orange light across Sirius' face. It reminded him instantly of that final day in his bedroom on the Lupin Estate, where he got to watch the sun rise and fall on Sirius.

"I want to hear the rest," Sirius told him. "When you're ready."

Oh yes.

"So bring me back to July," Remus murmured; "Warm and rich with soft orange skies…"

Sirius began tracing a finger along Remus' jaw. "Is that the next line?"

"No, it's something else," he whispered, closing the space between them and kissing his love tenderly.

"Happy birthday, Sirius."

* * *

Friday 4th November 1977

Remus wasn't used to arriving first. Normally, Regulus was on the premises ages before he'd even considered how long it was going to take him to walk from point A to point B. This time though, Remus found himself waiting for his partner outside the colourful Hufflepuff building, fingers itching for a smoke. The eastern half of campus, kept for the primaries, was completely akin to its western brick and mortar counterpart, except that the pavement was constantly covered in colourful chalk drawings and everything was built to be no higher than Remus' shoulder.

He was starting to wonder if he'd finally reached the day that Regulus Black had skived off from his prefect duties when the youngest Black brother came stomping up the pavement, his violin case tucked under one arm and a stack of music sheets held precariously in the other.

"Unlike you to be running late," Remus teased lightly. "Class doesn't start for another ten minutes."

"Photocopier jammed," Regulus huffed, missing the joke.

Adjusting Sirius' acoustic on his shoulder, Remus opened the door for him and eyed the sheet music as Regulus passed. The staves looked a lot like what James would call "mouse tracks", endless signatures, ties, and looping notes.

"You're not gonna try and teach them that, are you?" He asked warily, following the other boy down the hall.

"It's only the chorus portion of 'Für Elise'. Some of Beethoven's simplest stuff."

"They're nine."

"I was playing this at five."

"Do you know how insufferable you sound?"

Regulus rolled his eyes. "We're here to teach them, aren't we? We don't even need a piano for this."

Remus gestured about the hallway, at its array of colourful student cubbies and the tiny wellies that sat beneath each. "Yes well, I don't know about you, but I don't exactly see many Stradivarius violas sitting around. We're just supposed to be supervising the class—you know, let them bang their drums for an hour and then go home."

"You mean you're okay with just making noise and leaving it at that? Some musician."

"Whatever," Remus scoffed. "Do what you want, I'm not going to fight with you."

Regulus turned his nose up. "Suits me just fine, you can sit in the corner and watch. Maybe you'll actually learn something."

Remus didn't get the chance to fire back a retort; ahead of them, a door opened and a stout woman slipped out, slamming the door after herself. She straightened up when she spotted them, adjusting her blouse. There was a smear of paint on her cheek.

"Ah! Are you two the prefect students they sent over for music period?"

"Yes…?" Remus answered, regretfully.

"Oh good!" She plastered a smile on her face and surged towards them, blazing right past. "I'm just the secretary—and you're just in time for my tea break. The kids have been darling angels today. They've already got their instruments out—I'm sure a few stern words will have them in tip-top shape. Have fun with the lesson, see you in an hour!"

Before they could so much as say something, the secretary was halfway down the hall, waving as she turned a corner and disappeared out of sight.

"Is she allowed to do that?" Remus asked. "Just... leave?"

"C'mon," Regulus just grumbled; "Before they set the curtains on fire or something."

Following each other down the hall, they opened the door and strode inside. The kids were clearly surprised to see them; as the chatter came to an abrupt halt, twenty pairs of eyes turned on them in question, various instruments and noise-makers already in hand. No sooner had Remus shut the door behind himself did he have a child before him. The boy was rather chubby around the middle, with a whip of wheat-blonde hair on top of his head, and he was looking at Remus like he'd just arrived on a spaceship and demanded to be taken to his 'leader'.

“Er—hey man.”

“You’re not Mrs. Bean,” the boy said indignantly.

“Nope, I’m not.”

“Where’s Mrs. Bean?”

“Off for the day,” Regulus answered cuttingly. Holding his violin aloft as though afraid their tiny hands might obliterate it with the slightest touch, he weaved through the kids’ seats until he’d made it to the front band stand of the music classroom.

“I’m Mr. Bl—” Regulus flinched as one of the kids blew horribly on a recorder. He glared at the boy until he looked next to tears, and then cleared his throat again. “I’m Mr. Black. Lupin here, and I have been appointed as your music instructors for the afternoon.”

“You’re really tall,” a girl up the front shouted at Remus.

“Do you talk out of turn in front of Mrs. Bean?” Regulus asked her.

“You’re really short,” the girl shot back, making Remus snort and therefore allowing the entire class to descend into a furious giggle-fit.

"Five-foot-nine is not short."

Remus resisted the urge to burst out laughing. If only Sirius could hear how alike they truly sounded.

“Rich kids, eh, Reg? Can’t live with ‘em, can’t teach ‘em.”

Regulus ignored him, clearing his throat furiously and holding up his stack of music sheets, which he kept rearranging into different orders. “We’re here to learn. I’ve brought with me a piece even a stray dog could learn to play. Now does anyone recognise these staves?”

A paper ball flew through the air and smacked Regulus in the side of the head. His eyes widened, and Remus watched as his face turned a raging red.

“Who threw that?”

The kids burst into laughter.

Before Regulus could lose his mind entirely, Remus intercepted, stepping in front of the band stand and leaning over it. “Reg, they’re kids. I'm pretty sure they can smell fear. Don't let them get to you."

"They aren't!"

"Then maybe try levelling-out some, okay?" Gingerly, Remus took a step back and faced the class, awkwardly clearing his own throat. "Okay, well, can anyone tell me what you were last practising with Mrs. Bean?"

One of the girls held up a hand, her clarinet balanced precariously in her lap; "We were practising 'Daisies in the Meadow'."

"Christ," Regulus said under his breath.

" 'Daisies in the Meadow'," Remus mused, slouching back on an empty desk in the corner of the classroom, "sounds quite captivating, don't you agree, Mr. Black?"

Regulus gave him a sharp side-eye and came around the front of the band stand. "Alright, fine. Who's got the sheet music?"

There was a bit of rustling, and one of the kids from the flutes section handed him a doodle-encrusted paper. The song was apparently not up to par with Regulus' expectations, as his shoulders sank in disappointment while he passed the tablature back to the fifth year.

"Fine, whatever, let's hear it then. Trumpets, give me an E flat."

Rather than the correct note, Regulus was promptly answered when one of the students gave a horrible fart, letting it rip across the classroom as all the kids shrieked in horror and delight.

"Sounded more like a low-G to me," Remus cackled.

Regulus rounded on him. "You're supposed to be helping me!"

"I'm sitting in the corner like you told me to! Maybe if you asked nicely…"

"Not on your life, Loony."

Remus shrugged and leaned down, popping the clasps on Andy's guitar case and pulling out the beaten-up acoustic. It was certainly well-loved (Sirius had let Peter sketch flowers along the side of his body ages ago and the strap was fraying at both ends) but Remus set it across his lap anyway and tucked a pick between his teeth as he fiddled with the tuning. When he looked up he found nearly every set of eyes on him, kids craning their necks to get a look at the guitar. Even Regulus had paused, eyeing the instrument the way he always did when Remus brought it around. It was hard sometimes to remember that he was Andy's cousin too.

Remus pulled the pick from his lips and scanned the room. "How long have you guys been practising 'Daisies in the Meadow'?"

"Since September," one of the kids called.

"Bloody hell," Regulus muttered.

"He said a bad word!"

Remus stood up from his corner desk, throwing the guitar strap over his shoulder. "Okay, who here actually likes 'Daisies in the Meadow'?"

None of the kids raised their hands.

"Well, who likes listening to music?"

Hands shot skyward.

"That's what I thought. See, Mr. Black and I really love music, and if you keep up with it long enough, one day you'll be able to play whatever you want, whenever you want. Like—" He hit the first several notes of "Smoke On the Water", because he knew it would make Regulus pucker, and not a single laugh or childish shriek interrupted him; "Like that. But really, I'm just an amateur—you should hear Mr. Black. He's practically a virtuoso."

Remus looked back at Regulus, who suddenly appeared rather nervous to be put on the spot. The kids leaned forward in their seats, utterly hooked.

"It's nothing," Regulus stammered. "Anyone can play a few basic notes."

"Really? Hm. Well, no need to be humble now." Smirking, Remus stood up and addressed the room. "I want to hear Mr. Black play, how 'bout you guys?"

The nods were slower, but eventually kids were calling out faintly. Remus thought of Sirius, who would never have accepted such a lacklustre response. "I can't really hear you," he started again, "I said, I want to hear Mr. Black play, now how about you?!"

The chorus came more fervently, and Regulus looked about ready to cave in on himself.

“Well, Reg? You heard ‘em,” Remus smiled.

Tapping his fingers against his palms nervously, Regulus finally relented. He reached for his violin case, withdrawing a beautiful violin the colour of mahogany wood and burnt sugar. It was a magnificent instrument; it would’ve been such a shame to have ended up at the bottom of the lake. When he pulled out the matching bow, a little girl from the brass section held up her hand.

“Er—yes, what’s your name?” Remus asked.

“Charlotte."

“One of my best friends is named Charlotte," Remus said. "What’s your question?”

“It’s not a question,” the girl murmured. "I just wanted to know if Mr. Black knew ‘Swan Lake’.”

He turned to Regulus. “Do you?”

“Obviously,” Regulus said flatly. He might’ve called it too simple, or too beneath his station, had Charlotte not been instantly smiling from ear-to-ear.

Pushing his dark hair out of his face, Regulus took up his spot at the front of the class, carefully tucking his violin beneath that primly-chiselled chin. When he set his bow against the strings, it became clear that all of the nerves had drained from him. When he played his eyes were closed; drifting. Remus wondered what he pictured.

The piece was perfection, naturally. Regulus played the theme’s introduction with flawless precision, stopping just before the crescendo as though he knew the exact way to edge his desperate audience into needing more. None of the kids booed him, they were too much in awe. Remus too.

“Fantastic,” he smiled, clapping and earning Regulus an ovation he sheepishly accepted. “Wouldn’t it be cool to just be able to do that?” Remus asked the class. “Should we do that—just pick a song and play it?”

There was a rallying cry of agreement and he wracked his brain for something age-appropriate to play. It had to be easy, since they had no time and no sheet music, but when the idea came to him, it was brilliant.

As Regulus set his violin down, Remus leaned in, whispering his idea into his ear.

“How is that any better than bloody ‘Daisies in the Meadow’?” Regulus demanded immediately.

“It’s fun, Reg. It’s a song they’ll know, and we only have to do the chorus.”

“Go on then. Since you’re so clearly enjoying yourself.”

Remus couldn’t deny it. He’d scoffed at Lily when she’d said he would make a good teacher, having no real experience with kids, but it’d been a while since he’d felt so needlessly silly, and he wanted to make the most of it. The kids would like it, he was sure, but he still needed Regulus’ help.

“C’mon, you’re the protégé—I know you know how to play more that just that violin. And you know how to translate all the notes! I can’t do it without you...”

Regulus’ steel-grey eyes widened a bit, and he looked back to his violin. “Do you at least know how to play it on that dingy guitar of yours? I'm not teaching you too.”

“Hell yeah, I do,” Remus grinned, before grabbing a scrap piece of paper off the teacher’s podium and hastily scribbling out a stave of notes for Regulus to see. He sighed, grumpy for the sake of being grumpy, but took the sheet and turned around to tackle the task at hand. After that it was easy. Remus took the percussion section, while Regulus weaved between the rows of kids, correcting the way they held their instruments and helping them fumble through the correct notes. They’d toned the level of difficulty down a bit more—until it was only the most basic sounds—but eventually after much squeaking and squawking, they had music.

“Okay!” Remus declared, clapping his hands to draw the kids’ attention back to the front of the room. “I actually feel really confident about this, how ‘bout you, Mr. Black?”

“Time will tell, I guess,” Regulus answered, picking up the conductor’s baton.

Remus turned back to the class. “Remember, we don’t need it to be perfect. Noise—music—it’s all a matter of opinion.”

“Or taste,” Regulus muttered.

A girl named Angeline raised his hand. “Can we sing along?”

“Of course! In fact I expect it—from you too, Mr. Black!”

“Yeah, fat chance.”

The kids laughed, and Remus did too, but Regulus just rapped the baton against the podium, clearing his throat.

“And a one, and a two—”

The rallying noise that exploded was nothing like the song they’d just spent the better half of the hour practising. Regulus shivered all over in revulsion, and instantly Remus held up a hand, half-laughing as the hooting trumpets and blaring trombones came to a shrieking halt.

“Maybe we shouldn’t count in,” he offered.

Instead of fighting him, Regulus nodded. “Anything’s better than that.”

“But it was a great start!” Remus trilled quickly, as all the kids stared up at them. “How about we try something else?” Slowly, he started snapping his fingers along with the beat, humming as well. Twenty tiny heads bobbed after him, fingers twitching around their instruments.

“Add in the timpani,” Regulus advised.

Remus nodded, and pointed to the percussion section. “Douglas, he means the really big drum just there. Can you beat it along with my snapping, like we practised?”

The nine year-old nodded and took up his mallet, banging along spectacularly.

“Now cymbals on count four,” Regulus said. “You there—”

“Marley,” Remus offered.

“Marley,” Regulus tried again, “use your pedals to—”

Before he'd even finished, the little girl was clapping away, a huge smile on her face.

"There, that sounds great!" Remus cried.

Regulus had placed a hand over his mouth thoughtfully, staring down the expectant class like Sheila during one of their own lessons. "I want to hear clarinets now, four G notes, high-A, and four D."

There were only two clarinets in the class, and both tripped up their high-A, but Remus high-fived the kids when they were finished. One by one they went through every section as a class, adding them together until finally they had something that was more akin to music than noise.

"This is fantastic," he said when they'd finished, eagerly scooping up his guitar and standing at the front of the class. "What do you guys say we run through it together?"

As the kids trilled enthusiastically, Remus elbowed Regulus. "You gonna play with us? Only if it's not too hard for you, that is."

Arching a brow, Regulus picked up his violin, and together they faced the class.

"I hope those of you who can will sing with me," Remus said, before smiling. "One, two, three—Weeeeee… all live in a yellow submarine! A yellow submarine, yellow submarine!"

And just like that the class was playing. Those who could sing, did, and Remus wasn't the least bit ashamed. He spent so much of his time playing the pessimistic, hesitant asshole, that right then it didn't matter if he was embarrassed or not. He was just an idiot making noise.

"We all live in a yellow submarine! A yellow submarine, yellow submarine!"

The cymbals clashed until their ears twinged—the drums drummed until the floor shook. There was more squeaking and squawking than ever but they were all squeaking and squawking together. It wasn't magnificent—wasn't even that good, but they were nine and happy and making noise; what else could you ask from such small, eager musicians?

"This is going to be stuck in my head until I'm ninety!" Regulus shouted at him without missing a beat.

“Then you’ll have lived a full life!” Remus added; “—A yellow submarine, yellow submarine…!”

They played and played until the secretary finally reappeared, looking distinctly less rumpled but exceedingly shocked to find that they’d managed to get the kids to sit still long enough for an entire lesson.

“Well, aren’t I just chuffed to bits!” She preened. “You two are miracle workers! They should have you back here every week.”

Remus laughed nervously and quickly tucked Andy’s guitar away as the secretary began setting the kids to clean-up. Taking a moment to watch them stack chairs and band stands, he crept over to Regulus’ side as he gathered the music sheets he’d brought with him back into a pile. “Sorry we never got to play any Beethoven, but you have to admit, it was pretty brilliant.”

“It was terrible,” Regulus answered lightly.

“Okay, we’ll compromise—it was ‘brilliantly terrible’.”

He might’ve been seeing things—a side effect of staying up the entire night before with Sirius—but for the briefest moment Regulus actually smiled, dropping his head down and shaking it lightly. Not a dismissal—a friendly exasperation. Somehow, it was refreshing to see.

As Regulus tried to hide his pleased indifference, Charlotte appeared beside him, tugging on his Salazar-green jumper and making him whirl around to face her.

“Is it hard to play the violin?” She asked, all big brown eyes.

“Of cour—” Regulus caught himself, swallowing tensely. “Not… if you’re willing to put the work in. It’s hard work.”

“If I work hard, will you come teach us again?”

Regulus didn’t seem to know what to say to that. It took him several moments to manage; “Uhm… sure.”

Charlotte nodded eagerly and spun on her heel to join her classmates, while Remus just watched in amusement, slinging his guitar up over his shoulder. Regulus caught the look grimly.

“Shut up.”

“I didn’t say anything!”

“You were thinking it!”

“A violin master and a mind reader—is there anything you can’t do?”

Scoffing—albeit more light-heartedly—Regulus picked up his violin and together they said goodbye to the class and the secretary, making their way out into the hall.

“You talk differently with children,” Regulus said eventually, as they passed row after row of colourful cubbies.

“Yeah well, kids can be trusted. They’re honest, and you never have to wonder what they’re thinking. They’re better people than most adults.”

Regulus was quiet, and eventually they emerged on the outside of the building, both blinded by the light of the midday sun. Remus had assumed that with the lesson over, Regulus would leave him there without so much as a goodbye, but he was surprised when he looked back to find him standing there, nervously digging the toe of his shoe into the pavement.

"That was... fun, right?"

Regulus grunted back, still not looking at him. Remus squinted his eyes, considering his options. He could just leave, but then...

Goddammit.

“Reg, if I were to ask you if you actually liked music, what would you say?”

“That I do,” Regulus replied, snapping his head up without a hint's hesitation.

“Alright, why?”

“Why do you?”

“Because it’s something I can do with my friends," he answered. "And because it helps turn everything else off.”

Regulus made a face, and Remus rushed to extrapolate;

“I just mean that when I’m playing, I don’t have to worry about anything else.”

“You’re not worried about sounding awful?”

“Oh, I’m worried,” he laughed; “but there are worse things than sounding awful.”

Regulus paused and then stepped past him. He strode forward a bit, like he meant to leave him there after all, before turning around abruptly and giving Remus a hard look.

“I like jazz.”

The confession surprised Remus, to say the least. “I like jazz too. Do you have a favourite?”

“Miles Davis.”

“He’s amazing. You have good taste. Is there… anything else you want me to know about you?”

Regulus hesitated, but then; “I don’t like being called ‘Reg’.”

Remus’ lips parted for a moment, before he nodded. “Okay, what do you want me to call you then?”

“Just Regulus.”

“Well, alright then. It’s a pleasure to meet you, Regulus Black." Feeling a bit stupid, he held out his hand. "I’m Remus."

He'd really only expected Regulus to scoff and turn away, but Remus should've known better.

Never underestimate a Black.

He watched as Regulus came forward, tucking his sheet music under one arm and taking a deep breath. Then he reached out and took Remus' hand, and giving it the barest squeeze.

“Pleasure to meet you too, Remus Lupin.”

Happily, Remus squeezed back.

Chapter End Notes

Songs: "We Are the Champions" by Queen, 1977 & "Heroes" by David Bowie, 1977. Both are links to 'Top of the Pops' videos that would've been shown on Sirius' actual eighteenth birthday <3

Edit: Next chapter, April 22nd. xx babes

Chapter 79: The Long Week

Chapter Summary

> Mid-November, and it's as though the entire school is in a tizzy. Remus assumes he's made it through relatively unscathed, but life has a way of keeping things interesting.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Fat chapter, with smoking and brief allusions to violence and sexual content.
>
> So... got this out a bit late, but better late than never. Also, some of you will see that I did let "Almost Famous" inspire me a little bit with that one 'Rolling Stone' scene, hehe. Happy reading x

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You want me to hit you with a stick,
But all I've got's a guitar pick;
Huh, baby, you're so vicious…

- "Vicious" Lou Reed, 1972

Tuesday 14th November 1977

"It's no use! Mock exams are right around the corner and I can't retain any of it. I might as well give up now…" With a heavy moan, Lily pressed her forehead onto her open law textbook, stifling all chances of studying. Another library goer shushed her, and she lifted her head just long enough to shoot them a nasty glare.

"Five minutes ago you were just lecturing us on the importance of flash cards," Marlene replied dully. Across the table, Remus cracked a small smile. Lily's habit of switching between stark reinforcement and utter despair was entertaining to say the least.

"Seven years," the red-head whimpered; "Seven years at this godforsaken school and I haven't learned enough to fill a thimble."

"It's only November," Remus reminded her. "I'm sure you'll reach thimble capacity before uni applications are due."

"No!" She practically shrieked. "Applications have to be in before Christmas. Otherwise, you might as well throw them in the bin. We're already considered too far away to attend interviews—we have to impress on paper or we haven't got a chance."

"If you actually plan to apply, that is," Marlene remarked, eyeing Remus pointedly.

She was right of course. As busy as he was between their exams, musical affairs, and Sirius affairs, Remus was not worried. He had no plans to apply for university. He was going to be in a band.

"Shhhh!"

Madam Pince appeared next to their table, scowling venomously, and all three of them cowered until she'd finally moved on.

"I've only got practice until six," Marlene whispered. "We could study again afterwards. Lupin, you want in?"

Remus shook his head. "Can't, got plans. Band stuff."

It wasn't a total lie. The night before, all four Marauders had agreed that it was finally time to nail down exactly what it was they were going to say to get their families to agree to a life of pursuing music. James planned on pitching the idea as a gap year; they'd take a single year off and if nothing came of Marauders, then he'd go to uni and make something out of himself. Remus had initially thought it a bit of a gamble—a year was mere plonk change in the record industry—but James didn't appear worried. In fact, out of all of them, Peter's parents seemed to be the hardest sell. Mr. Pettigrew was a working man through and through, and although he'd been behind a desk at his newspaper company for many years now, he'd been preaching the value of a hard day's work for as long as his children could remember.

Sirius had it a bit easier. Though he'd received no word as to whether or not he'd been officially disowned by his family, he still wanted to appease the Potters—but then again, no one was going to blame him for following music. He was a prodigy. And as for Remus, well… he was never going to accomplish what Lyall Lupin wanted of him anyway. He just hoped Giles took the news alright. It was enough for Remus just to lounge around in surreptitious bliss, which he did on the floor of their dorm room, gorging on tarts sent by Effie and listening to Dr. Hook play off the stereo.

'We take all kinds of pills, that give us all kind of thrills,
But the thrill we've never known;
Is the thrill that'll getcha when you get your picture,
On the cover of the Rollin' Stone…'

Next to him, Remus watched as Peter licked the jam from his fingers while pouring over his open notebook. Homework aside, the other boy had written and rewritten his 'gap year' pitch about twelve times, though Remus doubted it was bound to get any better. If they didn't have this in the bag by now, then Marauders wasn't going to get anywhere.

"You're so lucky, Remus," Peter said, when he'd caught him staring.

"He's lucky his dad don't give a shit about him?" Sirius replied dryly, trying and failing to roll a spliff on the back of his Latin text.

"No. He's lucky he don't have to hear him bleat about it at all hours. My dad's called three times this week just to ask me about my maths."

"Mine did too," Remus said, taking the spliff from Sirius and easily finishing up the sides for him. "I just never picked up."

James nudged Peter with his foot. "I guess that's the difference, hey Pete?"

"Go on, yack it up. Not all of us can play the delinquent where our parents are concerned. I stop picking up and the next thing I know, Dad'll have me pulling twelve hour shifts in the printer's basement."

"Could be worse," Sirius reasoned, taking back the finished spliff; "You could be designated mail room bitch."

They all shared a shameless chuckle, while Peter huffed and reached for another tart.

"Just you wait," Sirius urged him; "this is gonna be fucking brilliant. A whole year off, with nothing to do but make music. And then once we've cut a demo, we can send it out to all the biggest reps in the country and wait for the offers to start pouring in."

"Come on," James said, "that's a bit far-fetched, even for you."

"Yeah, no way it's gonna be that easy," Peter chipped in. "Besides, most of us are still learning our damn instruments."

"Who gives a shit about that? None of the Pistols could play their instruments, and they got a deal before they'd even added 'Sex' to the name."

Remus, already rolling a second spliff for himself, shot Sirius a brazen look. "Yeah, well I don't want to be like the Sex Pistols," he said. "I want to be better."

"Obviously," Sirius crooned. "We're gonna blow that prissy 'New Wave British Heavy Metal' out of the water! I'm talking billboards as big as the buildings they're printed on. Our faces plastered along Piccadilly Circus and Times Square! 'Top of the Pops', 'American Bandstand', and then some."

"And what shall we do in-between all of that?" James asked. "Toothpaste adverts?"

"If it fits your fancy." Smirking, Sirius raised the spliff to his lips but paused at the last second and reached for the stereo's volume dial. The next thing they knew, the speakers were blaring, and he was singing along.

" 'We got all the friends that money can buy, so we never have to be alone. And we keep gettin' richer but we can't get our picture—!'"

Unable to help himself, Remus belted out; " 'On the cover of the Rollin' Stone!'"

"Fuck yeah," Sirius cried. "That's it!"

A second later and James and Peter had jumped to their feet. "Wanna see my picture on the cover!'"

Sirius joined them; " 'Wanna buy five copies for my mother!'"

" 'Wanna see my smilin' face—ON THE COVER OF THE ROLLIN' STONE!' "

They all laughed and shoved each other, which was just brotherhood for love and endearment, and just like that it wasn't about exams or parents or money anymore, it was just about the music. As the song ended and James went to change the tape, Sirius crouched down ahead of Remus and set the spliff between his lips.

“Whaddya say, Moons?” He mumbled around the filter; “Feel like being on the cover of ‘Rolling Stone’?”

Remus raised his zippo, lighting the tip of Sirius’ spliff and grinning at him over the flame.

“Sounds good to me.”

Sirius breathed in, and when he was done, turned the joint around for Remus to smoke right off of his fingers. And Remus did so, wishing horribly that it were Sirius’ lips he were feeling instead.

They’d been better lately, about including their friends in whatever relationship they sought to maintain. Every secret escapade was strategically planned, and they’d learned not to be greedy. James was showing no further signs of jealousy and Peter seemed to be blissfully unaware, as per usual, but aside from that, their continued efforts had resulted in a growing lack of sleep. Remus had always been a shit sleeper, but now that things were good again, he and Sirius were spending all of their late hours sneaking into each other’s beds—anything just to have a moment alone. When he did manage some shut-eye, Remus practically slept with his songbook under his pillow—poised for any idea that might happen to come along at the most inopportune moment. Though, it had the added benefit of keeping any and all sticky fingers at bay. Sirius was a real curtain twitcher when it came to songwriting, and despite serenading him on his birthday, Remus wasn't sure he was quite ready to give up all of his secrets just yet.

Perhaps the lack of personal time might've been cause for alarm once, but now that they were all well and truly on the same page (or as close as they could get whilst remaining in the closet—revere the closet) Remus wasn’t all that worried. If the youngest Black brother’s recent lack of total aversion for him was anything to go by, then he’d even managed to make a breakthrough where Regulus was concerned. Yes, life was good. Not even Snape had come within twenty feet of them since the bucket incident, which left only one visible downside.

It was time to say goodbye to the East End. For good. There was no place for him there anymore, save maybe Tomny's love. Remus had realised it sometime in early November, after another chat with his oldest friend had taken a glum turn. They hadn’t fought or anything of the like, but he could tell by the way Tomny talked that things were still not ideal. And it was the same thing later that night. After the spliffs and jam tarts, Remus had slunk down to the ground floor to ring him, and was greeted with a Tomny that sounded as ragged and worn as an old tire.

“Things are jus’ busy nowadays,” he said. “And you know me—hate the cold. Can't never stop fuckin' coughin'. But don’t worry yerself, Lu. S'normal.”

“And Lee? How's he?” Remus had asked, once he’d plucked up the courage to say his name.

“Lee is… Well. Lee’s Lee. You know ‘im.”

Not anymore.

He told himself to get over it. Remus had never had a brother, but he had Tomny. And that was enough. He just hoped that Lee and the other boys would find some way to be happy.

“It won’t last,” Sirius told him afterwards. He'd taken up a spot on the bottom of the stairs, but they were alone in the hallway, and rather than being annoyed that Sirius had followed him downstairs despite his wishes, Remus found that he was grateful. He glanced back at his boyfriend, setting the phone back on its hook.

“What won’t?”

“The feeling… like they’re forgetting you. It’ll fade. I promise.”

“And if it don’t?”

Sirius stood, smiling quietly. He pattered over in naught but his socks and grabbed Remus by the belt loops, tugging them together.

“You worry too much.”

Remus arched a brow. “And you don’t worry enough.”

“Yeah, you’re right. But that's what makes us work. We balance each other. Like a jack and coke.”

“You couldn't have tried for a music reference? Lennon and McCartney...?”

“Mm… in that case, I’d say more like Jagger and Richards.” Sirius smirked, and then glanced around to make sure they were really alone. He kissed him then, briskly and with that perfect Sirius mouth that Remus dreamed of every night. It was almost funny—the idea that something as tumultuous as their relationship could bring balance. He loved all parts of Sirius, even the insane, unreasonable half of him that was always getting them into trouble. He never knew what to expect or when he should be expecting it, but that was half the fun; if not all the more reason to worry.

Hard to worry when you were dead asleep, though.

BEEP—BEEP—BEEP!

Morning had come, and Remus lifted a heavy eyelid, letting out a long groan.He could still feel the faint effects of the whisky bottle James had unceremoniously opened upon his and Sirius' return to the dorm room. Things often went that way whenever one of them was feeling sorry for themselves.

BEEP—BEEP—BEEP!

"Potteeeer," he moaned through his bed curtains; "Turn off the bleedin' alarm, you great git! Not everyone likes goes for five-AM runs…"

"It's six-thirty," James fired back, before the alarm was mercifully silenced.

Like most mornings, Remus turned over and collapsed back into his pillow for a few more precious moments of sleep. Distantly, past the cover of his bed curtains, he could hear the sounds of his friend as he puttered about the room. Remus could picture it perfectly; a creature of habit, James would first pop his joints with a stretch, then put on his glasses and head into the bathroom. (He also kissed the photo of Lily good morning too, but they weren't supposed to talk about that.)

Once he'd pretend to run a comb through his hair, James would reappear and stop to open Peter's curtains the tiniest bit, cooing a gentle good morning at him. (He never tried this with Remus, for good reason.) He would end his rounds with Sirius, though his greeting was usually more along the lines of 'up and at 'em, you handsome prig' and not at all like—

"Sirius? ... Where'd you bloody go?"

Shit.

Remus' eyes flew open. There he found Sirius draped gorgeously out on the bed beside him, hair splayed and perfect mouth parted in sleep. They'd finally done it then—one of their secret late-night trysts had turned into Sirius accidentally falling asleep in his bed.

"Pete, seen Sirius have you?"

"How could I?" Peter bleated. "I just woke up."

Horrified, Remus shoved his boyfriend furiously. “Get up! Sirius, get up!”

“Ngh… fuck off, Moons… I’m still—”

There were footsteps, and Remus clapped a hand down over Sirius’ mouth. Instantly the other boy’s eyes shot open and he grappled for his wrist as Remus furiously held a finger to his mouth to shush him. Sirius hadn’t the time to be confused, as a second later James was thumping the outside of the curtains.

“Moony, you seen Pads? He’s not in his bed.”

Ever-so-slowly, Remus withdrew his hand from his boyfriend’s mouth and pulled the blanket up over their bodies. Meanwhile, Sirius replaced the hand with his own, covering a smile so instant it might have been contagious had Remus not so badly wanted to crawl into a hole and die.

“M–Must have gone down to the common room early,” he managed.

“The common room? But he never goes down there this early. He say something?”

“Yeah. He... He said he had a stomach ache!”

"He did?"

"Yup! Must've went out for some air."

“Hm.”

James didn't sound convinced, and Remus was about to throw out another excuse when Sirius pinched his side, drawing an involuntary yelp from him.

“Whoops."

“You little—”

“You okay in there, Remus?” James called.

“Fine!”

Sirius pinched him again, but Remus swallowed the yelp, turning to smack him in the arm. “Stop that!”

“Ow… Stop what?”

“You know, you should really open these curtains of yours sometime,” James carried on. “You’ll get rickets if you don’t see the sun every now and then. Here, let me—”

Before his friend could throw them wide, Remus grabbed hold of the curtains desperately and shouted the only thing he could think of to deter him;

“JAMES! I’VE GOT A BONER!”

There was a beat of silence, and then finally the floorboards creaked. James slowly backing away.

“Oh! Okay, cool. I’ll—er—I’ll just leave you alone for a bit then… Go get some tea, or… cool…”

Remus fought a shudder, but a short second passed and the bedroom door had closed behind James with a distinct click.

“I’m up too!” Peter called a second later, obviously nursing the rude awakening. “And I’m totally just going to have a shower… YEP! Just gonna step out for a bit and—heh… leave you be…”

More hurried footsteps, and the bathroom door had shut. Immediately Sirius, who had been biting his lip to stave off a laugh, burst into a great guffaw. Remus had to smack him again to shut him up, and by then he was near-on ready to implode from the humiliation of it all.

“Shut up, wanker!" He hissed. "Peter’s still technically in here!”

“Okay, so he’s still in here. But do you want me to do something about that?”

Remus peeked down at his lap. An idiot he may be, but a liar he was not.

“We can’t,” he whispered, even more embarrassed by his early morning standing ovation. “There isn't enough time. I'll just have a cold shower or something.”

The shower turned on, and Sirius smirked. “With what shower, Moony? Now c'mon, don't be a fuddy-duddy. I only need a few minutes anyway.”

Carefully undoing the drawstring of his pyjama pants, Sirius slid a hand up Remus’ hip. With the other he pulled the cloth trousers down, and Remus could feel himself crumbling.

“You’re evil,” he breathed, his voice hitching as his head fell back. “Ugh—Fucking hell...”

“Mmm… I love it when you talk dirty.”

“Stupid... ugh—prat.”

“That’s it, now call me a filthy wanker. That one really gets me going.”

Remus wanted to push him away, but suddenly all he could concentrate on were the knots in the wood on the roof of his bed and the trail of kisses Sirius was leaving along his abdomen. He let his arms drag downwards, across Sirius' shoulders and the roughly-patched skin on his scarred, right-hand shoulder. Then he felt Sirius' tongue and prayed to God that their friends had the good sense to stay away for a bit longer.

He’d kicked Sirius out of his bed afterwards, feeling both satisfied and slightly guilty for the lack of reciprocation, and eventually they’d all made their way down to the dining hall. It was obvious that James didn’t believe the lie that Sirius had somehow slipped past him in the common room, but he was too busy grinning at Remus over breakfast to be all that bothered.

"So Moony, did you manage to play the pink fretboard in peace this morning?"

"Oh yeah, he really beat the bishop dead, alright," Sirius sniggered. "It was a one-string banjo jubilee. Johnson out to play!"

"How would you know?" Remus snapped. "You weren't there—were you?"

Sirius puckered into his coffee, but thankfully James had always been a bit of a snoop whenever it came to his best friend.

"Yeah, where did you go this morning?" He asked. Sirius shrugged, and thankfully Lily was there to shut the conversation for them.

“That's enough, leave Remus and his 'Johnson' alone. We're eating breakfast," she said, busy pouring syrup onto her plate of pikelets. "Are you guys at least excited for the village trip this weekend?"

She's asked her question, but Remus wasn’t really paying attention—he and Sirius had begun a game of footsies beneath the table and he was winning, but his attention was quickly grabbed when Peter began to whinge.

“I would be, if Lupin weren’t so stingy!”

Remus rolled his eyes, knowing instantly what Peter meant. “Come off it already, Pete, I told you I’m not doing it.”

“But I tried again last night and I couldn’t write a thing!” Peter protested. “It’s like a mental block, I need your help!”

“Are you trying to write a song or something, Wormy?” James asked eagerly.

“No, it’s for English. Flitwick’s got us all writing bloody love poems and I can’t do it. But it’s worth a quarter of our final mark! Might not sting as much either, except for the fact that Moony’s had his done for days now, and the stupid sod still won’t show me!”

"I'm not sure calling me stupid is gonna get me to come around any faster, Pete."

"Have a heart, Moons," James said, as he and Peter tilted their heads together to share a pout. Remus ignored it, busy picking at his food, and then suddenly Sirius was nudging him with his elbow. His tone was musing—delighted.

“You wrote a love poem?”

Oh, here we go.

“Shut it. It's for class, and like I already said, I’m not doing your homework for you, Pete, I’ve enough of my own!” Huffing, Remus went to pick up his teacup before lowering it with another lash; “I mean, really—why’d you even take English Lit if you hate it so much?”

“It was either that or public speaking. And I would’ve failed out of Physics!" Peter whined. "Now will you help me or not?”

"I already said no!"

"I know, but I've a feeling you don't quite mean it, so how 'bout this—I'll bring you tea in bed for a week—two weeks, even! Plus, I won't tell anyone you woke up with a stalk-on!"

Remus scowled, while Lily covered her mouth to hide her smile and James and Sirius began to snigger. A second later, the other girls had strolled up to the table with their breakfast trays in hand.

"What's this about Remus and a stalk-on?" Mary asked innocently.

"Thanks for that, Pete," Remus grumbled, grabbing his school bag and tray of dirty dishes and standing up from the table. As he went to leave, Peter clapped his hands together to beg.

"Okay, so I'll write it on my own, but will you at least let me read yours first? Just as inspiration—I promise not to copy!"

"No, not a chance. Get one 'a those other dickheads to help you."

Peter looked desperately at James, who quickly shook his head and swallowed a bite of pikelet. "Sorry, mate. Got no experience with poetry. And my lyrics are still a bit... well."

"Sirius?!"

"Hm. Not sure you can afford my writer's fee, Pettigrew."

Defeated, Peter moaned and dropped his head on the table. Satisfied that his stubbornness had won out, Remus shouldered his school bag without a hint of mercy and left to drop off his empty tray. After stopping to rinse each dish in the student sinks, he gently patted his hands dry and reached for his bag. Inside the innermost pocket, he found the scrap of notepaper he'd torn from its book the day before and gently unfolded it, resisting a grimace. Even as he read the poem over he hated it, but he couldn't stop thinking of Peter and his whining;

At least let me read yours?

Absolutely not. There was no way Remus Lupin was ever going to let that poem see the light of day. He didn't even want to hand it in for marks. It was soppy and embarrassing—exactly the thing he'd feared it would become when their professor had assigned it after weeks of dissecting the romantic blathering of the likes of Burns and Yeats.

“A love poem,” Professor Flitwick had lectured, “should not just be a declaration of intimacy, but a summative assessment of it. What makes love different from any other emotion? From anger or sadness? Love is like an ode to any subject, but what makes your chosen subject worthy of such devotion?”

Remus didn’t much care for poetry himself, but it wasn’t all rubbish. Many of the same techniques went into song writing, but whereas a song could convey a multitude of different emotions, like anger and lust, poetry so often felt bland and boring. A love poem felt twice that. But he’d written it anyway—in a fit of late-late hysteria in which his only thoughts and ideas were made up of Sirius. It was corny and mostly gibberish, but at least some parts of it were truthful.

How wonderful it would be
To one day feel your love and care
On a public street

Buy a two tickets for a show
Midday matinee
And sit in your sweet company

There I imagine how it might be
To run my fingers through your hair
Absent of this body

Now I say,
Everything I will have ever wrote
Would be worth nothing
Without you there to read it back to me.

Bloody Sirius. Of course he’d written the poem to be about him. And that was precisely why no one else would ever see it.

“Hey, hey,” Sirius said, appearing beside Remus as though the fates had summoned him. As Sirius dropped his tray into the sink, Remus frantically shoved the poem away and wiped a hand across each cheek to stifle the blush that he could feel spreading up over his neck and ears.

“H–Hey,” he answered awkwardly. “What d’you have first block?”

“Latin. You?”

“History.”

“Great. Let’s skive off.”

Seemingly recovered, Remus scoffed and grabbed his bag. “I’m not skipping History.”

“Why not? It’s just History. You’re great at History!”

“I’m great at History because I actually go to class. Not all of us are blessed with the innate talent to do absolutely nothing and still come out on top. Which you might not, if you never go."

“But all I’ve got going on is revision, so there’s no point in me going.”

“Ah, yes. Because revision is completely useless when it comes to A-Levels.”

“Audentes fortuna iuvat—fortune favours the bold, Lupin*,”* Sirius recited, as though speaking a dead language was as easy as blowing his nose. He leaned in after, pressing up on his toes so he could look Remus in the eye. “So… you wanna tell me about this poem of yours now?”

“Piss off.” Remus splashed him with dishwater, and Sirius leapt away, more amused than upset.

“Evil,” he muttered, dabbing at the water stains on his shirt. “But actually though—can I see it?”

“No!”

“Why not?”

“You know why, Sirius.”

“Ooh. Does that mean you actually wrote it about me?”

Unable to take any more, Remus turned and began marching for the doors. Sirius followed, naturally, skirting around him like an excited puppy.

"So you did write it about me!"

"Shut up and get out of my way already," He snapped. When Sirius didn't, Remus went around him instead, dodging incoming students and trying not to look anyone in the eye. Sirius followed, naturally, and prodded him sharply on the arm.

"You don't sound very convincing, Lupin."

"Bugger off. I can actually feel your ego inflating."

“Don’t be like that," Sirius laughed; "If it’s a love poem written about me, then at least give us a read.”

“I told you already, piss off.”

“Come onnn.”

"No, I—"

Just as he was about to reach the dining hall's doors, Sirius snatched his bag off of his shoulder and began rifling around inside.

“Now where is the little devil?" He trilled. "You have it on you now, right?”

“Jesus—stop it!”

Remus ripped the bag away and furiously zipped up its top, while Sirius snorted and stuffed both hands into his trouser pockets.

"Ugh! You're such a dickhead!"

"Yeah alright, m'sorry. Shouldn't have grabbed—call it an impulse." Sirius leaned in, voice sing-song; "But if you won’t show me your poem, the least you can do is skip with me.”

He batted his eyelashes, and Remus resisted the urge to punch him in the arm.

"No, I'm busy. You've pissed me off."

"I always piss you off. It's a special talent."

"I’ve a quiz today.”

“Even better! Binns’ quizzes are shite anyway.”

Remus stopped to look at him. It was early; the dining room was still busy with other kids, but no one was paying attention, despite the fact that Sirius was looking as handsome as ever. Swooping hair, a dimple on each cheek and smiling teeth more perfect than any Brit deserved.

Genes—genetics—the grace of God—whatever it was, it wasn't fair. He had the kind of looks that stopped strangers in their tracks, and for some reason, all he wanted was to spend time with Remus. Him—Remus Lupin.

Christ.

“I’m not skipping class," Remus grunted.

“Aw, but—”

“But… I’ll meet you for my next free period.”

Sirius' face lit up.

“… Astronomy building?”

“If you’re so inclined.”

“Mhm,” he hummed quietly—delighted once more; “Yeah, I’m inclined now, but I want to be reclined later.”

Remus smothered a smile. “Get to fucking class, Sirius.”

"Ooh. Yes, sir."

With that, Sirius saluted him and slowly began backing away. He flashed a cheeky wave—all elegant fingers—and pointed at him. You, me—and then one very quick, very crude gesture involving his hand and mouth. Remus nearly floundered, but no one had noticed, and by then the bold, beautiful boy had already disappeared through the doors on his own. It struck Remus then how dating Sirius Black felt a lot like being on a rollercoaster that only went down. Down and down they plunged and even when he was begging for the simple release of an upturn—a moment when his stomach would leave his throat—he never got one. He'd never been on a rollercoaster himself, but liking Sirius was enough to put him off the idea completely. Not that he minded all that much though; the view from the top was quite nice.

Once lessons had finally ended, Remus snatched up his things and practically ran from building to building. It was almost laughable—they saw each other every day, all day! But as he rounded the side of the Astronomy building, the anticipation of seeing Sirius boiled terribly in his gut. My boyfriend, he anticipated, I'm going to see my boyfriend.

Cigarette already balanced between his teeth, he'd just arrived at the base of the Astronomy building's exterior stairs when a pathetic fit of sniffling drew his attention toward the far wall. There he found Jillian Stewart hunched over on the ground, unceremoniously crying into her knees. Silently cursing himself, Remus started a retreat, only to be caught the moment Jillian's head snapped up.

"Oh, Remus," she sniffled, "it's just you."

"Er, hey Jill. You… doing okay?"

Jillian nodded placidly, before her face split into another agonised sob. "N–No, I'm not! Roy dumped me!"

Remus pulled the cigarette from his mouth and clicked his tongue quietly. "Wow, that—erm… really sucks…"

"That arsehole!" She wailed, loud enough that one could've heard it from the primary campus; "All over some stupid argument too! I don't get it—it's normal for lovers to have the occasional spat. Isn't it?!"

"Uh… yes?" At least, for his and Sirius' sakes, Remus sure hoped it was.

"Yes, well that's what I thought!" Jillian moaned. "But the moment I try talking to him, the bloody coward runs off with his tail between his legs! Best eight weeks of his life and you wanna know how he breaks up with me? He gets Bill Crook to pass me a note in French! FRENCH!"

"Do you mean like the class or the language…?"

She only cried harder.

Glancing around desperately, Remus finally pulled the handkerchief James' mum had sent him from his bag. She'd monogrammed his initials onto the corner herself. It was all very Effie.

"Here," he said, squatting down in front of his sobbing classmate and holding out the hanky. Jillian took it to blow her nose and a moment later Remus offered his cigarette as well. She took it just as eagerly, leaning in to let him light the end with his zippo.

"Thanks," she mumbled sadly. "I don't normally smoke."

"I get it." With nothing else to do, Remus settled in next to her, awkwardly patting his palms against the knees of his trousers. "Sorry things didn't work out with Roy. He sounds like a right cunt."

"Oh, he sure is," Jillian said, practically chewing the filter. It made Remus smile a little, and he plucked out a fresh cig for himself and lit up. Now it was Jillian's turn to watch him, which she did out of the corner of her eye, clumsily sucking on the end of her cigarette like a relapsed addict.

"I knew I should've picked you over him," she started, wiping her cheeks. "Guys at this school treat girls like absolute rubbish, trampling over our feelings like they're worth nothing at all. At least you never did that. You were nice."

Suddenly worried that Jillian was about to mistake his awkward friendliness for interest, Remus scrambled to correct himself;

"Jill, I'm sorry but I really don't—"

"I know," she sighed; " 'Farrah' and all that…"

He raised the cigarette to his lips, eyes on the ground. "Yeah, sorry…"

"Don't be. It was a sweet lie."

Remus sucked back sharply—straight into his lungs.

"You knew—" cough; "it was a—" cough; "lie?!"

"No... but you confirmed it just now."

Bested, Remus slumped back against the brick wall.

"I'm—sorry," he wheezed. "For lying—to you."

Jillian shrugged shyly, taking a drag.

"For what it's worth, I'm sorry too. I got it in my head that we could be something, the two of us—but no. You were nice enough about it. Just wish I'd chosen someone better than bloody Roy Nilssen." She shook her head pitifully. "I swear, I'm never dating a younger guy again. They're really all the same. Fucking Roy—did you know, he said such awful, immature things when he was angry. Immature wanker."

Remus nodded solemnly, because it felt like the right thing to do. Sirius was technically a year older than the rest of them, he recalled.

Did that make him the younger guy? Had Sirius thought about it?

“Well,” he began hesitantly, “I don’t think you should worry about what dickheads like Roy have to say. Teenage boys are pretty stupid, you know. Take it from a primary source.”

There was a moment of pause, and then Jillian rested her chin on her knees, smiling at him. “It’s hard to be a teen, isn’t it, Remus?”

“Sometimes,” he agreed. Hard to be a teen… Had a certain ring to it.

After a while, Remus put out his cigarette and tapped a second from the box, offering it to Jill. She declined, blowing her nose in his handkerchief once more, and just then another person rounded the side of the building. Expecting it to be Sirius, Remus set the cig between his teeth and looked up, only to find the one and only Roy Nilssen staring them down.

“Fucking finally,” the other boy huffed. “Jill—what the fuck? I've been looking everywhere for you."

"Piss off, Roy," Jillian snivelled.

"Aw, don't be like that." Roy paused, just long enough to give Remus the eye. "C’mon, we can talk about this somewhere else.”

“I’m not going anywhere with you!” Jillian lashed, fisting the hankie and already spitting like a cat. “In fact, I don’t want to see your miserable face ever again!”

Roy gave a low groan.

“Fucking Christ—let’s not have this again, love. I'm sorry, alright? Now why don't you just stand up and give us a snog so we can move on already?”

“Snog? I wouldn't touch you with a ten foot pole, Nilssen! You disgust me, and besides, Remus has helped me come to a few very un-startling revelations. The first being that you’re a royal arsehole!”

Remus resisted a groan. Roy turned on him, clearly vexed, and once again he found himself in the middle of another couple’s spat.

“What’s he even doing here?” The other boy snarled, thrusting a finger in Remus’ direction. “This doesn't have anything to do with him!”

“He’s comforting me! Which is exactly what you should’ve been doing, but instead you went off with your bloody mates! Figured that meant we were done."

"It wouldn't, if you'd just give me a bloody chance to speak!"

Jillian crossed her arms haughtily. "Oh enough, Roy! You've spoken plenty and still somehow managed to say nothing at all. Call me when you finally learn that your girlfriend should come first!"

"You're mental! No real bloke would put a girl ahead of his mates all of the time!"

"Oh, I'm mental, am I?"

With an expression like fury, Jillian leapt to her feet. It was sudden enough that Roy actually flinched away, as though she might gouge his eyes out with her fingernails.

"If I'm mental, then you must be thicker than mud, Roy Nilssen, because I am never going anywhere with you ever again! You're positively the worst boyfriend I've ever had!"

Roy puffed up his chest in a sure attempt to look bigger than he was. "You're not exactly a prize yourself! I mean, how hard is it to put a little effort in every once in a while? You think you're such hot shit, but listening you drone on is like listening to my bloody mother. And no guy wants to show off a girl who can't even be bothered to shave her legs!"

"At least I have hair to shave, you prepubescent monkey!"

At her words, Roy went purple in the face.

"Fucking—whatever!" He spat. "Good luck finding someone else to put up with your shit. They'd have to be deaf to stand your yammering. And half-blind, considering—"

"Alright, I think I've heard enough now."

Remus stood, more than tired of having to listen to the pair of them argue. He just wanted to snog his boyfriend, why was everyone else so insistent on getting in the way?

"What'd you say, dick?" Roy demanded.

Well, there you go, Lupin, his nasty inner voice keened. Sticking your nose in where it don't belong it again.

Might as well commit then, he told it.

"You're the one being a dick, dick."

"Yeah? And why don't you just fuck off!"

Sighing, Remus stuck the unlit cigarette behind one ear. "Look, clearly whatever you two had going on is over, so how 'bout you save us all the trouble and fucking scram already."

"Oh I get it," Roy sneered. "This crazy bint's finally gotten you to come around, huh Lupin? You want my sloppy seconds? Fine. But I warn you, she's a shitty lay."

Jillian made a noise in the back of her throat, and suddenly Remus' patience had reached its end. With a tight-lipped smile, he raised his hands as though admitting defeat, but when Roy scoffed and turned away, Remus' hand shot out. He grabbed the other boy round the arm, throwing him up against the brick wall and pinning him there with his wrist locked behind his back. It was the same move Lee and Doss had been using on him for years, only now he was the one in control.

"There," Remus huffed. "Let's try this again, shall we?"

Roy thrashed against him immediately, like a shark caught in its net.

"Fucking—GET OFF ME!"

"No, you're gonna apologise for everything nasty word you said to her, and then maybe I'll think about letting you go."

"Fuck you!"

Unimpressed, Remus glanced over at Jillian. She was standing off to the side with her mouth hanging open, clearly shocked. He could've been scaring her, but either way, Remus didn't bother letting up. Roy was still writhing against him, and while his ex-girlfriend watched, Remus thrust him further against the wall, grinding his face into the rough brick.

"Apologise now. Or I'll break your arm."

He felt the other boy turn rigid, but Hawkings was a posh school, filled with posher students. If the upper-class had anything, it was pride.

"As if! You can take your bloody apology, Lupin, and shove it up your

—!"

Remus wrenched Roy's wrist higher, until it was flush with his shoulder blades and the other boy was practically shrieking in pain.

"You think I won't do it, Roy? Hell, I'll snap an ankle too. Leave you limping back to those sorry mates of yours. Now apologise."

"Fucking yob!" Roy screeched. He was breathing so rapidly that he was spewing the wall with spittle, nearly managing to hit Remus as well. Impatient, he gave one more jerk on his wrist, and Roy finally caved.

"Fine! Fine!" He yelped. "I'm sorry! I'm fucking sorry now get the hell off of me!"

"Hm," Remus hummed. "Now that wasn't so hard, was it?"

With a satisfied grunt, he stepped backwards and released his grip on Roy's arm. He was scrambling away from them in a second, clutching his wounded wrist, cheek marred with the jagged imprint of the building's brick.

"You're in for it now, Lupin!" He swore. "I'm gonna fucking crack your skull!"

"By all means, try it."

Remus stepped forward, but the gesture alone was threat enough. Practically falling over himself to get away, Roy turned and bolted in the other direction, disappearing around the side of the Astronomy building with a final string of curses. With him gone things were finally quiet, but even Remus wasn't oblivious enough to not realise what he'd done. He'd traded Jillian's pride for his own peace of mind. Lily was totally right—he was too bloody nice.

“So…” Jillian started, once she'd finally picked her jaw up from the ground; “Does this mean you want to try for that second date now?”

Remus scrambled; no, no, no!

“Look, Jill—”

“Lord, Remus—I know!” She laughed. “Don’t get your knickers in a twist. That was... Well, I'll be honest—that was fucking hot."

"Please don't tell anyone, I am supposed to be a prefect after all," he winced, more worried that the saviour stunt would get back to Sirius than anything else.

"Oh, no—never," she grinned. "It was totally cool of you, everything you said to Roy. And watching you... oh, but well, if you're ever interested, then we could always—"

"Jill, I'm sorry, but I can't."

Jillian bit her lip. "You can't?"

"No."

"Oh."

"It's not you," he insisted. "I just can't date anyone right now. I'm… Well, I've got a lot on my plate."

She squinted at him, then smirked again. "Would this have anything to do with that mysterious sheet-clad kisser on Halloween?"

"Uh, no… I mean—no way!"

"I knew it!" Jillian cried, calling his obvious bluff. "I knew you were sprung for someone! Who is it? Her name's not actually Farrah, right? 'Cause I had a look at our school records and the only 'Farrah' at Hawkings is Farrah Dunsmuir and she's like, eleven—"

"It's no one!"

"Oh come on, Remus! I promise not to tell!"

"Jill… no."

At his final word, Jillian sighed very dramatically. "Alright, fine. I suppose I already promised to stop bothering you. Just… thanks for being one of the good ones, Remus."

She hugged him, and though it was just a genial thing, Remus seized up. He'd only just raised a hand to awkwardly pat her on the back when someone pointedly cleared their throat behind them.

"Hope I'm not interrupting anything..."

"Oh! Hello Sirius."

Instantly horrified, Remus wrenched his head around. There he found

Sirius standing a few feet away, arms crossed and a single perfect eyebrow raised in judgement. Just seeing him was enough to make Remus spring away as though he'd been electrocuted.

"Sirius! Oh shit... I—uhm! This isn't—"

"Aw, Moons, don't act so guilty," Sirius started wryly. "Someone might think you were actually up to something."

"We weren't up to anything!" He insisted straight away. "Nothing happened—or that is to say that Jill and I—uh… We—Christ! Well, come on then, Jill. Tell him!"

"What Remus is trying to say," Jillian said, "is we started dating again."

This time, both of Sirius' brows shot up. "Really?"

"NO!"

"Mhm, yes. If I recall, he even said something like 'I'd snog Jillian any day of the week'."

"Any day? Even Sundays and bank holidays?"

"Enough!" Remus wailed. "You're killing me! You're actually killing me!"

With a great giggle, Jillian turned and picked up her school coat from where she'd been sitting on it. "He's right, I'm only joking. Remus and I were getting cosy, but unfortunately Roy came along and ruined it. Lucky for me, Remus makes a pretty good white knight."

"Oh?" The corner of Sirius' mouth twitched. "Well, someone better catch me before I swoon."

Nothing happened, Remus mouthed desperately. Sirius gave him the up-and-down, but said nothing as Jill dusted off her coat and hung it over one arm.

"Remus got Roy to back off. Threw him around like a rag doll. You should feel sorry you missed it, it was very sexy. Thuggish in almost a gentlemanly way. Have you ever tried it, Black? Being a gentleman?"

"My, Stewart, you've certainly gotten mouthy since getting those cheese graters off your teeth."

She gave him a curtsy, and then glanced back at Remus, patting him on the arm.

“Thanks for the cigarette, Remus. You were real sweet. I’ll wash your handkerchief, but don’t think this means you’re going to get away next time. I’ll be expecting a full report on that secret girlfriend of yours, love. Ta.”

Remus resisted a groan. If there really is a God in this world, he thought, He's one sadistic bastard.

After Jillian had bid them adieu, Sirius trudged forward. Throughout the entire conversation with Jillian he'd appeared blithe and unbothered, but now he was looking at him sternly, and Remus knew he was in for it.

“ ‘White knight’?” He echoed. " 'Thuggish gentleman'? What'd you do, eat her entire minge in broad daylight?"

Remus grimaced. "Do you really have to be so crude?"

"What happened?"

"She was sitting there when I got here—crying! I didn't know what to do, and you sure as fuck weren't around, so I... I gave her a cigarette!"

"You gave a crying girl a cigarette?"

"What else was I supposed to do? Snog her?"

"Oh I bet you'd like me to say that, wouldn't you?"

Remus pressed his lips together guiltily, hiding a smile.

“You wouldn’t happen to want that blowjob now, would you?”

He appeared reluctant at first, but then Sirius tongued the inside of his cheek, looking like he were trying not to smile.

“How is it that everyone likes you so much?"

"I dunno. Maybe it's my special talent."

"... Cheeky git."

It wasn't hard to make up after the Roy incident. All Remus had to do was scamper up the metal stairwell and pop the lock to the Astronomy building. The minute he and Sirius were inside, Jillian was forgotten, and they hid out for a long while, skipping the rest of their lessons and just enjoying each other.

“Weekend should be good,” Sirius said brightly, when they finally emerged again and made their way back toward the centre of campus for dinner. “Trip into the village and all…”

“You hear from Prongs then?”

Sirius looked smug. “Didn’t even need to give him an excuse. Said he and Lily wanted the day alone, since we’re all headed back to his for Christmas.”

“And Pete?”

“Moira’s got him locked down tight.”

Remus brushed Sirius’ pinky with his own. “Brilliant.”

Excited by the idea of their first real uninterrupted date since the summer, Remus began counting off all of the things he and Sirius would be able to do together. The Ramones had just released a new album, which meant that a trip to Dervish and Bangers was in order, and if they went early enough to Broomsticks they’d probably get some privacy in one of the back booths. He’d dropped quite a bit of dosh on that Bowie record back in October, but he was hoping to still have enough to have a good day in the village. Maybe he’d even take him to Madam Puttifoot’s. Wouldn’t that be a sight.

“Say," Remus started; "what do you think about... oh shit.”

“What’s wrong?”

“Forgot to pick up this month's stipend ages ago.” Remus stopped dead in his tracks, looking sorely back the way they’d come. “Maybe should head to the office now, the secretary's always gone before five.”

“Sure, I’ll come with,” Sirius shrugged.

And so they went together, hurrying back up the lane toward Castle Hall so as to make it on time. Remus had never really enjoyed his visits to main building, but like many of his classmates, he’d been making the trip every other week to collect his allowance. Some kids, like James and Peter, got their pocket money mailed to them in the form of a cheque they could cash at the office or in town, but Lyall was not as trustworthy. Instead he'd arranged for a monthly stipend to be dispersed at the school's discretion. It was just a small thing—plonk change compared to most others at the school—but it was enough for Remus to buy his fags and a bottle of jack so that must've meant that the Lupin name was good for something.

"You're lucky, I was just about to step out," the secretary said, her clogs squeaking on the tile as she spun around to unlock the filing cabinet behind her desk. Remus waited patiently outside her office window, drumming his fingertips along the countertop. Sirius stood across from him, used to the affair. He'd also collected a stipend when he was on the Blacks' payroll, but that year Monty and Effie had been kindly mailing him a cheque every other week as well.

"What'd you say your surname was again, deary?" The secretary called.

"Balenciaga," Sirius answered. Remus pinched him.

"It's Lupin."

Her fingers flew across the files once more. "Hm… Seems there ain't much here."

Both boys shared a bewildered look.

"Remus Lupin?"

She plucked a paper file from the collection, folding it open. "Yes, I've got a 'Remus Lupin' here, but… Hm… Have you talked to your parents at all recently?"

"Uh…" No. He'd been all but ignoring every one of Giles' calls. No way he'd pick up for his father.

"I'm afraid your account's been emptied." She flashed him the stipend paper, which read with a big fat zero at the very bottom. "Could just be a mistake. I've had grandparents and the like bungle up accounts before. Would you like to ring them now, deary?"

Remus stared at Sirius again, who looked just as surprised. Lyall Lupin might not care much for sordid bookkeeping, but he did not forget to pay his bills.

The secretary came to the window, spinning a telephone around toward them, but Remus could think of a hundred other things he'd rather do than call his father in front of her. In the end, he and Sirius backtracked down the hallway, where the building's only other wall phone hung. He punched in the numbers, and when Cartsen finally connected him to his father's office, Remus had barely gotten the words out before Lyall was dismissing him.

"Of course I emptied the account. How else was I supposed to get your attention?"

"You could've said something first!"

"When? How?" Lyall scoffed. "You never pick up the phone anymore, not even for Giles. I could've called your Headmistress, but you're almost eighteen. Better you learn the lesson yourself."

Remus all but strangled the phone in his grip. He could still see Sirius, but he'd wandered further down the hallway to give him some privacy.

"So what, you're just gonna cut me off?" He hissed quietly. "After all this time?"

"I'd be more inclined to reinstate the stipend should I know you'd be putting it to good use. I want to know what your plans are for university applications. Your marks were good enough to submit to Manchester—you know it's my own alma mater, and I know that you'd do well enough there. So, you've already begun your applications, I hope?"

"None of your business."

"Well, then I suppose providing extra funding for your filthy habits is also none of my business. The world is tough, Remus. You reap what you sow."

Didn't he fucking know it.

Suddenly another voice sounded in the background. Sandra.

"The car's ready, darling. We don't want to be late for dinner."

"I'll be right there, Sandra," Lyall replied curtly. "I'm just wrapping up things with the school."

"Oh, is that Remus now? How's he doing? Here, pass me the phone, I'd like to say—”

Remus hung up.

* * *

If Remus had had it his way, none of his friends would’ve found out about his stipend, but as it was, Sirius had been there witness to the whole thing. They morning after he'd spoken with Lyall, he woke up and went about his day as normal. Later in the afternoon, they spent most of music class revising for upcoming mock exams, and afterwards Sheila had agreed to give them the rest of the block to work on their compositions. It was then that word of Remus’ sudden poverty came to light, much to his displeasure.

"Couldn't you borrow the money?" Peter reasoned. "I thought prefects got their own stipends anyway."

"Not until the end of the month," Remus grumbled. "Until then I'm flat broke."

“I don’t know what you’re still whinging for, all we spend money on is drinks and fags. And hell, I’ll lend you the cash if you really want,” Sirius said, looking bored as he picked a hangnail. Remus glared at him. Only Sirius could look bored with an electric guitar in his lap.

Next to him, James was currently fretting over a composition and how he was going to be able to properly translate it into staves for their exam. “Blimey, I knew taking music as an A-Level was a mistake."

“It wouldn’t be hard if you just learned how to read music,” Peter pointed out from behind his drum kit, frantically scribbling on a music stand of his own.

“Oi, you two,” Sirius called sharply; “Brains outta the books—we’re talking about Moony right now.”

“Huh?” James raised his head. “Oh, right. I don’t mind spotting ya, Moons.”

“Me neither. No big deal.”

Yes—big deal! Remus thought bitterly. He wasn’t about to let James and Peter pay for his date with Sirius. That would just be embarrassing.

“I don’t want your money,” he grumbled, flipping the page in his music notes.

“And you call us proud,” Sirius blagged. “It’s just money! You’ve spotted us for fags or what-have-you plenty of times, so let us return the favour.”

“I’m fine. You don't need to pay my way.”

“Oh? And just what are you gonna do when we’re in London and I’m footing the bill then?”

“You won’t be,” Remus snapped. “I’ll get a job.”

“You? A job? You’d likely get sacked the first day for telling your boss to go play in traffic.”

“At least I’d make it past the interview, you pompous nob.”

Sirius shot him the bird, just as James chimed in;

“I think we’re all gonna have to get jobs, actually.”

“What?”

“You really think Dad’s gonna let us get away with only playing music for an entire year? No way. Pete and I were talking about it just this morning.”

Peter nodded. “My dad wants me to start at the company right after school finishes, so I’ll probably be there.”

Sirius appeared astounded. “I thought we were taking a year off! I thought it was gonna be about the music—the band! How are we gonna get a record deal or even write a single song with you kissing your dad’s boots from nine to five?”

“We’ll just have to do it after five,” James laughed. “Or on the weekends. Like normal people.”

“You be normal,” Sirius replied, crossing his arms. “I’m gonna be a fucking rock star and I’m gonna do it on Alphard’s dime.”

None of them had much to say to that, and it didn’t matter. The bell went and they began to pack up.

“Moony,” Peter started, creeping towards Remus as he put the Fender away. “I know you already said no, but Friday's just around the corner and I really need help with—”

“I’m not giving you the bloody poem, Wormtail.”

Peter whimpered, before putting his hands together. “Please? What if I paid you? That way I ain’t just giving you the money—it’s a genuine exchange of services! C’mon, five quid for just a little peek!”

Remus paused. Five quid wasn’t enough for a full date in the village, but it was certainly enough for cigs and a bottle of jack. He glanced at Sirius, who was talking to James and not paying attention.

“Fine,” he hissed, “but I swear, if you say anything about it to anyone —especially Sirius—I’ll murder you.”

“Yes, I won’t show anyone!”

“And don’t lose it! I still need to hand it in to Flitwick on Friday...”

“I’ll have it back by tomorrow, swears!”

Already regretting the decision, Remus untucked the top of his school bag and dug around inside. He handed the poem over when he found it, and Peter pressed a five pound note into his palm before crossing his heart like a promise.

“You can count on me, Moons! You’re a life-saver!”

“Yeah, yeah.”

As Peter rushed off, victorious and clearly elated, Remus was reminded that he did like helping his friends. He might cease to exist if anyone else were to read the poem, but Peter was an artist and harmless enough on his own. He may have had a big mouth, but he was still genuine. It was more than he could say for most people.

“Lupin," someone called; "your girlfriend’s here!”

It felt like déjà vu, but perhaps whinging to Marlene for a bit might take the edge off. At least she would understand not wanting to make Sirius pay for his own date.

With a sigh of relief, Remus turned to the front of the classroom and nearly gasped aloud when he found Jillian waiting in the doorway instead of Marlene.

“Remus!” She called, waving at him frantically. “Remus, over here!”

“They say a little competition’s good for morale,” Sirius said, appearing at his side; “But she’s really starting to tick me off.”

“I’m sure it’s nothing,” Remus said, shouldering his bag. “I’ll meet you guys for dinner.”

"Can't. Got detention."

"For what?"

"Does it matter?" Sirius asked, before ramming his knee into Remus’ left buttock for good measure. Remus groaned, but said nothing else as he slunk across the music room.

“Jill, you’re not actually telling people we’re dating, right?” He begged quietly, once they’d stepped out into the hall.

“Don’t be silly,” she chided. “I just need to know if you’re free tomorrow afternoon.”

“Uh... Why?”

She whipped him on the arm. “I just told you not to be silly! It’s only prefect stuff. Professor McGonagall’s asked me to find a few others to help rake up the leaves in front of the Great Hall. Apparently Filch is out with a cold. Would you be interested?”

“Well I…”

“Please? Trish and I are going to do it, but it’ll take us all day with just the two of us. And it’ll get you out of office duty! Plus—” she leaned in; “Trish has weed.”

"Trish always has weed."

"Yeah... but she's promised to share!"

He wanted to say no; it was getting colder out in the afternoons and he’d planned to use his boring office hours to finish a paper, but Jillian was staring at him with those big eyes and they’d only just started to get on as friends. Remus Lupin could’ve used some good karma. At least there was going to be drugs.

“Alright.”

“Great! It’s a date—kidding.” Jillian laughed and clapped her hands together. “Actually though, you’re a lifesaver. We’ll meet you and Regulus outside the great hall at three. Ciao!”

She’d gone before he could fully realise what he’d done. Good karma, indeed.

“Just walk up to him,” James said, when they’d finished with music and emerged in the dining hall for supper. Peter was eating with Moira, and Sirius had detention, which left just the two of them until the girls decided to show up.

“He’s with his shitty friends though,” Remus said, eyeing Regulus up from across the room.

“He’s always with his shitty friends. Hell, from his point of view—we’re the shitty friends! So go tell him that you’ve signed him up for garden duty so we can finally eat.”

“You're mean when you're hungry."

“Fine. Guess you could always ring his dorm later and tell him then.”

Remus sighed. Somehow he doubted he’d be any more convincing over the telephone.

“Come on,” James pushed; “I’ll even go with you.”

And so, with his moral-support Potter in tow, Remus crossed the dining hall. Regulus took notice immediately, but unfortunately that also meant that the others had caught on.

“What d’you want, Loony? Trip over your own nose on the way to the toilet?” Barty taunted.

"You know, Barty," James smiled, "if you’re interested, I know this really great dentist that might be able to help you out with all of… that.”

“Oh yeah? Well, nice skunk stripe, Potter. Get hit by a road painter?”

James smirked, nearly going cross-eyed as he looked up at the bleached bit of fringe hanging over his glasses. It’d yet to grow out after the girl’s prank on Halloween, and probably wouldn’t for some time.

“Crouch, can you do me a favour and let the big boys talk?" Remus drawled. “It’s about prefect stuff.”

Regulus clicked his tongue. “What'd you do now, Lupin?”

“Turns out we’re not filing paperwork tomorrow. Instead it’s you, me, a few rakes, and several thousand leaves.”

“You signed us up for garden duty?”

“Just for one day—a mere afternoon, even! Plus Jill and Trish are gonna be there too.”

The look on Regulus’ face could’ve been mistaken for horror. “You invited MacDuff?”

“Uh… Well, technically the girls invited us.”

Suddenly the other boys began to roar with laughter. Remus wasn’t sure what was so funny, until Barty clapped a hand on Regulus’ shoulder and all but told him.

“Ya hear that, Reggie? MacDuff’s called you out again. I think I hear wedding bells in the distance! HA!”

“Shut up, you’re being stupid!” Regulus spat, in a voice that made Remus think that the teasing was already old-hat. "And piss off, Lupin! Ain't my problem."

"Now that's a bit rude," James replied, before taking Remus by the shoulder. "It's alright, Moons, I'll help you rake the leaves."

"Ooh, watch out Reg," Yaxley sneered. "Looks like Potter's moving in on your girl."

"No, he's not! He's... As if he could steal a girl from anyone!"

James rolled his eyes. "No need to steal. But if you want the girl to like you more, Reg, you should probably try smiling every once in a while."

At that, Remus thought Regulus might just implode.

“Shut up!” He snapped. "Stop laughing! Stop laughing!"

But the boys did not let up. Rather, Yaxley and Travers leaned across the table, already mid-song and perfectly in sync with their ridiculous children’s rhyme;

“ ‘Reg and Trish, sittin’ in a tree! K-I-S-S-I-N—’ ”

With ears as red as hot coals, Regulus shot to his feet and marched off, taking his dinner tray him. None of the others seemed bothered, they simply kept on laughing, and James and Remus had to return to their table victory-less.

“Looks like little Reg has a crush,” James said as they stood in line for supper. “Wonder if Sirius knows anything about it.”

“Doubt it. Regulus still won't talk to him. And now I'm stuck raking his share."

"No one can say you didn't try."

The next morning turned out to be a cold one, just as promised. The Marauders all bundled up before heading down to breakfast and then communion, which would’ve been a dull affair had Remus not managed to sneak a book in.

“My brother? You’re sure?” Sirius was whispering to James, as the ministers chanted their hymns.

“Went red as a tomato when Moony so much as mentioned the girl.”

Sirius nudged him. “Psst—Moony. Does Reg really have a thing for Penny Prefect?”

“Regulus. Their names are Trish and Regulus.”

“Yeah, them. Has he really been shacking up with the girl then?”

Remus looked up from his book. “I don’t know. I’m not a Regulus-tracker.”

“Has Trish said anything?”

“No. Not to me.”

Sirius pursed his lips. “Well. Might be good for him then. The git could use a girlfriend. Maybe he’ll finally relax some.”

A hand reached over from the pew behind them, smacking Sirius upside the head.

“Be quiet before you get in trouble,” Lily hissed, as the rest of the girls shared an amused smirk.

“I am being quiet,” Sirius replied. “In fact, no one can even—”

“Mr. Black.” Professor McGonagall had appeared at the end of their row, looking unimpressed.

“Oh, hey Minnie!”

There were several snickers from nearby kids, but McGonagall simply handed Sirius a detention slip. “That makes two for two after yesterday. Let’s not make it three,” she chided, then; “Mr. Lupin, you know the rules. Now, the book if you would.”

Remus resisted a groan, snapping his novel shut and handing it over. With it clutched tightly in one hand, the Headmistress gave them all a final warning glance before carrying back on to her seat at the front of the church.

“I hate you,” Remus muttered.

Sirius smothered a laugh.

After the service had concluded, the Marauders piled outside onto the green to compare schedules. Remus had straight lessons until mid-afternoon, but then he’d be expected to join the girls outside Castle Hall. Sirius had another detention courtesy of Professor McGonagall, and as it turned out, James' offer to help out had also turned up fruitless. He and Lily had a dorm monitor meeting, which left Remus on his own.

“Maybe I should say something to him,” Sirius pondered, while the two of them were on their way to Classics after church had let out. "Reg, I mean."

“I think that’s a sure-fire way to make sure he never speaks to you again."

“But I’m in a relationship,” Sirius contended. “I could give him some real advice. Like what to do if his partner kisses their best friend on the same day you both say ‘I love you’.”

“You’re never gonna let that go, are you?”

“No. Not until I see this Tomny guy in person and can confidently say that he’s as ugly as a tin bin.” Sirius let out a long moan, stretching his arms up above his head. “I do worry about the little wanker sometimes, you know. Couldn’t have been easy after I left, but then again, he's always been able to tolerate it better. Who knows, maybe his life's gotten easier."

"You really think Regulus did better without you around?"

"I dunno. I would've left eventually anyway. Couldn't stay. Not after what she said…" Sirius wiped beneath his nose. "Guess he'd be fine. After all, he doesn't have to be worried about disappointing them as a man."

Feeling a bit helpless, Remus glanced around. They were in the Agrippan Block—lessons would be starting soon, but that meant that it would be only a few minutes until the second floor corridor would be completely empty…

"Come on."

Taking Sirius' sleeve, he drew him toward the stairwell, and together they followed it up.

"Are you sure?" Sirius asked, when Remus had pulled them into an empty study room. "Remember what happened with Yaxley?"

Remus held up a key. "This room's prefects only." He set it aside then, and grabbed Sirius by the tie, guiding him toward the sofa at the back of the room. There, he made Sirius sit, and crouched down, pushing his knees apart.

"Oh! Oh…" Sirius licked his lips, then let his head fall back, fingers already knotting in Remus' hair. "I knew it was a good idea to date a swot…"

* * *

"I swear, all men are the same," Jillian huffed. "They never know what we want, and when they do, they're still fucking terrible at it."

Trish nodded sympathetically, raising a light to the spliff Jillian had set between her teeth. They'd already been raking for an hour and had only managed a fourth of the green. None of them had objected when Jillian suggested a well-earned break, and together they'd shuffled behind the building to try out one of Trish's spliffs.

"Ye said Roy's already rebounded with someone else?" Trish mumbled, her coat done up to her chin against the mid-November chill.

“Yes,” Jillian replied, taking a hit and passing the spliff along. “Some eleventh year named ‘Rita’. She’s the same age as his little sister too. It’s fucking gross…”

“Nasty,” Remus agreed, accepting the spliff. Jillian waited for it to come back around again to start cursing again, which she did—loudly.

“Roy can do whatever he wants, I don’t care! I told you he’s already trying to make me jealous, right? Caught him telling his mate that Rita's breasts were ‘practically perfect’—and he totally knew I was listening!”

“Whatta pig,” Trish said, busy piling leaves onto Remus’ shoulder.

“James almost cut him from the football team this year,” he added, dusting them off. “Marlene helped with try-outs and he threw this huge fit after she out-sprinted him during drills.”

Trish laughed; “A pig and a man-child. You said he was a weird kisser, aye?”

“God—yes! He never opened his mouth!” Jillian whined; “Hated tongue. It was like coaxing an eel out of its cave!”

Trish glanced at Remus, spliff tucked between two fingers. “How d’ye feel about tongue, Remington?”

“Well, I was partial to it until Jill compared it to an eel in a cave.”

“Ye hear that—LUPIN LIKES TONGUE!”

Jillian and Trish fell into one another on the grass, laughing, and Remus shook his head.

"It's not really the tongue part, it's more like—"

"Right. Should've known I'd find you here."

They yelped—all three of them—and Remus spun round to find Regulus standing behind them. He was done up in his mittens and winter coat, and was holding a rake in either hand.

"You came!" Remus exclaimed.

“Of course I came, it's prefect duty. Now how long are you three going to hide out here and slack off?”

“Aw m’on, Reginald,” Trish said, offering the spliff. “Sit down, take load off—join us. Ye might be able tae relax long enough to work that stick out of your arse.”

Rolling his eyes, Regulus came forward, tossing the rake across Remus’ lap. “You. Up. Now.”

Remus sighed lazily. “Fine, but you have to jump into the leaf pile at least once.”

“No.”

“What if I push you?”

“Then I’ll beat you with the rake.”

Remus looked back at the girls. “A few weeks ago that threat would’ve been very real. So you see, progress.”

“Stuff it, Lupin,” Regulus huffed. "Now where's Potter?"

Remus shrugged. "Couldn't come. He had a dorm meeting."

Regulus puckered, but said nothing and instead reached down to grab the back of Remus’ jacket and haul him to his feet. The girls followed, eager to have another pair of hands, and eventually they’d all settled back into their chores. Three out of four of them were nicely stoned though, which made for a grand ol’ time as far as Remus was concerned.

“Our leaf pile’s getting huge,” Jillian observed later on. She'd picked up a handful of the already-raked leaves and tossed them in the air, grinning as they fell down around them.

“Stop it,” Regulus snapped, “you’re just making more work for us.”

“You could hide in it,” Jillian whispered to Remus. “Scare the next kid that walks by.”

“You do it."

“No way, you’re way scarier.”

“Yeah, but no one’s as scary as Regulus.”

They shared a covert giggle, and while Trish returned to helping Jillian on their side, Remus shuffled over to Regulus, feeling a bit too keen.

"Hey buddy."

"Don't call me buddy."

"Sure, buddy. Only wanted to say that I'm glad you showed up. What, couldn't stay away?"

"They didn't need help in the office," Regulus replied, briskly. He didn't offer any further explanation, and Remus set his rake back to work, before eventually drifting back into the other boy's field of vision.

"So… Trish's pretty cool, huh?"

Regulus gave him a sharp look. "What do you want, Lupin?"

"Nothing! But I can tell you're a little…" He searched for the right words; "off … around her."

"I'm not 'off'."

"Okay, sure. But you know, I could say something to her if you wanted. She and I are kinda like that." Remus foolishly twisted two fingers together, but Regulus did not look impressed.

"Not interested."

"Ha. You sound like Lily. She was the same way before she and James started dating."

"Clearly she made a mistake then. Potter's about as intelligent as this rake."

"No need to be rude," Remus said defensively. "James thinks you're cool enough, anyway. Despite how bloody mean you are."

If Remus had been paying attention, he might've noticed the way Regulus turned his face away, hiding a blush, but as it was, he was too busy planning ridiculous schemes in his head.

"Hey, I got an idea! We're gonna get hot chocolate after this. I could distract Jill, and then you and Trish could talk—"

“I don’t need to talk to MacDuff!”

“So defensive.”

“So annoying!”

Remus laughed dumbly. “Is chatting just not your style then? You could always write her a note. I’m sure she’d only laugh a little. Or a poem! … I just wrote a poem. Fucking embarrassing, really—gave it to Pete the other day, but he swore not to show anyone. Oh! You could write her a song too! You’re good at music… Or you could always—”

A pine cone hit him upside the head, and Remus gaped as Regulus readied his fist with another.

“Are you quite finished?!”

“Yeah…”

Regulus dropped the pine cone.

“But if you really wanted—”

“Bloody—enough! Are you always this stupid when you get high?”

Remus considered. “I dunno. Sometimes I’m stupider?”

“Fitting.” Regulus set his rake to the ground again, avoiding eye contact. “Say anything to MacDuff and I’ll blind you. Besides, I’m not interested.”

“Really? Man… somehow I’m disappointed.”

“Good. I don’t live to please the likes of you. Least of all when you're failing miserably at playing match-maker.”

“Oh, trust me, I’m no match-maker,” Remus snorted. “Don’t have the grit for it. Just couldn’t help but notice that your friends were giving you a hard time. Thought you might wanna talk about it.”

“I don’t, so you can forget it. They were being stupid anyway.”

“Well, they’re pretty stupid most days, so…”

“As if you can talk."

Remus edged closer, the weed giving him confidence where there usually was none. “You and Sirius have a lot in common, you know. In a good way! … You’re both really smart.”

“My brother is not smart," Regulus rebuffed. "He simply possesses above-average intelligence—which he chooses to squander on rubbish like drugs and rock ‘n’ roll. There’s a stark difference.”

“So you can call him your brother!” Remus grinned, blazing past the end bit. “Good to know you have it in you.”

The younger boy puckered. “I hate him, that doesn’t make me delusional.”

“No, you don’t. You don’t hate him.”

“Don’t tell me who I hate. I hate you.”

“Nah, now I know you’re lying. If you hated me you would’ve moved heaven and earth just to get McGonagall to let you switch partners. You enjoyed that music class with the kids—annnnd, you secretly enjoy knowing that Sirius thinks about you.”

“He doesn’t think about me.”

“Sure he does. You don’t know what he tells me in private.”

“I’m sure he tells you enough.”

Remus scratched the side of his head, reminded of the reason why so many of Sirius’ relatives went into politics. They certainly had the tongue for it.

Then an idea hit him.

“Hey, Regulus, do you want to come home with us for Christmas?”

Regulus’ eyes shot wide. “Excuse me?”

“We’re going back to James’. You could come too.”

“You want me to follow you back to… to Potters’ house?!”

“Why not?”

“I could give you a thousand reasons why not.”

“Okay… but isn’t there at least one reason to come? You could get away for a while. See what it’s like to be happy for a change.”

If he was more sober, Remus might’ve realised that this was not the thing to say.

“You’re all the same,” Regulus said, picking up an armful of leaves. “You think anyone who’s not you must be miserable. But I don’t need to be like my brother. I know Sirius, and the phrase ‘blood is thicker than water’ only applies when he wants it to. Now do us all a favour and stop meddling.”

Remus was at a loss. He said nothing more as Regulus strolled away from him—just watched as he tossed the leaves onto their large pile.

“Where’s MacDuff?” Regulus demanded.

Jillian hid a giggle behind her hand. “I dunno.”

“She was just here! We still have half a lawn left to rake.”

“Maybe she needed to use the lav.”

Regulus scoffed, probably well on his way to chastising his classmate for skiving off, when Trish suddenly burst forth from the pile—scattering leaves everywhere and screaming blue murder. The fright was enough to leave Regulus gasping for breath, but by then Trish was already bent over and laughing herself to tears.

“Your face!” She howled. “You should’ve seen your face!”

“You—! How dare you!"

“ ‘How dare I’? Crivvens, who are you, my gran?”

“I’m the only sane one here apparently!” Regulus shouted back. “God, it’s like taking care of children! Can’t you people do anything right?!”

“You’d be surprised, o’ m’laird,” Trish replied, crossing her arms over her chest. “Maybe if you came down from yer high horse every now ‘n then you’d see the world like us wee folk do.”

“And I suppose you think that’s rather smart of you!”

“Tis certainly getting under your skin well enough.”

Regulus fumed. “Why anyone would ever like you, I’ll never understand!"

"Oi, oi," Remus called, stepping in between them. "C'mon, Reg. That's a bit uncalled for, don't you think?"

He hadn't expected the shove, but it came anyway and Remus had to stumble to avoid crashing straight into Trish.

"MY NAME IS REGULUS!"

The shout cut deep, and Remus was instantly sorry, but Regulus didn't give him time to apologise. He turned, kicking his rake out of his path, and tore off across the lawn in a fit.

"Bleedin' Christ, he's really unhinged, isn't he?" Jillian said after. "Are you alright, Remus?"

"Yeah, no harm, no foul," he huffed, stepping out of the pile of foliage and dusting the leaves off of his trousers.

"And you?" Jillian asked, wrapping an arm around Trish's shoulders. The younger girl leaned into her friend, her usual vigour depleted to nothing.

"Didnae mean to make him so mad… Sorry, guys, now we've gotta rake the rest of this ourselves."

Jillian pat her partner's head softly, like a big sister might. "Don't worry, Trishy. Regulus Black is just an old sour puss. Who'd want to be liked by a boy like him anyway?"

Remus didn't say it, but the look on Trish's face did not seem very comforted.

* * *

Friday 18th November 1977 – The Day Following…

It was only lunchtime, and Remus Lupin was not in a good mood.

Not only had Peter neglected to return his poem on time, but that morning he'd gotten roped into his second prefect project of the week. Sheila had come to him at the last second and requested that he and Regulus cover the fifth years' music class again. If it'd been anyone else he might've said no, but Sheila had probably known that, so that's why she'd asked him. On his way over to the primary campus, Remus had been sceptical of seeing Regulus so soon after their spat. He'd considered how he might go about apologising for stepping so far over the line, but apparently he'd worried for nothing.

Regulus had not shown.

"Blimey, you look… well, fucking terrible actually," Sirius said, when Remus reappeared for lunch, indeed looking haggard and grumpy. He sat, groaning as he attempted to stretch the kinks from his neck. Luckily, James was well versed in muscle tension. He leaned over and began working the knots from Remus' shoulders with those magic fingers of his.

"Ah, thanks," Remus sighed. "Lifesaver."

James waved him off kindly, and Lily slid a cup of tea toward him. "Are you really okay, Remus? Sirius is right, you look awful."

"Do I? No wonder, I've been run ragged by a bunch of nine year-olds all morning. Now does anyone else care to tell me how bad I look?"

"Could be worse," James offered; "You could be tutoring them in maths."

"Oh yes, that's what I did," Lily finished, smiling brightly.

"Thank god for the little things…"

"Hi, Remus."

Remus turned around. The table behind theirs held a large group of girls, all of whom were looking at him with curious grins on their faces. He couldn't tell which of them had called out to him, but they seemed to be waiting for something. Bewildered, Remus flashed them a meek wave, and suddenly all of the girls squealed a bit before turning back to one another, heads tucked tightly together.

"What was that about?" Sirius murmured.

"Dunno…"

"Maybe you're getting a fan club," James teased. As he did, another girl passed by behind him.

"Hey, Remus," she called, brushing her long hair off one shoulder.

“Er… Hi.”

She didn’t stop, just carried on with a sly look on her face, but Sirius looked after her.

“That was Pepper Doyle,” he said with an air of surprise. “What’s Pepper Doyle doing saying hi to you?”

“I don’t know!” Remus insisted. “Did you guys do something while I was with the primaries?”

All of them shook their heads.

“Tell the truth!”

“They didn’t do anything,” Lily swore. “Potter was with me in Politics and… well, I can’t say for Sirius.”

Sirius scoffed; “I actually went to class today, thank you very much. Had a Latin quiz and everything. Aced it.”

“Does that mean, you carpe diem-ed the day?” James snorted.

Sirius opened his mouth to answer, but all that came out was;

“Hi, Remus.”

This time they didn’t even know which direction the hello had come from, but as they all whipped their heads around to check, Remus suddenly realised that they’d amassed an audience. Girls had crowded in like a swarm of crows—even some guys were craning their necks to get a look. Before Remus could question it, he felt a tap on his shoulder. It was Andrea Sapsford. She and Remus had History together, though Andrea made a point of sitting near the front of the classroom so they’d rarely ever talked. Now she was standing beside his table, clutching a piece of paper across her stomach so tightly it looked about ready to tear in half.

“H–Hi, Remus,” she said nervously.

“Hi, Andrea. Is… that today’s homework or something?”

“Oh no, it’s…” She bit her lip, and Remus could sense all of his friends leaning in—Sirius most of all. “Well, I figured that I just had to say something. What you did was so nice and all.”

Remus looked at Sirius. He had no idea what he could’ve ever done to Andrea Sapsford to be considered 'nice'.

“You know I’m actually sort of seeing Oliver Paice right now,” she continued, “but if you’re interested then maybe we could hang out as friends and… oh," she giggled nervously; "I dunno... See where it goes?”

She smiled after, and Remus blinked very quickly.

“I’m sorry?”

Andrea glanced down at the paper, biting her lip. “Maybe I’m jumping the gun, but no girl could resist such a sweet gesture.”

Sirius was on his feet in a second, snatching the notepaper from Andrea and looking down at it. For a moment nothing was said, but Remus knew he was in trouble the moment Sirius’ eyes widened.

“… Holy shit.”

“What?” He clambered after him. “Sirius, what is it?”

“Er—” Sirius shook his head frantically. “No... don’t think you want to see this, Moons.”

Remus felt dread wash over him. “Give it here!” He cried, as Sirius ducked around the other side of the table. On the way, James managed to snatch the paper from him and turned it over, eyes turning to saucers in shock.

“Bloody hell. Is this what I think it is?”

“Can I have that back please?” Andrea shrieked.

“Oi!” Someone else called. This time it was a guy. Remus didn't even know his name, but that didn't stop him from storming up with a paper of his own and waving it beneath his nose.

“Lupin!" He cried. "What d’you think you’re doing giving something like this to my girl?”

“Wha... What girl?”

“My girl! You trying to sweep her out from under me, you thick nob?”

“Huh?”

Andrea stepped up. “Remus, you mean you gave it to someone else too?”

“Gave what?!”

“Moons—” Sirius got between him and the angry boy. “Moons, something’s happened. It's your poem, I think it might’ve…”

Remus gaped. “My poem?”

“Are you dating someone else or are you not, Remus?” Andrea demanded.

“Yes—I mean, no!”

“Then who was this poem meant for?”

He hadn’t the time to answer; just then Mary and Lottie rushed the table. “Remus!” Mary gasped; “You must tell us—did you actually write this?”

Remus threw his arms out. “WRITE WHAT?!”

“The poem!” Lottie gushed. “It’s so beautiful! Like, I might actually have to fall in love with you after all!”

This got Sirius’ attention. He snatched Angry Boyfriend's paper and dashed toward the girls, taking the one from Lottie so he could compare.

“It’s the same! It’s the same, and…” a smile split Sirius’ face; “Oh Moons, I knew you could write poetry!”

Remus did not wait for permission. Horrified, he all but launched himself across the dining table and snatched the first paper from James’ hands, turning it over. What stared back at him was the single most embarrassing piece of work he’d ever created—his own love poem. And the words were not just hand-written in pencil anymore, they’d been transformed into ink. Solid, permanent, unerasable ink.

Someone had copied his poem.

No, no, no, no, no—NO!

“Fuck!” Remus cried. “Mary, where did you get this?!”

She looked affronted. “Rochelle from history gave it to me.”

“Where did she get it?”

“I don’t know! But tons of girls had a copy, I assumed you gave it to them.”

“Are you insane? Why would I give this to anyone?!”

As Mary baulked, Remus put his head in his hands. Shit! Shit! Fucking shit!

Across from them, Sirius covered his mouth as though he were afraid Remus might catch him laughing. “It’s not that bad, Moons,” he reasoned. “Really, it’s a good poem! A new classic, even.”

“You!” Remus lashed, seeing red. “You did this!”

Sirius dropped his arm. “Me?”

“YES! You fucking did this, didn’t you!”

“How could I have done it? You wouldn’t even let me see it until now!”

“It had to be you! It had to be because it’s always you, and you were the one who—!” Suddenly Remus broke off. No, it couldn’t have been Sirius, because Sirius wasn’t the one who… blithering fuck.

“Where is he?!” Remus barked, furiously scanning the room.

“ ‘Who’?!” Everyone asked at once.

“PETER! PETER PETTIGREW, WHERE ARE YOU?!”

“I’m here!” Peter strolled leisurely up to the table, lunch tray in hand. “What’s everyone shouting about?”

He glanced around, but upon finding no smiles to greet him, Peter’s good mood quickly vanished. All he needed was to see the look on Remus’ face and the paper in his hands to connect the dots.

“… Oh shit.”

“YOU!”

Remus was throwing himself on Peter in a second. The poor boy didn’t even have time to put his tray down before the entire thing plummeted to the linoleum after Remus had tackled him round his middle and sent them both flying.

“YOU TOLD ME YOU WOULDN’T GIVE IT TO ANYONE!”

“I DIDN’T!” Peter shrieked. “I DIDN’T!”

“THEN HOW THE FUCK DID IT END UP WITH ROCHELLE FROM HISTORY?!”

“Lupin! Lupin, that’s enough!” James barked, grappling Remus around the middle and trying to haul him off. He hadn’t hit Peter yet, but they’d wrestled a good ways across the floor, drawing a crowd of at least two dozen students, all of them cradling their books and bags as they stared on in sick fascination. Beyond them, the girls urged him to stop, but Remus’ anger had tapped into an unknown strength. Shoving James off, he used his legs to pin Peter in place before bending over him like an animal readying itself for the kill.

“WHO’D YOU GIVE IT TO?!”

“No one!” Peter wailed. “I swear!”

“THEN HOW’D IT GET OUT?!”

“Someone stole it from his bag!”

The cry came from Moira, who pushed through the crowd to come to her boyfriend’s aid. She started by batting Remus with her English text, looking even more furious than he was.

“He didn’t hand out your shitty poem—someone took it!” She spat. “Now get off him, you bloody brute!”

Remus acquiesced, albeit reluctantly, and Peter slowly staggered back to his feet.

“I was gonna give it back to you, honest!” He insisted; “But then I went to check my bag this morning and it wasn’t there! I thought I’d lost it so I started tearing our room apart—but I swear, Moony, someone must’ve taken it and given it away!”

“Who would give away a fucking poem, Peter?!”

“Hah! I wonder!"

The single laugh cut through the dining hall like a knife. Remus knew who it was instantly. All he had to do was turn, and the crowd parted around Barty like the Red Sea.

“Gotta be honest,” the nasty boy sneered, “didn’t think a single piece ‘a paper would get you so rattled, but I guess obsessing over girly stuff like this just comes with the territory, Loony.”

Remus was moving again. This was it—he was finally going to kill Barty Crouch.

“Woah, there!” Sirius grunted, grabbing a hold of Remus’ arm just as he raised it to give Barty the beating of his life. “Save it for the ring, big guy!”

"Get out of my way, Sirius!"

Somewhere further off, a few kids had begun chanting.

'Fight! Fight!'

"What's a'matter, Looooony?" Barty sang; "Getting a bit slow?"

Remus raged, as James grabbed his other arm and Lily even came between them.

“Remus, don’t!”

”Ooh, I’m so scared! Someone call for a teacher, Lupin’s gone rogue!”

“I’m going to murder you, you little shit!”

“Nice talk coming from a prefect!” Snape heckled, appearing on the sidelines like a leech.

“PISS OFF!”

“Remus, please calm down!” Lily begged. “It’s just one poem! I’ll bet nobody’s even seen it!”

“Don’t be too sure about that, charity girl,” Barty sniggered. The little coward had slipped several arm’s lengths away as if he could still remember the sting of Remus’ fist from the last time they’d gone toe to toe. “That bird from your piddly history class might’ve been one of the first to receive her letter, but she wasn’t the last. I should feel more at loss—best revenge ever and it wasn’t even my idea!”

Remus couldn’t believe his ears. He thought about ripping his friends off just to try and trounce Barty again, but reality had already sunk in.

All around them kids were holding books and homework papers—except they weren't papers at all. They were poems—his poem. At least thirty people were standing right there, reading his love poem right in front of him. And he couldn't do a thing to stop it.

"Don't read that!" Marlene said, coming to her senses first and ripping a paper out of the hands of the girl closest to her. Her gesture seemed to bring all of his friends to life at the same time, and the girls and Peter went about the room, taking back every copy of the poem they could get their hands on. It still wasn't enough. The dining hall was one room out of hundreds, and they numbered just eight. Remus wasn't even done processing Barty's words. Not my idea. Not my idea.

But whose?!

And then it hit him. Of course. Naturally. A long game—just like the girls on Halloween. Perhaps one that had never stopped.

Not my idea.

Remus turned. He found him sitting in the same spot, but this time when he looked, Regulus looked back. This time, Regulus Black set down his fork and folded his hands neatly in his lap, mouth forming just a single word.

Checkmate.

Chapter End Notes

Song sung is "Cover of the Rolling Stone" Dr. Hook, 1972.

& because someone on tumblr said they liked it, here is a link to a playlist inspired by Tonya. Not necessarily period-accurate, but accurate as to how I see her. Much love <3

Chapter 80: Repercussions

Chapter Summary

> Crazy girls. Magic mushrooms. Extortion. Dead bodies...? Just your average Monday, honestly.

Chapter Notes

> This felt a bit like a "transitionary" chapter. Lots of tiny moments merged into one. I hope you get a few good chuckles out of it though.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

What would you think if I sang out of tune?
Would you stand up and walk out on me?
Lend me your ears and I'll sing you a song,
And I'll try not to sing out of key;

Oh, I get by with a little help from my friends,
Mmm, I get high with a little help from my friends,
Ooh, I'm gonna try with a little help from my friends...

- "With a Little Help from My Friends" The Beatles, 1967

Sunday 19 th November 1977

That morning, Remus Lupin awoke to the sounds of his friends' whispering.

"What d'you think it is?"

"A dead body, probably."

"But it's broad daylight. How could you dig up a body in broad daylight?"

"I dunno. I've never actually done it myself, Wormtail."

"Reckon they were murdered?"

"Totally. Ever hear about them twelfth year kids that went missing like ten years ago? Supposedly most of 'em were found floating in the lake, but alas, the last body was never recovered…"

"You're so full of shit, Sirius."

Remus sat up in bed, pushing his curtains aside. "What are you twats on about now?"

His friends spun around. All three Marauders were crowded around the window between James and Sirius' beds, apparently engrossed in whatever was going on outside.

"Sorry, Moons. Did we wake you?" James asked.

"Yeah." Remus paused to yawn. "But that ain't much different from any other day."

Eager as ever, Sirius bounded across the room toward him. "Come take a look! Filch's digging something up behind the dorm."

"What is it?"

"Who knows? Just come look!"

Remus let himself be pulled, blinking in the morning's bright light. He didn't have to crane his neck much to be able to see the deep pit that was now taking up much of the green space on the dorm's back lawn. He saw no sign of Filch, but every now and then a shovel would reappear, tossing dirt up onto the pit's ledge.

"Old codger must've been at it for half the night," Peter said. "The ground's almost frozen and that hole must be over ten feet deep."

"I wish I knew what he was looking for," Sirius said.

"I think your wish is about to come true, Padfoot!" James said. "Looks like Filch is done digging."

A few moments went by, and all four boys leaned in even closer, practically climbing onto Sirius' hutch and stereo to catch a glimpse. Rather unceremoniously, Filch reappeared from the pit on a wooden ladder, bringing with him a large metal canister about the size of a small dog. Sirius was instantly disappointed.

"That's it?" He moaned. "All that digging for a bloody rubbish bin?"

"It could still have a body in it!" Peter suggested.

“Oh yeah? You show me the psychopath who bumped off a sprog.”

James gave a yawn, stretching one hand up to the sky and scratching his stomach with the other. “Not very exciting, oh well. Let’s just get dressed before we’re late for church.”

“I’m gonna go grab some fresh towels for a shower since Black used them all again,” Peter said, starting for the door. He’d only been quiet for a moment before; “Mooooony, they’re back again.”

Remus’ stomach sank. He’d just wrestled his night shirt up over his head and when he tore it away, he found Peter standing next to their bedroom door. Pinned to the outside wood were several dozen notes, each one printed in pretty pink lettering, cut into the shape of hearts and penned for him personally. It wasn’t even that they were suddenly in love with him—they wanted to tease as much as the guys did. The only difference was how much more determined they were to get his attention.

“These bloody girls,” Sirius huffed, stepping forward and pulling one of the larger love notes down. “ ‘To Remus, I just adored your poem. Would you write one to me sometime? Love Audriana, Bronte House’.”

Remus marched over. “Give me that.” He tore the note in two.

“Harsh,” Sirius said, the word ‘pleased’ written all over his face. He plucked down another, but when Remus made a swipe for it, he pulled his hand away.

“Uh-uh. You’re in your casanova era now, if I didn’t get any privacy then neither do you.”

“You never wanted any. You're like a bloody exhibitionist!”

Sirius cackled, then peeled down a handful of the love notes and threw them up in the air. “Better grab a coat, Moons, looks like there’s a chance of snow.”

“Ugh!” Remus grunted, batting the notes away as they fluttered down around him. “This is so stupid. They’re doing it on purpose.”

“Obviously, but some of them are actually pretty good,” Peter said, busy sorting through a handful of notes on his own. “Like look—pretty sure this one’s quoting Shakespeare. And this one here almost makes it sound as though you’re dating her.”

“I’m not dating any of them,” Remus said sternly.

“Of course you aren’t, Moons,” James announced, pulling his own shirt over his head and tossing it into the laundry bin by his bed. “I think I’d know if one of my best friends was dating someone.”

Sirius snorted, and then quickly covered his face with the love note to hide it. He lasted about half a second before he was recoiling over a cough. “Eugh! She’s bloody perfumed it!”

Peter and James began to laugh, but Remus wasn’t feeling very jolly.

“Enough of this nonsense,” he ordered, stepping forward and shoving both of his friends aside. He ripped the love notes down with vicious speed, letting them fall to the ground like broken birds’ wings. Majorie, Audriana, Cindy, Kelly-Anne—all of them, broken hopes only meant to badger him. It’d been like that since Friday, an incessant string of teasing that followed him everywhere. Literally followed. He’d been expecting the mockery from other guys, but the girls were by far the worst. On Saturday, they’d tailed him and Sirius across the entire village as though he were John Lennon at the height of Beatlemania. It hadn’t even mattered that Remus was without a penny to his name —there was no time to spend it. They’d tried going on down to the record shop, only to be swarmed by girls clutching Rita Coolidge and Elton John albums to their chests. Now it was Sunday, and they'd be expected to brave the horde for that morning’s mass. Remus had never resented religious institutions more.

At least his actual boyfriend was taking it well, he reminded himself. It could’ve so easily become a fight, but almost predictably, Sirius thought the entire thing was hilarious. After the mess at the music shop, they spent the remained of their village trip hiding out in some farmer’s barn. Which meant they were alone at least.

“It’s like you’re already famous. Imagine how they’d react if they really knew the truth,” Sirius had mused, while lounging across a hay bale like some barn cat. Alternatively, Remus had remained camped out by the doors, peeking out to make sure they hadn’t been followed.

“Hey.”

Remus turned around. Sirius had his shirt unbuttoned to the navel, a piece of straw sticking out of the corner of his mouth.

“What are you…?”

“Hay,” Sirius said again, cheekily waving a handful of straw at him. “It’s pretty soft, you know. Maybe even soft enough to…” He turned over arching his back until he was just peeking over his shoulder at him. What came after was enough to make Remus glad he’d latched the door. Now, he was staring at Sirius and reliving the memory in his head. You certainly can’t do that in London…

“Hey. Hey, Moons?” Sirius snapped his fingers at him. “You-hoo…?”

“Yep,” Remus replied, dumbly. While he’d gotten left behind thinking of Sirius’ behind, his friends had already moved on.

“I still don’t know how they’ve been getting inside without anyone seeing,” he heard Peter murmur, as he stepped out to retrieve his towels. James had already taken the opportunity to disappear into the bathroom, leaving Remus and Sirius on their own, still buried up to their ankles in pretty pink paper.

“You’re sure we can’t bump him off?” Sirius asked.

Remus blinked, alarmed. “Who?”

“Reg, obviously.”

Oh. “We’re not bumping off your brother,” he sighed. “Besides, don’t tell me you’re already done laughing at my pain.”

“Not by half. But just because it’s funny watching you run around like a chicken with its head cut off doesn’t mean I don’t want to bury that little shit six feet under.” Sirius smirked and shut the door. “It’s like, my entire life Reg’s been on my arse for rocking the boat, and now he’s managed to get my boyfriend about a hundred girlfriends overnight. It’s utter blasphemy.”

“I think you’re exaggerating a bit.”

“Am I?” He bent down to pick up one of the love notes. “ ‘Cause this one says she wants to have your babies.”

Remus pinched the bridge of his nose. “I wish I’d never written that fucking poem. Letting Flitwick fail me would still be better than this.”

“Well, I dunno about that.” Turning the note over, Sirius began peeling it apart as it's sparkled seams. It had a piece of his poem glued inside. “You never really said… but I wouldn’t be all wrong if I assumed that you wrote this for me, would I?”

Remus snatched the note away. “You were never supposed to see it.”

“Hm. Sounds like a waste.” He leaned in, and Remus knew it was going to be a kiss.

“BLACK! You been using my toothpaste again?”

They jumped apart, turning to glare at the bathroom door.

“You said I could!”

“I know, but at least put the bloody cap back on, man!”

Sirius rolled his eyes. “Idiot.” He passed Remus by, leaving a quick peck on the corner of his mouth as he went to the stereo and flicked it on. It was the Ramones album—the one James had mercifully picked up while on his date with Lily the day before. All girls aside, Remus had enjoyed himself; going around Craigtyre, pretending as though they could be on a date the same as their friends… it was nice. It made him think of summer. It made him long. Remus had never known what real longing was before Sirius.

He looked down at the love note in his hand. At the piece of his poem, just a scrap really, all made up of longing.

How wonderful it would be
To one day feel your love and care
On a public street

“Oi.”

Remus glanced up. Sirius was still by the stereo, a lit cigarette in one hand.

“Found the perfect place to hide the body,” he chaffed, gesturing out the open window with his thumb, toward Filch’s pit. “Just in case you’re coming around to the idea.”

“I’m still paying for your last great idea where Regulus was concerned.”

“Well, in that case, prepare to be paying for the rest of your life.” Sirius smirked at him and began scratching behind his ear. He snorted then, before unweaving a thin piece of straw from his hair. “Hey—more hay.”

Remus smiled—hopelessly.

"You idiot."

Sirius winked, holding the cigarette just before his lips. "Love you too."

* * *

Remus waited outside during breakfast. He did not want to deal with the chorusing 'hi, Remus' so early in the morning. Luckily he had Sirius who was willing to brave the fight for him. He emerged through the dining hall's back doors with a buttered crumpet in one hand and a styrofoam cup of tea in the other.

"Audriana Vane practically throttled me just now. She's still trying to figure out who you wrote the poem for," he said, handing the food over. "Apparently word's out of the bag about Farrah. No one believes you saved a stunning French model from the Seine anymore, Moons."

"How will I ever recover?" Remus replied sarcastically, scarfing down the crumpet.

"Maybe we should just skip commmunion," Sirius said, watching him.

Remus was ready to agree, but just then the doors behind Sirius burst open and several girls rushed out. Among them was Audriana Vane, who saw the two of them and immediately lit up. Remus was pretty sure she hadn't even known he existed before all of the nonsense began—but then again, he'd never paid her any attention either.

"Reeeemus!" She keened. "So glad we found you, did you get our letters this morning?"

Remus sipped his tea awkwardly, resisting a grimace when it burnt his tongue.

"He got them, alright," Sirius answered instead.

"Do you want to walk over to the chapel together?" Audriana offered, while the girls behind her giggled furiously. "You can come too, Sirius."

"How generous," Sirius said. "But Lupin and I were just—"

“There you are!” It was Marlene, emerging through the doors with Nicole beside her. “C’mon, you lazy sods, we’re going to be late for church.”

As embarrassing as it was, Remus was thankful for Marlene’s interruption. She and Nicole walked them over to the school church, arm and arm with him and Sirius. Their presence alone seemed to deter the girls, who walked several paces behind and whispered to one another furiously.

“Perhaps they're thinking that you and Moony got back together, McKinnon,” Sirius said, Nicole clutched onto his other arm.

“That’d be their mistake then,” Nicole said. “And Marlene’s, considering what she’s said about how Remus used to kiss her.”

“I only said you were shy!” Marlene laughed, when Remus rounded on her.

“I don’t think he’s very shy,” Sirius smirked. “In fact, just yesterday when we were in the village—”

Nicole held up a hand. “I don’t wanna know.”

The girls left them outside the church, where they managed to find James and Peter amongst the rabble waiting to get inside. Remus hated the cold, and therefore had bundled up in several layers, but he’d also brought a book with him in hopes that it would deter anyone from talking to him. It did not.

“That a new book of poems, Lupin?” One boy called. Remus flipped him the bird.

“Hi, Remus,” another girl cooed, before she was promptly chased off by Audriana and her friends. The group had insisted on hovering nearby, and made sure to glare at any girl who dare get too close. At one point Audriana happened to catch him staring and flashed him a dazzling smile, but it was not her Remus was looking at. Just over her shoulder, Regulus Black was waiting his turn to get inside. He’d also brought a book, and though Yaxley was trying to say something to him, Regulus kept on reading—blocking him out as though it were as easy as breathing.

Annoyed, Remus turned back to his friends, determined that if Regulus could tune the world out, he could do it twice as well. Next to him, Sirius was stuck on a tangent—busy going on about the importance of what he was calling a ‘rock and roll’ death.

“I’m just saying,” he drawled. “If we’re all gonna go out one day, we might as well make a big show of it. When’s the last time you heard of a rock star dying peacefully in his sleep? And I don’t mean from an overdose—mean, old and wrinkly, smelling of farts.”

“People die of natural causes all the time,” Peter reasoned. “Doesn’t make them boring.”

Sirius ignored him; “Ooh! How ‘bout a plane crash? You know, like Buddy Holly and Richie Valens. Think of it, they could call it ‘the day music died—again’!”

“How about you stop predicting our deaths and start reciting your morning prayers for once,” James replied snidely.

“Planes not your style, Potter? Okay, how ‘bout electrocution? You could just touch the mike stand with wet hands or something! Happened to the lead singer of the Yardbirds, and he got a candle-light vigil!”

James shoved Sirius away by the face, stifling the other boy’s sniggering.

“I would’ve thought it was more ‘rock and roll’ to get addicted to heroin,” Peter said, pulling up the collar of his wool coat to ward off the chill.

“No way,” Sirius scoffed. “I ain’t going out like Elvis or Morrison, choking on my own vomit on the bathroom floor. Put me on a motorbike and send me off the edge of the M25. That’s how one of the Allman Brothers died.”

“Morrison died in a bathtub,” Remus corrected, without looking up from his book.

“I thought they just found him in the bathtub.”

“So you think he died, got up and then got into the tub?”

“… Alright, touché, Lupin.”

Remus glanced up, feeling sly. “If you don’t like bathtubs, you could always wrap your car around a tree like Bolan.”

Sirius clapped a hand over his heart. “Ooof. Still too soon, Moons.

We'll see who's laughing when one of the Who up and keel over."

Remus shrugged, unbothered. To him, dossers like Pete Townshend and Keith Moon felt as close as you could get to being immortal. People would be playing their music forever. Or, people with taste, anyway.

Eventually the chapel doors opened and everyone began to file inside. Remus hung back purposely, and noted that Audriana and her girlfriends had as well. Not wanting to risk getting stuck beside them, he looked around desperately until Lily, Mary, and Lottie appeared.

"Still warding off your many admirers, Remus?" Lottie teased.

"Yes," he said through his teeth, "and if you'd help me, I'd much appreciate it."

They managed to grab their usual spot amongst the back-most pews, but it was a high demand area among the other sixth form students, and by the time Audriana had caught up to them, the pew was full. She moved on down the aisle, looking ruffled, but made sure to turn around in her seat to wave at him. Remus purposely buried his nose in his book.

"Alright, Evans?" James said, as Lily fit herself in between him and Remus.

"Alright, Potter." She smiled, and then kissed him.

"Don't I get one?" Sirius blagged. Lily scoffed at him, but kissed his cheek anyway. "Morning to you too, Remus."

"Morning."

She tapped his book. "That for class or for fun?"

"Class. We're supposed to have it read by Monday but I've been putting it off."

"Doesn't sound like you." Sirius reached over, taking the book. " 'Medea'. Oh shit, this the one we're supposed to read for Bilshin?"

Remus snatched it back, determined not to let Sirius lose him his second novel in one week. "Yes, now find your own."

Sirius shrugged indifferently. "Wasn't gonna read it anyway. Summarise it for me later?"

“No,” Remus said, knowing he would. Next to him, Mary turned around in her seat, looking distressed.

“Has anyone seen Marlene? I’m starting to get worried. This is like the second time she’s skipped church this term. That’s worrying for her, right?”

“Get your knickers out of a twist,” Lottie said; “She’s right there.” She pointed, and they all looked up to find Marlene sitting a few rows ahead with Nicole next to her.

“I don’t get it,” Mary grumbled. “Why’s she always going off with that twelfth year these days?”

“They’re friends,” Remus said quickly, sparing a tentative glance in Sirius’ direction. Apparently this was not the answer Mary was looking for. She slumped back into the pew, arms crossed over her chest. He knew Mary could be covetous when it came to her friends, but it was even more so with her bestest and oldest friend. She’d probably thought she’d never have to worry about Marlene leaving her, since she was so rarely interested in other people. Remus couldn’t find it in himself to be sympathetic; if Mary was allowed her ever-revolving group of darlings, then Marlene deserved someone that liked her that way too.

“OOOH! Look who it is!”

A voice rang out from the pew behind them. It was Michael Baelish, a thick-headed idiot who’d never gotten higher than an ‘acceptable’ on any essay he’d ever written. No one seemed all that impressed when he began making a scene, but he’d certainly gotten enough kids to turn and look.

“What’s that,” Michael taunted again; “Remus Lupin—here? Why… shouldn’t you be off signing your many manuscripts?”

“Do you even know what a manuscript is, Baelish?” Sirius scoffed.

Michael ignored him, turning instead to his best friend and the equally as thick, Eli Barbary. “Barbary, mate—‘shall I compare thee to a summer’s day’?” He said. “Or I know, I’ll just ask Lupin to tell you that ‘your eyes are like diamonds, your arms a brace to hold me when I feel ill’!”

“Stop! Please don’t, my heart simply cannot bear it!” Eli wailed, before getting to his feet and dramatically ‘fainting’ over Remus’ back.

“Back off, Barbary!” James barked.

“Yeah, get the fuck away from him!” Sirius grunted, as he and Remus pushed the other boy back into his own pew. Eli didn’t seem to mind much. He simply sat up and laughed along with several other kids until Sheila strolled up the row, carrying a small armful of sheet music for the choir.

“Eli, Michael,” she smiled. “I was just looking for someone to help me carry these papers. They are so dreadfully heavy. Will you join me at the front of the hall?”

Eli and Michael both looked reluctant, but all it took was a bit more prodding to get them moving. They went first up the aisle, and Sheila stopped at the end of their pew just long enough to slide a single paper from her stack and pass it along to Remus.

“I’m not your English teacher, but if I were, you’d have gotten top marks.”

Remus gaped. As she left, he turned the paper over to find a copy of his poem with the words, ‘Absolutely brilliant!’ printed along the bottom. He was horrified.

“I heard even McGonagall got a copy,” Lottie whispered. “But don’t worry. She said it was entirely inappropriate to acknowledge such admiration from a student. Think that means you’re in the clear.”

“Gee, thanks a lot, Lot.”

“You can come back to our dorm after church,” Lily offered. “Marlene’s gonna meet me there. We were gonna study.”

Remus reluctantly glanced in the direction of Audriana and her friends.

“They aren’t in our House,” Lily said, catching the look. “We’ll smuggle you back under the blanket if need be. No one’ll tease you there.”

“Okay,” Remus nodded.

“And what about us?” Sirius protested. “You’re not going to offer James and I a chance to study?”

“You know the rules, Black. Neither of you are prefects, and asking you to study is like asking you to pull your own teeth out."

"Studying is a made-up concept. Like time. We just exist—what happens to pass through my brain and get stuck is none of my business."

"I think A-Levels would disagree."

After communion got out, Remus promptly ditched his friends to follow the girls back to their place. He was happy for the peace and quiet, but that didn't mean Sirius wasn't going to try and badger. He'd gotten around Lily's stringent House rules by standing outside the open common room window and leaning his arms against the sill. It let the cold in, but Remus couldn't resist it when he'd call him over.

"We could drown him," Sirius suggested. He was back on his rousing parenthesis from that morning, newly invigorated by all the ways they might get back at Regulus for his gross betrayal.

"No."

"We could slightly maim him?"

"No."

"We could… spank him like the naughty boy he is?"

Remus considered. "Maybe."

"Really?"

"No."

Sirius huffed, dropping his chin down on the windowsill. "I hate when you're like this."

"No, you don't," Remus said, a wry smirk on his lips. "You think it's charming and it gets you hot and bothered. That's why I do it."

Sirius bit his bottom lip, looking amused. "Tart," he said, smirking right back. "Still, you were so mad when it happened—what's changed?"

What's changed is I found out Regulus did it.

Remus pinched his forehead. "Starting a prank war with Regulus isn't going to turn out well for any of us—especially me. Did you forget I still have to spend the rest of the year as his prefect partner?"

"Of course I didn't forget. You remind me every day. I just wish I knew how the tosser did it."

"I know how he did it—prefects have access to the photocopiers. Ten quid says he skipped out on music lessons with me to steal the poem off Peter, then got his slimy friends to distribute them." And really, Remus couldn't even bring himself to hate him all that much. The entire plot was genius—a social murder, if you would; something he'd initially thought beyond the morals of a one Regulus Black. But he should've known better.

Never underestimate a Black.

"We need to get him back," said Sirius

"We did get him back. Last June."

"Ugh! I miss angry Moony—sensible Moony's no fun. That little prat really fucked you up, you know."

"Did he? Didn't notice." Remus sighed, dropping his head forward. "I just want to forget about it. It'll be holidays in a few weeks anyway, then Regulus'll be old news."

Sirius set his jaw, like he wanted to argue but couldn't find the right words. "Come away with me," he said finally, fingers just brushing the cuff of Remus' sleeve.

"I'm studying," Remus answered, though not entirely untempted. "You should try it. We do have mock exams starting next week, you know."

"Stuff the studying. They're called 'mock exams' for a reason, let's go mock 'em. You're smart enough to ace any bloody test without even trying."

"Sirius—"

"Please…? Come on! Come away with me, and we'll plot a horrible prank to get back at that miserable brother of mine. It'll be brilliant."

Remus was almost considering it, but then Lily appeared over his shoulder and thrust a pencil at the tip of Sirius' nose to ward him off.

"Not a chance! We are studying! And if you're not also here to study, then you're here to distract. So off with you, Romeo."

Sirius teetered back onto the grass with a laugh, one hand over his wounded heart. “ ‘O, sweet Evans, wilt thou leave me so unsatisfied?’”

That was it for Remus. He pulled away from the window, already shouting; “Please, no more fucking poetry!” And Lily beamed proudly.

“You heard him,” she told Sirius, grabbing the window latches and pulling them closed. “Bye bye, baby!”

“ ‘Good night, good night’,” Sirius called woefully, “ ‘Parting is such sweet sorrow, that I shall say good night till it be—’”

The window shut, and Lily pulled the curtains together for good measure before stopping to dust off her hands. “There, finally some quiet.” She came to join him on the rug, their things already spread out on the coffee table between the sofa and fire. They were alone save the other girls distantly scattered about the room with studying of their own. This included Marlene, who was tucked up on a nearby sofa, long legs and Spanish homework set across the other cushions.

“I see he’s feeling needy today,” she teased, tossing a knowing glance in Remus’ direction.

“He wants to get back at Regulus.”

“Can you blame him? That was cold and underhanded, what Regulus did. Not cool at all.”

“I know.” And he did. Already Remus had pictured what it might be like to take Regulus apart piece by piece. The little git probably had a shrivelled up prune for a heart.

“But you aren’t really going to do anything to him, right?” Lily cut-in. “I feel bad for Regulus most days, and besides, going after him now would only put you on the same depraved level.”

“Nothing wrong with being a little depraved,” Marlene mused. “As long as no one gets seriously injured, I don’t see the problem.”

“Who are you and what have you done with Marlene McKinnon?”

Marlene uncapped her middle finger like a lipstick and drew it across her lips. Lily gave her a dirty look for the gesture—then giggled, muttering the words ‘you’re horrible’ before shaking her head and returning to her work. In answer, Marlene capped her finger again and winked at Remus.

“Nicole and I overheard those guys really having a go at you in church. You holding up alright?”

“I’m over it,” he lied.

“Oh? Does this mean you’re finally enjoying your newfound popularity?”

Remus flicked his rubber at her. “Popularity can kiss my arse.”

“Aw, poor Remus. You should beat them up. Show them how romantic you can be while pounding their faces in.”

“Yes, I’m sure that’ll solve all my problems.”

“It’ll solve a few.”

“No, it won’t,” Lily said, barely glancing up from her notes. “You’ll just be giving them exactly what they want. They wouldn’t be so entertained in the first place if you hadn’t lost your head in the dining hall like you did.”

Remus grumbled; “Do you have to start every conversation with an ‘I told you so’?”

“I’m only saying that if you act like you don’t care then they’re bound to lose interest eventually. I’d give it a try if I were you.”

“That might be good advice, except someone has to give them something more interesting to talk about first,” Marlene added snidely.

“In that case, shall I chat-up Chastity?” Remus quipped, making her scowl lightly as she licked her thumb and turned the page.

“Alright, Remus,” Lily started, reaching over to pluck his notes from his hands; “What started the War of the Roses and what repercussions did it have on feudal England at the time?”

If he’d been really listening, he might have been able to answer, but just then Lottie guided a weeping girl into the room, quickly bringing an abrupt end to their studying for a second time.

“Don’t listen to him, Prissy!” She cooed, before ushering Marlene’s legs off the sofa so the two of them could sit. “He’s a fool for treating you so badly—a right cad! I'll bet he comes crawling back on his hands and knees before the week's even out, you'll see!"

"I don't want him back!" The fitting girl howled. She looked about fifteen, but had enough makeup smudged beneath her eyes to rival a raccoon.

"What's wrong, Priscilla?" Lily asked, scooting closer on the carpet. Remus, adversely, slid further away.

"Prissy and Spencer had a row," Lottie explained quietly, as Priscilla continued her sobbing.

"I hate boys!"

"Join the club," Marlene muttered.

"That bastard!" Priscilla groaned, turning on her. "Did you know, he left me waiting outside in the freezing cold for ages and then had the audacity to say that I was the one who was overreacting—but he didn't even remember that it was my birthday! My own boyfriend!"

"Perhaps you should trade him in for a different model," Marlene offered. No one seemed to find it funny.

"Have you tried telling him how it made you feel?" Lily suggested.

"Obviously, but Spencer's a guy! And guys don't care about feelings. They'd rather skip out and talk about stupid things, like business and billiards!"

"And boobs," Marlene added.

"There, there." Looking sympathetic, Lottie cast her gaze toward Remus and instantly perked up. "Remus! Now there's a man with some real emotional breadth. Remus, come tell Priscilla that dossers like Spencer Whitmore aren't worth their weight in salt—or tears."

Feeling the inevitable weight of another problem that was not his to deal with, Remus tried edging even further away. "Er, sorry, Lot—I'm not really not sure this is my forte."

"Of course it is—you hate everybody!"

She had a point.

"What is it about November that turns guys into such pigs?" Priscilla moaned.

“I think it’s the name,” Marlene suggested; “Noh-vehm-berrr—just not very satisfying. Now October on the other hand…”

Ignoring her, Lottie threw out an arm. “You’re a guy, Remus, so what’s the answer? Why’s it so hard for boys to be decent to their own girlfriends?”

“Entitlement?” He suggested meekly.

“Yes!” Lily agreed. “Remus is completely right. It’s all that priggish entitlement. They expect us to be the ones crawling back to them—except they can’t even remember to wash their face at night and cry when we pluck their eyebrows!”

Remus leaned in; “James lets you pluck his eyebrows?”

Before Lily could answer, Priscilla gave another wail; “So I guess we should just throw out the lot of them then!”

“Not Remus,” Marlene said reassuringly; “I’m not much sure on his bathing habits, but he’s actually quite helpful… When he wants to be, that is. And he’s such the romantic.”

He flipped her off, and Marlene blew him a kiss in return as Priscilla raised her tear-stained cheeks from her hands.

“That’s right. I read your poem, Remus,” she sniffled. “It really was quite beautiful. If only Spencer were capable of half that level of romance. Oh… what do you think I should do?”

Oh FUCK no.

Remus looked desperately to Lily, but she appeared only too ready to listen. Lottie was of no help either, only motioning in a sort of ‘go on’ gesture. And Marlene—well, she’d raised her book in front of her face and appeared to be trying not to laugh.

“C’mon, Remus!” Lottie prodded. “What do you think?”

“Yeah, Remus, tell us,” Marlene chittered.

He scowled, but then Priscilla sniffled again, all while staring at him with those big girlish eyes, and Remus had no choice but to answer.

“Well… If you ask me, I—I’d say Lottie’s right. I mean, no guy who forgets your birthday and makes you cry this much is worth sitting in the fucking cold for… right?"

"You really think so?" Priscilla whimpered.

"Yes, Remus is absolutely right!" Lily said. "You should find someone who would wait out in the cold for you. Like… Like Remus! He'd stand in the freezing cold for anyone—especially a girlfriend. Just ask Marlene!"

"Oh no, Remus and I are ancient history," Marlene laughed, waving her hand. "Love him, but no."

Lottie leaned into Priscilla with an eager grin. "I know just what you should do, Prissy. Tell Spencer you're interested in Remus and I swear he'll be begging you to take him back."

Remus pressed his palms into his eye sockets. "Mercy—please. Have I not suffered enough this week?"

The girls erupted into a fit of giggles, but by then Priscilla had stopped crying and things were finally starting to look up again. She and Lottie were already on their way out—to go make Spencer Whitmore sorry he'd ever been born, surely—when Priscilla spun back around and looked straight at him.

"Remus, I hope it's alright to ask, but who was it who inspired your poem?"

He opened his mouth, then shut it.

"I just read a lot…"

* * *

Monday 21 st November 1977

"So that's it, huh?"

"Seems like it."

James squinted behind his glasses. "Definitely not a body."

Remus wasn't really sure what it was they'd expected. Though the pit

Filch had dug out behind their dorm was unreasonably deep, all he'd uncovered was a small metal case. The item in question had turned out to be a time capsule, buried in the earth by a group of leaving students and their professors. Now the contents of the capsule had been put out on display to give everyone a glimpse at what life was like at school fifty years before. It held photographs and newspaper clippings, as well as several class photos and official documents. It had also preserved several more personal items; an old wallet, a deck of dingy playing cards, cinema tickets from a bygone age, family photos, and also a calcified package of Gold Flake cigarettes. It was all stuff that must've felt important to someone once, but had become little more than dirty antiques for the new generation to ogle.

"Reckon those guys in the photos are still alive?" James asked.

"Probably," Remus answered. "They wouldn't be much older than your grandparents."

"They could've fought in the war though. Died."

"Oh. Yeah, guess they could've."

"That is so not a 'rock and roll' way to die," Sirius said, then; "I'll bet someone snuck at least a few nudie photos in there. McGonagall's just too 'fraid to show us those bits."

"I'm betting on weed," James sniggered. "You think they fit a little baggie inside the lining of the wallet? I know that's where Lupin keeps his."

"Oi, you always keep a little on you for luck."

"And how's that going for you, Shakespeare?"

Remus scoffed, pushing him lightly.

"What d'ya think fifty year-old weed even tastes like?" Sirius asked, stroking his chin.

"Dirt," Remus answered. "You can't get high off weed that old."

"Of course you'd know," James finished. They all leaned in a bit closer after that, until Sirius finally straightened up, wearing that clever look of his.

"Maybe we should bury our own time capsule. Leave a piece of us behind for whatever losers find themselves in our places fifty years from now."

"What—you gonna put your own naked photos in it if we do?"

"Maybe I will, Potter. You think Evans would be my photographer if I asked?"

"Dickhead!" James grabbed Sirius in a headlock and the two of them began tussling back and forth, other kids weaving around them in the hall, completely unbothered by the usual antics.

"Hey, Remus—over here!"

All three of them glanced up. Peter was waving at Remus from down the hall, looking ecstatic. Beside him stood three other boys. In contrast, they all appeared nervous and awkward.

"So that's where Wormy went," Sirius grunted, still wrapped in James' headlock. Their friend had been missing all lunch hour, and Remus found it odd that he'd be turning up now with strangers in tow.

"Come on," Peter said to the others, before leading them forward. "Remus, these lads and I have a business proposition for you."

"What sort of business?"

"The poem sort."

"Oh no, you don't!" James said suddenly, freeing Sirius and getting between Remus and the three strangers. "Pete, I don't know what you're on about but Lupin's done with these bloody jokes, so you guys can just move on!"

"Yeah, enough taking the piss!" Sirius scowled, rubbing his neck. "Only we get to rag on Moony, them's the rules."

"They're not here to take the piss," Peter insisted. "They just wanna talk. Now could you two give us a moment? You can return to being Lupin's bodyguards after."

James and Sirius both deferred to Remus, who pursed his lips and gestured for them to go on. They do so, reluctantly, and as his friends shuffled up the hall, Remus crossed his arms.

"You better not be messing with me, Pete. I'm really not in the mood."

“Just hear them out,” Peter pleaded, before clearing his throat. “Lads, this is Remus. Remus, these are the lads! Ashton Hyde, Francois Martin, and Spencer Whitman.”

“It's Whitmore,” Spencer grumbled.

Remus looked the boy up and down. “You’re Spencer?”

“Uh… yeah.”

Not much to go off of at all, huh, Prissy, Remus thought candidly.

He uncrossed his arms. “Alright, so whatchu want?”

Before any of the others could answer, Peter slid back in. “You see, Lupin, these here lads are having some issues of the 'feminal' sort."

"That's not a word."

"Right. What I mean is that they’ve got trouble at home—the honeymoon’s over—their favourite birds have flown the coop—they—”

“I think I get the picture, Pete.”

Peter elbowed Francois fondly. “Told ya he’d get it.”

“So what do you want from me?” Remus asked, looking straight at Spencer this time.

“My girlfriend fell in love with that bloody poem of yours,” he said. “Apparently it’s the best thing since sliced bread, and now she’s threatening to break up with me if I don’t come up with something just as foppish.”

“Didn’t Prissy already break up with you?”

Spencer gave him an odd look. “How’d you know about that?”

“Uh… word travels fast.” Remus cleared his throat. “So what—you all want me to write poems for you?”

“Well, we can’t bloody do it, can we?”

“Have you tried?”

Before Remus could put his foot in it any further, Peter slid in;

“They’re willing to pay for it. You just whip something up, they pass it along to their girls—and boom! Everyone’s happy.”

“Except they’re not my girlfriends.”

“Come on, Moony, it’ll be the same as writing a song! And besides, you said needed the money for fags, right?”

Remus resisted a scowl; it was a ludicrous idea, but even worse was the bad business of telling buyers what it was they were paying for.

“Yeah, I dunno about that. Sorry, lads, but I really ain't the type.”

Peter surged forward, grabbing Remus by the back of the neck and smiled at the others. “Just give us a moment, lads,” he told them, before ushering Remus away a few paces.

“Pete—”

“Look, you can totally do this! They don’t even have to be good poems —those guys aren’t gonna know the difference. Just slap a few words together and you’ll have earned enough cash to buy fags until you’re forty.”

“What’s with all the sudden… manoeuvring?” Remus blabbed. “You sound like my dad if he knew how to smile.”

“Let’s just say my econ classes are finally starting to make sense.”

“Oh? So you’re a businessman now?”

Peter waved him off humbly. “I’m only trying to present you with the opportunity to earn an income of your own. I think it’s brilliant—easy money, and all you have to do is lift a pencil.”

“You know I don’t actually like writing poetry, right?”

“Who likes their job? We do it to support life’s little pleasures. Just think of it—three measly poems, and you’ll be rarin’ for when we go home for the holidays. You can even buy that girlfriend of yours a pretty little gift. I’m sure ‘Farrah’ will appreciate it.”

“Pete, I’m about three seconds away from smacking the shit out of you.”

“As long as you thank me for this brilliant opportunity afterwards.”

Remus sighed. He wasn't sure what had gotten into his friend, but if all it took to buy his own fags was a few cringe-inducing lines of script then maybe…

He turned back to the group. "Do they have to be long?"

Spencer shrugged, glancing at the others. "Nah, just enough to make her bawl a bit."

"Alright… but it'll cost you up front."

"How much?"

"Twenty."

"Twenty?" Francois yelped. "For a fucking poem?!"

"Each."

The boys gaped.

"I'll give you five quid," Ashton said.

Remus picked at his teeth with his nail. "Ashton Hyde… Isn't your dad a lord?"

The boy puckered.

"How 'bout we split the difference?" Peter suggested. "Ten each and he'll write like the wind. Your girlfriends'll think they've woken up to new men."

Ashton, Francois, and Spencer all looked at each other sorely.

"C'mon," Peter egged, "Lupin's right—s'not like you lads ain't good for it."

There was some more grumbling, but eventually all three boys were pulling their wallets from their coat pockets and slapping the notes into Remus' previously empty palm.

"Right," he said, tucking the money away with a satisfied smirk. "I, uh... Guess I'll need some info. Maybe just their names, some characteristics like hair and eye colour, and something they like. Try a favourite book or flower or something. Write it all down for me and we've got a deal."

Excited by the chance to woo their own girlfriends, the boys pulled out a pen and a paper each, quickly scribbling down what was needed. They split after that, and Remus let out a long breath, wondering how long it would be until all of it blew up in his face.

“Have I made up for accidentally letting Barty steal your poem yet?” Peter asked, looking smug.

“Nice try, Wormtail, but I’ve been burned before. We’ll see how this pans out first.”

Peter nodded, understanding, but still with a kick in his step that was distinctly un-Peter-like. When the ball rang, he strolled off with such a grin on his face that Remus found he couldn’t even be irritated anymore.

“They didn’t give you any trouble?” Sirius asked later, when he finally reappeared for Classics.

“Nah. Opposite, even. Tell ya later.”

Sirius raised an eyebrow in question, but already Professor Bilshin was calling out over the class.

“Alright, since some of you have gotten a little too comfortable recently—” He slapped a ruler down on a pair of desks up front, where a girl named Verity Wilkenson was currently straddling her boyfriend, both of them locked together at the lips. The pair burst apart, but did not look happy about it.

“New seat arrangements,” Bilshin barked. “Find your name on the board and park it, we’ve work to do today.”

Without even looking, Remus knew his chances of being sat next to Sirius were slim to none, but apparently the fates were shining on him today; he and Marlene had been given a pair of desks by the window.

“Finally!” She grinned, as he pulled out his chair and sat. “I’ve missed sitting beside you.”

“And what am I—chopped liver?” Sirius said, as he stopped by their desks.

“Liver with a side of day-old tripe,” Marlene answered, sticking out her tongue. Sirius made a play at trying to grab it, before instead picking up Remus’ copy of Medea as he pulled it from his bag.

“What’d you two think of today's play?”

“I loved it,” Marlene said automatically. “Let me guess, you never finished?”

“I skimmed,” Sirius said, flipping through the book. “Enough to know that Medea was a badass. ‘Cept she reminded me a bit too much of my mum. Maybe it was all the filicide.”

“I hope you’re being sarcastic."

Sirius gave Remus a snide look and passed the book back. “What’d you think of it?”

“It was okay. She was better in Ovid though.”

“Ha. You’re so cute when you talk like a swot.” Sirius crouched down. “Hey, get this—Prongs and I came up with a way to get back at Reg and his miserable comrades for what they did to you.”

“Does it involve any chemical warfare?”

“Just a little. But I’d hardly consider flour and bicarb soda real chemicals.”

“Bicarb soda? It isn’t more stink bombs, is it?”

“I’m offended that you even had to ask. We don’t repeat pranks. This one is brand new, and much sweeter. Call it a present, if you’d like. And the best part—all of Salazar’s gonna get a taste.”

Bewildered by all of the obscure hints, Remus opened his mouth in question only to be cut off when their professor ordered Sirius back to his desk. Winking at him, Sirius obeyed and dropped down into his seat, two desks away. His seat partner, a girl named Amanda, immediately started undressing him with her eyes, obviously delighted she’d gotten placed so close by. Remus wasn’t worried. The only one actually undressing Sirius Black was him.

“Shall I fetch you a camera?” Marlene murmured under her breath. “Bloody queer.”

Remus snorted into his palm, feeling familiar.

“Oi, pen any new poems lately, Lupin?”

It was Snape, naturally. The déjà vu must’ve summoned him. He’d been moved two rows behind them and seemed just as happy as Remus that the two of them were finally separated. Unfortunately his new seat partner, Verity, did not look all that pleased.

“Just ignore him,” Marlene advised, taking Remus’ shoulder and turning him around. “He’s only trying to get a rise out of you.”

She was right, and Remus calmed himself with thoughts of Sirius’ mysterious prank. Snape was in Salazar House; with any luck the revenge would extend to him as well.

“Alright, settle down!” Professor Bilshin called. The class quieted a few moments later, and he turned to write the title of their most recent play on the board. Out of the corner of his eye, Remus saw Marlene lean in, as though she were a tiger getting ready to pounce.

“ ‘Medea’, one of Euripides’ more notable tragedies which I’m sure all of you read to completion.” The professor eyed his students pointedly, and Remus glanced over at Sirius who gave him a sarcastic thumb’s up. Professor Bilshin didn’t seem to notice; he turned around and added the word ‘Themes’ to the board.

“Now, as an intro to our unit, who can suggest to me one of the themes present in our text?”

Marlene’s hand shot up. “Feminism.”

“Oh, here we go,” someone muttered. Remus glanced up sharply, and found Wells Lewis already sniggering with another boy near the front of the class. Wells was Verity’s boyfriend and a right dickhead when it came to most things, but Remus had never had class with him until that term.

“Alright—feminism.” Bilshin added it to the board. “Anything else?”

“Marriage,” Verity called, making Marlene roll her eyes.

“Good,” Bilshin said, scratching ‘marriage’ across the chalkboard. “Explain.”

While Marlene soured at not being given the chance to extrapolate on her point, Verity perked up in her seat. “Well, the whole plot hinges on it. Medea and Jason are married yet he’s fallen in love with the other princess so she wants revenge.”

“Oh my god—love?” Marlene said loudly. “Did we even read the same play? Jason doesn't love Glauce, he wants her father's kingdom."

"A friendly reminder to raise your hand in class, Miss McKinnon," Bilshin sighed. "Now, if we were to compare these two themes—marriage and feminism—what does the text say about them?"

Marlene raised her hand, but the professor picked Verity.

"That marriage is natural, but you have to be a good wife first. Medea loved Jason but she thinks she's better than him. Who would want to stay married to someone like that?"

"She doesn't think she's better—she thinks she's equal!" Marlene exclaimed. "Medea says it in the opening of the play, that marriage is intrinsically tied to a women's reputation and therefore is just another example of the power imbalance between genders! Jason can divorce her and he'll be fine, but she has to go into exile. It's pure misogyny."

"Hand, McKinnon," Bilshin ordered. "Can anyone else name a theme?"

Wells Lewis raised his hand. "Revenge. The creepy bird murdered both her kids just to get back at her cheating husband."

"Figures that's what you'd take out of it," Marlene protested quietly.

"Yes, but what drove her to that decision?" The professor urged.

"Pride," Marlene said. "The Greeks were obsessed with hubris, and Medea's too clever for the rest of her counterparts, but because she's a woman, no one will take her seriously. To everyone else she's just a villain."

"Didn't she cut up her own brother and throw his body parts into the sea?" Verity called.

"Exactly! She knew her father would have to stop to collect his son's body so it helped Jason and the Argonauts get away with the Golden Fleece. It was a brilliant counter move."

"I'd hate to be your brother," Wells sniggered.

"Medea's passion and suffering made her into a monster," Marlene continued, ignoring the ridicule; "But how can we say for sure that her story is inherently worse than any other? Hercules also murdered his own wife and children and he's still considered a hero. Medea's automatically condemned because we've all been brainwashed into thinking that a mother's only duty is to care for her children. But she was powerful, and Jason tried to make her subservient. If anything I feel bad for Medea."

"Well, there's a shocker," Snape mused. "The suffragette feels bad for the witch. Someone call Hansel and Gretel."

Half the class began to laugh until Professor Bilshin silenced them with a stern clap of his hands. "Alright, so suffering, a strong theme to be sure." He wrote it on the board. "Lupin, I know you've read the play—what can be said about Euripes' treatment of his characters in relation to this theme?"

"Uh, well…" Remus glanced sideways, where Marlene was staring at him with desperate eyes. "I think Marlene's right. The play's all about society versus women, and what it means to take charge of their own bodies. It's—uh… Well, it's suffering."

"And what's the cost of your body, Lupin?" Wells' seat partner called. Laughter erupted again, but Marlene had the support she'd been seeking.

"Medea suffers because she's 'othered'," she called. "Because people are afraid of her! It's proof that she's powerful. Jason would've been nothing without her magic, and yet the moment they arrive home he throws Medea aside and calls her a barbarian."

"Maybe she was just ugly," Wells reasoned. "I wouldn't want to snog someone whinging about their problems all the time—especially if they had the face of a horse. Sound familiar, Lupin? You and McKinnon dated, yeah?"

A paper ball hit Wells in the back of the head and he turned around to find Sirius scowling at him. "Watch your mouth, mate."

"What? I'm just making an educated guess. Thought you'd be able to relate, yeah, Black? At least you know how to pick 'em."

While the class sniggered at Sirius, Marlene scowled.

"Pig. At least Sirius—"

"That's quite enough," Bilshin cut in. "We're discussing themes, not the issues of beauty versus morality. Now would anyone else care to play the field?"

“Not McKinnon,” Wells drawled. “She’s much too busy being a bitter rug-muncher to take a swing at anyone.”

“Better than sounding like a worn out hose-bag with a silver spoon so far up his arse you’d think he’d fucking choke on it!”

“And that is detention, Miss McKinnon!”

Sirius sat up in his chair very quickly. “Hold on, that toff just called her a ‘bitter rug-muncher’ and McKinnon’s the one that gets punished? That’s fucked up.”

“That is detention for you too, Mr. Black. After school—my office.”

“Fine,” Sirius huffed, before cupping his hands around his mouth to holler across the classroom; “Looks like it’s a date, McKinnon! You prefer red wine or white?”

“Sirius Black, hallway—now,” Bilshin snarled. Shrugging, Sirius got up and made his way down the aisle of desks. Just as he passed Wells, his elbow came up, clipping him in the back of the head.

“Go to hell, Black,” Wells hissed.

Sirius waved mockingly before shooting a wink in Marlene’s direction and joining their teacher in the hall. There was more sniggering, but as Remus turned to Marlene, she simply turned her face to the window, head bowed low over her book.

“You—uh… handled that pretty well,” Remus told her, after the lesson had ended and they were making their way out of the classroom.

“I’m so sick of how women are treated at this school,” Marlene scowled. “We had to fight just to get our own football team, and then they told us we couldn’t compete in any official tournaments. And now this bloody-fucking time capsule.”

Sirius slid an arm around Marlene’s shoulders. “Oh? You heard about that, yeah?”

“Unfortunately.”

“You should see the hole they left behind our dorm. Apparently those older codgers thought it would be funny to bury it ten feet under. Not even Moony could crawl outta a pit that deep.”

Remus took a light shot at the back of Sirius’ head before deferring to

Marlene. “What was wrong with the time capsule, Cherry?”

“I’ll tell you what’s wrong—that time capsule is from 1927, that’s fifty years ago!”

“Okay. Yeah…?”

“Do either of you know when Hawkings started admitting female students?”

Both of them shook their heads ruefully.

“Fifty-four years ago! Women were here four years before that capsule was buried, and there isn’t a single hint of their existence in the entire thing! Not in the school photos, or the certificates—none! It’s all memorabilia of men. Every photo and list and bloody artifact—men! But women were here—women were contributing to this college, and there isn’t a shred of evidence of that! We have no idea if they had clubs or organisations or what classes they enjoyed or how they spent their time. It’s tragic.”

Remus exchanged an ashamed glance with Sirius, who shrugged and offered an alternative;

“We were going to trick Salazar into eating a bunch of weed brownies if you wanted us to drop some off for Wells and Verity too."

“No,” she grumbled. “I think I’m just gonna sulk a bit more. See you in detention.”

Marlene pulled away and made her way down the hall to her next class, and Sirius sidled up to Remus and slung an arm around his shoulder instead. It was more of a reach, but Sirius didn’t seem to notice.

“Such a trooper, willing to take on some of society’s biggest quandaries,” he said, turning them the other way. “Think this is her first detention ever?”

“Probably... Is that really what we’re doing to Salazar? Weed brownies? That’s not a punishment, it’s a gift.”

“Not if they don’t know they’re eating them,” Sirius smirked. “And not if the gift comes on the same day as mocks.”

* * *

Sirius had kindly filled Remus in on the prank idea between final period and study hour, and even he had to admit that it was brilliant. As long as they made it tempting enough, the lads of Salazar House would wake up to a royal treat meant to motivate them on their first day of mock-exams. They wouldn't put enough weed in the brownies to do any real harm, but sure as the wind blows, they'd be feeling it come exam time. The Marauders would have to wait a few days for the timing to line up, but that gave them plenty of time to start stewing. Lily had already refused to give them her personal brownie recipe, but Sirius had found a cookbook in the library that would do the trick. Remus was pleased; he couldn't afford to get back at Regulus personally, but an all-House attack was a strong alternative. As long as he ate the bloody things.

Once Sirius and Marlene had disappeared to serve Bilshin's detention, Remus made his way across campus alone. He had prefect duty, and though it was with Regulus, they were only filing paperwork in the office. Hopefully they'd be able to come to a wordless understanding to ignore one another, and then leave and never speak again. Hopefully.

As he walked, Remus began to feel that familiar empty feeling in his hand. His fingers felt twitchy, and though he knew logically that it was brought on by the anxiety of having to deal with Regulus again, he still searched for something to sedate it. So often lately, he'd been able to fill that empty feeling with Sirius; just a touch, or even a kiss if they were lucky enough to be alone. It was a lovely occurrence, but as it was, Sirius was in detention, so he could only reach for his cigarettes.

They were tucked at the bottom of his bag, buried beneath school texts and exam notes. He managed to reach them—his zippo as well—but as he withdrew the carton, the zipper of his pencil case got caught on the button on his shirtsleeve and came tumbling out, hitting the pavement with a clatter and scattering pens and pencils everywhere. Remus sighed, and stooped over to collect them. He'd just picked up his rubber when he noticed them.

It was Audriana, along with her group of friends. The girls were walking up the pavement arm in arm, with giddy smiles on their faces. They might've just passed him by, said hello, or stopped to fulfil another purpose—one that was innocent and not at all driven by ulterior-motives—except that Remus was never that lucky.

He hurried to collect his things, and then shot to his feet. It was stupid, he knew, to be running from a group of girls, but he wasn't actually running so much as hastening in the other direction. Every so often he'd chance a look over his shoulder and each time he found they were still there, smiling at him and giggling to one another. They weren't even waving—they knew he'd seen them, and now it was a game. A cruel game that only a girl (and probably Sirius) would find funny. But that wasn't all. Around the fourth or fifth time he glanced back, Remus began to realise the true circumstances of their game. The girls weren't just following him.

They were getting closer.

Remus urged his legs to go faster, without fully breaking out into a run because that would be embarrassing and a lot like admitting defeat. Instead he pumped his arms, all while experiencing a shrill feeling that had come over him. He'd thought it might be enough to give them the slip, but when he looked back again—there they were! The girls had also upped their speed; no longer arm in arm, but rather scurrying after him at the same pace.

Oh god. They were chasing him!

Remus whipped his head around, searching desperately for a way out. He was approaching the science block now, and just beyond that would be the dining hall and its surrounding berms. If he could just make it past them then Castle Hall would be a straight shot, but every time he looked back the girls were somehow closer, moving so briskly it was as if they secretly had wings on their school shoes.

Fuck it.

Remus had reached the science block, and the moment he disappeared around the corner of the building, he was off. Running to—running from—it didn't matter! All that mattered was that he put distance between himself and those crazy girls.

"There he goes!"

There were screams—he couldn't tell if they were in despair or delight, all he knew was that he was now sprinting across campus with a wild throng of sixth form girls chasing after him. It was worse than that day in the village, at least then he'd had Sirius to laugh at him—and they hadn't actually been running, they'd just been hiding!

Now he was running—running with only the open berm to save him. He passed other kids, most of them appearing completely flummoxed to find their classmate being chased around the side of their school buildings. It was mortifying, but also terrifying. Every time Remus turned a corner and spotted the group out of the corner of his eye it seemed to have grown—more girls had fallen in with the others, throwing their hat into the ring! He should've known; girls were pack animals, and like wolves they would chase their prey when given any opportunity.

He skirted the dining hall, thankful indeed that it was not yet time for supper and very few were around to witness his shame. The girls kept coming.

"THERE—GET HIM!"

"SOMEONE GRAB HIM!"

"HE'S HEADING FOR BASTION!"

They were right. Directly behind the dining hall and across from the skip bins was a tiny building known as Bastion Hall. Generally students were not allowed inside, since it was mostly offices anyway, but that meant reprieve. Remus' lungs were burning, and his bag kept walloping him in the gut as he ran. After skirting around a lorry parked out behind the cafeteria's loading zone, he made a beeline for the tiny hall. The doors were open—thank god— and he rushed inside, slamming it after him. There was no visible lock, but he could still hear the high-pitched shouts coming from the girls outside. Panicking, Remus turned around and made to dash down the main hallway, only to nearly punt Mrs. Norris across the linoleum as she came streaking out of a random office. He just managed to miss her, and in doing so, collided headlong with a rubbish bin, taking it down to the ground with a horrible crash.

"WHAT'S THAT MAKING ALL THE NOISE?"

It was Filch. He came thundering out of his office wearing his usual mouldy-looking trench and heavy, steel-toed boots. His quivering jowls became a nasty grin when he spotted him, as though he'd yet to fulfil his quota of terrorized students that day.

"What—What are you doin' in 'ere, eh?" He wheezed. "Students aren't allowed in 'ere!"

"It was a mistake!" Remus insisted. He scrambled to his feet, trying to right the bin while chucking pieces of rubbish back inside. “I–I just tripped over the cat, and—”

“You hurt my cat?!”

There was a shout, this time from outside. The girls had crowded around the door and appeared to be pressing their noses up against the frosted glass.

“I think I see him!”

Remus abandoned the rubbish bin and all of its mess. The furious caretaker screamed after him, but there was no way he was going to stop. Remus wasn’t sure what was worse; being caught by the girls or submitting to Filch and spending the next several hours shovelling horse dung in the school stables.

Dodging a secretary as he ran, he burst out of the office building on the far side, letting out a moan of relief as Castle Hall finally fell into view. After making it across the road, he snuck in the back door and found himself alone at the end of Castle Hall’s ground floor hallway. His chest was heaving, and he couldn’t fathom how he was going to explain such a thing to his friends later on, but at least he’d made it.

Once he'd caught his breath, Remus straightened out his bag strap and made his way down the hall toward the main offices. Most of the secretaries and administrative workers would’ve gone for the evening, but that didn't mean he was lucky enough to be awarded peace and privacy. When he strode into the front office, he found Regulus Black standing along the head counter, busy sorting through files and replacing them in their correct cabinets.

“Finally decided to show, did you?”

Remus was instantly furious. There he was, stuck running from a problem that he’d created in the first place, and Regulus had the gall to snark.

“I’m not here to talk,” he snapped, dropping his bag down on a random chair; “I’m here because I have to be. So if we could just ignore each other properly, I’d appreciate it.”

“Fine by me. Just stay out of my way.” Regulus kept sorting, while Remus reached out toward his back to mimic strangling him. Finally he settled on flipping him the bird with both hands, and huffed strongly before marching over to the far side of the room to begin his busy work. He'd just taken off his coat and hung it on the hook by the office's front window when a secretary marched back into the room, carrying a box that looked as though it'd been sitting in brown water for a decade.

"Oh! Boy, am I glad I caught you two. These books are being donated to the school in the village, but they need all our stickers peeled off. The prefects in the library were busy with a group of third years, so I figured we could lend a hand over here at the office." She set the box down on the counter next to Regulus' files. "There's more on the trolley in the hallway when you finish those!"

As the woman left, her heels clicking on the tile, Remus strode over to the box and opened it. The mildewy smell of old books had just hit him when Regulus yanked the case away. He was already digging into it by the time Remus realised that it was meant to be a slight, but rather than give Regulus the satisfaction of blowing up, he stomped out into the hall to retrieve a box of his own.

"Little git… right fuckin' piece of… cheeky arse-hole…!"

Remus kept grumbling under his breath even as he returned to the office, dropping the box of books down on the counter opposite to his prefect partner. At least he got the window. While peeling the stickers off of each book, he stared out at the early evening sky. It was getting darker much earlier now, and they were due for a snow fall or two. Hopefully the weather would hold out until after exams. He didn't much fancy lugging himself across campus during a snowstorm.

Pushing the stack of cleaned books aside, Remus reached into the box for another. As he did, movement beyond the window caught his eye, and he glanced up—just in time to see Audriana and her group of girls approach the Hall's front steps.

He fumbled the book, ducking out of sight below the counter. Instantly his heart was in his throat. How had they found him? Why hadn't they given up? Were they really just coming into the hall for shit's sake?

"There's odd, Lupin," Regulus said, having turned to stare at him; "And then there's you."

"Piss off!" Remus hissed, before wrenching his head up to peek out the window.

"Looking for someone? Like your fan club, maybe?"

Remus couldn't take it anymore. He jumped to his feet, thrusting a finger beneath Regulus' nose. "Honestly, where do you get off?! You'd think you'd have some sense of self-preservation—I am seriously four seconds away from annihilating you!"

"With what? Your extremely quick wit? Good luck trying, I'm not afraid of you."

"You're gonna wish it was wit I hit you with when I'm done! Do you even know how it's been for me since you stole that poem?"

"Not my fault Pettigrew can't keep track of his things," Regulus replied coolly.

"—Crap!" Remus howled. "It's been four days of absolute crap, and it's all your fault! You fucked me over!"

He'd been expecting another dismissive jab, or maybe a snide remark or two—something that would 'put him in his place', but what Regulus did next was ten times worse.

He smirked.

"And how's it feel, Lupin?"

"All I was trying to do was help you!" Remus bellowed. "Since the day I got here, you and Sirius have been trying to pick away at each other like fucking pigeons and I never took a side! He's my best friend and I defended you when he stepped outta line!"

"Well, thank heavens for that!" Regulus exploded. "You may be so generous, but I never asked for your 'help'! And I never asked to be friends with that girl either!"

"It's always 'I never asked'—'I never asked', but that's what nice people do, Regulus! And Trish is nice! She's nice and you don't deserve her friendship—I'm not sure you deserve anyone's!"

"Go then! I never wanted to be stuck with you then, and I certainly don't now! Why don't you go find my brother and make yourselves useless somewhere else!"

"I will! God, if you put half as much effort into being a decent person as you do being miserable, then we might've solved world hunger by now!"

Regulus scowled very deeply. Remus almost thought it might try to hit him, like that day in October when they'd fought, but Regulus was smarter than that. He knew he couldn't beat Remus in a fight, so he did the one thing Remus couldn't defend against. He marched over to the office window and threw open the latch.

"HEY! GIRLS! YOU LOOKING FOR LUPIN?"

Remus' stomach dropped. No, no, no…

"HE'S IN HERE!"

"What are you doing?!" Remus shot forward, pushing Regulus out of the way of the window. Just outside, he could see the girls, and they'd spotted him as well.

"You should really stop blabbing about your own weaknesses, Lupin. Someone might try using them against you."

"You little—" He rounded on Regulus, grabbing him by the collar of his shirt. "You fucking cunt!"

Regulus flinched violently, and then grabbed onto Remus' hands to try and push him away.

"Y–You're a cunt!"

Remus had never wanted to smack someone more in his life, but the alarmed look on Regulus' face and the fact that his time was wasting was enough to give him pause. He could already hear the girls' excited shrieks and thunderous footsteps on the stairs outside. And so, in true fight or flight fashion, he released Regulus' collar, grabbed his jacket, and his bag, and left him to whatever miserable brooding he preferred.

* * *

He lost them by the lake. Perhaps it was too cold, or maybe they'd just tired of the chase; but either way, as Remus half collapsed against the side of the rowing team's clubroom—wheezing and coughing up a lung—he was relieved. The other Marauders were never going to let him live it down.

"That you, Lupin?"

He jumped—making his ribs twinge painfully. “Who’s there?!”

“Just me.” Trish came around the side of the clubroom, adjusting her muffler around her neck.

“Trish? What are you doing all the way out here?”

She pointed at the building with her thumb. “This place ne’er gets used in the winter. I come out ‘ere tae smoke sometimes… What's happened to you?”

“Oh.” He let out a long breath. “It’s a long story.”

She shrugged, indifferent or uninterested, he wasn’t sure. Then she pulled a baggie from her pocket. “Haven’t started yet. Feel like a walk and a smoke, wee bawbag?”

He did. Anything to avoid going back before the cover of nightfall. Together they left the clubroom behind and made their way down to the shores of the icy lake. Trish was an eager enough sharer, which Remus had to appreciate. She was a bit of an acquired taste, sure, but she was always real with you, and could definitely be counted on in a pinch.

“Yeah, I got a brownie recipe,” she said, as they walked along the edge of the Dubh. “Call 'em 'hash browns’. I’ll write it out fur ya—see if Salazar likes the taste. They should, I spent all last summer perfecting it with my cousin.”

“Clyde?”

“Na, got loads ‘o cousins, me. No siblings though.”

“Me neither.”

“Well, there you go. Us only bairns gotta stick together.” She stopped on the edge of the bank, next to a large boulder big enough to use as a make-shift table. “Here looks like an alright spot.”

She got to rolling, while Remus kept his back to her on look out. The wind had decided to be merciful, and only a light breeze was blowing off the water. They chatted, mostly about normal things, and eventually things turned to talk of Sirius.

“He actually called me a hippie? Smug bastard,” Trish mused, while sealing up her first joint and passing it along.

“He’ll call anyone a hippie. Think it’s just part of that age-old rocker versus flower-child rivalry.”

“I remember what his hair used tae look like when it was all long and flowy—he’s more ‘hip’ than he thinks. ‘n besides, I’m more like a stoner socialist anyway. A narcotist nonconformer, if ya will. Look here.” As if to illustrate her point, Trish passed him her thermos, which Remus stared down at quizzically.

“What is it?”

“It’s tea—or, a kind of tea. Go on, try it.”

Shrugging lightly, Remus tucked the spliff behind his ear and twisted the lid off the thermos. He took a swig, and the smell hit him about half a second too late. It left him instantly sputtering—almost gagging as the garish taste flooded every corner of his mouth with the rich flavour of rotting earth.

“Eugh—tastes like fucking dirt.”

Trish let out a cheeky snort. “It’s ‘cause it’s made with mushrooms.”

Remus frowned at the idea of drinking liquid fungus. “I’m guessing you don’t mean the average sort.”

“Nope, these are of the magical variety. Don’t worry, I never make it strong enough tae start seeing shit, just enough tae leave ya a bit floaty for ‘a while.”

“I gotta say, that’s pretty ‘hippy’ of you, Trish,” he said, before taking a second swig, grimacing, and handing the thermos back.

Trish took it and chuckled, looking out over the calm lake waters. She’d finished three joints, and tucked the leftovers back into her coat pocket. “What’s the hippiest thing about you, Remington?”

Remus considered. “I have a tattoo.”

“Na wey! Can I see it?”

He tapped his chest sarcastically. “Too cold. Should’a kept me inside if you wanted to strip me down.”

She snorted again. “I ken a few people who’d kill me for trying.”

“Ha, like who?”

“Half o’ yer wee fan club for starters.”

"Please, don't bring it up."

Trish looked pleased. “Alright, ya hippy—What’s yer tattoo of?”

“It’s Lily’s initials.”

“And just why do ya have Lily Evan’s initials tattooed on you?”

“Let’s just say I was heavily coerced on Halloween. I think your cousin was involved too.”

“Ohhh,” Trish smirked, “Halloween, huh? I remember, ‘n I have ‘a few guesses as tae who it was under that sheet by the wey.”

Remus bit his lip. “Oh yeah…? Er, who?”

“I’ll let’cha know when I figure it out for sure.” With an impish grin, Trish glanced down and suddenly came to a startling halt. “Oh my god!” She bent down, coming back with a stone she held up to her eye. Remus could just make out the warm brown of her iris through it. The stone had a small hole in its centre.

“It’s a hag stone!” She trilled.

“A what?”

“You know, a witches stone. In Gaelic we call them gloine nan druidh —‘druid’s glass’. They’re supposed tae ward off evil charms and prevent bad things like nightmares. They’re really rare.”

Remus stepped up to peer through the stone from the other side. “That's cool. Could always use more ‘evil charm’ protection.”

“I collect rocks actually,” Trish said, pocketing the stone and sipping her mushroom tea; “That’s my hippie thing. My dad always complains about how heavy my bags are when he comes to pick me up at the end of term.”

“That’s… sort of fitting,” Remus smiled.

“I know, right? Let me know if ya have any nightmares and I’ll let ya mooch it,” she teased.

They continued walking, passing the magical fungus tea between them until they’d made it all the way around to the eastern edge of the lake, near the storage buildings that were all shut up for the season. It'd be dark soon, but the sun was still a rich orange colour in the sky. Nice evening for a walk.

"Fancy a swim?" Trish asked, as she plopped down on one of the metal benches meant for watching the rowing teams.

"No thanks, I've felt those waters in the winter. Not nice."

"Och aye, I remember hearing about that last year. Reginald told me."

"You mean Regulus," Remus replied, with a hint of distaste. Trish caught it, and set a hand over her brow, squinting up at him.

"You're mad at him, aren't ye? For what he did."

"Aren't you? What he said to you before wasn't exactly nice."

Trish dropped her hand. "Guess I don't really mind all that much. I know he's hurting inside, and when ya hurt in here, it feels better to bring that hurt out. Sometimes others just get caught up, that's all."

Remus slumped down on the bench next to her, feeling a bit flighty from the tea, but also troubled. "I didn't realise that the two of you were... close."

"We aren't really. Just in the same year. Sort of ran in the same circles as prefects, but he's 'a tough nut to crack, that one. Not that I havena' tried. It's stupid, but I always end up thinking that the best people to have around are the ones that want nae to do with me. It's my hamartia."

Remus looked down at his feet—at his boots caked with mud. Hamartia; a fatal flaw.

"That why you started talking to me?" He asked.

"Like'lie. You've got so many rumours around ye, Remington, it's almost exciting."

"Eh. Mary starts half of them."

Trish began toying with her lighter, clicking the spark wheel over and over again. "So this must mean that yer pretty bothered by whit Reginald did with your poem then."

“Are you saying I shouldn’t be?”

“Na, but ye might be looking at it the wrong way… How many people have told ya that they like yer poem?”

“Enough.”

“Did ya listen tae any of ‘em? I mean really listen?”

“Sirius liked it,” Remus said, quietly.

“Oh? And what did the great Sirius Black have to say?”

“He said… Well… He said that it was like seeing himself again. But through—” My eyes; “—Someone else’s eyes.”

“That’s nice,” Trish smiled. “I bet if ye listened a bit more, you’d hear the same thing from other folk too. It’s like those songs of yours. People want to see themselves in ‘em. And the girls at this school, they just wanna feel something tender. Like yer poem. Don’t ya ken… Boys are mean, Remus.”

Remus was surprised. He didn’t think he’d ever heard Trish use his real name. Somehow it reminded him just a little of Sirius.

“I’m sorry for what Regulus said to you.”

“Eh. It’s all water under the bridge,” she shrugged. “He’s the one missing out, not me.”

Remus smiled. “You’re actually really smart, you know that, Trish?”

“Naturally. Dinnae tell me it took ye ‘til now tae notice?”

He laughed then, wondering how it was possible to feel so good after feeling so bad. Mental illness, probably.

“Does everyone have a hamartia?” Remus asked.

“Mm… maybe. Do you think you have one?”

“I dunno. Can I think about it?”

“Yeah, sure.” Trish pinched her lighter between two fingers. “In the meantime, want to share that spliff now?”

Remus sat up. “Yeah, go on. I’ll spot you when we get back to the dorms."

They lit up together, the pot-heads, and passed it back and forth until they were thoroughly baked. Not even the cold could touch them.

"If you were a rock, what kind 'a rock would you be?" Trish asked, flipping a smooth lake stone around in her hand. They'd since abandoned their bench and were throwing stones across the dark water, trying to hit a large boulder that was sitting several yards away and was just barely skimming the surface. They'd yet to hit their target, but Remus had faith.

"A grey one," he answered blandly.

Trish began to splutter. "Not what colour—what kind? Like obsidian or—or basalt."

He bent down and scooped up another stone. "What kind of rock is this?"

"It's probably just shale."

He threw the rock, watching it plop into the water's surface next to the lake boulder. "Then I'd be shale."

"So much for exciting."

"What? Shale's great. There's so much of it—" He threw his arms out across the lakeside for emphasis; "Sounds great too. Shale. Shhhhhaale. Shale-shale-shale."

Remus kept saying it until the word lost all meaning in his mouth and they were both laughing.

"Fine then," Trish said. "If you're shale then I'm schist."

"No, you just made that up."

"I did not! Sch—" She snorted and had to try again; "Schist is a type o' metamorphic rock just like shale."

"Schist is what people say when they stub their toe." Remus illustrated by pretending to ram his boot against a large stone. " 'Oh schist'! See?"

They both began cackling, the sort of laugh that occurred when you were too far gone to remember where the boundary was between funny and just plain stupid. They were laughing so hard that they didn't notice it when they were run up from behind. Luckily, it was not Audriana.

"Moony, what the hell?"

Remus glanced up to find Sirius standing next to the bench, arms tucked in either armpit to ward off the cold. He had a vague look of irritation on his face, but Remus only thought it looked handsome.

"Oh," Trish smiled, "Shale look, it's yer boyfriend."

"Hey, boyfriend," Remus grinned dopily.

Sirius gave a start, blinking at them and opening his mouth before quickly closing it. If Remus wasn't so off his arse he might've noticed how he was blushing up to his eyebrows.

"Are you two stoned?"

"Yes, he's shale and I'm schist," Trish sniggered. Sirius gave her a bewildered look, before an icy chill whipped past them and he winced.

"Christ. It's fucking freezing out here, you even missed dinner. Come on, Moons. Evans said we're studying tonight and we got other shit to fry if we want to take down Reg and his minions."

"He means 'schist' to fry," Remus said to Trish, who immediately broke down giggling again.

"You were supposed to save some of the hash for Salazar," Sirius grumbled, coming down to the water's edge and grabbing Remus' coat sleeve. "How high are you exactly?"

With a smile bordering on smug and stupid, Remus held his free hand up over Sirius' head and passed it over him several times. "About five inches higher than you, short-stuff."

Trish howled behind them, but Sirius only shook his head.

"Ha-ha—very funny. Do you know how long it took me to track you down, you tall twat?"

"Maybe you'd be warmer if you didn't insist on wearing nothing but a leather jacket in December, Moooom," Remus blagged, sassily pulling his arm out of Sirius' grasp.

“So you got jokes then? Alright.” Sirius made to grab for him again but Remus shot backwards, holding up a finger snootily.

“It’s my arm! No touchy!”

Astonished, Sirius nearly laughed. “Moony, I ain't playing games. Now get back here.”

“Uh-uh!” Remus snorted, dodging his boyfriend for the second time.

“You cheeky shit—I am not doing this. We got actual pranks to plan!”

“You’re the one chasing me!”

“I’m not chasing you!”

“Are too!"

Sirius stopped short on the bank, giving him a stubborn smile. “Fine, come here then.”

Remus pretended to consider, taking a few steps forward until he was just an arm’s reach from Sirius.

“Good. Now are you done acting like a—”

Remus shot past him, smacking Sirius on the shoulder. “You’re it!”

“Ugh. Fucking prat,” Sirius scoffed, falling for it and finally giving way to an exciting game of cat and mouse. They tore across the banks, slipping past one another and laughing.

“Trish, stop him!” Remus wailed eventually, after Sirius had nearly caught him for the dozenth time.

“Nah, yer on yer own, schist-head,” she quipped, scanning the bank for more rocks.

The joke was enough for Remus, who—in a fit of laughter—turned very sharply and ended up on his back on the rocks. Sirius skidded to a halt next to him, bending over and grabbing him by the front of his jacket.

“There! Caught you!” He panted.

Remus might’ve kissed him right there in the open—even licked his lips in anticipation—but suddenly a sharp clang sounded from across the water, and they both turned to find Trish with her hands thrust into the air in triumph.

“I hit it!” She cried. “Remington, I hit the boulder!”

Sirius straightened up, staring past her at the lake with a look of absolute shock. “No fucking way.”

“I did! I did! Look, I’ll do it again.” Trish grabbed another rock and threw it. It fell just short of the ‘boulder’, but on the second toss her aim was true, and another clang echoed across the lake, making all of them perk up.

“That didnae sound like ‘a boulder,” she murmured in sheepish realisation, before holding a hand over her eyes and squinting. “In the name of the wee man, I think it’s a trolley!”

Remus stood up and stumbled down to the edge of the water with them. He’d been too dazed before to realise it, but there was no denying it. The seasonal cold had lowered the water level, and where the lake used to cover it entirely, the corner of Stan’s missing trolley now stuck out of its surface like a tiny floating island.

Sirius checked an invisible watch on his wrist, then whistled innocently. “Wow. Wonder how that got there…”

Remus lost it. By the time Trish and Sirius had managed to drag him back up the bank toward home, he was still laughing.

Chapter End Notes

I've decided not to worry about C/W around smoking and drugs anymore unless its significant. I think that at this point, it's just an expectation. If anyone disagrees and thinks I should keep them, please let me know.

As for posting, my next chapter won't be up until May 13th—two weeks from now. I'm going on a bit of an impromptu holiday and I won't have a lot of time for writing or the like. Hang in there, the next couple chapters are really some of my favourites <3 (Two more until another Marauders Christmas!)

Chapter 81: Hamartia

Chapter Summary

> Exams have come to Hawkings. Remus plays business mogul. A prank goes wrong, and then oh-so-right.

Chapter Notes

> No CW for this chapter. Also, I'm dedicating this one to Anastasia, because I know she'll never see it and I love that for her.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

'Cause I'd rather stay here,
With all the madmen,
Than perish with the sad men roaming free;
And I'd rather play here,
With all the madmen,
For I'm quite content they're all as sane as me…

- "All the Madmen" David Bowie, 1971

Friday 2nd December 1977

In reality, Trish had had the right idea all along. People did like his poems. They even liked them enough to pay. More than a week had gone by, and in some pinch of luck, Regulus' grand joke had turned itself into a real financial venture. Eventually the girls had given up chasing him, and life returned to normal somewhat.

"We should call you the Poem Pusher," Peter said, as Remus got up from the library table. He gasped, then; "The Substance Sonneteer!"

Remus let out an apprehensive chuckle. "Careful, Pete, your poor eyebrow's only just grown back. Wouldn't want it to go missing in the middle of the night."

Peter covered both eyebrows with his hands. "You're quite right, Moony. I reckon the 'Blitzed Bard' is ten times better anyway."

"Somebody hold me back before I kill him."

“Go on already,” Sirius laughed, pushing him on. “Don’t want to leave your two o’clock waiting.”

Remus smirked back. He was in the best mood he'd been in ever since Regulus had dropped that bomb on his life; they still found time to practice and write music, and soon exams would be over altogether. Then they’d be free to return home for the holidays, where he and Sirius could meet up in that little beach-themed bathroom as many times as need be. Yes, it was the simple pleasures, that's what Remus Lupin was after these days. Good friends, good music, and a good snog.

With his hands in his pockets, Remus left the small study room their little group had cloistered themselves in and made his way down the library’s centre aisle. He was looking for something—or more accurately, someone—and found them waiting for him in the Anthropology section, looking twitchy and nervous. Remus wasn’t nervous, rather, he felt brazen. He had the entire thing down pat. No holds, no exchanges, and certainly no I-owe-you’s. All payment was to be made up front, and if his buyers didn’t have the cash, then they would just have to look elsewhere, and now that word of his exploits had finally spread (thank you Barty) looking elsewhere was certainly easier said than done.

“You said ten, right?” The mousy boy warbled, staring nervously from behind glasses too big for his face. He was a tenth year, far too young to have such girl troubles, but money was money, and Hawkings was full of it.

“Price’s gone up actually. Now it’s—”

Reluctantly, Remus drew up short. The kid was white-knuckling his books and staring at him with brown eyes as big as a girl’s. He had a tenner peeking out of one hand.

“… Ten. Ten’s fine.”

A smile split his rosy face, and he raised the ten pound note, handing it over. Remus pocketed the money and then pulled out a tiny notepad and a pen.

“Who’s it for?”

The boy blinked at him. “Huh?”

“The poem. What’s her name?”

“Oh, uh… Sam.”

He wrote it down. “Hair colour? Eye colour?”

“Brown. B-Both brown.”

“Mhm. And what do you like about her?”

“Uhm… Do you think you could just write something nice? I–It doesn’t have to be too specific.”

Remus clicked his pen impatiently.

“Don’t you want it to be more... special? She’s already gonna know I wrote it.”

This was true. Everyone knew. What had started as a few boys looking to keep their girlfriends from breaking up with them had quickly ballooned into a school-wide fad. Every girl wanted a Lupin poem, it was like a new status symbol. Maybe they couldn't have their own personal tennis court or a leopard-skin bed with a mirror on the ceiling, but they could certainly cop a dingy limrick. He’d already written half a dozen for Chastity Bell alone, and though it always bothered him, he was at least able to charge those poor sods double.

“It’s okay if she knows,” the tenth-year insisted. “Put whatever you think would be nice."

"Does she at least have a favourite song? Band...?"

"What? Oh! Yeah, sure. She—er… She likes Pink Floyd a lot! And—uhm… The E-Eagles. It's an American band.”

Remus smirked. "I know who the Eagles are. Your girlfriend’s got good taste."

It might've been a trick of the light, but Remus could've sworn he saw the kid blush. Pretending not to notice, he cleared his throat and gestured back to the notepad.

"Alright, should only take a couple days. What’s your name and House so I can get this to you when it's done?”

“Oh, don’t worry about it!” The other boy chirped. “I’ll come find you!”

He took off down the aisle like he was scared of him, and a few seconds later Remus heard Ms. Pince's reedy wail from across the library;

"Samuel Sheridan, you stop that running this instant!"

It didn't take Remus long to put two and two together. He glanced down at his notepad, a funny feeling in the pit of his stomach, and—almost secretly—added 'Sheridan' after Sam. Then another voice was calling out to him through the shelves.

"Psst, Lupin! You still writing those poems? How much?"

Remus covered his mouth with a yawn.

"Twenty-five."

Ten minutes later, Remus returned to the study room and found the rest of his friends exactly where he'd left them. They'd been there since breakfast, and in that time Lily's hair had grown to twice its usual size simply from running her fingers through it while stressed. Lottie sat quietly next to her, listening to Spanish books on tape and chanting different verbs and their conjugations under her breath while Mary battled her way through an overdue psychology essay. On the boys' side of the table, James had his Physics notes spread out around him as though a tornado had ripped through his school bag, but he wasn't quite crying yet. Peter, on the other hand, had already wept twice over his Maths, and was currently copying out Lily's notes from last term as though his life depended on it. Only Marlene had remained fully quiet—secluding herself on the far corner of the table and writing what appeared to be a very long essay of her own.

As he sat down at the table, Remus tugged his school bag toward him and pulled out a fresh notebook. There he began brainstorming all of the potential ideas for his newest customers, while Sirius—the only one of them that had managed to resist studying altogether—leaned over to snag a peek.

"Another score then, Moony?"

"Shush. It's still working hours, Black," Remus said, a smile still playing on his lips.

"I don't know how you keep up with it all," Mary asked, looking up from her essay. "How many of those poems has it been now?"

Remus shrugged indifferently. "Around forty-three."

“Forty-three?!”

“Give or take.”

“That’s insane!”

“Shhh!” Lily hissed. She was flipping through her flashcards with such speed that she could’ve rivalled a street magician.

“It is insane,” James agreed quietly. “I don’t know how he writes ‘em so fast... And uh—speakin' a which, Moons, you finished with that thing we chatted about the other day...?”

Not even bothering to look up from his work, Remus reached into his bag and pulled out an envelope, which he passed onto James.

"Brilliant!" His friend grinned, before turning in his chair. "Hey, Daisy? Guess what, I've a little present. Now I know it's a bit early for Christmas gifts, but I think you'll like this one. It's 'eau de Lupin'."

" 'Eau de'?" Mary giggled. "Water of Lupin?"

"Huh? I thought that meant 'from'?"

Not one to be interrupted, Lily took the poem and added it to her stack of study papers with an air of indifference while James tried not to look too crushed.

"Is there any for me in there?" Mary asked. "I told Greyson I'd give him another chance if he stepped up his game a bit. And Jason's been dropping hints about some 'surprise' all week."

Huffing, Remus returned to his bag once more. "Here," he grunted, retrieving four different poems, each commissioned by a different guy. Mary lit up when she saw them, eagerly snatching them from Remus' hands.

"Shouldn't the guys who paid for those be the ones who give them to you?" Peter asked, having observed the entire thing from a safe distance.

"Of course. But how else am I supposed to know which one I'm going to like best if I don't see them all first? I'll give them back—let them think they're a step ahead."

Peter snorted, and then glanced at Marlene. "Can you believe that?"

"Mhm... sure," Marlene murmured, eyes boring into her paper. Remus was about to ask what class it was for, when Sirius reached over and nudged him.

“Oi. Where's my poem?"

"I only work on commission. And I’m backed up on orders as is.”

"Hmph. Stingy."

Remus smiled to himself, while Lily arched an eyebrow at him from across the table.

“You should be studying for your exams,” she swore, adding several more flashcards to her stack. “Not writing poetry just to make a bit of money on the side. It’s almost extortion.”

“You show me the legal definition of 'extortion' and then we'll talk,” Remus retorted. “This is simply supply and demand.”

Lily shook her head like he was hopeless and returned to her flashcards.

In all honesty, Remus might’ve been more worried about his marks had he not stayed up most nights studying on his own. It was fine to study then, in the hours he couldn’t sleep, but he’d already ixnayed poetry after dark. It always made for soppy messes, and was no good for writing with other people in mind. Now the daytime—that was when the poetry became easy, and once he'd figured out how to remove the him and Sirius aspects from it, the words began to flow like water. Remus had already amassed enough money for fags and booze to last him until the end of the year, and even had a bit leftover for some Christmas shopping. With his goal reached, he was now hoping to earn enough to make a small cash donation toward the flat. He knew Tomny’s pride would force him to refuse the gift, but Remus was determined. It would mean repaying Tomny for all the times he'd rescued him in a pinch—even if he had to shove it up his arse, Tomny would take the money.

“Ugh, I can’t take it anymore,” Lily huffed after a long while. “Sirius, will you quiz me?”

She handed the cards across the table and Sirius took them, clearing his throat.

“ ‘What must be present for a system of judicial precedent to work’?”

“The identification of the binding parts of the judgement, an agreed hierarchy of the courts, and… a sound system of law reporting.”

“Brilliant. A bit scary, but brilliant.” Sirius flipped another card. “ ‘To what extent has the principle of Parliamentary sovereignty and the role of the judiciary been affected by the UK’s entry into the EEC?’ … Jesus, Evans—you put entire essay questions on your flashcards?”

“You never know what they’re going to ask!”

“Alright then, I have a question for ya. What do they call those wigs all the judges wear in court? Do you know?”

“Don't—”

“A bob-wig, ha!”

“Sirius!”

“Fine,” he grumbled, raising the cards again. “What are the three types of delegated legislation?”

Lily sat back with her hands in her lap, looking confident. “Orders in council, statutory regulations, and local by-laws.”

“Ooh, so close. The card actually says ‘statutory instruments’.”

“That’s the same thing.”

“Not according to the card.”

“Sirius Black!”

“Careful,” James warned. “Push your luck any more and she might actually murder you.”

“Yeah, straight threatened my life this morning when I buggered up ‘House of Commons’ and ‘House of Lords’,” Peter added pensively.

“They’re completely different systems!”

Peter whistled innocently. “Whatever you say…”

They continued like that for a while, and when Lily looked close enough to reach across the table to throttle his best friend, James humbly took over. Without the job of quizmaster, Sirius turned his full attention to Remus. He started with subtly grazing his hand along the outside of his thigh beneath the table, before growing more emboldened and trying for a full grab. Remus ignored it at first, confident that no one else would notice. He was too busy trying to think of a word that rhymed with ‘irresistible’, but there truly was no ignoring Sirius Black. Eventually his fingers slid higher—then deeper, toward the inside of Remus' thigh. Remus put a hand on his wrist to stop him, and Sirius began stroking with his thumb, sending shivers across his skin.

Remus looked at him. “Black, you’ve a spider on your shoulder, did you know?”

Sirius seized, clapping a hand to his shoulder immediately, but when it came away clean, Sirius scowled at him.

“Dick.”

“Don’t you dare mention spiders,” Mary threatened. “There was one in our room just this morning. Marlene had to kill it with a slipper, right Marls?”

Marlene gave a little mumble, still barely listening. She’d moved on from her essay, and was now tracing lines across another paper with her ruler.

“What are you studying for?” Remus asked.

“I’m not.”

"What was the essay then?"

"It wasn't an essay."

Attention caught, Sirius turned to them with a raised brow. “Marlene McKinnon not studying for exams? Someone call the paramedics.”

“It’s a petition,” Marlene said haughtily, drawing back from the table to reveal a cleanly drawn-up list of values. “I’m tired of the blatant disregard for equality at this school. Hawkings claims to be a forward-thinking institution—it’s time they prove it. We're the ones hosting the year-end tournament this time around, and I can't think of a better way for Hawkings to showcase it's supposed 'ethos of equality' than by letting the girls play too."

“Wow,” Lily breathed, snatching her flashcards back from James; “You’re making a petition for a girls tournament?”

"No, not a girls tournament—I want the girls to play in this tournament. Same as the boys."

"THAT'S A WONDERFUL IDEA!" Lottie called, headphones still on and shouting through her Spanish tapes. "Muy bien! Estupendo!"

A few of them laughed, and Mary craned her said to get a look at the petition.

“I think it’s a good idea too," she said, "but do you really think old McGonagall’s gonna go for it?”

“That’s what the petition’s for, numpty." Marlene straightened up, cheeks splotchy with nerves. "If I can get enough kids and faculty to sign this then she’ll have to take me seriously. And besides, she’s a woman in a man’s job. It’ll happen, just you wait.”

Somewhat eagerly, James stood up from his seat and reappeared over Marlene’s shoulders to read the petition over. “I think it’s a great idea too,” he said finally.

Marlene appeared flummoxed. “You do?”

“ ‘Course. I’d kill to have some of you girls on the team. The guys get complacent thinking no one’s better than them, but then they turn around and pull crap like refusing a scrimmage match because they ‘don’t play girls’. It’s bloomin’ tosh."

"Oh... Well, they're just afraid they'll lose anyway."

"Too right," James grinned. "McKinnon, If you’d let me, I’d like to be the first one to sign your petition.”

A look of utter shock crossed her face, but slowly Marlene moved aside so James could lean down and scribble his name just below hers.

“Hand it here, Prongs,” Sirius called after him, before adding his name to the list and passing it along to Remus. The paper went around the table until all eight of them had signed and Marlene was left positively weepy.

“Thanks guys,” she said, holding the paper against her heart.

“We’re with you, Marls,” Lottie smiled, headphones now strung around her neck. “Anything to get out of more studying. Any more verb conjugations and I'm going to top myself. Juro por Cristo."

“Agreed,” Sirius said, already moved on to making card towers out of Lily’s spare flashcards.

“I’ll give a copy to the other prefects if you’d like,” Remus offered, making Marlene beam.

“That would be great! The more people who see it the better. Mrs. Brady in the admissions office has already agreed to let me make as many copies as I want.”

“We could make it a group thing,” James suggested. “Pair off and take turns every lunch hour or something.”

“Yeah!” Sirius agreed. “Make it a contest—whoever gets the most signatures before holiday break wins.”

“You always have to make everything a competition,” Lily scoffed.

"How else do you make life fun?"

“Well, what’s the winner get?” Mary leered. “A lap dance from all the other losers?”

There was a chorus of moans turned laughter that Lily silenced with a wave of her arms. “I think the winner should get the satisfaction of knowing they helped their dear friend Marlene with an issue that was very close to her heart.”

Sirius blew a raspberry at her. “Boo. Boring. Lap dance is better.”

“Tell you what, Sirius,” Marlene said, “you get the most signatures on the petition, and you can have a lap dance from anyone you want.”

Remus glared at her, but Marlene remained purposely oblivious. Sirius wasn’t cheeky enough to make eye contact, but he did squeeze Remus’ left arse cheek from under the table.

“Deal, McKinnon.”

Delighted, Marlene went back to her petition and Remus knocked Sirius’ hand away before returning to his work. As he did, Sirius subtly slid him a spare flashcard. His perfect handwriting was all over it.

Better start brushing up your dance moves, it read.

Remus narrowed his eyes and stole Sirius' pen.

You wish.

Sirius took the pen back promptly; I'll even get Mary to lend you an outfit. Fancy a skirt?

Crumpling the note, Remus shoved it into his pocket and Sirius smugly turned back to his card tower.

"I need one of those," Lily said, snapping her fingers at him a moment later.

"Only if you give us that brownie recipe of yours," Sirius said, concentrating hard on placing another card on top. Unimpressed, Lily stole one of the bottom cards and the whole thing came tumbling down with a flourish.

"You're positively wicked, Evans."

"And you're not getting my brownie recipe. Potter told me what you were planning and I'm not helping you sabotage an entire dorm right before exams just because Regulus was a little nasty."

"A little?!" Sirius shot his best friend a glowering look. "Utterly whipped, you are."

"I couldn't help it," James whined. "She's top of our law class, which means she's very convincing."

"It's alright," Remus said kindly. "Trish gave me her recipe last week. She's even got the hash oil. We can start baking on Sunday."

"Brilliant!" James cried, while Lily covered her face and groaned.

"The things you four could do if you applied yourselves to something good for a change."

"But it is for a good cause!" Peter reasoned.

"Which is?"

"A... wicked prank?"

Lily rolled her eyes and went back to studying.

"Nice, Wormtail."

“Well, I’m not top of the law class…”

* * *

The next day, the Marauders got straight to work. Not on their pranking—that could wait another day—but on the petition. After all, there were stakes now. And though Remus had very little desire to actually win himself, he couldn't very well lose. He and Lily had volunteered to take the first lunch shift, and after Marlene had delivered them a stack of fliers, they took to the dining hall’s main corridor, attempting to catch anyone who was coming or going.

“Really, I’m sur—prised,” Lily grunted, while slamming her hand down on the stapler in an attempt to attach one of Marlene’s petitions to the hallway notice board. “Trish was so unassuming last year… ugh… Damn thing.”

Remus took the stapler from her, unjamming it. “You’re too aggressive, staplers are sensitive. They need a gentle touch.”

“Har har.”

He passed the tool back. “And Trish is still unassuming. It’s how she gets away with everything.”

“You're right. I don’t think she’s ever had a detention.”

Lily returned to hanging the petitions, while Remus stood by awkwardly with a clipboard of his own. He’d been eager enough to volunteer, but when it came to actually collecting signatures, he was proving to be a bit shit. Lily’s preferred method ended up being grilling any unsuspecting student who happened to walk past until they either signed or fled in terror, but like expected, Remus wasn’t really all that cut out for campaigning. He didn’t have her brazen drive, and was starting to realise that there was a very real chance they’d all be giving Lily Evans a lap dance come end of the term.

“Wouldn’t you like to sign a petition allowing women to play alongside men in this year’s football tournament?” She demanded of a group of passing eighth years. The young kids exchanged unsure glances but before they could scurry away, Lily was pressing her clipboard into their faces. “Equal right to play on the same field! No one should be denied the chance to show off their skills just because of their gender, don't you think? Or are you for discriminatory school sports?!"

Intimidated by her instant lecture, the kids passed around the chipboard and rushed off, leaving Lily with a pleased look on her face. “I think I might have a knack for this,” she boasted.

“Maybe," Remus said, "but one of them signed as ‘A. S. Muncher’.”

Lily raised the clipboard and groaned. “Whatever. We’ve already gotten like seven ‘Seymour Buttz’. Whatever helps Marlene, I suppose.”

“I dunno, I thought ‘Pierre Pants’ was pretty good.”

As Lily stifled her laughter, she spotted another girl making her way up the hall toward them and immediately shoved Remus ahead of herself. “There! Ask her!”

Remus swallowed, regretting everything, but like Lily had said—whatever helped Marlene.

“Hey—erm... Wanna sign a petition?” He babbled, drawing the girl to a stop in the middle of the hall. She looked at him, surprised at first, before drawing all of her hair onto one shoulder.

“Maybe. What’s the petition for?”

“To let the girls play alongside the guys at the end of the year football tournament.”

“Hm." She looked him up and down. "Strange to see a bloke crusading for a women’s football team of all things.”

“It’s a favour for a friend—” he started, before rushing to correct himself; “But girls should be allowed to play football wherever they want too!”

She considered for a moment before holding out a hand expectantly. Acting quick so she didn’t have time to suddenly change her mind, Remus passed the clipboard over and she left a big loopy signature at the bottom. “Is your name on here?” She asked, scanning the list.

“Oh, I signed a different page.”

She nodded and gave him a sly smile before handing the clipboard back. “Good luck with the petition.”

She left with a quiet flourish and Remus proudly looked at Lily, who was watching him with her arms crossed.

“You’re unbelievable.”

“What? You told me to ask her!”

“She all but left her phone number, Remus.”

“You know, Sirius actually got a phone number yesterday. I’m afraid he might be winning.”

“Figures.” Sighing half-heartedly, Lily tucked her clipboard under one arm and began fiddling with the stapler. “Hey, so James told you guys that I’m going back to his for Christmas, right?”

“Yeah, told us a while ago."

"And you're going too, right?"

"Mhm. My dad and Sandra’ll be vacationing in the French Riviera for Christmas so Giles is letting me stay at James’. Peter’s just next door and Sirius basically lives there now so it should be great."

"I've never been to London. We were gonna go for Pet’s birthday one year, but she decided to go to Cardiff with her girlfriends instead."

"You'll like it," Remus said. "Plenty of libraries. You won't even run out."

She smiled, before nervously twisting a lock of red hair around one finger. "Listen Remus, I’m only telling you this because you’re my best friend.”

Interest piqued, he turned to her in question. “Yeah…?”

“I’m a bit nervous,” Lily confessed all at once. “It's just... I’ve only ever spoken to James’ parents over the phone a few times—and they were always kind! But… it’s not exactly the same as meeting someone in person, is it?”

“You think they won’t like you?”

“Well no, but—" She stepped in closer. "What if they don't like that James and I are dating? What if they don't like that I'm not Indian or a Hindu, or—or that my family is working class? I don't have anything to offer him, I'm just... me."

"Lils..."

"It's not an ethnicity thing," she amended sorely. "I don't care that James isn't white, I never have... But I really want his parents to like me, and what if they'd rather he date someone else? A nice girl with a good background. Someone who takes tea in the garden and has a personal tailor and whose dad doesn't have to choose between thatching the roof or mending the fence, and—"

"Lily," Remus tried, more forcefully; "You have nothing to worry about. Who gives a shit about background—you're literally the smartest person I know. Besides, there's no way James would ever let anyone put you down for something as crap as a busted fence. You're amazing, you are!"

Lily sighed. "Remus, I know you're trying to be kind, but you don't get it. I'm not like you, all I have is school."

And she was right. As othered as Remus had begun to think of himself, he would never know what it was to be outclassed by someone he loved. He and Sirius might've been queer behind closet doors, but they were lucky as far as material wants went.

"It's not that I don't trust James," Lily went on; "It's just that a part of me's always wondered if maybe he was keeping it hush. That maybe his parents were worried and he didn't want to kick up a fuss while we were at school."

"I'm sorry," Remus said. "I didn't mean to dismiss your feelings. But I swear, Lils, that's not James. You must know it's not. And it ain't the Potters either. They're going to love you, especially because you're always grinding their son's gears."

She smiled bashfully. “You really think so?”

“I know so! The Potters—blimey—they’re amazing. They took Sirius in without a second thought, right? And they always considered him a son, even before that. They’re incredibly smart, and they support James with our music too. I’m... Well, I'm a bit jealous, to be honest.”

“You never know, maybe they could adopt you too."

“As much as I’d love to be your future brother-in-law, I don’t think it would work out,” Remus said, trying not to imagine what it would be like to be Sirius’ adoptive brother and dating him at the same time.

“Well, alright," Lily said, untucking her clipboard from beneath her arm. "I suppose I should stop worrying about what they're going to think of me and start worrying about what sort of gift I should bring.”

“I know James’ mum likes these little sweets that taste like pears—he’d probably know the name. And I’ll bet Monty would love to hear about your parents’ botany. He’s got a great garden, if that helps.”

“It does, thanks. Reminds me to be less nervous. I think I’m gonna go hang a petition up in the girls’ loo upstairs. Marlene figured it would be a good idea to put them where we know other girls will see them. Head to lunch with me after?”

"Yeah, go on."

He handed her a stack of petitions and the box of staples from his pocket and Lily started for the staircase. She was halfway up when she around and called back to him;

"Remus? You're pretty amazing, yourself."

Remus smiled. "Meet you back here."

As Lily turned and skipped back up the staircase, Remus began happily rocking back and forth on his heels. Their conversation had put him in a good mood—confident, even—and he made sure to put it to good use. While scanning faces as they passed him in the hall, a group of guys approached and Remus raised the clipboard.

“Sign a petition?”

They didn’t stop, but the group after them did. And the one after that. Eventually Remus realised that it was much easier to catch people heading into the dining hall, rather than out, where they'd inevitably have some lesson or meeting to get to. He was just finishing up with a few kids from his English Lit class when he was approached by a few more girls. They were headed by Priscilla, the one he'd witnessed crying into Lottie's shoulder the week before. She was beaming—grinning at Remus like he'd hung the moon himself.

“Hi, Remus.”

“Oh, hey… Priscilla, right? You know Lottie.”

She nodded fervently, while her two friends tried to hide knowing smiles.

“I haven’t seen you around since that day in the dorm, but I wanted to thank you,” she said. “You helped me realise that Spencer wasn’t worth my time—or my tears, as Lottie put it. I dumped him right after. But not before he gave me this.”

She held out a piece of paper, one of his poems. It looked rumpled and worn—well-loved, he realised.

“Glad you got it,” he said. “But no need to thank me, really.”

“I heard you and Jillian went on a date earlier this year,” Priscilla said. “But you told her that you were already gone for someone else.”

“Er… yeah.”

“And are things still like that?”

He nodded. “They are.”

“She’s lucky then, the girl you’ve fallen for.”

Remus smiled, genuinely. “Not as lucky as I am.”

The girls squealed—actually squealed—and Priscilla turned back to them to join in, before carefully tucking her poem away.

“What’s that you’ve got there?” One of them asked.

“Oh!” Remus felt stupid for nearly missing his chance. He passed the clipboard over. “It’s for one of my friends—Marlene McKinnon? Anyway, she’s captain of the girls football team, and she’s trying to petition the school to let them play in the tournament at the end of the year.”

“Oh my god, I love that,” Priscilla said. “Who says only boys can play sports?”

“Yeah, it’s complete bollocks,” he agreed. “Would you consider signing?”

He'd hardly needed to ask; one by one the girls went around and added their names to the list.

“Would you like us to take a copy?” Priscilla offered. “Val and I are on the dance team and Katie’s in the art club so we could get you a lot of signatures.”

“Yeah, that’d be great! Thanks so much.”

“No, thank you,” they giggled, each taking a spare copy of the petition and slipping past him.

“And don’t be a stranger, Remus! Let’s meet for lunch sometime,” Priscilla called. “I wanna hear more about your mysterious girlfriend.”

“Yeah. Yeah—totally!” Pleased, Remus looked down at the petition before an idea suddenly occurred to him. If that many girls knew his name, then it stood to reason that they might not object to giving them theirs.

Whispering a silent apology to Lily, Remus left his post in the hallway and ventured into the dining hall. There he began going table to table, interrupting other students until it wasn’t even scary anymore. He even approached Audriana, who had since cooled whatever crush she’d been brewing.

“You’re just too fun to tease, I think,” she cooed, before signing the petition and taking an extra copy to hand out among her theatre group.

When he’d exhausted all of the filled tables, Remus snagged an apple from the fruit trays along the far wall and scurried back out into the hallway. Fully ready to brag to Lily about his feat, he didn’t notice the interruption heading his way until the clipboard was tugged from his hands.

“Collecting donations for the poor and buggery, Loony?” Barty sneered. He waved the clipboard around as if to taunt him, while Regulus stood by beside him, looking indifferent. Remus might’ve reacted badly, had he not had over a week to put Regulus Black from his mind. He pulled the apple from his mouth and squared his shoulders, ready to take the pair head-on.

“Just give it back, Crouch.”

“You know those girls won’t actually be able to keep up in a real tournament,” Barty goaded. “No amount of signatures can change basic biology.”

“Sounds like exactly the sort of misogynistic bullshit I disagree with. Now hand it over and piss off before I write you up for harassing a prefect.”

“Ah, that’s right, ‘Loony the Prefect’—we all best run or else risk detention and a broken nose.” Barty pinched his and moaned mockingly before ripping the stack of petitions off the clipboard and flapping them in Regulus' direction. “Lookie here, Reg. This list’s only got girls’ names on it. Should’ve known since all Lupin's good for is stealing girlfriends.”

Remus crossed his arms. “Wouldn’t have thought that that would bother you much, Crouch, since you hardly have a girlfriend to steal.”

Barty’s sneer turned into a bitter scowl, and with one sharp toss, he scattered the petitions across the floor, throwing the clipboard down for good measure as he retreated up the hall. The pen he chucked the other direction. Afterwards he gave Remus a look that was worthy of a good pounding and began flouncing up the hall.

“Come on, Reg, let's go before we catch a case 'a the queers. Good luck with your silly round robin, Loony!”

Grinding his teeth together, Remus bent down and began collecting the papers, wincing as other students stepped on them and left dirty boot-prints behind.

“Here.”

It was Regulus. He bent down over Remus, holding out a stack of petitions. Remus eyed him sceptically, before taking the papers and adding them back into the pile.

“Shouldn’t you have gone already? Think your crap friend's calling for you.”

“Barty doesn’t tell me what to do.”

Remus scowled further, fetching his clipboard and standing up to tower over the other boy. “Yeah well, I know you’re hard to figure out on principle, but why you’d ever want to hang around him is truly beyond me."

"Yes," Regulus said, "it is beyond you."

He bent down to pick up a few more petitions, passing them over, but Remus turned his nose up.

"What's that you're always saying—'I never asked for your help'?"

"Do you want them or not?"

Huffing, Remus snatched them back. "What's with the sudden friendliness?"

"I'm not being friendly. We aren't friends."

"But we could've been, couldn't we? I thought we might've had a chance there. For a while anyway..."

"You're delusional. We can't be friends, you're already my brother's… friend."

"You're really starting to sound like a broken record," Remus snapped. "Hear me now, Regulus Black—I decide who I'm friends with, that's it. There's no 'convenience' to it. I'm not friends with people because I share a room with them, or lessons—I'm friends with them because I like them. And I even liked you for a while, 'til you showed your true colours..."

Regulus' eyes traced the ground. They stayed there for a long time, and eventually Remus had had enough. He turned to go.

"Why does it make me any worse?" Regulus asked suddenly.

"Worse than what?" Remus demanded, whipping his head around.

"Than him." Regulus' eyes came up. Hard, and grey. Almost familiar. "I was angry," he said sternly, "so I got you back. Tell me, how does that make me worse than my brother?"

Remus drew up short. He'd been prepared for another fight—more quippy remarks accompanied by aloof undertones; but for all his wisdom, he'd somehow forgotten. Despite the cold exterior, despite the viper-like tongue, Regulus was still only a sixteen year-old kid.

"It doesn't."

"Then why would you want to be friends with him and not me?"

"I didn't think you wanted to be friends with me, Regulus."

Regulus seemed to remember himself. He raised his chin. "I... I don't!"

"That doesn't sound very convincing." Remus sighed again, and reached up to scratch the back of his head. "You know, you really messed me up there for a while. What you did really fucking sucked."

“Guess that makes us even.”

No, it's your fault! Your fault, your fault!

Remus closed his mind off to the voice. He didn’t want it affecting his decisions. He thought about leaving. A part of him even wanted to, but Remus had always been nosy when it came to Sirius and his problems. And whether either of them liked it or not, Regulus was one of Sirius' problems.

So, Remus extended his hand one final time.

“Even, then?”

There was a moment of silence. Maybe it was shock; like Regulus couldn’t believe he was offering him a second chance. It almost looked as though he was going to decline—Remus told himself to expect it. But rather than push it away, or even take it, Regulus gestured to the petitions.

“Have you got a pen?”

Now it was Remus’ turn to be shocked. He'd lost the one Barty had stolen, so he desperately searched his pockets and came back with one of the biros Lily had supplied him with, dubiously handing it over. Regulus took the pen along with his clipboard, stunning him further when he left his name printed neatly beneath the others. He held onto the petition for a moment longer, reading it over, before finally passing it back, the picture of good manners.

“Even.”

“You’ve surprised me,” Remus said.

“Is that good thing or bad thing?”

“Good,” he smiled. “Definitely good.”

Regulus nodded pensively while Remus tried not to let his relief show on his face. To hide it, he glanced down at the petition and remembered the mess that had gotten them there in the first place.

“Look, maybe it’s not my place,” he started, “but just one word of advice?"

"I'm not going to talk to Sirius."

"Ha, no… But you should talk to Trish."

Regulus puckered a bit. Guilty.

"She won't talk to me. Not after what I said."

"Nah, you see, I think she will. It's her hamartia."

It earned him a funny look, but Remus only nodded earnestly.

"Just try apologising to her. You don't have to be friends or anything, but I know it'd mean a lot. She thinks you're really cool."

Regulus hesitated, and suddenly his proud demeanour vanished in favour of that awkward, shy kid Remus had only just begun to notice beneath the surface.

"Alright, I'll apologise to her. But not because you told me to. For your information, I was going to apologise anyway."

"Of course," Remus smiled. "Oh, and one more thing. Whatever you do, don't—well… If you see a brownie from now until Christmas, it'd probably be best to avoid it. But you didn't hear that from me."

The barest hint of a smile crossed Regulus' features. Remus counted it as a win.

* * *

Sunday 4th December 1977 – The Night Before Exams…

That evening, they finished their final round of studying early and even skipped dinner. It was all part of the plan; anyone who happened to follow their nose to the Godric kitchenette would've found only four boys, innocently cooking a batch of brownies ahead of a long week of exams. In reality, they were plotting—plotting while simmering the ground up hashish in a pot of melted butter. And though it seemed almost a shame to waste good product on sods as sour as Severus Snape and Barty Crouch, all four of them were optimistic.

"I don't endorse this sort of thing," Lily said as she passed an armful of dinner boxes and canteen napkins to James, "but dinner is important."

“Love you too,” James grinned, kissing her forehead and making his girlfriend scoff while she dusted the cocoa powder from the front of his jumper.

Once the brownies were securely in the oven, Remus retired to the common room with a book. He tried reading, but his head kept thumping in rhythm with the grandfather clock and he couldn’t manage more than a page before feeling dizzy. Somehow he’d managed to wake that morning feeling poor and lethargic. It was probably a result of all of his late-night studying, but there was so much to know! And with the poems… ugh.

He tried not to complain. None of the other Marauders seemed to be under the weather, and Remus didn’t want to risk being left behind during the prank. As he finished gorging himself on lukewarm lamb and potatoes, courtesy of Lily, Sirius came to join him by the fire.

“You feeling alright or are we gonna have to postpone?” He asked, pressing a hand to Remus’ forehead.

“Can't postpone,” Remus said, batting his hand away. "Tomorrow's exams."

"We could always wait until another day. Don't matter to me whether Reg fails his chem or maths exam."

Remus shook his head. He'd purposely neglected to tell Sirius that he'd tipped Regulus off to the prank. Better to avoid a fight and let him think his brother had outsmarted them. Even if he hadn't known, getting Regulus to eat anything so suspicious had been a long shot at best.

“Don't worry about it, I’m fine now. You three all finished in the kitchen then?”

Sirius held up a plate of wrapped brownies, grinning slyly. “By tomorrow morning, half of Salazar’s going to be taking their exams while severely off their trolley.”

James and Peter appeared in the doorway of the common room, puffer jackets in hand. “Dorm rounds are done,” James grinned, while Peter clapped his hands together. “Let’s get to messing, lads.”

Not bothering to be very sneaky, they went out the front doors and were rewarded by immediate teeth-chattering cold. It hadn’t snowed yet, but the forecast was calling for it, and the overnights were already dipping below freezing temperatures.

“I hope you saved a few of those for us,” Remus said, eyeing the brownies as they made their way up the dorm’s front path.

“We don’t get stoned on the job,” Sirius said, holding the plate of edibles out of reach.

“I didn’t mean for tonight, you twee idiot, I meant for after exams when we—”

Up front, James spun around on his heel and pushed them both back. “Abort! Abort!” He cried. “It’s Filch’s car!”

“Shit,” Peter hissed, as they all turned to see the caretaker’s rusted lorry creep up the road, headlamps casting a harsh glow like two great yellow eyes.

“We can go around back!” Sirius hissed. "Quick, cut between the Houses!"

Quickly they all turned and booked it back around the side of their dorm where the December frost crunched loudly beneath their boots. There Remus could feel the haze of his breath just in front of his face, but it was a cloudy night and without the moon or the street lamps to illuminate their path it was as though they were walking blind. He stumbled more than once on the uneven lawn, which was treacherous enough in daylight, covered with ice puddles and the occasional molehill. They could still hear the distant bang and rumble of the caretaker's truck, as though warning them to keep their wits about them or risk detention all the way into the new year.

“I can’t see anything back here,” Peter complained. “It’s like walking with a bloody sheet over your eyes.”

“Should we go grab the torches?” Asked James.

“Don’t bother,” Remus said. “Let’s just get on with this so we can get back.”

“Easy for you to say, wolf-man,” Sirius teased. “You can probably see in the dark.”

“I think it would be more ironic if Lupin turned out to be a vampire or something,” James mused. “I mean, he never sleeps.”

Peter chimed in; “What are you talking about? Moony sleeps all the time now. Can’t hardly get him up in the morning.”

“That’s just the morning,” Sirius said haughtily; “At night he’s actually very—”

Remus went to pinch him. He’d just found Sirius’ arm when suddenly the ground came out from underneath him. Literally.

With a surprised yelp, Remus plunged downwards in a short free-fall which ended several feet down on a stiff cushion of dirt. On impact his knee jabbed him in the chest sharply, momentarily winding him as his friends cried out in shock up above.

“Moony!” Sirius shouted. “Holy fuck! Are you okay?!”

Groaning, Remus looked up. A circle was impressed into the inky sky, all of the stars blotted out by clouds. The hole around him had to be at least nine or ten feet deep, but he could just make out the round shape of his friends' heads peering in on him.

“Yeah, m’fine,” he grunted. “Dirt broke my fall, I think.”

“It’s the bloody hole they dug looking for the time capsule,” James’ voice called. “Can’t believe they haven’t filled it in yet! I swear this school’s trying to kill us.”

“Don’t shout,” Peter warned. “Filch is probably still around... Can you reach us if we hold our arms out, Moony?"

In answer, Remus began feeling around for the walls of the pit. It was slimy, covered in dirt and muck, but he managed to find a short tree root lodged into its side. Grabbing hold of it, he reached up and for the barest of moments managed to brush a set of finger tips before the root gave way and he collided back down into the dirt on his arse.

“Shit... Too slippery. Frost has practically turned the bottom to mud.”

“We could get a rope—pull him out,” James suggested.

“There’s also that ladder in the kitchen cupboard,” Peter added.

“Okay. Well, you two go on then, I’m gonna stay with him,” Sirius said.

“Alright, be right back. Hang in there, Lupin!” James chirped, before the sound of shuffling feet began to fade into the distance.

“And be quick!” Sirius shouted after them. Remus shook his head lightly. There wasn’t a version of Sirius Black that came in ‘quiet mode’.

With nothing else to do but wait, Remus tried his best to survey his surroundings. The hole was pitch black, the kind of dark that began to look like grotesque faces when you focused on one spot for too long. He could tell just by puttering around that the bottom was at least a couple of feet across, enough space for him to sit comfortably at least, which he did and instantly regretted as the freezing dirt squelched beneath him. Whatever, he was already covered in muck; he could feel it seeping up his shirt sleeves from his hands and across the knees of his trousers where he fell.

“Moony, you sure you’re alright?” Sirius called from up above.

“Yeah,” Remus called back. “Believe it or not I actually think it’s warmer down here.”

“Well duh, no wind down in a hole.”

Remus smiled to himself and crossed his arms over his chest, glancing up. The sky had begun to clear some, and he could just see the beginning twinklings of stars peaking through.

“It’s like another world down here. You can actually see the stars shining,” he said. "Hey... How's that one John Lennon song go?"

A little snort. “... Are you high?”

“Ha, I wish. Would probably make this a lot more funny. C'mon, you're the one with the perfect memory, tell me how it goes.”

"Superior memory, not perfect."

"That mean you don't know it?"

Another snort. " 'And we all shine on... like the moon and the stars and the sun'... That the one?"

"Yeah." Remus hugged his knees. "That's the one."

There was silence for a moment, and then Sirius began to whistle the tune. Finally he stopped;

“Just you wait, Moons. We’re gonna get you out and finish this prank. You can laugh then.”

“S’long as I get first shower privileges tonight.”

“Of course. You think I’d let such a filthy man crawl into bed with me?”

“You’re impossible.”

Sirius’ head appeared over the edge of the hole, like a dark silhouette. “No, I’m improbable. Unexpected.”

That you are.

Remus kept on staring up. He couldn’t be sure, but he thought Sirius might be smiling. From down below, it was as though he were in the sky—floating amongst the stars like the Sirius for which he’d been named. It was so like him; Sirius was like the sky.

Remus was cold, and wet, and yet somehow content. Sirius was his sky.

“Say,” Sirius started, after a while; “how many of those poems have you written now?”

“Uh, maybe fifty or so?”

“Damn.”

“Yeah. Think I’m gonna stop soon though. I’m running out of adjectives to describe girls’ eyes. There’s really only so many times one can use the word ‘dazzling’ before it loses meaning altogether.”

There was a short chuckle, then; “So… you’re gonna stop soon?”

“Probably, yeah. I’d like to focus on our songs a bit more, I think. At least that way we’ll have something to show James and Pete’s parents over Christmas.”

“Oh. Well, that’s… That’s smart.’

The way Sirius answered made Remus think he wasn’t saying all there was to say, so he squinted up in the dark again.

“Sirius.”

“Hm?”

“Out with it. What’s the matter?”

“Nothing.”

“Sirius.” Remus grabbed a clod of dirt, throwing it up at the edge of the pit.

“... You missed.”

“Out with it!”

There was a great sigh, and then a flourishing hand appeared over the edge of the pit. “I just don’t know how I feel about it, s’all. You… writing love poems for other people.”

“But they're not my love poems."

"I know that! But you're—you're complimenting them. Making them feel good... I just sorta thought you'd only want to do that with me."

"Oh."

“It’s not like it's that big of a deal or anything,” Sirius said quickly. “Not even that much different from songwriting, right? And people paid Wilde and Shakespeare to write for ‘em so… You’re good at it too! It’s why they like them so much. A-And they're nice. Genuine, even. In fact, yesterday Cindy Carlisle showed me hers, and—”

“Sirius—”

“I don’t want you to think I hate them! Because they’re so beautiful. And they’re so 'you' too, and I love you, so...”

“Sirius!”

“… Yeah, Moons?”

“I’m sorry.” Remus frowned deeply. Such an idiot, he was. “I didn’t realise writing those poems would bother you.”

“They don’t! It’s not the poems… it’s… the other people.”

“It’s alright, I understand now,” Remus said. “I’ll stop writing them. Right now—I’m done. I was finished with ‘em anyway.”

“No, you don’t have to stop,” Sirius replied. “It’s good practice, and good money too, obviously. You don’t have to stop just ‘cause it bothers me.”

“Of course I do. We’re dating—why would I ever want to bother you?”

Sirius fell quiet then, as though he hadn’t been expecting such an answer. Because it made him nervous, Remus sat up a bit more, craning his head as though he could catch a glimpse of his love in the darkness.

“Sirius, you can tell me when things bother you,” he called. “I want you to tell me when things bother you. I’m not as good as you—I’m not a mind-reader. But I think this—talking bit... Talking about the things that bother us—well, it’s what a relationship is supposed to be, innit?”

“... You suck.”

“Huh?”

“How about beguiling?” Sirius said suddenly. “ ‘And her eyes were like a beguiling labyrinth, deep and without end’.”

“I—” Remus stopped to let out a chuckle. “I can’t keep up with you.”

“There’s always the classic ‘ravishing’. Ooh, yeah, tell her that her eyes were ravishing. That’ll really get a girl going.”

“How about ‘glorious’ instead?" Remus supplied. " ‘And glory was in the skies, reflected in those grey, storm cloud eyes’. What’d you think —any good?”

He’d meant the rhyme as a quip, but when Sirius said nothing, Remus grew nervous again.

“Sirius…? Come on, I was only teasing. You’re still there, right? … Sirius?”

There was no launching cry—no ‘bombs away!’ —Sirius simply sailed down into the pit in front of him with a heaving grunt, nearly landing directly on top of Remus’ ankles.

“Oh shit—that was way deeper than I thought!” He gasped, wobbling in the muck. Remus gaped up at him, half frozen from surprise.

“What—What the fuck are you doing?!”

Sirius gave him a wry look. “Oh, you know… Figured you’d be lonely down here by yourself. Thought I'd 'drop in'—heh!”

“But you’re supposed to be up there so they can find us in the dark!”

“… Oops.”

“Oh for fuck’s sakes.”

“You’re right though—s’cozy down here,” Sirius said, plopping down next to Remus in the dirt so they were shoulder to shoulder. “Whaddya think, should we cuddle?”

“Shut up.”

“C’moooon, you know you want to. And you were being so romantic a second ago—my little poet.”

“Shove off. James and Peter—”

“Would probably find it very hot and want to join in. We can just tell them we were cold. That we’re staving off fever.”

Remus smiled to himself and rolled his eyes. “Only we would end up stuck in a hole the night before exams.”

“That’s why we’re going to be rock stars and everyone else is going to be ordinary,” Sirius sassed.

Remus reached out and took his hand. Even in the dark—even covered in as much filth as they were—he knew every line and curve of the beautiful pianist’s fingers that instantly opened up and intertwined with his own. It made sense—he had spent the better part of the last two years zoning out on them.

“You sure seem to like Trish,” Sirius said eventually.

“I do,” Remus answered, then when Sirius was quiet again; “What, no quippy jokes?”

“I’ve…” He took a breath. “I’ve decided I wasn’t going to be jealous anymore.”

“Blimey, when’d you decide that?”

“About four seconds ago.”

“Prime timing, that.”

Sirius’ free hand came up, swatting him lightly across the nose and leaving a smudge of dirt behind. “What’s the point of being jealous when all you do is go around making everyone like you so bloody much?”

Remus snorted, wiping his face on his sleeve. “I do like Trish,” he said. “But I think I like her—well—because she reminds me a bit of you.”

“Really?”

“Yeah. So did Tonya, actually. I sort of… look for you in other people.”

“Why would you need to do that when you’ve got the real thing right in front of you?”

“It’s my hamartia, I guess.”

Sirius hummed in delight. “Careful, you start saying stuff like that and I might actually fall in love with you for real.”

Maybe it was the darkness, or the fact that he couldn’t see Sirius’ face and expressions in their entirety. Whatever it was, it cushioned him enough to let the words flow out like a river.

“I love you,” Remus said softly. “More than anyone.”

There was the barest sound of an inhale, and then Sirius’ mouth came up and he settled his lips along Remus’ lips. Remus could practically taste his smile. Hotter than any fever, it burned like the enduring passion of a star. It singed and warmed him all at once.

“I love you,” Sirius said between kisses; “The most.”

“I love you, Sirius,” Remus said back, because he couldn’t stand not saying it. "Always."

I love you, I love you. I am in love with you, Sirius Black.

Heedless of the dirt or the muck, they clung to each other in the darkness. In his head, Remus was already constructing the lie that got Sirius into the pit in the first place when he spotted the familiar yellow of a torch cutting across the top lip of their filthy prison.

“Sirius,” he mumbled against his lips; “Sirius, they’re back—James and Pete.”

Sirius broke away immediately and jumped to his feet, arms flailing.

“Here!” He cried. “We’re down here, Prongs!”

Standing next to him, Remus jumped too, both of them shrieking until finally their saviour was bearing down on them with a torch trained viciously in their eyes.

Hand shielding his brow, Sirius swore; “Fuck Wormtail, mind turning your light that way a bit? S’not like we’ve been sitting in the bloody dark this entire time or anything.”

The torch whipped away and Remus blinked around the sun spots in his vision. Then his stomach sank to his knees.

“Ooh, dear, we are in trouble,” Filch sneered, grinning with teeth as yellow as his torch.

Bollocks.

* * *

Probably against his better judgement, the sour caretaker did agree to get them out of the pit. When Remus finally climbed out, covered head to toe in muck, he found James and Peter standing off to the side, both looking rather sorry and glum. They’d been caught on their way back out on their rescue mission, and rather than risk leaving their two best friends to freeze to death overnight, they gave up the ghost and told Filch everything. Though they conveniently left out the part about the weed being in the brownies.

“I’m telling you—they’re a surprise for a friend’s birthday. We were gonna leave them outside their door,” Sirius scowled. Filch had them lined up in front of their dorm, marching up and down the line like a drill sergeant.

“Likely story comin’ from a couple ‘a pumpkin heads out after hours,” he scoffed. “No, I’m confiscatin’ the lot as contraband.”

All four boys exchanged an unsure glance, but Filch had already set the plate of sweets aside. “Now, turn out yer pockets—all of yeh. Let's see what else you've managed to sneak in illegally.”

They did so bitterly, handing over everything from wads of pre-chewed gum (“That’s right nasty, Pete.”) to a near-full pack of cigarettes. Remus lost his second lighter to Filch, and was contemplating his odds of being able to slip his hand into the caretaker's pocket to get it back when they were all ordered to lift their arms so they could be patted down for any other possible 'illicit goods'. None of them had any weed on them, but Remus realised too late that his pockets weren't quite so empty.

"You ruddy mop-sticks hide all sorts of rubbish under these bleedin' coats—" Filch was saying, before his gnarled fingers fell across the hard shape tucked into Remus' breast pocket; "What have we 'ere, 'ey?"

Before he could stop him, Filch ripped the lapel of Remus' coat away and shoved his hand down, snatching up his song journal in one fell swoop.

"Oi! Give that back!" Remus cried. He'd forgotten that he'd left it in his coat pocket and seeing Filch's slimy fingers all over it made him thrum with fury.

"If this little book were so important to yeh, then you shouldn't have been caught out after hours!"

"You can't just grab a student like that!" Sirius lashed. "It's practically assault! We have a right to autonomy and privacy!"

"Rule breakers forfeit all rights to privacy!"

"But you can't just take our things! What does one little book have to do with being out after curfew?!"

"I'm reviewing it for contraband! Who knows what sort of dirty messages are written in 'ere!"

"It's a bloody notebook!" James hollered.

"One more word out of any of you's and I'll have yeh muckin' stables 'til June!"

Sirius managed a swipe at the journal, but Filch caught him by the wrist.

"Try that again and I'll break yer fingers," he threatened, before throwing Sirius back and grabbing Remus by the collar to haul him out front. "Now march, ya bleedin' ingrates! You'll head straight to Professor McGonagall's office in the morning!"

Filch slogged them all the way up to the fourth floor of Godric House, muck and all, and left them in the doorway of their bedroom with a final threat; “I see any of you’s out again after hours and I’ll make yeh wish you’d never been born!”

The moment the awful caretaker had shut the door and stormed off, Sirius charged it, wailing on the wood with his boot. “Fucking—DICK!”

“That’s enough, Black,” James sighed. “You’re gonna wake up the whole dorm.”

After stripping out of his dirty clothes, Remus slumped back on his bed. Beyond the embarrassment that Filch might possibly read his songbook, he was left more than a little depressed. The notebook had everything; “September”, his version of Sirius’ “Wag the Dog”, "Tonya’s Song", and even the beginning drabbles of “Hard to Be a Teen”. Every shred and scrap of his songwriting was in there. Now it was all gone, and unlike Sirius he didn’t have the musical memory to replace it.

“Fuck,” Remus hissed, aiming a light kick of his own at his wardrobe.

Instantly Sirius was at his side on the bed. “I’m sorry, Moons. I know what it was that bleedin’ codger took.”

He sighed, holding his head which had begun to ache. “Whatever, I’m tired. I’m gonna go take a shower.”

“It can’t be that bad,” Peter reasoned, while Remus rifled through his hutch for a fresh towel.

“Says you, Wormtail,” Sirius snapped. “You didn’t have much to say when Filch was robbing us blind.”

“Well, I just assumed we’d get it all back."

This gave the other three boys pause.

“You mean break into Filch’s office?” James started.

“Yeah, duh!”

“Pete, we tried that—in year ten. Twice! Filch had us cleaning out the crawl spaces above the science buildings for weeks.”

“I still get nightmares about all the dead squirrels,” Sirius shuddered.

“We didn’t have Moony back then,” Peter reasoned; “And—Filch hadn't confiscated an entire plate of edibles right before either.”

“Oh my god, he’s right,” Sirius said, perking straight up; “In a hour that son of a bitch is gonna be out cold. Christ, this kid might be a genius after all!”

While Peter crossed his arms haughtily, Remus slowly looked up from his hutch.

“Do you really think he’d eat them?”

“Do I think he'd resist eating an entire plate of freshly-baked goods? We’d have a better chance of finding a giant squid in the Dubh,” Peter scoffed. “Nothing ever comes out of Filch’s office, especially not sweets.”

Sirius leapt up from the bed. “This is brilliant! That tosspot doesn’t know there’s weed in them—which means the prank worked after all! By the time he wakes up he’s not even gonna remember what year it is, let alone that he gave us detention!”

James, ever the voice of reason, chimed in; “As much as I want to stick it to Filch, we do have exams in the morning, you know.”

“Oh c'mon!” Sirius cried, surging toward his best friend and clasping him over the shoulders; “What would you rather be known as, Potter? The guy that got a good night’s sleep before one of his boring law exams—which he’s been studying for religiously anyway—or the guy that broke into Filch’s own bloody office when he was utterly caned?!”

The answer was obvious on James’ face, but it was Remus he looked to.

“Well, Moony? It’s your book, and you’re the one who’s gonna have to pop the lock.”

As his friends rounded on him, Remus glanced at the clock on his bedside. He was tired and filthy, and still had a headache… but it wasn’t shit-all hour yet.

“Alright. Let’s go rob the bastard.”

That was all the permission the others needed. Bundling up in whatever mucky coat they could find, they quickly slipped back out into the night. Four boys with a bone to pick.

Filch's office was located in a tiny building tucked away behind the cafeteria called Bastion Hall, though over the years it'd affectionately earned itself the moniker of 'the Bastille', since anyone going in was certainly about to be punished. Remus had only been inside twice, the first time after Filch had caught them setting off firecrackers on Sirius' sixteenth birthday, and the second just last week when he'd been fleeing the clutches of Audriana and her pack of girls. He'd never made it all the way into the caretaker's personal office though, and for that he was thankful.

Being one of the older buildings on campus, the Bastille felt more like the Shrieking Shack's more straight-edged cousin. The floor tiles were chipped and worn and all of the walls had a certain shade of yellow to them, earned from years of age and smoking indoors. Together they snuck in quietly, their hearts thrumming with the excitement of getting to stick to one of Hawkings' oldest bullies. Sirius, who naturally had the most experience with Filch's office due to his many detentions, took the lead, brandishing them onward in the dark.

"It's this way," he whispered, glee and anticipation clear in his voice.

"Remember," James said, "this is a covert rescue mission. We're only taking back what's ours."

"And what we can carry," Sirius sniggered.

They made it to the office door, which had a cross hatch window complete with curtains drawn behind it and a small plaque bearing Filch's name. James and Sirius leaned their heads together to peek through the small slit between each curtain before drawing back with big smiles on their faces.

"He's in there, alright. Looks like he's asleep," Sirius said.

"Did he eat the brownies?" Peter asked.

"Can't be sure. Try and keep quiet with the door, alright Moony?"

Remus nodded, pulling a few pins from his pocket and kneeling down before the doorknob. Its insides were worn down from years of use, but he managed it quick enough, grinning when that familiar tick and click echoed from its joints.

"Thought you said this was going to be hard," he quipped snidely.

“ ‘Fraid that’s not the only door we gotta get through,” Sirius smirked, making Remus’ smile falter a bit.

Once he’d moved out of the way, James slowly rotated the doorknob. All four of them held their breath as it dropped open, squeaking painfully on its hinges until finally they had a decent view of the grimy man through the gap. Filch was slumped back in a seemingly ancient leather chair with his eyes closed and his feet up on the desk. Next to them, the desk lamp was still on, illuminating a half-eaten batch of Marauders-certified weed brownies.

“Oh fuck yeah,” Sirius breathed, fist-bumping James.

“Make sure he’s really asleep before you start celebrating,” Peter warned as they all straightened up and slipped soundlessly into the room.

“How many d’you figure he ate?” Remus asked.

James squinted at the brownies; “Looks like at least six.”

Creeping up to the caretaker’s side, the Marauders peered down at him. Filch’s eyes were closed and he was buried up to his nose in his heavy winter coat, but he was unmoving—completely still.

“You think he’s dead?” Sirius murmured grimly.

“No way, you can’t die from too much weed,” James said, before his face fell; “Right, Moony?”

“I don’t know, I’ve never tried it!”

They leaned in closer and slowly Sirius held up a single finger. Before Peter could even attempt to stop him, he poked Filch in one wrinkly cheek and the caretaker gave a hoarse snort, making them all wheel back in fright. Though by either sheer dumb luck or the brownie’s effectiveness, Filch stayed asleep, now snoring horribly.

“And what would you have done if he had woken up?” Remus grumbled.

“Ask if he’d like another brownie. Duh.”

"Just don't touch him anymore," James shot, as they all spread out to start their search.

The office itself was covered in clutter; stacks upon stacks of old newspapers and magazines covered every surface, coffee-ringed mugs and overflowing ashtrays littered between it all. One wall was made up entirely of rusted filing cabinets overflowing with files and other bits of paper and there was a coat rack in the corner piled so high with jackets an entire person could've been buried beneath. There was only one window in the entire room, which was covered in dead flies with its exterior barred and coated in an endless array of spitballs—some of which were certainly courtesy of Sirius.

"Moony, over here," James called, ushering Remus over to another door on the room's far side where they'd all gathered. One look at it told him everything he needed to know about his friends' first failed attempt to storm the office; the door had at least a dozen locks of varying styles, some that were definitely going to need to be pried off.

"I think I'm gonna need more than a few bobby pins," he winced. "Anyone see any keys?"

"He always keeps 'em on him," Peter winced, turning to look back at the dozing man. James joined him, scratching his head dubiously.

"Moony, you wouldn't happen to make a good pickpocket too, would ya?"

"Don't bother. It's a good thing Filch always comes prepared," Sirius grinned, scooping up a crowbar that had been unceremoniously left in an umbrella stand next to the desk.

Once Remus had rid them of the locks he could handle and James had taken a pair of bolt cutters to the thin door chains, Sirius slid the edge of the crowbar up under the final bolt and gently pressed his weight against it. The door gave a deep groan, making them all wince, but still did not give.

"Prongs, come help me out with this."

With the two of them at it, the bolt began to pry back, millimetre by excruciating millimetre.

"So close!" James grunted, before finally the lock snapped back with a sharp bang and they fell against each other in one big pile. Horrified, Peter and Remus whirled on Filch. The caretaker gave a low grunt through his snores, but kept sleeping, and they relaxed as Sirius tossed the crowbar away with another clatter and popped up to his feet.

“Open sesame,” he grinned, throwing the door wide.

Inside was a mountain of confiscated goods. Boxes towered over one another, dingy from dust and neglect, and there were cabinets full of liquor bottles, glass pipes, and other drug paraphernalia. There was a trunk of prohibited clothes in one corner with a rusted, metal shoe rack next to it, piled high in the same risqué heels worn by the corner girls that came out at night in Soho’s red-light district. Above that was an entire shelf dedicated to banned books and dirty magazines, and as it so happened, a crate of what looked to be spray paint. Just beneath that was several plastic tubs full of water pistols, which must’ve been confiscated from the largest water-battle ever hosted. The room was absolutely a delinquent’s treasure trove.

“How much you want to bet there’s a family of rats living in here?” James asked, pulling the string on the only free-hanging light bulb in the entire room.

“Smells like mould and moth balls,” Peter commented, eyeing a tub randomly overflowing randomly with rubber ducks.

“Oi lads,” Sirius called from next to the trunk of clothes, “think Filch plays dress up?” He held an ugly old bra the size of his head up over his shirt and James snorted.

“I think that belonged to your grandmother, actually.”

“And how would you know that?” Sirius asked, whipping the brassiere at the other boy’s head.

“C’mon Padfoot, you know the old ladies love him,” Remus smirked. James scooped the bra up from the floor and threw it at him in return.

“Alright,” James ordered once they’d stopped laughing, “let’s get our crap and get out of here.”

“What’s the rush, Prongs? Even if ol' Filchy wakes up he’ll be in no fit state to do anything. I want to look around,” Sirius said, pulling open a drawer and inspecting its contents. “Holy fuck—jackpot!” With a triumphant look, Sirius pulled out several roman candles, waving them around and making shooting noises at his friends. James instantly joined him, rifling through eagerly.

“There are some of Bob’s firecrackers in here!” He said gleefully. “Think of what we could do with all these.”

“Burn down the entire school, likely enough,” Peter added, though he didn’t look any less excited as he opened his bag and began filling it with all sorts of explosives.

On a more personal mission, Remus began sorting through his own share of drawers and boxes in search of his songbook. As he did, he ended up coming across an impressive array of tapes and vinyl LPs, which Sirius practically drooled over until James reminded them that they were only to take what was absolutely necessary. (The fireworks, in this case, were absolutely a necessity.) Remus thought he'd found what he was looking for when he unearthed a box of tattered notebooks and journals, but all that was there was a collection of assorted class notes and diaries older than himself. Unsatisfied, he pushed the box away.

Across the room, Sirius beckoned Peter over; “Wormy, get a load of this—” before promptly opening a can of rubber snakes in his face, making Peter jump back and nearly topple a stack of cardboard boxes that was taller than he was.

“At least someone’s having fun,” Remus muttered to himself, before glancing back toward the main office. There was a chance Filch hadn’t bothered to sort through everything he’d taken off them earlier in the night before sitting down to enjoy his stolen midnight snack, which meant that he could’ve still had Remus’ songbook and lighter on his person. The thought didn’t bode well, but he had to try.

Leaving his friends to their nonsense, Remus made his way back into the office and pushed up his sleeves. He’d just rounded Filch’s chair when he spotted his first obstacle; sometime between getting the storage door open and heading inside, Mrs. Norris had taken up residence on the sleeping caretaker’s lap, her yellow, lamp-like eyes staring back at him as though she were daring him to try anything funny.

“Nice kitty,” he breathed, slowly sliding closer. “I’m not gonna hurt you, I just need to…” Biting his lip, Remus slipped his hand into the side pocket of Filch’s coat, feeling around. He didn’t dare take his eyes off of Mrs. Norris, afraid that the moment he did she would come flying at him with her claws extended or worse—wake her master.

Remus’ rifling was rewarded with his personal carton of Embassy cigarettes, which proved well enough that Filch had yet to empty his pockets. He tucked them away for safekeeping before moving on to the next pocket, in which he found Sirius’ cigarettes and three lighters, one of them being his own.

“Moony!” Sirius called suddenly, his voice a strained whisper. “What are you doing?”

Remus looked back to find all three of his friends standing in the storage room doorway, utterly gawping.

“Are you mental?” Peter hissed.

“Just hold on,” he told them, before slowly reaching up to the collar of Filch’s jacket.

"You're gonna get yourself killed!"

Remus ignored the warning. He was so close. Only one more pocket left.

“That’s it, nice Mrs. Norris…”

The cat made a small noise like a trill and he froze, but all Filch did was snort and shift slightly in his chair. When the old man had settled again, Remus pressed on. He was holding his breath and would’ve bet anything that his friends were too, but when he finally managed to slip his hand into the inside breast pocket of Filch’s coat, his fingers brushed the smooth edges of his journal and he was able to grab hold of its cover.

Giddy with victory, Remus pulled his hand back and let out a sigh of relief. “Got it,” he grinned, holding up the book.

“Yeah, Moony!” James cheered quietly, then in perhaps a moment of oversight, he clapped his hands together and that was all it took to spook Mrs. Norris. The cat skittered off Filch’s lap with a yowl and each of them gasped in horror. Instantly a gnarled hand clamped down around Remus’ wrist, squeezing so tightly it threatened to crush his bones like a bird’s. Remus’ stomach launched into his throat as Filch turned his head, slowly opening one eye.

“What... time is it…?” He lurched in that scraggly voice of his.

Remus was speechless at first. It felt like a joke.

“H–H–Half past one."

Filch narrowed his beady eyes before swallowing like he’d tasted something fowl and dropping his head back against the chair. His grip loosened on Remus' arm, and Remus ripped away, scrambling backwards until he slammed into Sirius' knees. It was only then that he realised that Filch was not in fact getting up to throttle him, but rather had fallen back asleep in his chair.

"Holy shit. You just might be the luckiest son of a bitch I've ever met in my life," Sirius said, helping Remus to his feet.

Remus shook his head grimly. "I think I'm gonna be sick..."

"Glad you got your book back, Lupin," James said, patting him on the back. "Now let's get out of here before the old fart actually wakes up."

With their pockets and school bags full of all sorts of banned bits and bobs, they took the remaining brownies and fled the hall, feeling richer than kings.

"Got all sorts of stuff perfect for pranking," James was telling Remus while they skittered up the sidewalks. "Rubber snakes, explosives, fart in a can—the works! Padfoot here, even found some of his own tapes that Filch had confiscated after our stereo prank in eleventh year."

In answer, Sirius held up the tape and kissed it. "Rock 'n' roll is back, baby!"

"We're so going to get expelled," Remus grinned, lighting a victory cigarette. Just then Peter shouted from up ahead;

"Hey lads, don't look now but it's snowing!"

They all glanced up at the night sky. It was bright and Remus could see the tiniest flickerings of little snowflakes as they drifted down to earth.

"First snow fall," he mumbled. "Always unexpected."

"This is great," James declared, batting Sirius fondly and not looking the least bit tired; "We got everything back and then some and in less than two weeks we'll be heading home—all of us, together. We should make more plans! Maybe try and see a live show—catch a glimpse of our futures, yeah? Is that new song of yours ready yet, Lupin?"

Remus pat his breast pocket, where his newly-returned songbook was securely tucked away. "Almost, Prongs."

“Brilliant! S’all brilliant!”

“So brilliant we should celebrate,” Sirius suggested, before drawing to a stop under one of the buzzing road lamps and reaching into Remus’ pocket himself and withdrawing his lighter. He tossed it at James, who caught it with a questioning look.

“You mean…?”

Sirius smirked, and at the same time, both boys said;

“Roman candles.”

“Oh hell yeah!” Peter cried, dropping his bag on the icy sidewalk as he and James eagerly began to root through it.

Remus stood back, content with his fag, but as he watched Sirius just turned around in front of him and blocked the view.

“Here," he said, holding up another zippo. "To make up for the one I just stole. And the one I lost...”

The lighter was silver, made with cheap plate metal that was already tarnishing on one side and turning brassy. Remus recognised it instantly. Utterly stunned, he reached out and took it, turning it over in his hands. It was the one Tomny had given him the day before eleventh year, the same one he'd lost to Filch ages ago. He was suddenly trembling, and not from the cold.

“You remembered!” Remus exclaimed, looking up at Sirius.

“ ‘Course. It meant a lot to you, I couldn’t very well leave it behind." Sirius grinned, then bit lip giddily. "That’s the right one, right? I had to sort through about a million of those little fuckers.”

"Blimey..." Remus’ face split into a smile, even though he felt like half-crying. “It’s definitely the right one. It’s Tomny’s actually. He—er… he gave it to me before I came to Hawkings.”

“Oh, well in that case—” Sirius made a grab for the lighter, but Remus pulled his hand back in time.

“What? What are you doing?”

“Can’t have you thinking ‘bout that toff every time you light up. My pride couldn’t take it.”

Remus laughed, unable to help himself. “I thought you were trying to be less jealous?”

“Of girls. I said nothing about other guys.”

“Shameless, you are.”

Sirius opened his mouth to deliver what was undoubtedly another clever quip, but suddenly a loud pop sounded from behind them, followed by a spectacular show of red as James aimed one of the roman candles up at the sky.

“Oi, Black,” he called, before dropping his arm and training the firework in their direction; “Think fast.”

Sirius tilted his head. “You wouldn’t—”

Oh, but he would.

The candle fired and Remus and Sirius had to dive apart to avoid it, hitting the grass with two low groans. They looked up in time to see a second shot—this one green—arc over their heads from Peter.

“You’re mental!” Sirius shouted. "And so dead!"

Cackling, James and Peter loped away across the frozen lawn while Sirius tossed Remus a firework of his own, quickly fumbling with a lighter and the fuse.

“This is how people end up in the hospital!” Remus warned, grappling for the roman candle before narrowly avoiding another green burst. “Motherfu—! You’re gonna regret that, Pete!”

“Bring it on, Moony!”

“Marauders, ATTAAAACK!” Sirius cried, racing after James with his candle pointed ahead of him like a magic wand. It blew red, lighting up his laughing face in the darkness.

No one, in fact, ended up in the hospital.

It was a good night.

Chapter End Notes

> Personally, I think I've been a little too good to you. Lots of fluff recently. So I think I'm gonna rock your worlds a bit for next week's chapter. Mwah.

Chapter 82: Everything, or Not At All

Chapter Summary

> You might want to tuck in and cue up some Bowie for this one... it's a ride.

Chapter Notes

> C/W: for emotions????
> (and woo, we broke 600k lmfao. pfft this fic will never end...)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I'm the guy in the sky,
Flying high, flashing eyes;
No surprise I told lies,
I'm the punk in the gutter;
I'm the new president,
And I grew and I bent,
Don't you know, don't it show?
I'm the punk with the stutter…

- "The Punk and the Godfather" The Who, 1973

Tuesday 6th December 1977

They say it's easy to become relaxed when one was in love, but whoever 'they' was must've been smoking some real strong shit. After two years Remus had grown used to life's little derailments such as fad gossip or the occasional detention, but he'd never truly been relaxed. He'd still had the same trouble sleeping as anywhere else, still lost out to his emotions during those terrible, high-tension moments, and was still carrying secrets on his back as though he were Atlas trying to hold up the sky.

Still, Sirius made things easier. Sirius had more of him than anyone else. He made Remus feel safe, even if there was hardly ever a calm moment between them. Most of the time loving Sirius felt like running headlong toward a brick wall; every shred of you screaming to stop, to pull back, but you can't because you've already committed. And then just when you're expecting to crash—expecting to shatter every goddamn bone in your body—you haven't. You've made it through, there wasn't even a wall at all. It was a door. A magic door.

Yeah.

Loving Sirius Black was like magic. He was made of it. Perhaps that was the scariest part; Remus Lupin was not made of magic. He was made of resentment, of poor decisions. By the grace of a mother and father, he'd been made out of unlove, and now that he knew the difference, it was getting harder to ignore.

I should tell him, he thought, whenever the thoughts and memories began to seep back in. We could understand each other even better then. And he wouldn't give a shit. It's only me who cares.

Maybe, the voice said; But what about after?

What do you mean, after?

Don't play thick. After. When he realises it isn't worth it. When your friends find someone better. When they all get tired of you.

Sirius isn't like that.

Oh, yes he is. One day he's going to get tired of you, and when he does, he'll leave and take every last bit of you with him. What will you be then?

Those were the worst thoughts. Born of guilt and agitation and quiet. Of the idea that Sirius was anything like all the others that had given up on him. I should tell him, I should tell him—he'd regret the cowardice later. Back then it'd felt like handing Sirius a burden that wasn't his to bear, but that was the brilliant thing about burdens; the more hands to carry it, the lighter it became.

That afternoon, Remus had tucked himself next to Sirius' bed with a book in his lap. It was just the two of them, they being the only ones without an exam that day, and Remus had long since called it quits on any and all revision. He'd resolved that if he didn't know it already, he wasn't going to know it at all, and he'd rather sit with the stereo on, enjoying himself, than slave over an exam that wasn't going to matter much in the long run. A quick turn of the head found Sirius lounged out on his bed behind him with a copy of Peter's father's paper open on the covers, one of Lily's red revision pens sticking out of the corner of his mouth. The little thief.

"What's that?"

Sirius' head shot up, pen falling from between his teeth. "Huh?"

"That." Remus pointed. He'd spotted what appeared to be a letter, open overtop of the newspaper. It had some sort of fancy crest at the top, but Sirius pulled it back before he could get a decent look.

"It's nothing. Exam work." Sirius slipped the paper beneath the ad-riddled publication, smiling at him brightly. "I've been thinking, how do you feel about Camden?"

“Camden? What about it?"

Sirius picked up the pen, twirling it between two fingers; “How would you like to live there?”

"As in full-time?"

"No, as in a summer home—yes, full-time, you knob."

With a little smile, Remus shut his book and dropped his head back against the edge of the bed thoughtfully. Next to them, the stereo was playing a Lou Reed song. Slow and melodic.

“Camden’s fine, I guess. Lots of squatters, but it’s central enough. Could be fun.”

“Hm. And have you thoughts on Clerkenwell? This ad here says ‘two bedroom flat in Clerkenwell’.”

“Clerkenwell's... Hold on, why're you looking for flats now? S'pretty far off, we still have a whole ‘nother term to finish first.”

“I’m just getting myself familiar with the market,” Sirius replied staunchly. “Now Clerkenwell?”

“It's fine. Lots of council housing. You know, casual gentrification, the like.”

He flipped the page. “And Soho? There’s this corner place on offer, seems big enough.”

“Oh yeah, bet we could find real cheap rent over a massage parlour. And there’s a bagman on every corner for when we run out of hash at three in the morning.”

“Far from you to complain about easily accessible drugs. Oxford Street then?”

“Only if you want to be blown up by the Provos.”

“You’re joking? Bloody Irish. Well, I suppose we could always try the East End. This place called 'Mile End' sounds nice. This one boasts black mould in only one of the bathrooms.”

Remus smirked up at the ceiling. “A posh boy like you? Those Eastenders would eat you alive.”

“Ah, but what do I have to worry about when I have a tough guy like you to protect me?”

The next thing he knew, Sirius had leaned forward and slipped a hand down the side of Remus' neck. He automatically curled into the touch, letting his eyes slip shut as soothing fingers worked the knots from his muscles. Pleased, Sirius slid across the bed until he was close enough to leave little kisses along the shell of his ear.

“I've got somewhere to be, you know,” Remus mumbled rather reluctantly.

“Mmm… Where's that?”

"Told James I'd meet him after his physics exam. He’s working on a Christmas present for Lily and he asked me to help out.”

“No, blow the tosser off.” Sirius’ voice turned husky as he dipped lower still and ran his tongue along that sensitive bend connecting Remus’ neck and jaw. “Stay here with me.”

For a moment he was tempted. He imagined giving in—turning around and meeting Sirius' lips with his own. Falling back into bed with him, clutching the collar of his shirt until it nearly split at the seams, the little moan Sirius made when he sucked that spot between his ear and jaw. And then... James walking in on them, mouth open in shock, lips forming the words—bloody queers!

Remus cleared his throat, drawing his face away with a sharp flinch.

"Sirius... James."

"—Would probably be very jealous and want to join in."

He nearly laughed. Nearly.

"He's waiting. I don't show and he's bound to come looking for me anyway.”

With a frustrated grunt, Sirius pulled back and flopped down into his pillows. “What good’s a best mate if all he does is cock-block me?”

Shoving down the guilt, Remus shut his book and turned over, leaning his elbows on the side of the bed. “He also happens to be the lead guitarist of your band.”

“An unfortunate coincidence.” Sirius curled his fingers around the collar of Remus’ shirt and drew him across the bed for another bout of snogging. Remus gave in again, but only for a few minutes. It was hot—Sirius’ tongue always found that little spot on the roof of his mouth that turned his arms and legs to jelly.

Really he couldn’t wait until they were free to snog all they wanted in the comfort of their own flat. Lily and the girls were almost finished with their uni applications, as were James and Peter, though they insisted that it was only to satiate their parents. Alternatively, all of the school brochures Lyall had sent ended up as kindling in the common room fire. Even if the band thing didn't turn out for them, Remus had no interest to go back to school. Neither did Sirius, and he had more than enough inheritance to keep them afloat until they figured out a backup plan. Once they found themselves a place to live, they could get jobs and furniture and a huge bed to lie around in, and soon enough there’d be no more talk about exams or marks or lessons. Just music, friends, and Sirius.

“I love you,” Remus whispered when they broke apart again.

“I love you too,” Sirius replied, before biting his bottom lip. He looked so handsome that Remus had to kiss him once more before popping to his feet.

“Better split now if I’m to meet Potter on time. See you at dinner?”

"Kay."

Remus pulled away, and as he did Sirius flipped another page in the newspaper. "Can't wait until we're all sharing a flat," he mused. "I'm gonna find us a 'do not disturb' sign to hang on the door. Potter's just gonna have to get used to playing second fiddle."

Remus nearly missed the meaning. He was by the door now, about to wind his muffler around his neck when he suddenly froze and caught on.

"You mean you want all of us to live together... after school?"

" 'Course," Sirius said, as though it were the most obvious thing in the world; "Didn't I already say that? All the best bands live together when they're starting out. Even Queen did it."

"But don't you think this'll be kinda hard that way?"

"What way?"

"You know... us. And them. Everyone in the same place?"

"Why would that be a problem? We're in the same place now."

Remus squirmed slightly. "Yeah, alright—the dorm's tight for sure, but at least we have the whole school. A flat, it'll... It'll be a lot harder."

"Yeah, well maybe I didn't picture us hiding it by then."

"... Oh."

Sirius sat up a bit more, pushing a thatch of dark hair out of his face. "You said it yourself, right? It's a long way off. But how long did you really think we could keep this up anyway?"

A lot longer than this, Remus thought nervously.

"So you're really thinking of telling them then."

Sirius shrugged, nonchalant. "Maybe."

"You were."

"Alright, so I was!" He snapped then, throwing up his hands. "Is that such a crime?"

"No! But I'd wish you'd tell me your plans before you just—"

"I'm telling you now, aren't I?"

Remus supressed another yelp. The news had come like a punch to the stomach. Sirius hadn't done anything wrong yet, but the promise of more had him blindsided. He couldn't get a breath in.

"When did you imagine doing it?" He asked, voice thin and reedy. Sirius looked away, and then got up to stand next to the stereo and fiddle with the dials. Remus hated it, seeing his back turned.

"I was sort of thinking... over Christmas."

Shit.

"That's like five days from now."

"No, we go home five days from now."

"And what would you even say?"

Sirius shrugged, shoulder blades cutting through the fabric of his jumper like razors. "The truth, obviously. That I'm a raging queer."

Shit... Shit fuck shit!

"And us?"

At that, Sirius turned to face him. "Well, I guess that's up to you, ain't it?"

"Don't do that," Remus warned. "Don't put this on me."

"But it's gotta be on you! You're the one who doesn't want to say anything."

"And I suppose you hate that, right?"

"Oh, I hate that I'm living every day like a charade? Wow, you got me there, Moons. You've cracked the code! Somebody get him a gold star."

"Don't be a dick, this is serious!"

Sirius laughed, and it felt scornful. "Oh, I know serious, but I also know that I can't keep this up forever. I'm not like you. I can't play some stupid part in front of my friends just to save face."

"What the fuck's that supposed to mean?"

"Nothing! Sorry, I just—" He huffed, lips pressed into a thin line. "Dammit... Potter's my best friend, and he thinks he knows me but doesn't."

"What? You're saying you can't really know a person unless you know all their habits in bed?"

"It's not that simple, and you know it!"

Remus felt his chest seize. Tired of you. Tired of you.

“So, what… Are we breaking up?”

“God—no!" Sirius practically hollered. "A bit fatalistic, aren’t you? Just —Just listen to me for a second.”

Coming forward, Sirius bent down ahead of him and scooped up Remus' muffler. He hadn't even realised that he'd dropped it. “I thought about telling him on Halloween," Sirius said, wringing the scarf out between his hands; "but I didn’t say anything, and he was still so good about it. It’s just like… I keep asking myself, what is it that I’m waiting for? For him to turn homophobic? To come out to me? Wouldn't that be a laugh. But Potter's not like McKinnon. He's not just gonna turn gay to make things easier."

"Marlene didn't—"

"I know! Bloody fuck, but I'd just rather he find out from me rather than anyone else.”

Remus' fists clenched at his sides.

“H–Has something changed then? Did James—”

“I’ve changed, Moons. I know what it is that I want now—I’m grown. I’ll understand if you don’t want the same things, but I think you should at least admit it to yourself one of these days. Doesn’t even a little bit of you want to tell them?”

“Of course I want to tell them! But you can’t just tell people shit like this and not expect them to—to not care!”

“Tomny didn’t care!”

“Tomny’s different!”

“How?” Sirius demanded. “I don’t get it. What are you so afraid of?”

The word 'everything' hung on his lips, but honesty had never come naturally to Remus. Instead, he did the vicious thing, which did come naturally, and turned it around.

"You want me to fight you on this," he spat, backing up until he was closer to his own bed, familiar territory. "You want me to beg you not to tell him anything so that you can say that it's not fair."

Sirius followed, caging him in. "Isn't it?"

"Then why bother asking my permission? Since you've so clearly already made up your mind!"

"I'm not asking," Sirius pushed, "but I just thought that maybe if I said that I was ready, you might be too."

"Well, I'm not, okay?! You wanna know what it is I'm afraid of? It's the change. It's the bloody fucking change! Because that's all this is, innit?! Things are good right now, and that scares you! You can't trust in your own happiness, Sirius, so you have to go and blow it up!"

"You don't think I don't know how you're feeling? I've been there—Christ, I'm still there!"

"Oh yeah? And what other secrets do you have?"

Sirius frowned deeply. "That's not fair."

"Whoever said life was fair."

It was enough of a dismissal, and Sirius stepped away, rubbing his forehead. "I didn't want this to be a fight," he murmured, a bit haggard; "I just wanted you to know where I was at. You don't have to do anything you don't want to."

"That sounds like a lie."

"Whatever. Call it whatever you want."

Remus sucked back a whimper. He didn't want this, he only wanted—

"All I've ever really wanted was you."

"Yeah... Well, now you have me."

Not looking at him, Sirius tossed the muffler aside and returned to the stereo beside his bed. The album had ended, and he began picking through the collection with lazy fingers, like his heart wasn't in it. Remus couldn't take it; he reached for his muffler again, fully intent on storming out, but at the last second—spotted the newspaper sitting open on Sirius' bed. It made him think of their little imaginary flat, waiting for them in Soho or Camden or wherever. It made him think about his poem, and all the longing he was about to put to waste.

"This one."

Sharply, Sirius spun around. Remus had approached him from behind, reaching over his shoulder to touch the edge of the record. He'd picked randomly, but it was Bowie. Typical.

"Thought you had to meet Prongs," Sirius replied dryly.

"He can wait a bit longer, I think. Right now, I want to be here with you."

The corners of Sirius' mouth tugged like he wanted to smile, but neither of them said anything more as he put the album on. When it was spinning, they wordlessly took up a spot on the floor between the two beds beds. There was nothing else to do beside stare up at the ceiling and wait for the song to start, just like old times. They were so close their ears were nearly brushing, and when the record started Remus couldn't help but recognise the song. Really, it was just his luck.

'Still don't know what I was waiting for,
And my time was running wild, a million dead-end streets and;
Every time I thought I'd got it made,
It seemed the taste was not so sweet!'

"You've got to be fucking kidding me."

There was a quiet snort, as though Sirius were trying to make himself laugh at the irony.

"You're the one who picked it."

'So I turned myself to face me,
But I've never caught a glimpse;
Of how the others must see the faker,
I'm much too fast to take that test—
Ch-ch-changes!'

Sirius shifted, and Remus felt dark waves tickle his ear like a whisper. He thought about reaching out to run his fingers through it, but then Sirius was speaking.

"I'm pretty sure 'Hunky Dory' is one of the best albums Bowie's ever made," he said, almost nonchalant. "Like I never—"

‘Turn and face the strange,
Ch-ch-changes!’

“—thought something that sounded so stupid could be so wonderful.”

“I could. I’ve heard you talk.”

“Wanker.”

‘Time may change me—
But I can’t trace time!’

Remus felt Sirius’ shoulder flinch next to him. “Ooh, shit. Just got the shivers,” he murmured. “God, isn’t it amazing how music can do that to you?”

“Mm.”

Suddenly the room felt very big, and very empty. Remus wondered how long it’d been since they’d done this. Listened instead of talking. Easy and hard all at once. Had he done this with Miles then? Remus hated the idea. He wished for the Remus and Sirius they’d been not twenty minutes before. Fancy a place in Wembley? Sirius would say, and though it would be naught much more than a mask, Remus would be blissfully ignorant.

But he wasn’t ignorant anymore. Sirius was going to tell James, and when James knew, others were bound to follow. How long until they put two and two together? And could they even stay together with one of them out and the other still severely locked in the closet? Would that not just lead to more resentment?

‘And these children that you spit on,
As they try to change their worlds;
Are immune to your consultations,
They’re quite aware of what they’re goin’ through—
Ch-ch-changes!’

Remus felt as though he were in mourning. It was as if a million tiny, little grains of sand were slipping right through his fingers. He didn’t want Sirius to slip through his fingers, but it occurred to him that while he was off imagining the dingy pubs they would play in and the jobs they might have, his boyfriend was deep in a mourning all his own. Remus could sparsely picture it; how they might not be able to hold hands in their own home or kiss each other good morning as they sipped tea or coffee or vodka—whatever happened to fit their fancy that day. None of it had bothered him because he was happy enough with how things were now, but perhaps he'd been taking Sirius' feelings for granted. Perhaps he was trampling them—had been for a long time. Dammit.

Remus took a deep breath. No backslide. No backslide.

'Time may change me,
But you can't trace time…'

"What would you say is your favourite Bowie song, Moony? If you had to pick a favourite?"

"Sirius, I think we—"

"Aw, don't be like that. I know you secretly love him. Heard you mumbling 'Rebel Rebel' in the shower just the other day!"

'Ch-ch-changes—
Turn and face the strange!'

"Is that one your favourite? You can tell me, I won't tell anyone, swears."

"Sirius—"

'Ch-ch-changes!
Pretty soon now you're gonna get older—'

Remus shivered too.

"Ooh, I felt that one, Moons! You got goosebumps?"

'I said that time may change me,

But I can't trace time…'

It was enough.

In one fluid motion, he rolled over onto his stomach, bearing down over Sirius' face with desperation leaking from every pore. He might've kissed him—he almost did—but Sirius was still faster. Anticipating him, he turned his head to the side, and Remus' lips hit his cheek instead. It was a total rejection, one he probably deserved. He was losing Sirius, he realised. And it scared him.

"New Years," Remus said very quickly; "Give me until New Years."

Sirius sighed. "Moony, you don't have to do this."

"I don't want to lose you," he begged. "Whether it be now, or ten years from now. And if this is something you need, then… I'll do it. I'll do it with you! I can be ready—I-I am ready!"

"No you're not."

"Who says? You are! I thought this was what you wanted—or were you just waiting for me to say no officially so you could break up with me and be done with it?"

"Fuck, Moony!" Sirius sat up, nearly slamming their foreheads together. He knocked the hi-fi's needle aside, before pressing his head into one hand and exhaling very deeply. "I just want to feel whole for once, okay? You're not the only one who feels half-empty all of the time, and don't fucking bother with any more shitty metaphors like how I'm 'full' 'cause I'm not! Alright?!"

Remus sank back on his knees. He wanted to fall through the floor. Just—down, down, down, until nothing else mattered but the dark. It scared him, made his nose burn and his eyes sting, so he wiped them on his sleeve.

"I love you," he said, stubbornly.

"Love you too," Sirius answered, twice as so.

They were quiet again, like neither of them could think of anything besides a pitiful 'I love you'. Finally, Remus reached out a hand. Sirius looked at it, then at him. His eyes were glassy.

“I told myself I wouldn’t be jealous anymore,” Sirius started lowly; “but it’s not just the girls anymore. It’s James and Lily—Peter and Moira. It’s everyone who’s ever gotten to have what I can’t.”

I know. God, I know.

"And it's not about being ready," Sirius swore; "It's about not being able to take it anymore. I lost one family, I can't handle sitting around and waiting to lose another."

“I understand," Remus said. And he did. "Look, I know I’m not as brave as you, but I promise, I’ll try. Whatever you need—I’ll try... Just give me a bit more time. New Years, that’s all I’m asking for.”

"You don't have to."

"I know. I want to."

Several seconds passed between then, but when Sirius finally reached out and took his hand, Remus just about threw up from relief. Eagerly, he brought it to his lips and kissed his knuckles over and over again—until Sirius was pulling him by the shirt and they were just kissing. Two desperate kids, missing one another. Remus clung to him, and together they fell into the hutch between the beds. The clatter knocked the turntable’s needle off its stand, immediately starting up the music mid-song.

‘—h-ch-changes,
Turn and face the strange!’

Sirius threw his head back and laughed, bright and brilliant. It was contagious, and Remus was laughing a second later.

“New Years,” he promised again, “just give me until then. After that we can sort out what it is we’re telling people.”

“If you say so.”

Sirius bit his lip over another short chuckle, but it still felt sad. Remus apologised by kissing each knuckle, and Sirius returned the gesture by reaching out and brushing the mossy brown hair back from his face. They held each other for a while longer, staring back at one another and kissing every time the silence got to be too much. Finally Sirius released him and rolled back up onto his bed, whipping one leg around to take a quick shot at Remus' arse for good measure.

"Get on out of here then. Don't want to keep our lead guitarist waiting."

"I guess so." Remus coughed, clearing the nerves from his voice. "Erm —not when we're to live with him forever."

Sirius stabbed a finger into the newspaper still lying open on his bed. "Think Prongs'll fancy this little row-house in Chelsea? He can even bring that girlfriend of his—the feisty one with the red hair."

"Just try and keep us out of Brompton or Kensington," Remus told him, as he reached once more for his scarf. "I know you can afford it with your nepotism money but that doesn't mean I'm willing to admit to being a posh prat just yet."

"No, you're far too rough for the comforts of home to apply."

Dropping his head with a shake, Remus quietly slipped out into the hall. The cheeky tête-à-tête was enough to calm some of his frayed nerves, but not enough to forget what he'd just done. He'd just made a promise he wasn't sure he could even keep, and as per usual, his intrusive thoughts were becoming more disruptive than a German bomber plane.

That's it? The dreadful voice echoed, as he clattered down the steps of the school trolley that'd dropped him outside the Bellchant building. You're just gonna tell everyone after all this time? After all this shit? Just like that? Just—Happy New Year, I'm a queer! Ha! … As if.

God, just shut up.

How can I shut up? I'm you, bloody nutter.

He kicked the building's wall on his way inside and let the dull ache in his toes distract him. Intrusive voice or no, the reality was that he'd just told Sirius what he wanted to hear. Nothing had been solved, they'd just talked in circles until one of them cracked a joke that distracted the other long enough to end the conversation. Either Sirius was very right, and they were genuinely terrible at communicating, or they were so good they were bad. So smooth they'd turned slippery. It was all just one big headache—which coupled with the very real headache he was getting from his persistent cold, spelt only disaster.

"You don't think it's too cheesy?" James asked him later on, nervously clutching his guitar across his lap while Remus set the recorder up on the floor of the private music room they'd sequestered.

"It's absolutely cheesy," he agreed, grateful for the distraction. "But you wrote it for her, so she'll like it anyway."

"You wrote most of it, I just plucked a few strings."

"Semantics," Remus dismissed. When James had approached him with the idea of writing and recording a song for Lily for Christmas, he'd initially been shocked. It was around the same time of his 'poem-pushing' but Remus' first assumption had been that James would go to Sirius for that sort of thing. It became more clear why he hadn't after he'd presented the song's concept. Sirius wouldn't have been able to stomach something so sappy.

"There. It's no proper studio, but I think we're good to go," Remus said as he readied the tape machine and pressed record.

James cleared his throat, leaning into the whirring machine and taking a deep breath. "Er… So this is 'Lily Bloom in June'. Music by Potter. Lyrics by Lupin."

"—And Potter."

"Lyrics by Lupin and Potter," James drawled sarcastically, then; "This one's for you, Daisy. Happy Christmas, babe."

Remus smiled so broadly his face hurt, and James shot him a warning glance as he sat back and shook out any jitters. When he took up the guitar and began play, the tone proved rich and warm; courtesy of the dead strings he'd refused to change ever since he got the thing. But the song was soft; slow and romantic.

"Take a walk on down the path," James sang, more sure of himself with every word;

"Just past the little house carpeted in grass;
There you'll find a serene lakeside,
Where lilies bloom in springtime…

"And I'd sit down on the shore,
Shake that rock from my shoe, there's always one more;
There I stop and admire the setting sun,
And all the lilies that bloom in the springtime…"

Remus tried not to look at his friend directly. Apart from not wanting to break his immersion, he was somehow too embarrassed. James loved Lily so much—that was clear—but he'd been so distracted by Sirius as of late; it was startling to remember that other people could be just as happy as them.

"You are prettier than I,
I'm just your average guy,
You're like living colour;

"And when the summer passes by,
Gives way to autumn skies,
I still feel so lucky;

"You, you're all I need and more,
You're my lake that meets the shore,
You're my Lily bloom in June—

"And with you by my side,
There's nothing to lose;
'Cept a bit of pride,
And the rocks from my shoe;
I look into your green eyes and I see my future life,
With my Lily bloom in June…"

He stopped for a quick interlude, in which his fingers danced across the strings and Remus could only quietly admire it. He'd always thought James handsome—even with his untidy black hair that tended to stand up in all directions, a few bits still bleached white in the front from Halloween—but he was never more striking than when he had a guitar in his hands. His voice was almost willowy, deeper than Sirius' but raw and supple. As he sang the song turned into a soft ballad like a lullaby, and for the first time in his life Remus was truly proud of something he'd helped create.

"Take a walk on down the street,
Just past the little house made for you and me;
There you'll find our favourite pastimes,
Like sipping tea long after tea time;

"And I'd sit down next to you,

In that soft chair patterned all in blue;
And there I'd remember that little lakeside,
Where I brought my Lily during springtime;

"You are prettier than I,
I'm just your average guy;
And I wrote this little tune,
For my Lily bloom in J—"

In a sudden fit of protest, the tape recorder began shrieking with the tell-tale sounds of jammed plastic, and James' singing came to an abrupt halt.

"Bugger," Remus hissed, hitting the eject button and ripping the 8-track tape from its slot. The slight smell of melted PVC followed, making them both wrinkle their noses in distaste. "Must've gotten caught up inside the machine."

"Damn. I knew I wouldn't sound magnificent or anything but that just stings," James snorted sarcastically.

"You sounded great," Remus amended, squinting the tape. "It doesn't look all that damaged. Will probably still play actually, though I wouldn't risk trying to copy over it now."

Shrugging, James took the cassette from him and flipped it around, sliding it back into its slot and hitting play. This time instead of recording, it played the song back to them in all its raw and genuine goodness. At the very end, there was a little rippling sound and then Remus could be heard muttering 'bugger!' before the tape cut off.

"We could get another one from the AV room," he offered. "Though we might have to wrestle it off Pete."

"You know what, I sorta like it this way."

"You don't think you weren't dragging the bridge a bit? … Ha—just taking the piss."

James scowled; "I was gonna say that now it's got a bit of both of us."

"Then you're a sap."

"Guess I am." Smirking slightly, James yanked the 8-track from the machine while Remus handed him a felt pen. He quickly scribbled the date across the cassette's back. The front he finished off with 'To Daisy, all my love, JP'.

“You really think she’s gonna like it?” He asked after.

“No,” Remus answered, “I think she’s gonna love it.”

James grinned down at the tape, all dimples, and Remus suddenly felt disappointment surge over him. Not at James, but at himself.

“Hey James?”

“Mm?”

“You care about Sirius, right?”

“Like my own brother," James supplied, before furrowing his thick brows furrowed together in question. "Why? Is something the matter with him?”

“No, sorry. I was only thinking about something he said earlier.”

“Which was what?”

Remus bit his lip. “Prongs, do you believe in keeping secrets?”

“Depends. In third year Simeon tried to convince all of us that babies came from space. Said it was a secret only adults knew."

"Did you believe him?"

"Only for a few years." James smiled, and tilted his head. “Has something happened, Moony?”

“No… not really.”

"Would you tell me if it had?"

Remus took a deep breath, straightening his back and giving James his best Janus-faced smile. “I’m fine, Prongs. Don’t worry about me. Just got caught up thinking about how it’s gonna feel not being with the guys for Christmas.”

"You mean your Tom friend and them."

"Yeah..."

“Well, don’t be too sad, you've got us to keep you company after all. And if you’re really missing the ambience, we can just set something on fire. Like a rubbish bin. S’long as it’s outside, of course. Mum would have a fit otherwise.”

Remus smiled, despite himself. “Thanks, Prongs. You’re a real mate.”

James set a hand on his shoulder, squeezing it kindly. “Anything for the world's most dangerous Marauder.”

* * *

It wasn’t always hard. Sometimes imagining a life with Sirius was easy.

“Plants! We should get loads of plants. Big ones! The kind that climb right up to the ceiling and ruin all the walls.”

“Do you even know how to take care of a plant?”

Sirius would smile. “Can’t be any harder than taking care of you.”

And Remus would melt, just a little bit. “In that case we’d need a lot of light.”

“Yes!” Sirius agreed. “We’ll find a place with big windows—or maybe a skylight. They have those in London, yeah? And your books can go there!” He swept an arm out, toward whatever imaginary wall he was picturing. “We’d have to display my records too of course. Find a great set up for the stereo. Think we could build one?”

“You and me? Not likely. But we could hang a photo of Mick Jagger over the dining room table.”

“And Hendrix in the toilet, with a claw-footed tub!”

“Isn’t that a little tacky?”

“Of course, but who’s ever lost out to a little bit of ‘tack’?”

Remus chuckled to himself, the feeling of Sirius’ hands curling into his hair. It was a Thursday and nothing exceptional spectacular had happened, but somehow, it felt like they were the only two people in the entire world. Like Sunday.

“How ‘bout Clapham?” Sirius whispered later that night, after he’d snuck into Remus’ bed. They were so close, Remus could feel the tip of Sirius’ nose brushing against his own.

“Sure, if you like being knifed on your way home,” he murmured back, only half lying.

“How stirring. I hear Hyde Park is nice in the winter, maybe we should look for a place with a view.”

A sudden snore cut across the room. Peter.

“Ngh… no, James… you’ll set off the burrito trap early… not enough… nghh… salsa…”

Sirius snorted into his hand, then; “We’re totally gonna be stuck with these tossers forever.”

“Yeah,” Remus murmured. “But a view would be nice.”

As their friend’s breathing evened out, Sirius drew a finger up the side of Remus’ cheek, tracing the shape of him. “I am going to buy so many shitty leather jackets.”

“Mm…” Remus kissed his finger. “And what else?”

“A new pair of Doc Martens.”

“Yeah?”

“Mhm. And then I’m going to beat the shit out of them for no reason at all. We’ll get you some new trainers too. Like those red Chucks we saw in Camden.”

“You want to dress me up?”

“Ha. If I had it my way you’d be naked all hours.” Sirius smirked devilishly in the dark. “Also, m'gonna buy a motorbike and use it to wake up all our neighbours when we come ripping home from a show at the crack of dawn.”

“Just don’t come to me with any injuries. Blisters or otherwise.”

“You mean you wouldn’t want to nurse my wounds? What happened—"

"Shhh!"

Sirius laughed noiselessly. "What happened to that dashing Moony in the bathroom—the one who bandaged all my wounds for me?"

“He found some sense. I think I baby you too much, Padfoot.”

“You never know, maybe I’d like being babied by my baby.”

They kissed, and when they were tired, they slept. Or, Sirius slept. For Remus, sleep still felt impossible. He couldn’t decide if he were up or down. These moments with Sirius made him feel up, but the uncertainty of each day and night wore on him, and it wasn’t just because of exams.

It felt good that Sirius wasn’t retreating from him at least. After their talk, Remus had been afraid that he’d shut him out, but whether it be because he had real faith in him, or because he couldn’t stand the quiet, Sirius remained familiar. There were no cold-shoulders—no resentment—and eventually Remus was able to relax a little. There were things to look forward to during the holiday, after all. The two and a half weeks at Potter Cottage were sure to be warm and friendly and genuine, but there was no astronomy tower in East Finchley, and James had a big family. If the rumours were to be believed, then even the hall cupboard would be packed with a cousin or two. Sirius had his own bedroom at the Potters now, but that would be given up for Lily and the room Remus had stayed in was being occupied by Effie's great aunt Binita. The woman was apparently a hundred and two and slept with the fireplace raging even during dead summer.

“So you two are gonna be bunking with me,” James offered kindly, as they continued going over plans for the trip home. Peter still had maths to revise for and therefore was missing, but Lily had completed their humble group of four in his honour. With her in tow, they'd met up in the Godric common room, as Remus had started running a fever and didn't much feel like leaving the dorm.

“Dad’s still got the old cots we used for camping, so at least you won’t be on the floor," James continued. "Might just have to wipe the dust off."

“Oh sure, we get it. We’ll be on the cot in Potter’s room,” Sirius said snidely, elbowing Remus with a suggestive wink. "We don't mind a little camping do we, Lupin?"

“What are you on about now?” Lily asked with a tone of annoyance.

“Nothing—Lupin and I will be totally bunking with Potter. Goooooot it.”

James’ eyes shot wide while Lily’s cheeks burned. “If Mum catches Lily and me in the same room she’ll hang me on the wall like mistletoe.”

“Oh? How nice. I hear mistletoe’s good for snogging.”

Lily moaned. “You’re horrible.”

Sirius winked in Remus’ direction again, while Remus just sipped his tea. He wasn’t about to fight it—if James and Lily caved then it meant they’d get a room to themselves for an entire holiday. He just hoped the door had a lock.

“Don’t pretend you’re not excited, Evans,” Sirius started up again.

“Of course I’m excited, it’s Christmas.” Lily pushed her hair from her face, looking haughty. “And it’s the first time I’m spending the holiday away from home. You should’ve heard the fit Pet threw. Mum and Dad never let her stay away for so long when she was our age.”

“The woes of being an older sibling,” Sirius sighed. "You young'uns have no idea how easy you've got it."

"Does this mean you've talked to Reg again then?" James asked gingerly.

"You mean since you pulled that little saviour stunt of yours? No, as a matter of fact, I haven't. I mean, did you really think that the tosser was gonna give me the time of day twice in one week?"

Sniffling slightly, Remus leaned in, getting the feeling that he was somehow out of the loop. "I don't understand, you mean you actually talked to Regulus?"

"Aren't you listening? I said I tried. If the little git doesn't want to talk to me, it's on him."

"What did you say?"

Sirius rolled his eyes. "Ask Potter. Practically breathing down my neck, he was."

"Only because you refused to do it on your own," James rebuffed. "I just thought it would be nice to tell Reg our plans. See if he'd like to... y'know, tag along. It was only to be nice, of course!"

"That was nice of you," Lily agreed. "Pet and I don't always get along, but I would hate going home without her. It wouldn't feel like Christmas with one of us missing."

Sirius thumped his palm against the common room table. "Thanks for that stirring addition, Evans, but my brother took one look our way and told us to fuck off. Little Reg would rather swallow his own tongue than follow us back to Potter's, and I say, more power to him. Maybe now he'll finally get to be the only child he's always dreamed of being, ha!" He looked at Remus then, probably expecting a smile, and when he didn't get one, Sirius straightened up in his chair with an air of dismissal.

"No matter. This is still going to be a great holiday. Family be damned."

"Don't jinx us now, mate," James said. "Still got a few exams left."

"No, it is," Sirius insisted; "I can feel it."

It didn't seem like an intentional jab, but Sirius' remark had gauged a deep crevice into Remus' confidence. He didn't think Sirius would offer him an ultimatum, Either you tell them or I will; but the only other alternatives he could think of were breaking up or living a lie, and he didn't want that either. So, Remus sought the advice of the only person he could think of.

His ex-girlfriend.

"No, I haven't told anyone else aside from you and Sirius," Marlene said, when he'd asked a day later. They were alone together on a bench outside the cafeteria, the snow-covered lawns stretching out in front of them like shimmering fields of ice and crystal. Sometime near the middle of exam week, Remus' light malady had mutated into a persistent cold. He felt gross, but apparently wasn't beyond the realm of snoggability quite yet. Sirius still laid with him every night, dreaming of their imaginary flat. Those moments were easy, it was the days that sucked.

"It's just me and Nicole," Marlene went on, breath coming out in a haze; "And Chastity, I suppose, but she ain't likely to tell anyone. She's back to dating Tristan Thomas now anyway."

"You've thought about telling the girls though, right?" Remus said, coughing into his elbow. "Or even just… I don't know, Mary?"

“Well fuck, of course I’ve thought about it, but am I gonna say anything? Not a chance. Not now anyway.”

“Why not? Are you still afraid of how they’d react?”

Marlene covered her face with her hands. “Remus, I’m sorry, but I really can’t talk about this right now. Not right before we go home.”

“Oh.” He tucked his hands into either armpit. “Right. Sorry…”

There was a sigh, and then Marlene was looking at him sadly. “Things are more complicated than just telling people, I think,” she said. “It's hard not to wonder who they might tell. And I... Well, things feel a bit different now. Like, I can’t imagine myself with a man anymore."

"Really?"

She shook her head. "I’ve tried. It was easier when I was a kid, but now we're more grown and—"

"Sirius said the same thing..."

"He understands."

And I must not then, Remus thought bitterly.

"When we dated," Marlene started, "I thought it might work out with you. That I could like you the way I like girls, but it just didn’t end up like that. And I’m not sure how to tell people that without making it sound like I’ve changed. It’s like, I’m still me, I’ve just… grown up some.”

Remus nodded, and Marlene slid her hand along the bench in offer. He took it, and squeezed her gloved fingers.

“There’s something else, isn’t there?” She asked timidly. “Is it Sirius then? Has he said something?”

It was as though a breath had turned to ice and lodged itself in his throat. Remus coughed again, trying to clear it away, but the sob built up and up until his eyes were pricked with tears.

“I like him so much, Cherry,” he swore, “but what if I’m wrong about all this?”

“What do you mean, love? Are you thinking that maybe you don’t like guys after all?”

He hung his head. “No—I know I like guys, but Sirius, he—he’s so sure. So sure about everything! … What if I’m just dragging him along behind me?”

Marlene sighed and leaned into his shoulder, hugging him tightly. “You gotta talk to him, Rem. Before you implode.”

He wondered how to tell her that talking was the very problem. They talked so much that they just ended up going in circles. He didn’t want to be angry with Sirius for doing something that he needed so desperately, but he couldn’t help but feel like Sirius was leaving him behind. Remus wished he had Tomny to talk to, or even Tonya, who he’d sparsely thought of in recent months, but both were miles away, and he wasn’t sure he could stomach the conversation over the phone. So rather than talk, he did the next most impulsive thing he could think of. The first chance he had alone with Sirius, Remus initiated one of the most intense snogging sessions they’d ever had.

Sirius was more than surprised—they were in the corner stacks of the library, barely out of sight—but he never pushed him away, and Remus just kept up. If he couldn’t say the words, then maybe there was a chance he could make Sirius understand with his actions.

Every moment they had alone together following his and Marlene’s conversation were spent snogging; holding each other up against the first available surface and doing just about anything time would allow. They had more close-calls during this short whirlwind of affection than ever before, but a desperate sense of recklessness had already taken over. It was as though he had to prove that their relationship was worth having even if no one else knew about it—because it was the only thing that made sense. But if Remus had been allowed a shred of omniscience, he would have seen himself spiralling, and might have had the time to realise that the faster he fell, the harder the crash back to earth would be.

“Remus?”

He lifted his chin from the top of his guitar case to find Sheila walking toward him down the hallway, her heeled Beatle boots clicking on the tile. They’d finished their music exam ages ago, but Remus had stuck around, telling the other Marauders he had prefect duty. He didn’t really, he just wanted to be alone for a while.

“What are you doing here?” She asked, stopping beside him. “Shouldn’t you be at supper?”

“Wasn’t feeling very hungry.”

Sheila glanced at the wall across from them—at her and Hope’s photograph. She sighed a little, and it was almost wistful.

“Come with me then, hey?” She nudged his arm fondly. “We’ll have some tea.”

He followed her back to the room, but rather than make them sit in the tiny office, Sheila poured him a cuppa and together they set up along the orchestra risers. As he waited, Remus thought of the exam. James had done brilliantly on his recital, although he’d been quite worried about his results of the written component afterwards. Peter had done less spectacular during the practical, but scored near top of the class on the written. And of course Sirius had breezed through it all.

“You’re the same age now as we were then, in that old photo,” Sheila recalled, as she handed Remus his cup and came to join him on the risers. She was wearing a flowery white blouse tucked into red gingham slacks—quite tame for her, all things considering—but she’d made sure to match the red to her hair scarf. The entire ensemble made Remus think she looked a bit like Audrey Hepburn.

“Funny how people age and photos don’t,” he answered blithely, sipping his tea. Sheila eyed him, but only stirred hers with a spoon.

“I thought you were wonderful during your mock-recital today. You’re really starting to get to know your way around that bass. Have you given any thought to trying out a different instrument?”

“Guitar,” Remus said quickly. “I’m learning a bit of guitar.”

“Oh?”

Before he could stop her, Sheila was up and moving again. She quickly zipped across the room to her office, and after a short clatter, reemerged with an instrument case in hand.

“Might need a bit of a tune-up, but she’s a personal favourite,” she said, setting it down in front of Remus. The case itself was worn—smoothed over by years of love and use—but when he flipped the snaps up and lifted the lid, what was inside took his breath away. It was a Martin acoustic guitar in pristine condition, made of a rich mahogany colour and polished to a shine. Bob Dylan played guitars like this. David Gilmore. Eric Clapton. Legends.

“Go on then,” Sheila prodded. “Show me what you’ve got.”

He didn’t have much, but the instrument was too beautiful to keep in its case. Remus withdrew it carefully, quickly tuning each string while Sheila watched, her chin balanced on one hand.

“I’m not gonna sing or anything,” Remus warned.

“Oh no, never,” she smirked. “Know any scales?”

“Yeah.”

“Alright, give us a C major then.”

He did as she asked, and with no mistakes to boot. Pleased, Remus glanced up and Sheila nodded.

“Good! Now D minor?”

He knew that one too. Apparently there was a point in practice. Take that Sirius.

“That’s brilliant, Remus, just watch out for that pinky… Can you show me any more?”

“Uh… E major, maybe?”

She gestured for him to go on, and Remus looked back down at the guitar but this time as he set his fingers to the keys, he messed up.

“That’s alright, try it again,” Sheila encouraged. He did so, and she nodded him on. “Faster.”

So, Remus went faster.

“Again. Faster.”

He went faster.

“Faster!”

On his third loop around, Remus’ index finger slipped, creating a loud thwang! that had them both wincing and laughing.

“I’d say that’s pretty good for a beginner,” Sheila mused, before holding her hands out. “May I?”

He passed the guitar back, and Sheila kicked one leg up over the other. She found herself in the strings quickly, and the next thing Remus knew, she was singing.

“ ‘Don’t it always seem to go, that you don’t know what you got ‘til it’s gone—paved paradise and put up a parking lot…’”

She kept playing, mostly humming and poking fun at the melody, and finally Sheila clapped her hand over the strings and grinned.

“Admittedly, I’m not much of a singer. Your mum was leagues better than I ever was. She used to be able to—as they say—charm the birds from their trees.”

Remus dropped his gaze to the guitar, and Sheila must’ve caught it, because she handed the instrument back for him to pluck at.

“I hear you don’t have much in the way of plans for university?” Sheila prodded. When he raised a brow, she shrugged innocently. “We teachers do talk to one another, you know.”

“I suppose you’re going to try and talk me into applying then?”

“No, not really. The world's too vast to be hung up on institutions forever. And I knew your mum, and she had no real desire to go to school either. At least not the traditional sort.”

She uncrossed and then recrossed her legs, and when Remus said nothing, seemed to take his silence as permission to continue;

“Hope only wanted to play piano. She would’ve played it from dawn until dusk if you’d have let her—even had a dream of doing it professionally. But when her parents suggested she get married, she gave it up.”

Because he was surprised, Remus finally asked; “Couldn’t she have been married and also followed her dream?”

“That was her plan actually. She’d even accepted a seat in a top conservatory to begin training, but in the end she backed out.”

“Why?”

“Because she found out she was pregnant.”

Remus didn’t even have it in him to be shocked. He simply clutched the guitar’s neck more tightly, glaring down at the floor.

“So what—she couldn’t have a dream because she had me instead?”

“What? Oh no. Remus, please don't think..." Sheila sighed, then leaned forward to look him in the eye. “You've misunderstood me. Hope loved you, Remus, truly. There was only one thing in the entire world she wanted more than music.”

“And what was that?” He asked miserably.

“To be a mum.”

Remus could’ve clawed his own eyes out. They betrayed him—instantly burning with seventeen years worth of unwept tears. If Hope Lupin had wanted to be a mother so badly, then why hadn’t she stuck around long enough to do it?

“Don’t you see, Remus?” Sheila said. “You were her dream come true.”

* * *

Friday 17th December 1977

It was with great reluctance that Remus phoned home. He’d waited until the second-to-last day of term to do it, and although Effie had been so kind to pre-arrange everything with Giles herself, Remus still figured he owed it to the old man to let him know his plans.

“I should tan your hide,” Giles’ stern voice rumbled through the phone. It was morning and Remus was god-awful tired, but he always enjoyed their friendly back and forth.

“Think you can reach it from London?”

“I see you haven’t lost any ‘a that sass… How did your exams go?”

“They were only mocks.”

“And?”

“And they went great, thank you."

“Great? Not just ‘fine’?”

“I could just hang up, you know.”

Giles chuckled, and somehow Remus found the sound soothing. He wouldn’t have said so—that’d be embarrassing—but either way the chance was taken from him when his body was suddenly wracked with coughs.

“Blimey, you alright, son?”

“Yeah,” Remus wheezed. “Just a cold. I’ll get over it. But I was calling to tell you that I’m gonna stay at James’ for the holiday.”

“And you're just telling me this now?"

"Does that mean I can't?"

A gruff sigh. "You sure you’re feeling up to it?”

“Mhm.” He couldn’t stand being home anyway. Not now. Not after Sirius and Sheila and… fuck.

“Alright,” Giles said, “but you should come home at least once. See the dogs, have a meal or two. Your father and Sandra have already left for the Riviera. It’ll just be the two of us—and the lasses in the kitchen, if you’re lucky.”

“I dunno. You might ask me more questions about school, and—eugh—university.”

“Promise I won’t.”

Remus smiled, wiping his sleeve beneath his nose. “I’ll phone ya. Swear.”

“I still get to be the one to pick you up from the station, right?”

“Wouldn’t have it any other way, Gil.”

Another chuckle, and then Giles grimaced. “Ugh. This damn heartburn. Doc says I’m not allowed to eat fatty foods anymore. No more steak or bacon, can you believe it? Dunno what he’s on about—I’m as healthy as a horse.”

“A forty year-old horse, maybe.”

“Exactly! Not a day over forty—it’s what I keep telling him.” Giles gave a laugh that descended into another bout of hawking. Remus supposed it made them both disgusting and ill.

“Oh!” Giles said suddenly; “Reminds me, I found some old trunk in your room the other day. White outside, brass handles, practically falling apart—sound familiar?”

Remus let out a breath. Hope’s trunk. He hadn’t brought it that term. Ever since blending his records in with Sirius’ collection, there’d been no need.

“Yeah. S’just an old thing. You can get rid of it.”

“You sure?"

"Yeah, don't use it anymore anyway."

"Understood. Now you enjoy that ride home tomorrow. I’ll be there to pick you up when you and those lads ‘a yours arrive.”

“Kay. I should go anyway, I’ve got prefect stuff.”

“ ‘Prefect stuff’? Oh, if only that therapist ‘a mine could see you now.”

“Shove off. As if you have a therapist.”

They said their goodbyes then, and Remus hung up, immediately bursting into another coughing fit that left his entire chest sore. It’d started with the fevers, then a runny nose, and now this. At least Sirius hadn’t seemed to catch it. A miracle, considering how often they’d been snogging lately.

But there wasn’t time to be sick, he was going home tomorrow, and today... Well, today he had a prefect partner to contend with. If being with Sirius was like plunging down on a never-ending rollercoaster, then trying to navigate Regulus Black was like trying to climb a mountain with no peak. Sirius was never silent, he was loud and obnoxious and gloriously free. But Regulus was none of those things. In the beginning Remus had just thought him quiet—quiet and bitter and unwilling to change. But he knew better now. He knew that silent and quiet were not mirror images of each other. Instead they were two sides to the same coin; you could be silent, or you could be quiet. Sirius was never quiet, but he could be deafeningly silent. He could be that kind of silence that seemed to say all the things words couldn’t. And it occurred to Remus, as the two of them were cleaning up after the Hawkings staff holiday party, that Regulus Black had his own iteration of silence as well. He hadn’t tried snapping at him for the amount of mop suds Remus was dripping across the floor, and neither had he made any sarcastic remarks about the festive decor or the small collection of liquor bottles someone had tried to hide at the bottom of the rubbish bins. He was simply withdrawn, moving about the room like a ghost.

“So, how’d the fifth years' little concert go?” Remus asked finally, desperate to fill the emptiness. “Sorry I couldn’t make it—had a history exam.”

Regulus dropped a tray of half-eaten fruit cake into a large rubbish bin. “It went fine,” he said numbly. “They got through most of the song at least.”

“Oh, that’s—well, that’s great.”

“Mm.”

Remus stretched awkwardly. “The kids—they’ve really started to like you, hey?”

“If you say so.”

“Charlotte clings to you.”

“She just likes the violin.”

“She called you magnificent three times the last time we were there. Said your playing was ‘really-super-uber good’.”

Regulus kept his back to him, slowly collecting the last of the paper plates and throwing them in the bin, and Remus felt defeat wash over him like a wave. He and Regulus may have managed to put their general differences behind them to get through their prefect duties, but they were far from friends. Perhaps he was expecting too much.

Sighing, Remus turned back to his mop.

“They asked me if we’d do it again next term,” Regulus said suddenly.

Remus’ head snapped up. Regulus wasn’t looking at him, but he’d turned, clutching a small tower of styrofoam cups in his hands.

“You mean like keep teaching the kids?”

“Yeah, but only a few times a month.” Regulus tossed the rubbish in the bin. “It was Buchanan’s idea. She—er—she came to see the show."

It was unlike Regulus to stumble with his words. It made him sound more his age—more human, perhaps. It made Remus soften.

"I hope you said yes. We still haven't gotten to 'Für Elise' after all."

There was that fleeting smile again. It graced Regulus' mouth—so like Sirius' mouth—but was gone a moment later as he turned his gaze to the window. He looked forlorn; tired. Sirius had always looked the same way right before leaving school. There had be an alternative.

"Hey Regulus, have you ever given any thought to staying at school for Christmas?"

"Why would I do that?" Regulus retorted sharply.

"Lots of people stay over the holidays. Mostly to study, but... You just seem like like something's bothering you."

"That's none of your business, is it?"

Remus sighed awkwardly. "Well, do you really want to go home? I know Sirius talked to you and all but—"

"Please, not that again. You and your incessant obsession with my brother is really starting to wear on me."

Temper momentarily ignited by the quick dismissal, Remus threw the mop to the ground—creating a clatter so spectacular that Regulus jumped and turned around again.

"You didn't answer my question," he said sternly.

"I never agreed to answer your bloody question!"

"So you're a coward then?"

"Why don't you just fuck off, Lupin?!"

Remus mentally punched himself. "I didn't mean it like that. I just meant to say that you don't have to go back if you don't want to. There are things you could do instead."

"Such as following somebody home like some stray? Follow you? Sorry to say that not all of us are blessed with our own personal delinquent."

“Does that mean you actually want to go back there, to the ‘Ancient and Most bloody-fucking noble House of Black’? All by yourself?”

“What else am I supposed to do? It’s home.”

The answer told Remus everything he needed to know. Slowly he picked up the mop, clutching it with both hands. “My house never felt like home,” he said plainly. “Never. I don’t think I even knew what ‘home’ was supposed to feel like until I left. And I may not know much, but what I do know is that home isn’t where other people say it is. Home is the one place you can be yourself. A front door and a bedroom don’t give you that—people do. People you love.”

“Love? Is that what you told my brother to get him to leave?”

The accusation rocked him to his very core. “Regulus, I didn't do anything! Your parents sent Sirius to Belgium. He had to run away from another fucking country! He didn’t—He didn’t leave you!”

“You don’t know anything!”

“Then try explaining it to me!”

“It’s so easy for him!”

“What’s easy?”

“Everything!” Regulus shouted. “He has everything! Everything comes to him with such ease—it’s damning! What with his friends and his talent and marks and even that fucking boyfriend and—”

Regulus froze instantly, eyes boring into the floor tiles as though he were searching for a way to take the words back. It was regret on his face, clear as day, and Remus could hardly believe it.

“The what…?”

Regulus visibly paled, and Remus knew the look. Like he'd said something he shouldn't have.

“Forget it. This is stupid. Let’s just finish this and be done with it.” Regulus spun around, looking for something else to clean, but the tables were clear, the chairs stacked. There wasn’t so much as a piece of tinsel left to distract him, and so he began ringing his hands, looking back and forth as though he were craving another distraction. Remus wouldn't give it to him.

“Regulus, do you mean…?” Miles. The name hung in the air like a storm cloud, and afterwards Regulus dipped his head, squeezing his shoulders in very tightly as though he could make himself disappear.

“Of course he told you…”

“How do you know about that?” Remus demanded, even more firmly this time. There was a short silence, but finally Regulus set both hands on the table before him, spreading his fingers as though he were grounding himself. When he began his confession, he seemed to Remus small and frail.

“He… He was always getting these letters when we were at home. He never let me read them, of course, but I knew he was sneaking them in. So one day I waited for the kid that was always bringing the post and I... Well, I fucking took them. Then I made him swear he wouldn’t tell Sirius, said I would rat him out to our mother—get him fired. I had no idea when I opened it that he was… well.” Another pregnant pause, and this time Remus caught the flash of Regulus’ shoulders as they trembled. “I knew what she would do if she found it, so I burned it. I never snooped again, I swear.”

Remus swallowed thickly, looking at the ground. “And Sirius, does he…”

“Know it was me? Of course not. And I never told anyone either. They’d have disowned him ages ago if they did.”

“And what—you didn’t want that?”

Regulus whipped around, a look of excruciating hurt across his face. “Why would I want that?”

“I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to—”

“I know how you all think of me. That I’m just some carbon copy of everything Sirius hates. That I’m the worst of him.”

“Reg—I–I mean, Regulus, no—no, we don’t think that.”

“He does. But I guess it doesn’t matter now anyway. He’s got a new family… And a new boyfriend.”

Remus felt his blood run cold. Suddenly he couldn’t see Regulus at all. It was just that dark pit, with endless mud clinging to ever inch of him —burying him. Blocking out the stars.

"… How did you find out?"

"Figured it out myself. Wasn't that hard, once I started paying attention."

He might vomit. He would vomit. The room was spinning.

"Regulus—"

"Just stop, Lupin. I've had enough. He's left and that's that. But I'm tired now, and I'd like you to go. You can just leave the mop. And don't worry, I'm not going to tell anyone. There's no one left to tell anyway."

Remus didn't have any words left to argue with. He retreated quickly, setting the mop back into its bucket and snatching up his coat. As he did, a small rattle echoed from the pocket and Remus was suddenly reminded of what was inside. With shaky fingers, he reached inside and withdrew a small 8-track tape of Miles Davis' greatest hits.

"Happy Christmas, Regulus," Remus murmured, leaving it on one of the tables on his way out.

* * *

Later that night, as he was lying in his bed and wheezing from shortness of breath, Remus added Regulus Black to his list of things he was trying not to think about. It was getting rather long now; Hope, Lyall, Sirius, Tonya leaving, Tomny stuck in the End, Sirius, addict Lee and his dead brother, Sirius, his marks, the band, London, Sirius—all the usual stuff. Regulus was an unwelcome addition, but an addition none the less.

He managed to push the list of worries away long enough to make it through the following morning, where he and his friends all rushed about, furiously packing and chittering over the things they were most excited to do over Christmas. James wanted to take Lily ice skating and to see the lights in Hyde Park. Peter was looking forward to practising on his own set of drums back home and had agreed to go see a stage show with Moira, who would be in London visiting extended family. Marlene was going to be spending every other evening volunteering in a soup kitchen. She kept talking about some film she was excited to see called Star Wars, but Remus thought snidely that the plot sounded rather ridiculous and long-winded. She'd gotten Mary to agree to go with her though, provided she concede to several days worth of shopping around Carnaby and Oxford Street.

Remus had made no plans. Nor had he called Tomny. He'd been too busy, and now was simply content enough to just let things fall into place. If the others' busy schedules meant he and Sirius had the time to sneak out and catch a show themselves, that was just fine by him. He didn't want to think about New Years.

With their things all packed and ready, they met up with the girls and made their way down to the dining hall for supper. The tables were packed, it being their last night, and the food was already getting cold, but his friends were determined to put on a show. They'd come up with the idea the day before, and though Remus had never really really been one for Christmas carols, none of them seemed all that deterred.

"On the seventh day of Christmas, my true love gave to meeee!" Lottie sang; "Seven Lily's fretting!"

"Six of Mary's exes!" Lily chanted.

"Five failed math tests!" Mary keened.

"Four tea sugars!" Peter cried.

"Three boring swots!" Marlene trilled.

"Two stinky trainers!" James crooned.

"And a Moony in a really bad moooood!" Sirius wailed.

It was brilliant and horrible all at once—brilliantly horrible! They went on down the line like lunatics, all seven of them screaming out in the middle of the dining hall and practically forcing other kids to join in. Remus might've felt more left out, had they not dedicated the song to him in the first place.

"Do we really have to do this twelve times?" He demanded.

" 'YES'!" They all shouted back, before starting up again. On and on it went, until they reached the final day, all nearly out of breath.

"On the twelfth day of Christmas, my true love gave to meeee—twelve drug dealers!"

"Eleven busted lighters!"

“Ten damn detentions!”

“Nine girls I fancy!”

“Eight pissed off teachers!”

“Seven Lily’s fretting!”

“Six of Mary’s exes!”

“Five failed math tests!”

“Four tea sugars!”

“Three boring swots!”

“Two stinky trainers!”

“AND A MOONY IN A REALLLLYYY BAAAAAD MOOOOOOD!”

He let them finish and then clapped begrudgingly along with the rest of the room. A few of the lunch ladies even cheered for them and there was some whistling, but Remus just shook his head in disbelief until the clamour finally died down. He glanced around for Regulus, wondering what he might’ve thought about the whole thing, but did not find him at his usual table. It worried him enough to make his stomach twinge.

“Well?” James cried. “What’d you think?!”

“Why you would want any of those things for Christmas, is beyond me.”

“Yes, but did you like it though?” Lily asked, still breathless.

“ ‘Like’ is a subjective term.”

“What an ungrateful bastard!” Marlene snorted from her seat next to him. She poked him in the arm with the end of her fork and he flicked a carrot at her.

“Come now, no need for that, Macdonald. Everyone knows it's only a defence technique,” Sirius said from across from them. “He’s so humbled by our amazing singing that he doesn’t know what to do with himself, so he resorts to half-assed quips and sarcasm.”

“Cheers to that,” Mary said, raising her glass. As his friends shared in a toast, Remus joined in too, though rather unenthusiastically. He'd sat across from Sirius on purpose, hoping that a lack of closeness would deter him from his relentless thoughts. Rather, all it'd done was make things worse. His boyfriend was a few precious feet away, beaming with the excitement and thought of returning to London the next morning, and all Remus could see was Regulus' face, impressed onto his brother's with that same expression of calm worry. He knew Regulus didn't want to return home—he saw it in the soft moon-grey of his eyes. But either out of reluctance or fear, the proud Black son would not admit it.

And then there was the fact that Regulus knew everything.

He knew.

Unable to stop thinking about it, Remus kept going back and forth over whether he should tell Sirius. On the one hand, Sirius might be able to do something if he could only see the camaraderie of it. Regulus had kept their secret after all. Maybe he could use it as a launching point—offer his brother a real way out like James had done for him and ensure his silence by way of ally-ship. But Remus knew better; the chances of the two brothers reconciling before their departure time on Saturday morning were rather slim. And besides, he wasn't sure it was entirely fair to ask Sirius in the first place. Why should he have to feel guilty over the fact that he was finally free to do as he pleased with his chosen family while Regulus had to return home to the one they'd been left with? Sirius had done his time—dealt with the consequences—and when push came to shove he'd defended Regulus. He'd gotten scars doing it.

Did Regulus not defend him also? He burnt that letter. It must count for something.

So formal, the voice had become. Remus almost missed the crudeness.

Get fucked.

That was more like it.

Do you even believe in karma? You called Regulus the coward, but the only real coward here is you. Not telling anyone is as good as hurting him yourself.

You're wrong, he thought after. I'm not Regulus' keeper, and he doesn't want me to be.

No, I'm exactly right. You're always sticking your nose in where it don't belong but then as soon as you hear something you don't like you piss off. You just don't want to feel what they feel. This is exactly what Lyall was talking about. You're selfish. You're a brat. You. Don't. Care.

I care about Sirius! He doesn't owe anybody anything! And if I push Regulus anymore than this he could tell people! We'd be ruined.

Nah, if you really cared, you'd tell Sirius the truth. You could help Regulus. You're hiding it because you're a coward.

Shut up! I've enough to deal with without you butting in too.

Telling your own brain to shut up. You are loony.

"Moony, earth to Moony?" James said from his other side. "You good, mate? "

"Yeah," Remus croaked, shaking off the unease.

"We should've called you 'Moony' because you're always drifting off into space," the dark-haired boy chuckled, before dropping into a whisper; "So what d'you think, should we play the tape for Lily tonight?"

"Er—I thought you were gonna give it to her on Christmas?"

"Well yeah, but then I thought it might be nice to play it with all of us together. You definitely gotta be there at least. What—bad idea?"

Remus shook his head. "I'm sure the others will want to hear. And I know you just wanna show off."

James grinned guiltily. "You should be a cop. You always know what people are thinking."

Remus wished it were true. Maybe then he could tell Sirius with utmost confidence that Regulus truly needed his help. Without it, he was just banking on pure intuition, and he'd been plenty wrong before.

"Alright, alright, finally the moment you've all been waiting for!" Marlene declared, hopping up from her seat. She whipped out a piece of paper and cleared her throat formally. "I've collected the petitions and totalled up all the signatures, and I'm proud to announce that we finally have a winner for our battle for gender equality!"

"Who?!" Mary and Sirius demanded.

"First... Drumroll please!"

They all started hammering their hands on the tabletop, filling the room with commotion.

“And the winner is... No one—it’s a tie!”

They all baulked for a moment and Sirius leaned in. “Between who?!”

“Lottie and Remus!”

James reached over and clapped an arm around Remus’ shoulder. “Way to go, Moons!”

“How?” Lily demanded. “I mean, Remus I get—practically had an entire army of eighth year girls behind him, but Lottie?! You didn’t pass out a single petition!”

“Not at Hawkings she didn’t,” Marlene grinned.

“I just mentioned to Clyde that it might be cool if he took Marlene’s little appeal around the village a little,” Lottie shrugged. “For tiny townsfolk they’re really quite progressive.”

“You’re still seeing him?” Peter gaped.

“We meet for tea on occasion.”

“I can’t fucking believe it,” Sirius said, sounding genuinely impressed. “Only you, Lot.”

She blew him a kiss as Mary leaned across the table. “Wait, does this mean they both get a lap dance?”

As tempted as Lottie seemed to be by the idea, they did not all break out into a suggestive caper at the cafeteria table. Remus still couldn’t look Sirius in the eye as they made their way back to the dorm, but he blamed it on his fatigue.

“I still think you should let Ms. Pomfrey take a look at you,” Lily was telling him. “It’s been days—that’s far too long. If your fevers still haven’t gone away it could mean an infection. You could get sepsis.”

Remus shook his head, burying his face in his muffler and trying not to slip on the icy path. “S’fine. It’s just a cold, it’ll go away.”

“You should at least lie down,” James said. “ ‘Pops’ isn’t even on until seven anyway.”

That he could agree to. Casting a rueful glance at Sirius’ back, he decided he needed a break anyway, and some time alone in the dorm room would be a welcome relief.

You’re selfish and vile.

Piss off, he told the voice.

When they got back to Godric, all of his friends peeled off their winter kits and shuffled into the warm common room while Remus excused himself. Sirius, not one to just accept and move on, stopped him by the stairs.

“Are you really not feeling well? ‘Cause I could—”

“Nah, go on. I’m just gonna lie down for a bit. Maybe take a bath.”

“Okay, I’ll come get you when the show starts.”

Checking to make sure they were alone, Sirius quickly kissed him before slipping away. With him gone, Remus made the climb to the fourth floor alone where he peeled off his clothes. Too tired for a bath, he took a damp towel to the winter sweat clinging to his neck and torso and collapsed into bed instead. Not long after his teeth began to chitter with fever and he drew the covers up to his nose to ward off the chill. He wasn’t sure when he’d fallen asleep, but when he awoke he was slick with sweat again. A quick glance at the clock told him that seven had come and gone, leaving him even more lightheaded and exhausted than he’d been before his nap.

“Feeling any better?” Sirius asked, making Remus jump. He was lounging back on his own bed across from him, a piece of paper in front of his nose, which he set aside as Remus blinked awake.

“You were supposed to wake me up," Remus said. He sat up, clutching his forehead as all the blood rushed to it. "What happened with the show?

“Didn’t want to wake you. You didn't miss anything anyway. Biggest name was Wings, but Elton John co-hosted and he wasn’t entirely terrible.”

Remus nodded at the run-down. “What’s the paper for?”

“Oh this?” Sirius drew the paper back from his nightstand, casually fanning himself. It looked like the same one from days before, Remus recognised the crest now. The Blacks. “This is old-hat, my good Moon. Had it for a while now... Just can't seem to get rid of it."

Remus tipped his head in question, and Sirius shrugged haplessly.

“It's a letter from my parents, letting me know that I’ve been officially and forthwith ejected from the Ancient and Most Noble House of Black.”

“You mean—?”

“Yep, arrived on my birthday with the post! Took me several weeks to open it though. Apparently since I’m eighteen now, there’s no more rule saying they have to take care of me. So that's that. I’ve been officially dis-owned. And you know what? Good riddance.” Straightening up, Sirius scrunched the letter into a tight ball and tossed it toward the wastebasket sitting outside the bathroom. The ball bounced off the rim and rolled away, and Sirius clicked his tongue in disappointment.

“He shoots, and he sucks…”

Remus stared at the ball. From his position it was just peeking out from the corner of James’ bed—like a badly hidden secret.

“Sirius, there’s something we should talk about…”

Sirius hopped up from his bed and crossed the room, using the posts of Remus’ bed to swing himself onto its end with a cheeky look. “What’s that—you trying to cash in on that lap dance already? Figured you’d want to wait until you were properly awake, but I might be persuaded.”

“It’s about Regulus.”

“Ha. Good luck getting a lap dance out of him."

“Enough with the bloody lap dance!"

Sirius’ smile vanished. He crossed his arms.

“Fine, since you’re so up in arms already. What's the matter with him then?”

“It’s just—he’s been telling me some things… Or he hasn't, but he's... I think it's bad, Sirius."

"Go on then, don't keep us in suspense."

Remus knotted his fingers together in his lap. He felt a bit woozy, and sticky all over from sweat, and with Sirius looking at him the way he was, he was starting to wonder if bringing Regulus up at all had been a fatal mistake.

"I'm not sure what it is, but I think there's something seriously the matter with him."

Sirius snorted lightly. "Well, that's nothing new. Suspect there's plenty to diagnose, sour as he is."

"He misses you."

"Ha! That's a good one."

"Okay, so he didn't say that exactly, but I can tell that he doesn't want to go home for Christmas."

"Alright, so why's he talking to you about it?"

"Huh?"

"You!" Sirius snapped. "Why's he telling you all this over me?"

"Sirius, this isn't about me. I think you should be the one to talk to him, that's all I'm saying. Make him see that you care. Not—Not take on any extra burdens, just… maybe say something that might comfort him?"

"Reg doesn't talk to me," Sirius scowled. "He won't—I've tried! Little git only turns away when I do."

"What if I were to go with you then? We could head over to Salazar right now. Make him listen!"

"Or what, bury his head in a snowbank? Potter's right—your brain's on the moon, Moons."

Remus resisted the urge to groan. The more he spoke about Regulus, the more urgent everything seemed to feel.

"He needs someone, Sirius."

“What he needs is a therapist. We all do. Forgive me, but I don’t see how this is my problem.”

“It just is! He’s your brother!”

“Yeah? And what has he ever done for me?”

“He kept your secret!”

Sirius drew back like he’d been slapped and Remus snapped his teeth together, forcing a huff out through his nose.

“Regulus knew about you and Miles, Sirius.”

“How?” Sirius’ voice was breathless; staggered with shock. Guilty, Remus dropped his head and stared down at his hands.

“He found one of your letters.”

“You mean he stole it.”

“He was a kid.”

“He’s a liar!”

“Oh come on, Sirius! Stop taking the piss!” Remus reached out to grab him, but Sirius just pulled away. Hurt but undeterred, he plunged on. “He kept your secret for years—didn’t tell a soul!”

“He told you, didn’t he? Was probably cracking up just thinking about it. Me and Miles—hell! Must've been calling us fudge-packers to those fucking friends of his every time we turned around.”

“He didn’t! Literally no one knows! Don’t you think Barty would’ve told the whole world by now if he had? Told everyone about us?”

He realised his mistake a second too late, when Sirius’ eyes shot wide, turning more white than grey.

“You told him about us…?”

“No, he guessed! He guessed because he knew about Miles, I was just trying to reassure him—”

Sirius ripped away, practically falling off the bed in his haste to put as much distance between the two of them as possible.

“WELL, GREAT!” He roared; “AS LONG AS REGGIE’S REASSURED!”

Now he’d done it. How could he be so bad at this? Desperate, Remus threw off the covers and pushed to his feet. He staggered, but Sirius wasn’t about to wait for him to catch up. He had to chase him across the room, and even then Sirius wouldn’t look at him.

“Sirius, I know what it’s like to not feel at home with your family,” he said—begged; “I know what it’s like to—”

“How?” Sirius snarled. “How could you possibly know, huh? You think your dad resents you because—what? You hate going home? Because you’ve got delinquents for friends, and you've been kicked out of a few schools for setting some rubbish bins on fire? You don’t know anything—how could you ever know how this feels?!”

Tell him, the foul voice keened; Tell him right now. Throw it in his spoiled face!

“Sirius, I’m not—”

“I am such an idiot!” Sirius laughed, turning to pace back and forth before James’ bed. “I am so stupid! And to think that I actually thought you were coming around! That you were gonna tell me you were ready! New Years—HA! What fucking rubbish! Thought that maybe—”

“Sirius!”

“—We could finally cut all the bullshit and just start living like everyone else! I–I thought that what with McKinnon knowing—oh! But I should’ve known, really! It figures my own boyfriend would have an easier time talking to my brother about my past relationships than he does talking with me about OUR current one! That—That it’s fine for you to talk to others about us but when I even think about it I’m emotionally crucified—!”

“Sirius, this isn’t fucking about us!”

“Of course it’s about us! It’s about the fucking fact that you can’t admit to yourself what we are—WHO we are—but you’ll just spew whatever convenient bullshit to get my brother on your side!”

“ ‘Side’?! Sirius, what fucking side?”

“Whatever bloody side you’re on! Which clearly ain’t mine! God—I tried to talk myself out of it, you know! Told myself it would be useless to just wait around until you're done bloody denying it!"

"Denying. What."

"Us!" He lashed. "Denying us! You still don't get it—we're not Lily and James, just nervous to tell our friends because it would be a little embarrassing—we're gay! Bent as a nine bob note! A couple 'a fairies lost in the closet!"

"I'm not gay, Sirius!"

"Oh yeah! So you're not gay—whatever! You've still done some pretty gay shit anyway."

It cut—cut like a knife to the bone. And Remus seethed.

"You're not making any sense," he growled. "You're pissed because I'm gay but then not gay enough? Make up your bloody mind!"

"I don't care!" Sirius spun around with a hiss. He was clutching one of the records, arms shaking like he wanted to throw it but couldn't quite bring himself to. "Be whatever you want, but I told you! I refuse to be someone's secret! I won't do it again, not even for you!"

"But before you said—"

"I know what I said! But maybe—just maybe—I want what Lily and James have! Maybe I want all of it—everything! But we can't have everything, can we, Remus?"

"Why do we have to have everything anyway?" Remus whimpered. "Why can't we have this much?"

"Because," Sirius started, his voice deadly low, "because I'm selfish. And when I think of my life, I want everything. I want what everyone else has! I want my love to be painted in the sky—I want a legendary love!"

"You want that more than you want me?"

He could see the way Sirius ground his teeth together, straining the muscles in his neck. Finally, he turned away, pressing both hands on top of his stereo and leaning into it. "Yes, that is what I want," he whispered.

Remus stared after him, aching all over. "But I love you," he said.

“Oh, you love me, really?”

“Don’t say it like that.”

“Like what?”

“Like it’s small… Like it isn’t worth anything.”

“You said it, not me.”

For a split second, Remus forgot himself. It was a vicious anger, one that demanded to be felt, and to drain it all, he turned toward Sirius’ bed and kicked the baseboard so hard, the wood cracked. It might’ve helped him feel less, had Sirius not flinched so badly that he dropped the record. The vinyl disc hit the ground with a clatter, escaping its cover and rolling across the floor to rest by Peter’s bed. Remus stared after it, ashamed.

“Sirius—”

“No. No more.”

“You can’t—” Remus ached. “You fucking… You told me that I was the sky!”

There was a flash of a shiver in Sirius’ shoulders, but he would not look at him. Instead he turned back toward the stereo, one hand clasped to the side of his neck.

“I guess that’s the thing… You never agreed to be my sky.”

At a loss for words, Remus looked blindly toward the bathroom. The distance between them, which while fighting had felt wider than any canyon, suddenly felt too close to breathe. He stumbled toward the doorway but as his hand clasped over the knob he felt the inexplicable feeling of dread wash over him. If he left things as they were now, he was afraid everything really would be over.

“Sirius, please don’t do this—”

There was a sudden knock, and a second later the bedroom door opened and James popped his head inside.

“Everything alright, you two? What was that banging noise?”

It was Sirius who answered first.

“Moony tripped,” he replied coolly. “What’s going on, Potter? Where are the others?”

“Downstairs still,” James said. “We’re finished with cards I think, but Pete wants to crack into that bottle of Tokay he's been saving and Mary keeps going on about a game of questions. I told them to hold off for a bit though—see how Moony’s doing first.”

“He’s fine,” Sirius snapped, facing James with his arms crossed; “Been all busy barking his head off.”

James appeared confused and came into the room a bit further, but Remus stopped him with a hand.

“It’s fine, James, I’ll come down in a second. Just… gonna shower first.”

“Alright…” he said, then; “Black?”

Sirius waved him off harshly, before advancing on the door and ushering his best friend out. The door clicked shut behind them, and Remus was left alone. With nothing else to do but make good on his word, he yanked the bathroom door open and stripped out of his pant bottoms. He could weep in the shower.

The water he kept cold, which quelled the burning in his skin but only worsened the trembling in his core. He thumbed the chain necklace looped around his neck. He'd never taken it off—was now the time? What did one do with such gifts during a break up? Was this even a break up? Remus didn’t know. He didn’t know anything.

When he was finished he avoided looking in the mirror, disinterested in the solemn, dark-ringed expression he would find. Eventually Lily came to check in on him, concerned, and the only way he think of distracting her was to agree to join her downstairs with everyone else. The stairs sucked as usual, but it was getting late and the common room was already reasonably sparse. His friends had sequestered the set of sofas in front of the hearth—as was their right as leaving students—and waved when they spotted him slogging over.

“You feeling better then, Remus?” Lottie called, and he nodded to her while taking a corner seat next to Marlene. He didn’t look at Sirius, who was sandwiched between James and Mary with a beer in one hand.

“You’re just in time for the good stuff!” Peter grunted, fighting against the wine stopper of his bottle of Tokay. Lottie eyed him before snatching the bottle with a sharp 'give me that' and whipping the cork out of its neck. They all cheered as the liquor began to flow, and Marlene handed him a mug.

"Here, put some real hair on your chest."

Remus hummed in response and sipped. It tasted like plums.

"Everything okay?" Marlene asked quietly, reading his mood. "Black's been sour as a grape ever since he came downstairs."

"Sorry, Cherry, but not now."

She puckered lightly but nodded and turned back to the group as Mary took control.

"So! Twenty-one questions, right—we're all in agreement?"

"Yesssss!" Lottie trilled.

"You don't have to play if you don't want to," Marlene whispered. Wordlessly, Remus nodded and she smiled softly before tilting her head onto his shoulder. "Go on then, Snatchy, ask your question!"

Mary glared at her. "Alright, fine! My question's for the pétasse over there! Marls—how's Remus in bed?"

"Not that it's any of your business, but he's an absolute stag in the sheets!" Marlene declared, holding Remus' hand up and kissing it for good measure. Mary laughed, but nodded fairly and gestured for Marlene to ask her question.

"Lottie! Did you or did you not hook up with that drug dealer in town —what's his name—Colson?"

"WHAT?!" Peter shouted, making his sister shove him quite sharply.

"His name is Clyde, and I did not," she answered haughtily, "but that doesn't mean I wouldn't."

"You mean Clyde peddled that petition for nothing?" Mary leered.

" 'Nothing'? You and I have clearly never snogged."

Everyone moaned with laughter and Remus took another sip of the Tokay. It warmed his insides some, but it was taking all of his concentration not to let himself shiver with fever next to Marlene.

“My turn,” Lottie announced. “Sirius, is it true Kimmy asked you to father her child last year?”

“Are all these questions going to be about sex?” Lily blagged.

Sirius ignored her. “No. She asked me to father child-ren. The crazy bird wanted three. Even had the names picked out. Bradford, Constance, and Eldric.”

“Thank god she dumped you first,” James quipped. “Those are horrible names.”

“And what are you and Evans planning on naming your first sprog? ‘Prongs Junior’?”

“At least that has some ring to it. ‘Eldric’ is just begging to have his head flushed down the toilet.”

“Hear, hear, Potter!”

The two clinked glasses and drank, while Remus watched. It made him vehemently jealous—how easy it was for Sirius to put on his mask in front of others and pretend it was all okay.

Then Mary reached over and slapped Sirius’ knee. “Your go, Black!”

Sirius cast his eyes about the room, swirling his cup.

“Alright. What’s something you’ve never told anyone else?”

There was a pause and then Peter leaned in. “Who're you talking to?”

“I’m talking to Lupin, a’course.”

Suddenly Remus’ heart was thundering in his ears. Marlene perked up, quick to come to his aid.

“Remus isn’t playing," she said.

“He never said so,” Sirius retorted, staring directly at him now. “Can’t chicken out once the question’s been asked.”

“Remus isn’t feeling well,” Marlene insisted. “Ask someone else.”

“Thanks, but I’m asking Lupin.”

Remus was afraid to open mouth, else he might scream. His hand had seized over the rim of his cup, threatening to shatter its flimsy edges with the strength of his panic. He knew what Sirius was doing—what he wanted to hear him admit. It was purposeful.

“C’mon, Padfoot, try Pete instead,” James prompted, but Sirius would have none of it. He only leaned in further, his every limb taunting.

“Tell us, Lupin."

No.

"What's the one thing you’ve never admitted?"

Stop it.

"The one thing you’ve never said out loud?!”

I won't say it.

"Go on, fess up!"

Marlene threw herself to her feet. “That’s enough, Sirius! I told you, Remus isn’t playing—”

“I’m not my father’s real son.”

He felt frail saying it, but his voice carried, abruptly silencing Marlene’s rant and making every one of his friends turn to look. Suddenly it all felt very silly—this one thing. The secret he’d been too afraid to say aloud since that last day with Hope in her hospital room; when she’d told her eleven year-old son that the real reason his father didn’t love him was because he wasn’t his father at all.

Ah. Karma.

Lily spoke first, but it was just his name. He could hear the sympathy in her voice. The pity. He couldn’t stand it, so in a fit of self-destructive rage, he ripped the wound open further.

“Yeah, that's right! I’m a bastard!” He sang, ironically up-beat. “My dad hates meee, and it’s because every time he looks at my face, he sees some other bastard’s kid… And—And get this! When he doesn’t see that guy—whoever the fuck he was—he sees a reminder of his dead fucking wife! Who apparently everyone thinks killed herself. So that's cool, yeah?”

Vos non lupus, baby.

Remus laughed venomously and downed the rest of his drink. His friends still sat stunned, but he refused to look at Sirius. He wouldn't.

"You're all staring with your gobs open but this is great for me—really! Finally get to admit it, don't I?! That's it, everyone! That's the last 'a the Lupin secret stash! Someone call the papers! Alert the media! It's all out now!"

Marlene slumped down on the sofa next to him, frowning, with tears in her eyes. It was clear she knew exactly what had just happened, but he refused to accept her pity either and pulled his hand away when she reached for it again.

"Lu—" James stopped himself, then; "Remus, we didn't mean to—"

"Nah, don't sweat it, Prongs, all's good in love and war, innit. My turn then? Alright! Mary, how do you get away with wearing your year nine skirt to every French lesson? Is it to boost your marks, or is Mr. Dupont just that much of a pervert?"

The quip wasn't fair to Mary, but she didn't so much as look bothered.

"Remus, it's alright if you—"

"God! Why's everyone so bloody nervous all of a sudden? Black asked a question and I answered it! There—the one truthful thing I've never said aloud. And now you all know. Actually feels good… Yeah, feels good to come out with it."

No one relaxed, and as he glanced around he caught the expression on Sirius' face. It looked to him like horror, but then there was that pity again.

"I'm going to bed."

Pushing up from the couch, Remus slammed his cup down on the table next to him and all but ran from the room. He just wanted to be angry, but he could feel the sobs building up in his chest, the kind that would ache and leave him breathless for hours. It'd been so long since he'd felt them—Sirius' influence—but now there was nothing left to keep them at bay. Behind him, he heard his friends whispering.

"Sirius, how could you?"

"I didn't know! ... I-I… I didn't know..."

By the time he made it to his room, Remus was biting his lip to hold back the screams.

* * *

That night Remus dreamed. Or whatever the verb was for ‘nightmare’. It all felt the same.

He was back in the hospital, which he hated. It always smelt too clean, the lights too bright, and people were always telling him which way to go, where to sit, when to keep his voice down. All he wanted was to see his mum, and sometimes they would say he couldn’t even do that. Then Giles would have to lead him back out of the too-clean, too-bright corridors, sometimes calm, other times kicking and screaming, which he only did because he knew he wasn’t allowed.

This day wasn’t like one of those days. He was eleven now and hadn’t kicked and screamed in ages. Except for that time a few months ago when that horrible Butler Frederick had taken the radio away. That was well deserved, of course. It was his mother’s radio. Frederick had no right to remove it, the bastard. He was gone two weeks later anyway.

No, today wasn’t like then. Today the hospital had called. Remus hadn’t been able to make out all of what his father was whispering to Giles before they caught him eavesdropping, but he managed to overhear some of it.

Bad night. Treatment’s not effective anymore. This is it.

He didn’t understand, mostly because he’d yet to imagine a world where the treatment wouldn’t work. To him, there was only a world where Hope was healthy, at home all of the time and throwing wonderful Sunday teas at which Remus would get to stuff his face with however many jam tarts as he pleased. There was also a world where she was sometimes confused, and thought a Thursday might be a Saturday, or forgot that she lived in their house, or that she’d left the kettle boiling and let it burn one of the kitchen staff. Finally, there was the world where Hope was in and out of the hospital. Where wires and tubes covered her arms and body and she was sometimes too tired to open her eyes, but would squeeze his little hand to signal that she knew he was there.

But a world where there were no jam tarts or kettles or tubes? That world didn't simply exist.

She was awake in her hospital bed when they arrived. She had a silk scarf wrapped up around her head, hiding the spots where her beautiful blonde hair had come out in clumps from something Giles called 'radiation'. It always sounded terribly frightening to Remus, but it was supposed to make her better, so…

The radio was playing next to her bed. It was a hospital radio, so the speakers would sometimes crackle like the cap of a fizzy drink, but he still recognised the song. It was one of Hope's favourites.

Oh, where have you been, my blue-eyed son?
And where have you been, my darling young one?

There were a few tubes, but not enough that she couldn't speak, which was good because she had plenty of things to say. Perhaps if Giles had stayed in the room with him or Lyall hadn't had that meeting to make, then she wouldn't have said them at all. But they were both gone, and she was there, and he was eleven.

"I'm sorry, my darling. I'm so, so sorry…"

* * *

No one tried to wake him. They didn't have to. At shit-all hour, Remus got up, dressed, and carried his trunk as quietly as he could down to the common room. There he rolled a cigarette and smoked it to ash near an open window, and when that was done he rolled another. He repeated this until sun-up, when his lungs felt so singed he doubted he could speak if he tried.

No one bothered him and his friends never came looking. At eight o'clock he picked up his trunk and began lugging it down to Castle Hall, where he found a small crowd of eager students, all of them excited to return home for the holiday. As he stood off to the side and watched as the haze of their breaths floated up into the sky, he imagined what it would be like telling James that he couldn't stand coming to his for Christmas anymore. There would be a bit of fruitless arguing—promises of apologies on Sirius' behalf—but he would eventually give in, and then Remus would be left to go back home. At least the estate would be empty. But empty meant quiet.

No, not quiet—silent.

Agony. That's what it felt like. He so badly wanted to throw his friends' kindness back into their faces, but a dam had been broken—all of his secrets were spent. He felt hollower than hollow, as though the entire world were seeping into his chest cavity, dispersing everything that made him 'Remus Lupin' and splitting his matter up into a million different pieces until he was nothingness all over again. Aside from Giles and the dogs, the estate had nothing that would help put him back together again. All that was left of him was there—with his friends, with Sirius.

He could go to Tomny. He should. Tomny would understand. But then again, Tomny was in the East End, and there was Lee… and the Potters had been so kind and… shit—shit! It was all shit.

Across the berm, he spotted his friends waiting by one of the buses. James and Peter waved tentatively, and he nodded back. Sirius was drawing circles in the snow with the tip of his boot. Unbothered.

So go then, Vicious Moony seethed. Go and make his life miserable too. Show him how it feels.

Yeah, maybe he would.

"Hello, Remus."

Sheila's voice was soft when she said his name. It felt like a hug from a mother almost, but then again he couldn't remember what that felt like, really. He turned to her, and Sheila beamed at him while wearing an effervescent orange peacoat. She looked like a smiling traffic cone.

"Are you excited to be going home for the holidays?" She asked him. "I hope your father's taken some time off."

It was almost ironic.

"Yeah, loads. Enough to vacation in the Riviera with his new wife."

Instantly Sheila's good mood vanished. It might've been the rawness in his voice or the fatigue on his face, or perhaps after two and a half years of seeing each other every day, she was just able to tell what his misery looked like.

“I didn’t know Lyall had remarried.”

“Yeah, last autumn.”

She frowned at him. “Are you alright, Remus? What’s wrong?”

“Did you know?” He asked her, finally forgoing any needless pandering and cutting straight to the bone. Just like Sirius.

“Did I know what?”

“Did you know that Thaddeus Dean was my dad when you gave this to me?”

She looked down, to where he’d pulled the rumpled photograph from his pocket. Remus hadn’t looked at the thing in months, and yet the image felt as familiar as the back of his hand.

“Remus, I…”

“Don’t lie to me.” He thrust the photo at her again. “Did you know?”

She seemed to shrink away from it this time, like the truth might bite her. When she spoke, her voice was a reedy whisper. Thin.

“I wasn’t entirely sure. Hope never said and… But when I saw you that first day in my class, it was uncanny." She let out a shaky breath, her voice snapping. "It was like seeing him again. After all these years —Tad. A bit taller, skinnier in some places, but the same nose—same eyes.”

He felt the trembling return, but without fever.

“Why did you give this to me…?”

His teacher’s mouth fell open with unsaid words, but they were just excuses, and so he shoved the photograph back into his pocket.

“Remus—” Sheila said quickly, “there’s something else I should tell you.”

“No, thank you,” he ground out, turning toward the buses. “Goodbye, Mrs. Buchanan. Happy Christmas.”

Chapter End Notes

So... maybe this wasn't the end of exam treat you wanted, but at least the Christmas carol was cute though, right...? pfft I'm sorry, I like angst, what can I say?

I hope those of you who didn't see my big reveal coming can think back to all of the foreshadowing I've been desperately sprinkling throughout the fic. I swear it's there, but if you don't believe me, check out chapters 2, 33, 50, and especially 61 & 66. There's even more than that though.

Edit; If you can't remember who "Thaddeus Dean" is, check out chapter 61.

If you're that distressed, feel free to head on over to my tumblr and yell at me <3 (srsly, it's where I answer any and all questions lol) and hey,,, next chapter Christmas, right? haha... ha...

Chapter 83: Coda

Chapter Summary

Coda /ˈkōdə/ noun

1. The concluding passage of a piece or movement; an expanded cadence.
2. An ending, with the freedom to start again.

Chapter Notes

The irony of the song opening this chapter just kills me, idk.
And a note to everyone who was worried about Remus' health, he is FINE lmfao. He does not have cancer or any other terrible illness you lot have been dreaming up. I don't like angst that much.

No C/W for this chapter, but it's not exactly uplifting either. Hang in there smooches forehead

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I'm on the top of the world, lookin' down on creation;
And the only explanation I can find;
Is the love that I've found, ever since you've been around,
Your love's put me at the top of the world…

- "Top of the World" The Carpenters, 1972

Mrs. Potter had just about passed out in the foyer when she saw James and the bleached skunk stripe lining his sweeping fringe, but it was nothing compared to the look she gave Remus.

"Remus, beta, are you alright? You look positively ill."

He didn't deny it, and neither did any of his friends. James and Lily had been silently fretting over him since Scotland, passing him handkerchiefs to dab the sweat on his forehead and stuffing him with hot tea from the train's trolley cart. Only Sirius remained stoic; Remus didn't care—let him sulk.

"Just tired from the train," he said. Then he wobbled while taking his boot off and James had to reach out and steady him.

“Giles is still in the drive talking cars with dad,” he said, eyeing his mother uneasily.

“M’fine, James."

Mrs. Potter stepped forward anyway. “May I?”

Remus nodded reluctantly, allowing her to press the back of her hand to his forehead.

“Arey baap re… You’re burning up. Perhaps we should have Giles take you home until you’re well.”

“No, please. I’m fine, really!" He insisted. "No one else has caught anything, I’m just tired—just need some sleep, and I… I would rather not go home.”

Effie looked at her son warily before sighing. “Alright, but it’s straight upstairs with you. You’ll take James’ bed while I prepare something that’ll warm you up. And we’ve a neighbour two houses down, Dr. Ostrowski, we’ll have him take a look at you.”

Remus didn’t fight it. He’d already decided on the train that anything was better than returning to that empty estate.

“Here, let me get your trunk,” James said, ushering Remus out of the way while Mrs. Potter retreated into the kitchen.

“And you should take your jacket off, it’s wet from the rain,” Lily insisted, already peeling it off him by the collar.

“Guys, I told you I’m fine—” He’d meant to step over James’ guitar case, but like the klutz he was, caught his toe on the edge and nearly sprawled on the foyer carpet for a second time. He might have gone down on his face had a hand not shot out and steadied him. Alarmed, Remus turned sharply to find Sirius holding his elbow. They locked eyes for the first time since their fatal game of questions, and Sirius quickly released him, turning away to fumble with the buttons of his coat.

More affronted than he would’ve been had Sirius just let him fall, Remus drew himself up to his full height and turned for the stairs. He’d already told himself that should he choose to stay, Sirius was not his prerogative. Not his problem. He was there for his friends, and Sirius Black was not his friend.

No less than ten minutes later, Remus lay curled up under the covers of James' fourposter, staring up at the poster of Farrah Fawcett he'd yet to remove from the roof. He knew he should be happy Mrs. Potter had agreed to let him stay, but lying there, in an unfamiliar bed, made him feel suddenly panicked. Cagey. Like he needed to flee. Idiot—coming back to the Potters' had seemed like such a good idea on the train, when the mere thought of returning to the Lupin Estate had left him rushing to the toilet to vomit. (Though that could've just been courtesy of Lily's personal mixture of turmeric and ginger tea—heavy on the turmeric.) Now he felt guilty. Who was he to weasel his way into his friend's home and ruin everyone's holiday? Just because he and his boyfriend had had a nasty break up...

Had he and Sirius broken up? It felt like it. Remus had never been more angry with anyone in his entire life, save perhaps his parents. Why couldn't Sirius ever listen?! If Remus was the walking time bomb then Sirius was the match ready to set him off. Maybe they were bad for each other after all. Maybe they should've just stayed friends. Though really, Remus couldn't remember what it felt like to just be Sirius Black's friend.

"Effie, have you seen my boots anywhere? Should need to salt the drive, I think."

"In the hall cupboard, dear!"

"Right, right... Effie, have you seen my muffler anywhere? Bit nippy out."

"On the stairs, dear!"

"Yes, yes... Effie, have you seen my spectacles anywhere? Can't bloody—"

"On your head, dear!"

"Oh my..."

Potter Cottage was a big house, and in big houses sound tended to carry. As he laid awake, listening to the distant hum of happy reunions and novelty holiday tunes playing off the radio, Remus could feel a familiar itch to disappear creep back in. He imagined them all downstairs, sat down by the warm hearth and sharing all the bits of themselves Effie and Monty had missed since September. The girls' prank on Halloween, Sirius' birthday, the time capsule and Marlene's petition. He could hear laughter, the occasional motherly condemnation. James' good-natured reply, Lily's timid agreement. Sirius.

Remus couldn't take it anymore. The entire thing had been a mistake. Sirius wasn't miserable, he was happy! Happy to be home with family in a space big enough that he didn't have to look at Remus all hours. Remus' plan had failed, he needed out.

Throwing off the covers, Remus sat up in bed and reached for his jumper. He'd have to leave his trunk, it was too heavy to lug down the street with him, but what good were books and things anyway if you didn't even know where you were going?

It got noisier as he emerged into the hallway. Already out of breath, he wheezed lightly as he descended the stairs, but could still hear the sound of Lily and Mrs. Potter's happy voices drifting up from the kitchen. The others were clearly in the parlour, and he briefly caught word of a football match being discussed. Trying his best to block it out, Remus searched the hall cupboard for his scarf and coat. He'd just finished lacing up his boots when James came skittering down the hallway, heading for the stairs. With a tray of homemade soup balanced in his hands, he'd almost swept past him, but froze at the last second. Foot on the first step, James looked surprised—and disappointed.

"Moony, what are you doing?"

Remus sighed, like a burglar caught in the act. "M'gonna head out."

James only blinked at him.

"Huh?"

"Gonna go... now. I'm leaving, James."

"You're leaving now? Without telling anyone? What... Did you call Giles or something?"

Remus shook his head, utterly shamefaced, and the look James gave him was horrible.

"Where were you even gonna go? To the East End?"

He opened his mouth to answer, but James just cut him off;

"Remus, are you mental? It's dark out—gonna be real late soon!"

“Shh!” Remus groaned, desperately. “S'fine. I know my way around.”

“That’s not the problem!” James huffed, setting down the soup tray. “What’ll I tell Mum? Or Lily?”

“Just tell them that I got Giles to come get me or something. That I was too sick."

“Mate, you are sick.”

“Then don’t tell them anything. Say you never saw me.”

“You actually expect me to lie to them? Not a chance. Just stay, we’ll —we’ll figure something else out.”

“James, I can’t.” I can hear him laughing and I thought I could handle it but I can’t. It’s killing me.

“Moony, if this is about what happened yesterday, Sirius has already told me he’s sorry. Sorrier than anything. He didn’t mean to push you into… whatever that was. None of us knew anything about your dad."

"I know, that was sort of the point."

James frowned deeply, and took a step forward. "I don't know how it's been for you," he said, "and I won't pretend either. But Remus, if you thought for even a second that we’d think any less of you because of it —then you’d be dead wrong.”

It was good of him, but Remus had never been as good as James Potter. He stepped back, closer to the door, and raised a hand to ward him off.

“James... Please. I can't do this tonight."

“You can't go! People are gonna be coming around for the holidays soon. People who want to meet you guys! My cousin Ajay’s coming back home to visit and he’s got all these crazy stories about America. It’ll be a good distraction, and when you’re better, well… Then we'll do it your way. Heck, we’ll even go find Tomny together if you'd like.”

“No offence, Prongs, but I don’t want to sit around listening to Ajay talk about the Red Sox and the Yankees. I need to—”

“Don’t be a shit friend, Remus.”

It was the nastiest thing James had ever said to him, but it didn’t matter. His dark eyes softened immediately and he stepped forward, placing a hand on Remus' shoulder to give it a gentle squeeze.

"Stay," James said again, "stay and get better."

He wanted to say no. He wanted to throw his friend's kindness back into his face—be that shit friend who ran out on them the moment things went bad, but if the situation had been reversed, Remus couldn't see himself doing any different.

So, Remus allowed James to help him out of his coat, and together they made the long trek back upstairs. He ate the rasam Effie had prepared and only bothered James once about Farrah, before changing into his night clothes and slumping back in bed. James hadn't dawdled after that, a small mercy, and when he left he turned on the radio.

"Just try and relax some," he told Remus, before shutting the door. Remus stared after it, mentally comparing its size to that of his bedroom door back at the estate. It was a horrible feeling, but at least the radio helped some.

'It's a livin' thing,
It's a terrible thing to lose;
It's a givin' thing,
What a terrible thing to lose…'

Lily appeared sometime later, setting a cup of water on the bedside table and carefully laying down beside him overtop the covers. She noticed the poster immediately, but before she could comment on it, Remus spoke.

"He's still got one of you up over his bed at school. Kisses it every morning… Sirius put it up."

"I remember," she said, smiling up at the roof of the four-poster. "Funny, that Sirius. Though not always…"

A dour feeling came over him.

"Lils."

"I know you're sick, so we don't have to talk about it if you don't want to. But I can tell that all this has been on your mind for a while now.

You've been a bit odd lately, Remus."

Odd like a cuckoo clock.

He pushed the memory away. It felt like a lifetime ago. "Yeah, well—sorry for being so odd."

"I didn't mean it like that."

"I know."

She took his arm.

"Remus, I know what Sirius did was not kind, but I wish you'd talk to us. You don't have to take on everything alone, you know. You've got people here who want to help."

"Thanks, Lils, but I really don't want to talk about it."

She nodded solemnly, and then slid her hand further until it was cradling his palm. Her fingers were soft, and Remus just felt clammy.

"I didn't come up here to badger you. I just wanted to let you know that the others are getting ready for bed. Monty wants them up early to help rake the leaves from the lawn. If you'd like, you can sleep in the guest bedroom with me. We don't have to talk about it."

As she spoke, Remus cast his eyes over the cots, already set up for what might have been a fun night of boyish antics. Could've been, had he not cocked it all up so badly. He could barely look at Sirius now—being in the same room with him for even a moment would just send him running again.

With a wordless nod, Remus sat up in bed and allowed his friend to help him hobble out into the hall. That night, he laid awake thinking about how Lily's hair looked like dark whips of fire as it spread out across her pillow. It felt almost odd to see her sleep—the closest he'd come was the time she'd nodded off in James' lap in the common room, and then also that night in the girls' room, after she and Snape had had their final falling out. Funnily enough, Sirius had preoccupied his thoughts during both instances; and now, despite the slightness of her frame and the quiet kitten-like breathing, he had to keep reminding himself that Lily was not Sirius. The constant pang was a sorry reminder that without even saying the words, he and Sirius were over. They hadn't so much as glanced at each other on the train—hadn't said a word in either's direction since the fight in the common room. How long had it been since they weren't able to look at one another's face and read everything written there?

Guess you both got what you wanted, the vicious Moony said. No more hiding now.

No, Remus thought, as he turned his back on Lily so she wouldn't wake up and see the damp on his cheeks.

Not like this.

* * *

Remus spent the first several days of holiday in bed—Mrs. Potter's orders. He was fed soups and masalas that could've cleared even the worst sinuses, and James and Peter came by frequently to add to the growing pile of records they'd left next to the beside turntable. They didn't ask him about what had happened back at school, and he saw neither hide nor hair of Sirius. It was a boring existence but at least he wasn't being forced to go home. He'd rather let Lily play nurse than any of the maids back at the estate. At least at the Potters' no one was a stranger.

Though she was not happy to hear that they were sharing a room, Lily had managed to convince Effie to let Remus stay. She tended to him like an army medic until he'd finally snapped and said he could dab his own sweaty forehead. When Dr. Ostrowski arrived on their second day, Effie had shown him upstairs where he introduced himself in a deep Polish accent. He used a tongue depressor to check his throat and waved a narrow light across his eyes for so long that Remus was sure he'd go blind.

"Any discomfort or tightness in diaphragm?"

"No."

"Hm. Try deep breath."

Remus did so, and stubbornly resisted the twinge in his sternum. He did wheeze a bit on the exhale however, and the doctor peered at him sceptically.

"Have you been coughing up phlegm?"

“Yes.”

“What colour?”

“Yellow,” Remus answered, before coughing sharply into his elbow.

“He’s been coughing going on a week now,” Effie added, while she and Mr. Potter stood by the door. “Fevers every night.”

After taking a moment to listen to his heart beat, Dr. Ostrowski pulled the stethoscope from his neck, turning back to the worried couple.

“He has chest infection. Probably started as cold, then mutated. I will give prescription for bacteria. If is viral, should resolve on own.”

Effie’s shoulders slackened with relief while Mr. Potter fit the end of his pipe into his smiling mouth.

“So I don’t have to go to the hospital?” Remus asked anxiously.

“Not now. Keep eye on symptoms. If get worse, let me know.”

Snapping shut his medical bag, the doctor stood up from the bed and allowed Mr. Potter to show him out.

“Never thought a chest infection would be good news,” Mrs. Potter said, coming forward to change the damp flannel on his forehead. “We’ll send the boys out to pick up the prescription.”

“I can go myself,” Remus insisted.

“I hope you’re joking.” She drew the covers up, then leaned down and kissed the top of his head. “Drink your tea, and make sure you eat up all of that soup. I’ll be back to check on you in a little while.”

And that was how it went for Remus. Endless rounds of doting friends, antibiotics, and warm meals. Just dreadful, really. Despite the fact that he was mostly bedridden, he could tell when Potter Cottage began to get a whole lot busier. The front door would open every now and then to the sound of cheerful greetings and pattering boots. Cousins came in from all over the countryside, filling up the home until every nook and cranny was occupied. He finally met the infamous Ajay, who arrived the same day he’d flown in from Boston and strode straight into the room with James while wearing a Harvard University pullover.

“Sorry you’re feeling so crap,” Ajay said, after Remus had shot upright in bed and nearly keeled over trying to make himself look presentable. “Cuz told me you like music though. You heard of Van Halen?”

Ajay was cool, Remus decided. He brought James several records, most of them by American bands none of them had even heard of. Remus listened to each one on repeat for hours. Later, when he was feeling halfway decent, he even managed the occasional trip downstairs to mingle or share a meal. The Potters’ dining table had extended ten-fold to make room for everyone, but Remus always made sure to sit opposite to Sirius for meals. Unfortunately, this often meant contending with James’ younger, less tactful cousins.

“How did you get that scar?”

“Hamsa!” One of James’ uncles hissed; nearly choking on his supper. He said something in Hindi that sounded a lot like ‘behave yourself’, but Remus wasn’t fazed. He turned to the girl, rubbing the bridge of his nose pointedly.

“Picked a fight with a samurai. Nasty stuff. But don’t worry, I made sure to get him back. Took both eyes out with a single chopstick.”

She squinted like she didn’t believe him while everyone else at the table shared a chuckle. Remus spared a glance at Sirius, but he was not smiling. Instead he nudged James, and asked him to pass the butter.

As nice as meeting the Potters’ extended relations had turned out to be, Remus was not out of the woods entirely. The cough had ebbed, but his fevers returned with vengeance in the days leading up to Christmas. Lily continued to come and go from their bedroom with copious amounts of tea in hand, as did James’ vast family.

"Mummy says rock music melts your brain," Arun said. He was only eight, but seemed to consider himself very knowledgable in most things.

"Oh, it does," Remus agreed. "Sometimes I have plug up my ears just to keep it from leaking out." He stuck both pinkies in either ear and puffed up his cheeks, making Arun and his six year-old sister giggle.

"You two aren't supposed to be in here," Lily said, emerging through the door with a tea tray and a book tucked under one arm. "Remus is still sick. Do I have to tattle to your parents?"

Quickly, both kids leapt down from the bed and shot out the door, giggling some more and they slammed it behind themselves.

“Sounds like a circus down there,” Remus called.

“It is. More of James’ aunts and uncles just arrived,” Lily said, as she set the tray down on the bedside. “Did you know he has two cousins named Aarush? And three named Stephen! Anyway, they all say to get better soon. They’re saving you a portion of the driveway to shovel whenever it decides to snow.”

“As if London gets any real snow.”

She smiled and passed him a cup of tea. Remus matched it meekly, and stopped in inhale a much needed whiff of Mrs. Potter's famous chai. He had no idea what that wonderful woman put in the stuff, but it worked magic where sleep was concerned.

“You should go and visit,” he told Lily, while sipping the drink. “I’m not dying of tuberculosis, you don’t need to tend to me like a wilted daisy.”

“Nonsense. Monty lent me a book and I thought you might like it, that’s all. Now shut up and drink your tea while I read to you.”

He appreciated her, but could tell that the hovering was just Lily's way of keeping track of him. There was no way that James hadn’t told all of them about his disappearing attempt, and though it made him feel like a coddled child, he didn’t fight anymore than necessary. The alternative meant going home, and though he would certainly be left alone at the estate, it wouldn’t mean peace.

On the forth morning, Giles arrived to check in.

“Remus, darling,” Mrs. Potter called through the door; “Giles is here.”

She stuck her head inside, but Remus only pretended to be asleep, and after a bit more cooing, he began to hear their hushed voices in the hall.

“Should we wake him?”

“Don’t bother, Effie. Best to let the little blighter sleep. Thought I might take him home ‘cause he’s been so sick, but now that I know… He’d probably rather stay.”

He did. He couldn’t go back to that house. Not now, and not ever. Vos sunt non lupus. He did not belong.

In the end they didn't bother him, and Mrs. Potter left a thick envelope on his bedside, along with an assortment of gifts to be opened on Christmas. A few were from Giles, but most were from his father and Sandra. Remus resisted the urge to glare at them, but he did chance upon opening the envelope, which turned out to be a card showcasing the beautiful Monaco beaches and several hundred pounds in cash. Sandra had written a short note wishing him happy Christmas, but there was no note from his father. Just a swirling set of initials; L.L. Apparently Remus hadn't the need to hustle his classmates with his poetry after all.

Trying not to let the chilly gift turn his stomach, he tore the card in half and shoved the money into the deepest pocket of his coat. Perhaps he'd burn it later.

If overhearing Giles and Mrs. Potter's conversation had done anything, it'd proved his suspicions; for a long time Remus had wondered if Giles knew that he was not his father's legitimate child. He'd never had the courage to ask—couldn't even stomach imagining the face he'd give him—but now that the answer was clear, he wasn't sure whether to be hurt or angry. So… he became neither. Remus simply pushed the thought away, along with all the rest of life's disappointments.

While sitting alone in his and Lily's bedroom, he carefully took stock of the presents Giles had brought. Not all of them were for him, in fact a good portion were gifts. Most had been picked from a catalogue; a guitar strap for James, a new camera case for Lily… simple things, really. He'd paid for all of them himself using the money from his poems, and now they all sat at the foot of Remus' bed, swathed in red and gold wrapping. One of them, perhaps the largest, felt all for naught now. He tried not to think about it.

It became easier to avoid Sirius as the house grew more crowded. While James' uncles helped Mr. Potter change burnt out Christmas lights or salt the drive, the mums puttered around the kitchen like a flock of busy hens, speaking Hindi to one another and English when Mrs. Pettigrew came around. There was no mistaking her for Peter and Lottie's mum, not with her stout stature or head of peach-blonde hair. She greeted all of them enthusiastically, shaking Remus' hand and dubbing him the 'handsomest stalk of wheat she'd seen in all her years'. She was kind, with eyes like Simeon and the same sort of vivacious mettle as Lottie. Perhaps somewhat predictably, she was not one to hold her tongue, and like her children, seemed to let loose any and all thoughts that popped into her head.

“I never did much care for that old Jim Callaghan, but this Thatcher woman… I shudder to think what she’ll have to say if she ever gets into office.”

Yes, she was rosy and predictable, but if there was one thing Remus was not expecting from Mrs. Pettigrew, it was the whole-hearted encouragement with which she had for their music.

“Now, I’ve been talking to Rod,” she said one morning, after rushing over to help Effie decorate several cakes; “that is, Charlotte and Peter’s father—and I think that having you boys perform at the New Year's party would be spectacular! Christmas is for thanks and carols —good food and all that fuss, but I don’t see why we shouldn’t have a little live music to ring in the new year, hey?”

It’d surprised them to say the least, but as word got around that the home-grown ‘Marauders’ would be making a special guest appearance on the final night of the year, they had no choice but to acquiesce.

“I think it’s a champ idea actually. We haven’t played anything outside of a practice since Padfoot’s birthday,” James said, once they were all crowded around the kitchen table together, using a needle and thread to string coloured popcorn onto garland.

“And Sim’s gonna be back by then,” Lottie added. “He’s spending Christmas at his girlfriend’s, but he says he wants to see you all play.”

Girlfriend—sure, Remus thought to himself; Nice cover, Sim.

“You mean he wants to see us make fools of ourselves,” Peter grumbled, fighting to get his needle through a particularly stubborn kernel.

“You won’t make fools of yourselves,” Lily insisted, as James leaned past her and smacked a hand on the table.

“Daisy’s right! This is our chance to show our parents we’re serious. If we put on a good show, then they’ll have to give our gap year some thought.”

“Lupin doesn’t even have his bass,” Sirius said blandly, speaking about Remus as though he weren’t sitting a mere two seats over. “What are we even gonna do with two acoustics and no microphone?”

The revelation seemed to dampen James' spirits a bit, and he glanced at Lily.

“Is there nowhere we can borrow what you need?” She suggested. “Maybe find a rental shop?”

“This close to Christmas?” Remus echoed, looking anywhere but at Sirius. “S’fine. I’ll just sit this one out. You guys can get by for one performance without a backing bass.”

“No way,” James scoffed automatically. “Marauders go on as a whole, or not at all. We’ve still got a few days until everything’s shut up, maybe we could… Oh! Ajay used to have tons of mates into music—one of them’s got to have a bass lying around somewhere.”

“You could ask one of them to lend it out!” Lily agreed.

“Yeah, and in the meantime, you can just play rhythm guitar, Moons. You’ve better timing than me anyway.”

“Problem solved!” Lottie cheered, as Remus nodded along in indifference. Next to him, Peter flicked the stale popcorn kernel away and picked up another, this time licking his fingers and shutting one eye.

“Guess we best get to practising then,” he said, before promptly stabbing the needle into his thumb.

The holiday busyness kept them distracted at least; when they weren’t liberating Peter’s parlour and driving Mr. Pettigrew mad with all their noise, there was always party prep to be done. Someone new to meet. A meal to be shared… And on those mornings where James was away on some lovesick adventure with Lily, and Peter was off visiting Moira, Sirius and Remus made sure to sequester themselves in different rooms.

Remus also tried not to let this bother him. After all, he’d never felt so angry with someone in all his life—a sentiment he made sure to repeat to himself on the daily. He and Sirius had continued to brush each other aside at every meal and practice and every time Remus was reminded that no matter what he’d promised him, Sirius’ impulsive anger had gone too far this time. He’d all but dared him to publicly confess to something he’d told him—he’d told him—wasn’t true.

Why’d you do that? He’d asked the Sirius in his head, over and over again.

Why'd you do that?

Why'd you do that?

Why'd you DO THAT?

Why is it never enough for you?!

Enough… It was almost laughable now. Sirius Black did not know the meaning of the word 'enough'. It did not exist within his vocabulary, and if it did, it certainly did not apply to him. It was never about enough, it was always more. Not enough to be bisexual—just gay. Not enough to have this—to need everything. And in his bitterest moments, Remus came to realise that that was all it was. Sirius had accepted that his boyfriend could be 'bisexual' because it was more than he'd been before, but eventually that must've just felt insufficient. It wasn't a sin to be one or the other, but to be stuck in between? To be insufficient? Well… that was just not good enough.

He did not know whether or not Sirius had made good on his word to tell James he was gay, and he did not ask. Instead Remus waited, expecting some sort of change—even just a subtle shift at the way James looked at his best friend—but in the end there was nothing. He couldn't decide if that meant James knew and did not care, or that Sirius had held back. It was maddening. He wouldn't have ever imagined that not knowing whether James knew, would somehow be worse than him actually knowing. It made him want to run away again. He had no more secrets to punish them with, and no matter how many times James apologised on Sirius' behalf, no matter how many times Peter or Lily told him they were sorry—Remus was not. The only thing Remus was sorry for was how long it'd taken him to realise that whatever he and Sirius had been was doomed from the start.

You could just leave. Find Tomny. What's really stopping you?

He didn't really have an answer. Maybe he needed a push, but James had already told him not to be a shit friend, hadn't he?

Well, I think that ship's already sailed, mate.

* * *

Friday 23rd December 1977

“Are you sure you won’t come ice skating with the rest of us?” Lily asked, as she stood in the doorway of Remus’ bedroom, a concerned look upon her face.

“I can barely walk on my own two feet—now you want to put me on ice too?”

“I would’ve thought you’d be good at it! Long limbs and all…”

“Go already, before I sneeze on you,” Remus threatened, ushering her out of the room. They got about three steps before Lily had whipped around again, grabbing him by the shirt sleeves.

“Okay, but—Marlene’s already told me she managed to get us all tickets for that ‘Star Fight’ film or whatever.”

“You mean ‘Star Wars’.”

“Yeah, that’s the one! Technically it’s not out until the twenty-seventh, but there’s this cinema in Mayfair that’s doing a special holiday showing tomorrow on Christmas Eve! Lottie and Peter have already said they can’t come—they’re making the drive to collect Simeon, so promise you’ll go if you’re feeling better?”

“Promise. Now let me nap, woman.”

She smiled, but paused once more, this time with her palm on the doorknob. “James played me your guys’ song last night, by the way.”

Remus sighed, already embarrassed. He knew James had wanted to play ‘Lily Bloom’ for her on their last night at school, but then he’d gone and buggered the whole thing up.

“Hope it wasn’t too lame.”

“ ‘Course not! I only meant to say that it was brilliant.” Lily threw herself forward into a hug. “Thank you. It’s the nicest thing anyone’s ever done for me.”

Blushing, Remus murmured a shy ‘you’re welcome’, and then as they pulled apart; “You made sure to give James a kiss too, yeah?”

“Many kisses.”

“Oh, s’good then.”

Lily's expression softened. "Remus, are you sure you're alright?"

"It's just a tiny infection, Lils."

"I don't mean you being sick. I mean… here." She touched the place over her heart, her green eyes sad and soft. "None of us blame you for not telling us about your dad, but it's been days now… And you and Sirius are—"

"There is no 'me and Sirius'," he snapped. "I need you to stop asking."

"I would, except now Sirius refuses to talk about it with anyone. Even James."

"Sounds like a him problem then."

Oh, Remus—he could see it in her eyes. Thankfully she didn't say it. Instead she just gave him another hug, and whispered into his shoulder;

"Just know that when you're ready to talk about it, we're here."

She was kinder than he deserved, they all were, but all it took was another stilted dismissal and Lily finally left him be with his radio—promises of their prompt return following her on her way out.

The house was quieter after that, what with most of James' relatives off on final holiday errands. It was a brief lull; in mere hours every inch of the Potters' cottage would be stuffed with merry well-wishers and party-goers. For now though, it was just his moping self and the queen of the house, who eventually did come knocking.

"Remus, dear, may I come in?"

He sat up, mumbling in the affirmative while tucking away the book he'd been reading and turning down the radio's volume. A second later Mrs. Potter was sticking her head inside.

"Still feeling a bit peaky?"

"S'not so bad anymore," he said. "Cough's almost gone."

"Oh, good."

Mrs. Potter slipped inside wearing her kitchen apron, her hair up and out of her face as always. She glanced over the single gold-wrapped present still sitting on the foot of his bed before perching herself on top of the covers and drawing it into her lap to toy with the bow. Remus tried not to look so earnest. Most of the gifts Giles had dropped off had already been placed beneath the tinsel-clad tree in the salon, courtesy of James, but he'd kept one, wondering if he should give it at all. He knew what was inside. A brand new pair of Doc Martens. Size nine. Too small for himself.

"All ready for Christmas then?" Effie asked, eventually setting the present aside.

"Yeah. Did you need any help in the kitchen then? I probably shouldn't touch the food, but I could do dishes or—or something."

"Oh no, don't worry yourself, dear. We spent all day yesterday prepping. Should be a good turn out for the party tonight. Which you are invited to attend, by the way, provided you're feeling better."

He sniffled for effect. "Maybe, yeah…"

Mrs. Potter smiled kindly and pat his leg. "Don't feel pressured. You just focus on getting better. I did wonder though, if you're feeling up to it, would you mind if we had a little chat? Just you and me."

"About what?"

"Well, to be frank, it's about what you said when you arrived. I wanted to wait until you were well again, but since this sickness of yours insists on sticking around I thought now might be good, considering we finally have a bit of quiet around here."

He looked down at his lap uneasily, but Euphemia Potter was hardly the dithering type. She looked him in the eye whenever she spoke, and did not allow for cowering.

"James told me a bit about your fight with Sirius," she started. "He said it was spurred by something you said about your father. Is that true?"

Well, it wasn't wrong.

Remus nodded reluctantly.

"And is your father the reason you don't want to go home?"

Suddenly the dots were starting to connect.

"It's not like that."

“Hm. Like what?”

He struggled to find the words. He didn’t want her to misunderstand. “Like… Well, I’ll be eighteen in March,” he tried instead. “Won’t matter after that.”

She gave him a smile that felt a lot like a frown, and Remus knew he’d said the wrong thing.

“Remus, beta, I make it a habit not to pry, but is there anything you'd like to tell me? Or anybody? … I know how hard it was for Sirius to talk about his family but—”

“I’m not like Sirius,” he answered sharply. “My dad, he… Lyall doesn’t hit me.”

Another smile, and Remus wanted to top himself.

“I understand.” She stroked the bed covers gently. “But you know, there are other ways people can hurt us that don’t leave any exterior wounds. They can hurt us with words, or ignore us when we really need them. They could... take advantage of our love, or forget us. And it can happen to anyone, even very strong people. Even those who might seem well cared for. It’s called neglect, Remus.”

Neglect. It was an ugly word. It seemed to hang in the air long after she’d said it, and yet Remus couldn’t bring himself to agree. He wasn’t neglected, he had everything. He had so much, that he’d had to lie about having nothing just to fit in. He’d worn their clothes, shaped his mouth to fit their words, and yet he’d still gone home to gilded window panes and marble floors. Remus Lupin wasn’t a have not, he was a will not.

"I'm not neglected."

"Remus, beta—"

"I'm not!"

Aren't you?

No, no, no... Go AWAY!

How many times have you wanted to scream at him... All those times... Look at me.

No.

Please, look at me.

No!

LOOK AT ME!

"Remus."

She moved toward him, using that soft, motherly tone he was not used to, and Remus flinched. He hated himself for it the moment he saw the reaction of it reflected in her face.

“I’m sorry. I-I didn't mean to—”

“No, I’m sorry,” Mrs. Potter said firmly. “I believe I may have overstepped. I didn't mean to panic you.”

“He doesn’t neglect me,” Remus said again, because what else was there to say? “He raised me. Kept me, even after she died… And he never hit me, either. Not once. He just—He wants to make good on his investment.”

“Remus—"

Oh no.

"Children are not investments.”

He hated that. The way she said his name. Remus, Remus, Remus. He wished she would stop—that she would go away.

“He only took away my allowance," he blabbered. "I was angry—I was being a brat.”

“Everyone’s a brat sometimes.”

“Not me. I'm bad all the time. I tell him I hate him—all of the time. He got remarried and I hate her too, even though she doesn’t deserve it. I make life hard on purpose—I run away. I lie, all of the time. And I smoke cigarettes and take drugs. I’m a bad friend to James, I won’t go to university, and I don’t care about any of it! ... If you were smart you’d kick me out.”

Effie shook her head. “No, Remus. It’s not your fault.”

Remus. Remus. Remus.
Remus, my darling.

Remus, my baby.

Oh, where have you been, my blue-eyed son?
And where have you been, my darling young one?

He put his head in his hands, curling in on himself and yanking on his hair just to feel something. He should've gone after all—should've run away—told James to fuck off. He hated all of them, especially her, and now Effie was ruining all of it. She slid from the bed and knelt down beside him, not touching but close enough to make him tremble.

"It isn't your fault."

Stop. Please stop.

"Do you understand, beta? It's not—"

He couldn't. He wouldn't.

"—your fault."

"Stop!"

It took every ounce of him to say it, but when he whipped his head up only meaning to swear at her some more, he was instantly shattered again. It was her eyes. So like James' eyes and yet for a moment… oh… right. This. It was this—this feeling. Remus had forgotten what a mother felt like. Not to be looked at, but looked after.

He was come apart instantly.

"It's not your fault. You're a good boy. It's not your fault."

For so long she held him, repeating these words in his ear as he cried into the front of her apron. She stroked his hair and kissed his head, murmuring these words. Through it all she smelt of Christmas and home cooking, of teakwood, P&G detergent and poinsettia flowers. She was kind and it killed him and he hated her but she held him anyway; sitting on his sweaty bed sheets and rocking him back and forth like she might a baby. She sang to him too, and though the words were in Hindi and he did not understand, Remus wept. How he'd missed lullabies.

Afterwards he felt only numb. The embarrassment crept in slowly, but she didn't release him until he could sit up on his own without sniffling. There she stroked his face some more; patting the damp from his cheeks while Remus stared down at the covers.

“Thank you. I’m alright now,” was all he could think to say.

She kissed his forehead. “Of course."

“I’m sorry for making you take care of me like this.”

“No. Do not ever apologise. You are welcome here. Monty and I always talked about having more children—siblings for James. I’m glad to know that he went out and found them for himself.”

Remus had no words to that, and so she smiled kindly at him and pat his leg over the covers as she stood. Beneath the shame, he was grateful—she knew when her job was done and did not dawdle. Another coughing fit overcame him as she approached the door, and Effie shook her head.

“I’m going to send up some more tea for you. See if we can’t knock that cold right out of your system. You took your medicine already, yes?”

He nodded.

“Good. Then you just relax. Let me know if there’s anything you need. Anything at all.”

“… Thank you, Mrs. Potter.”

“You’re welcome, beta.” She pulled the door shut behind her and Remus sagged back into the pillows, grinding his palms into both eyes. He felt rubbed raw, and his runny nose was worse than ever. He wondered if seeing him cry had made her feel better—like she’d accomplished some great thing in getting him to acknowledge a pain he’d only ever sought to ignore. He felt guilty for not trusting her, but such was instinct. She was an adult, and adults had caused most of his problems—or they used to. Lately he was doing a fine enough job on his own.

But neglect? That was a new one.

Mrs. Potter clearly didn’t know what she was talking about if she’d thought he’d been actually neglected. If she could’ve seen the way Tomny or the rest had grown up then she would’ve seen that Remus walked on a carpet of clouds. He’d always told himself he was better off—that he’d never wanted for money or food or clothes. A dad was a luxury, and he had enough of those anyway. He was fine.

After about twenty minutes of trying to sleep while the radio hummed distantly on his bedside, Remus finally sat up and tossed off the bed covers. He sneezed into his elbow, and as he did, the disc jockey's voice filtered through the speakers;

"And that was 'Silver Lady' by David Soul. Now coming at you with some ABBA! Here's 'Take a Chance on Me'! ... 'If you change your mind, I'm the first in line! Honey, I'm still free, take a chance on m—!'

"Oh shut up."

Remus clapped his hand down on the radio's off switch, before tugging a jumper over his head to ward off the chills that never seemed to leave him. He reached for the box of tissues on the wardrobe dresser, but found it empty. Grumbling, he trudged over to the bedroom door and threw it wide, only to narrowly avoid running headlong into Sirius.

"Sorry—!" He wiped his face quickly, desperate to not let Sirius know he'd been crying. "Was gonna use… the… loo…"

Sirius recovered quickly. He was holding a tea tray in his hands while worrying at his bottom lip. "Effie said you were napping… Guess she lied. But she asked me to leave this next to your bed."

Remus looked down at the tea set, which smelled strongly of mint and peppercorn. Sirius pressed it into his chest and he took it, suddenly aware of his ragged bedhead and the frog in his throat. "You didn't go out with the others?"

Sirius shook his head. "Been working on something. Didn't want to disrupt the flow. And besides, I'm not much one for skating anyway. Too cold."

"Oh. Do you mean a song?"

"Maybe."

"Is it... any good?"

Sirius shrugged, looking sheepish. "Maybe."

"Cool..."

Neither of them said anything for a long moment, and after glancing at the floor, Sirius turned to leave.

“Wait.” Remus clutched tightly at the tray. “Don’t you want to talk or something?”

“Talk about what?”

Ugh. “Any of it?”

Sirius crossed his arms over his chest. “Didn’t seem like you wanted to talk,” he replied sharply. The reaction made Remus bristle a bit.

“I didn’t.”

“Why bother now then?”

“Because you were outside my door? And because it’s… convenient?”

The corners of Sirius’ mouth turned up humourlessly. “ ‘Convenient’. What an apt choice of words.”

“I take that to mean you’re still angry.”

“Yeah, I’m still angry.”

“Well, I’m still angry at you too,” Remus countered.

“Fine. No one said we had to be sorry to play in a band together, but I’m not playing stupid apology games anymore.”

Remus ground his teeth together. “So where does this leave us?”

“Guess we’ll find out.”

Sirius turned again, but Remus wouldn’t allow him the last word. Not after everything.

“You told James’ mum about my dad,” he said suddenly. Sirius stopped dead at that, and seizing his opportunity to sink teeth into flesh, Remus set the tea tray aside and stepped out into the hall. “You told her about the things I told you in confidence. About my dad.”

“You didn’t just tell me about your dad,” Sirius said stonily. “You told all of us.”

“Not that,” Remus growled. “I mean the rest—Lyall. All the stuff he’s said.”

“Oh. Yeah, I guess I did. Are you pissed off over that too then?”

“I should be, shouldn’t I? She thinks I was bloody neglected now!”

“Weren’t you?”

Remus swallowed thickly. “Not like you.”

“Oh, is it a competition now?” Sirius mocked. “The age-old game of ‘who’s daddy likes them the least’?”

“In that case, I wouldn’t bother if I were you. You’re a sore loser, and I’ve got two dads that don’t want me.”

“You said it, mate, not me.”

It was like watching a trapeze artist teeter on a tightrope. Remus couldn’t look away, even as the rope trembled and he was left holding his breath in anxiety. It was that roller coaster plunging down, down —only now, he could see the rocks at the bottom.

Unwilling to crash, he turned back to his room.

“Lupin.”

He almost ignored him out of sheer stubbornness, but Sirius had always commended every shred of his attention. When Remus stubbornly looked back he found Sirius with his back turned, a hand reached out toward him with its palm upturned, open and seeking. He wouldn’t look at him, but it was his hand he offered. Like a truce. It almost made Remus nostalgic.

Take me back to July,
Bright, beautifully bold;
Now it’s December,
And I’m turning cold…

He’d written the song for both of them. For so long it’d meant everything, and then when they’d fought it’d begun to ring hollow. And yet there they were anyway.

Looking away, Remus reached back and took his hand. Sirius gave it a gentle squeeze; so faint, more like a caress than anything else. Then he was gone, descending the stairs and dropping out of sight to the floor below.

That evening, Remus did not venture out of his room. Instead he opened the bedroom window, feeling the December cold ice his bones and remembering what I'd been like to sit with Sirius on this corner of the roof. It was not a fond memory, no matter how many times Sirius had let him kiss him or what had come after.

"Bloody freezing in here," Lily hissed, when she'd come in for bed. She fetched a spare blanket from the hall cupboard and buried them both under its plush warmth before turning out the light.

"How was your day?" She whispered, hair haloed against her pillow. "Did you talk to Sirius at all?"

Remus shook his head at the question. "How was skating?"

"Good. We went to Hyde Park. I wish you could've come. Potter always claims to be a sports god, but he fell three times."

"Bet you had a laugh."

"Me and half the rink. It's what he gets for showing off." Lily hummed quietly. "Are you feeling any better?"

"A bit."

"Does this mean you'll go out with us tomorrow?"

He considered. It would be nice to see Marlene, and at least with that many of them, he and Sirius could avoid getting stuck together.

"Alright."

She grinned at him. "I love you, Remus."

"Love you too, Lils."

Lily fell asleep quickly, tired from the day's events, but Remus remained all too awake. He waited until the house had finally settled and all of its occupants were sure to be sleeping, and then grabbed the present Lily had moved from the bed to the top of the wardrobe and crept downstairs. Outside, he found that the staircase's railing had been encased in tinsel and the soft glow of the tree lights could be seen before he'd even stepped into the salon. Beneath the real Fraser Fir, which Mr. Potter had cut down himself on the edge of the property, was a large array of presents, all lovingly wrapped and bound, just waiting for the morning they'd be torn open by eager hands. Remus went to place the gold-wrapped gift amongst them, but stopped short at the last second. He peeked at the tag.

To Sirius, From Remus.

He ripped it away, crumpling it in his palm. Then he tucked the gift back under the tree.

* * *

Christmas Eve, 1977

Mrs. Potter sighed, examining her thermometer. "You still have a slight fever. Perhaps we should take you to the hospital after all. See about some stronger antibiotics."

"No!" Remus urged. "I'm fine, I don't need a hospital."

"Remus, it's important to take care of your health."

"I'm practically all better. Honest."

She scowled like she didn't believe him, but by then James was already grabbing Remus by the shoulder and shaking him vigorously.

"Come ooooooon, Mum," he moaned. "Moony's been stuck in bed since we got back and it's just one evening! After tonight you can stuff him with kadha 'til it leaks out of his ears."

"Thanks for that image," Remus scoffed, before looking back at Effie. "I'll be alright, Mrs. Potter. Thank you for looking after me."

"You promise to dress warmly? Not like this one…" She eyed Sirius, who had decided upon his leather jacket without so much as a pair of mittens.

"You can't wear a muffler with this, Mum, it'd totally kill the look."

"No hanging outside in the cold," she ordered Remus. "Don't want you sniffling come Christmas."

"Promise."

James swooped in a second later; “Don’t worry, Mum, it's only a matinee—we’ll be back before your Christmas Eve party turns into a pumpkin.”

Mrs. Potter remained sceptical, but in the end the tickets were already bought and not even her overbearing kindness would keep Remus from missing out.

“Here, take Monty’s scarf, it’s much warmer!” She insisted, as they all donned their coats in the foyer. Remus let himself be bundled, while James and Lily stood by, trying to hide their sly smiles.

“What?” He asked Sirius, mumbling through the wool; “No jokes?”

Sirius looked him up and down. “I had some. Don’t much feel like giving you the satisfaction now.”

They finished by scoffing at each other, and then followed each other out to the driveway where all four of them piled into Mr. Potter’s sedan. He was kind enough to drive them to the nearest tube station, which was already bustling with last-minute holiday shoppers and those just looking to get home. From there they took the train the rest of the way into the city and hurried down to the icy London pavement to meet Mary and Marlene outside the theatre in Leicester Square. Both girls were bundled up tight and standing close together to avoid being jostled by the hundreds of other fans waiting in line to get a chance to glimpse the film taking the sci-fi genre by storm. Despite the weather, some were even in costume, and everyone was yammering excitedly about ‘death rockets’ and ‘sky-walkers’ and whatnot.

“It’s like a bleedin’ rock concert,” Sirius whistled, as they slipped in line behind the girls.

“Hey, no cutting!” Someone shouted.

“Bite me, Suspender-Stanley.”

“Don’t you look snazzy,” Mary commended, “and not at all like you’re about to freeze your bollocks off.”

“Be a mate and lend me your pockets, Macdonald?” Sirius begged, too cold to argue. Mary obliged, and he slipped his arms around her, pushing his hands into her coat pockets as though he were holding her from behind. Mary seemed pleased enough at this, and even smirked at the pair of young girls ahead of them who’d turned around to ogle the handsome boy in the leather coat.

Remus was not bothered. He'd fallen into step with Marlene, who seemed to be shivering as well, but upon closer inspection, was actually bouncing up and down on the spot from pure excitement.

"How'd you swing the tickets for this anyway?" He asked her.

"My brother!" Marlene exclaimed. "He's got a friend who works at the theatre. It's my Christmas gift."

"You didn't need to spend your Christmas gift on us," Remus frowned.

"As opposed to what—going alone?" She shook her head. "This is way better anyway. Last year Michael got me these god-awful earrings from Biba."

"Earrings are nice…?"

"Only if you've got the holes to match." Marlene lifted the edge of her wool cap, revealing bare earlobes. "Anyway, how're you doing?"

"Fine. Chest thing's almost gone."

"That's good, but I sorta meant what happened with Sirius."

Remus took a deep breath. There was a throbbing behind his eyes that was just shifting from a mild discomfort to a gnawing affliction. "It's done, Cherry," he told her.

"You talked then—made up?"

"No. We're done."

"Is that why you're still wearing his necklace?"

Alarmed, Remus pressed a hand to his throat, but the necklace was covered by a jumper and a coat, not to mention Mr. Potter's scarf.

"How did you...?"

"I guessed." Marlene dropped her gaze, looking sorry. "Has Sirius at least apologised?"

"We've moved on," Remus huffed sharply. "I'm over it."

"Shit, Remus. You can't just forgive him! He—" She dropped her voice; "He tried to get you to out yourself. Before you were ready! I mean, who even does that?"

Her vexation toward Sirius placated him momentarily, but then that same surge of guilt rose in his gut. Briefly, he considered telling her about all the times Sirius had made his own feelings about coming out crystal clear, only to dismiss them without a second thought; but really, Remus didn't fancy rehashing the conversation in public.

"I don't care anymore. I just want to forget about it."

Marlene looked like she wanted to argue, but then an excited cry went up in front of the theatre, and the line finally began to move.

"Here we go!" Marlene said to the rest of them. "Best be quick or we'll get stuck at the front and have to stare up at the screen the entire time."

"God forbid," Sirius drawled; "I can't wait to see nerd history in the making."

Most of them went into the dark theatre with very low expectations and when it was over, all filed out again, the booming film score practically chasing them up the aisle by the heels.

"Well, that was surprisingly… not terrible," Mary said.

"Just admit you liked it and move on," Marlene blagged.

"I wouldn't say I 'liked it', but that Solo fellow wasn't too hard on the eyes. I might be coerced into seeing a sequel if we get at least one shirtless scene."

"You're such a…" Marlene scoffed. "Fine. What about the rest of it then? What about Leia?"

"The whiny princess? Meh."

"She wasn't whiny! She was a soldier—a rebel! Honestly I'm amazed a man wrote her character. Competent and beautiful."

"My god, did it finally happen? Did you fall in love, Marls?"

"Oh shove off."

"I liked the laser swords," James said, waving his hand around with a whirring noise and playing at chopping Sirius' arm off at the shoulder. Playing along, Sirius clutched his arm and moaned terribly, before bouncing back and shooting finger guns in James' direction as he fled through the throng of giddy movie-goers.

"I'm gonna go find the lav. Meet you outside," Remus said to Lily, before excusing himself to the theatre toilet. He hadn't said anything (mostly because Marlene would've crucified any of them for chatting over the film) but somewhere between the exploding planet and the exploding spaceship that looked like a planet but was decidedly not a planet, his fever had crept back in full force. It left him hunched over a bathroom sink, breathing hard as he tried not to throw up. Everywhere smelt of stale popcorn and BO, and he felt light-headed just from standing. At least the theatre had been dark, but Remus was not look forward to the chilly ride home on the tube.

"Don't be a bloody jessie," he told himself; "you just need to make it back. You can pass out in your room, fucking toff."

When he finally emerged from the bathroom—nearly running head-long to a man wearing green face-paint and a pair of antennae—he found his friends waiting for him across the dark street. Despite the late hour, people were still bustling around, most of them avid fans or loiterers looking to pick a pocket or two. Even in the dim light given off by the theatre, Lily must've noticed how pale he was, as she turned to him and peeled off a glove to check the temperature of his forehead.

"You ninny, you're burning up again. That's it, we're taking you to the hospital."

"You mean you're still sick?" Mary gaped.

Remus groaned and pushed Lily's hand away. "I'm fine. It's Christmas Eve, let's just get to the train and go home."

"I can ring dad from a booth and ask him to come pick us up from here," James offered.

"No, don't bother, I can make it. I'm not—" he surveyed his friends, counting only four. "Where's Black?"

"Maybe you should look into the hospital," Marlene pressed, taking his arm quickly. "It's on our way, Mary and I will take you! Come on, let's go!"

Marlene meant well, but it was too late. He'd already spotted him a short ways down the street, standing on the corner. Sirius—talking to a girl. A pretty girl. She must've come from the film as well, but she didn't look like she smelt of popcorn or BO. She wore a long coat and a winter hat, dark hair braided down her back. And Sirius... he was standing in that self-possessed way of his—all legs in his dark jeans. And he was smiling. Then when the girl reached out to bat playfully at his arm, he didn't move away.

Suddenly Remus missed the annoying robots and the dark corners of the theatre. His hands seized at his sides and everything began to ache, especially his head.

Sirius was talking to a girl.

Sirius, who was gay, was talking to a girl.

Sirius, who he'd been in love with and dreaming of moving in with up until a week ago, was talking to a girl.

Now he knew he was going to throw up.

"There he is," James said, spotting Sirius a second too late. "Five quid says she complimented his jacket or something. Hold on while I go get the tosser. Oi, Black!"

As James started his merry way down the pavement, Remus began backing up in the other direction. Marlene clung to him, her platform boots scraping the pavement as she tried to pull him back.

"Remus—Remus, come on. Don't worry about that, he's just being stupid!"

"What's the matter?" Lily demanded, the picture of concern.

But Remus couldn't speak. He was turning over in his grave and he wasn't even dead yet. He was so not done moving on. He hadn't even packed yet. He was still wearing Sirius' bloody necklace, for Christ sake. Why hadn't he taken it off?!

"I—I need to go," he stammered.

"What you need is to go to the hospital!" Marlene pushed. She kept a tight hold on his wrist, but Remus was still looking at Sirius. Sirius who was turning as James approached, holding out a hand in gesture to the girl, speaking as though he were introducing them.

Oh god, he knows her name.

With a sharp twist Remus had freed himself from Marlene's grasp and turned, marching away.

"Remus!" Mary cried after him. "What the—come back!"

Lily shrieked too, wailing his name like it was a curse;

"Remus Lupin, where do you think you're going?!"

But Remus only covered his ears, taking the first corner he came upon and high-tailing it up the lane. He wouldn't be caught—he refused. He would not be the person Sirius looked to after being chatted up by some random girl off the street.

Without being fully conscious of where he was going, he caught a train from Charing Cross to London's east side and never looked back. As a result, he'd gotten on a no-smoking car by mistake. Irritated, Remus began instantly searching his pockets for a desperate fag anyway and nearly shat himself when he whipped out a wad of cash Lyall had given him and scattered half of it on the train floor. The notes scattered and he scrambled to collect them, before promptly switching cars. West of the Strand you'd likely get shivved for carrying that much dosh on you. Not that he wasn't already making about a dozen other mistakes. He was already out walking alone after dark, half-delirious with a fever while the other half of him was delirious with Sirius. And he was wearing a coat worth more than a month's wages at any dock along the Thames. The money in his pocket felt like a small burden in comparison to the rest, but at least if he got jumped he could throw the money one way and run the other.

As he made his way up the twisting streets, Remus realised with proper irony what a circle his life had become. Before Hawkings he would've done just about anything to return to the End, and he had. But he'd never imagined how often he'd be slinking back.

When he reached it, the flat's building looked the same—crumbled, rusted, and wet from the December rain. The light over the front door's entryway was out, but he buzzed the flat's number and was relieved to find that the ringer actually working again. Then a girl answered and Remus nearly stopped breathing.

" 'ello, wotchu want?"

It was like hearing Tonya's voice all over again, except this girl sounded sing-song, the voice of someone high on more than just life. Tonya never sounded like that, even after a dozen lines, she was too charming.

"Helloooo...? Th is Maxie with the hash?"

“No," he croaked anxiously. "I'm not Maxie, I'm... M'lookin’ for Tomny.”

The intercom clicked off and Remus briefly considered cutting his losses and taking off. He wasn’t sure he could get away with another confrontation with Lee fully intact.

“ ‘oo’s this?”

Not Lee. It was Tomny’s easy brogue that cut through. Hearing him nearly made Remus lightheaded with relief.

“It’s me, Tom."

There was some silence, undoubtedly Tomny collecting every thought that had just shot out of his head, then; “Meet me under the balcony.”

Remus did as he was told, skittering down off the front steps and rounding the front of the building, staring up at the dirty second-floor balcony as he rocked back and forth on his heels. It was hard to make out Tomny’s expression as he slid the door open, but he could see his breath coming out in little puffs of haze under the moonlight. Noise followed him out, the sound of plenty of people partying it up inside. Remus kicked himself—it was Christmas Eve. Of course he’d have people over.

“You’re mental coming ‘ere in the middle ‘a the night,” Tomny lashed at him from above. “How’d you even get past Stepney?!”

“You know how it is... No one bothers with a skinny kid.”

“Wish that were true.” Tomny sighed, before rubbing his shoulders harshly. “Fuck—s’cold out ‘ere. You come all the way from Blackheath?”

“No, Finchley.”

Tomny swore again and Remus felt a pang of guilt.

“I know you got people here, a–and I’ll go if I need to. Just needed to get out and cool my head, really. Didn’t know where else…” He winced; “… sorry.”

Tomny pinched his forehead, but waved him off. “No, don’t go. Jus’ stay out of sight for a sec. I’ll get rid of ‘em.”

“You really don't have—”

“Shaddup!” There was the noise of shuffling feet, and then; “Don’t freeze, posh boy.”

Obediently, Remus hunkered down in the shadows off the side of the front yard. It took about twenty minutes, during which his breathing had gone from slightly laboured to sounding as though he’d just run half a marathon. He was sweating an obscene amount inside his coat, but by then people had started to pile out of the front of the building. The rowdy group shambled out the door together, laughing and swearing as they kicked open the rusted gate and made their way up the lane. Remus thought he might’ve caught a flash of Seesaw among them.

“Nerve ‘a that Tom!” One of them cried. “Kickin’ us out on Christmas like fuckin' tweakers on his doorstep.”

“You are a tweaker, tweaker."

"Fuck off!"

"M'gonna head over to Geddy’s. You wankers comin'?”

“Oh shit, yeah! He’s got the good stuff anyway…”

Their chatter receded with them as the group trudged further up the lane. Remus was almost tempted to follow, if just for the chance to overhear something familiar, but then Tomny was there, nervously calling out for him in the dark.

“I’m here,” Remus rasped, rounding the dead blackthorn bushes that lined the front garden.

“Blimey,” Tomny cursed, coming down the wet steps in naught but his socks. “You look like death if he got hit by a train.”

“Try a Boeing seven-thirty-seven.”

“I don’t even know what that means.” He took Remus by the arm. “M’on then, little swot. You’ve already ruined my high, might as well getchu inside.”

Every single floorboard in the building creaked as they made their way up the stairs to the second floor. It was what happened to old, unkempt buildings in the winter. Frost had made its way inside, covering window sills and door hinges. They passed the row of post boxes, painted over with graffiti tags. A dead plant sat at the base of the stairs, its pot filled with more cigarette butts than dirt. Remus hadn't realised how weak he'd become until he had to practically let Tomny carry him up the stairs. It was slow-going, as he had to stop every fourth step or so to catch his breath.

"What's a'matter witchu, Lu?" Tomny grunted; "You actually get jumped on the way over or sumfin?"

Remus took another step and winced. Even his lungs had started to ache out in the cold.

"Ngh—sick. Got a chest infection."

"Fuck. You taking any meds?"

"Mhm... Left them behind."

"Bollocks."

Remus grimaced, nearly missing the next stair. "Sorry for interrupting your party."

"You didn't interrupt anything," Tomny huffed. "Those guys been 'ere goin' on three days now. I was getting ready to chase 'em out. Feelin' a bit 'humbug' as of late anyway."

That makes two of us, Remus thought bitterly.

They managed to get inside eventually, and thankfully it was warm. The flat smelt of stale cigarettes and the musk of many bodies, but Remus didn't care. Tomny carried him across the threshold and dropped him on the living room sofa—which was dingier than he remembered—before squatting down in front of him and reaching up to lift his eyelid with the pad of his thumb.

"You sure you ain't tweakin'?"

Remus shook his head. "S'just a fever."

Tomny tsked and checked his other eye. "And what was it you were doin' in Finchley?"

"Friend's place. Had to get out. Some… stuff's happened."

With another heavy sigh, Tomny released him and leaned back. “Can’t believe you came to me for medical help. Thought you public schoolboys were s’posed to be smart.”

“Jus’ wanted to see you,” Remus said honestly.

Tomny gave him a long look, like he couldn’t decide what insult fit him best. In the end he said nothing at all, just dropped his head and began unlacing Remus’ boots for him.

“Missed ya too, plonker.”

Feeling a bit weepy, Remus stared down at the top of Tomny’s head. The gold had faded from his hair as it always did during the cold months, leaving it soft and brown like a fallen leaf in autumn.

“Orright, up yeh go,” the older boy said, once he’d gotten both boots off. Snaking a hand under his armpits, Tomny pulled Remus to his feet and helped guide him down the hall toward the bedroom.

“Thanks,” Remus wheezed, as he collapsed down on the edge of the bed.

“You should drink something,” Tomny said as he straightened up. He left and came back with a coffee mug, passing it over with a little smirk. “Hope you still like the taste of London tap water.”

Remus gulped it down. “Tastes like home.”

Tomny nodded awkwardly and pressed his hands into his back pockets. “Well, you can stay ‘ere until yer feelin’ better. I’ll take the couch. No problem.”

"I don't mean to take your bed."

"You gonna make me tell ya to shut up again?"

“In that case,” Remus smiled meekly, “I hope you at least cleaned the sheets."

Tomny flicked him on the forehead. “You’ve clearly got jokes so guess that means yer gonna be jus’ fine.” Taking the empty mug, he mumbled something about medicine and turned to the door.

“Thank you, Tom.”

Tomny froze in the doorway, looking back at him. “You still got that scar, I see. S'not going away. It's stubborn… like you." He chuckled quietly. "You know, you could'a called first."

"I know," Remus nodded. "I'm sorry if I let you down."

"Nah. You know me, don't expect nuffin. Can't let me down if I'm expectin' nuffin, yeah?"

"Then I let the others down. I'm a shit friend."

At that, Tomny turned around and strode back into the bedroom. He stopped just before Remus, and placed a hand on his forehead, smoothing his hair back. "Be a shit friend then. You can fix the rest in the morning. When you're feeling better."

"Not sure that's how the world works."

"No, it is. Don't cha know? I know everything." Smirking, Tomny pushed him back onto the covers. "Sleep. I'll be right out 'ere."

He disappeared into the hall, leaving the door open a crack so that yellow light from the kitchen's hob could spill onto the floor. There was a light clatter of glassware on metal, then rushing water from a tap. Eventually Remus heard the faint sound of someone humming, and recognised the tune immediately.

"Mmm... You say goodbye, and I say hello… Hello, hello… I don't know why you say goodbye, I say hello..."

A lump formed in the base of his throat and Remus drew up the covers up to his nose. It was warm, comforting. The radiator was buzzing. Everything smelt familiar—like Tomny.

You say goodbye... I say hello...

Remus shut his eyes. Before he knew it, he was asleep.

Chapter End Notes

'Arey baap re' is a Hindi phrase that comes close to 'oh my god'.
The first song on the radio is "Livin' Thing" by Electric Light Orchestra, 1976.
Rasam is a South Indian soup while kadha is a variation of chai or black tea. Both are considered effective against sickness!
Biba was a women's fashion store in London.
'The Strand' is a major thoroughfare in London.

We have two more Christmas chapters left. Let's see how this resolves itself, yeah? Mwah.

Chapter 84: Christmas, 1977

Chapter Summary

Back at the flat for Christmas. Some has stayed the same, and much has changed.

Chapter Notes

HAPPY PRIDE DARLINGS!!!!! I hope you all tell someone you love them this month, and feel that love in return. You have it from me <333

Note: There's always a considerable amount of slang in these London chapters, so check the end notes before reading if you need to.

C/W: For domestic abuse (brief violence, nothing extreme) as well as hard drugs (cocaine) and addiction. Mentions of knives and blood, as well as violence. (No one dies or is seriously maimed, I swear.)

Also the wonderful r_moonpie has lovingly taken on the task of translating Cadence into Português brasileiro. You can find the link here and find them on twitter an tiktok @r_moonpie <3 I am open to any/all translations, I just ask that you message me on tumblr or tiktok first!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

No one knows what it's like,
To be the bad man;
To be the sad man,
Behind blue eyes;

No one knows what it's like,
To be hated;
To be fated,
To telling only lies;

But my dreams, they aren't as empty,
As my conscience seems to be;
I have hours, only lonely,
My love is vengeance that's never free…

- “Behind Blue Eyes” The Who, 1977

If you’d have asked, nine times out of ten, Remus Lupin would've told you that he did not dream. This was a lie of course, because everyone had dreams—Remus just barely remembered his. Every morning he woke up with the wisps of the night’s recital slipping away into the forgotten void, and he would go about his day thinking he had not dreamed at all. And really, this was how he preferred it. He had no interest in imagining that he could fly, or that he’d lost all of his teeth at once, or woken up in a room full of people completely starkers. In his later years, it’d even become a point of pride not to dream.

But you know what they say, the more you chase a high, the harder it is to achieve.

The memories came all at once as they tended to, tugged to the surface on an invisible line made of sickness and drugs. It was as though admitting his deepest secret had drawn them forth like an angry mob to the hanging. They came to him in night visions—cruel and lonely dreams built to fuck with his head. On those nights, he might have preferred the impossible. He’d have taken any hideous monster or man-made horror over the trudged up memories of his tiny, helpless self. It was like a trick—he was getting pranked by his own brain and he couldn’t even find the words to describe it afterwards. He simply woke up, memories made of the shape of his shirt buttons or the smell of a cooked meal dancing behind his eyes. Going from darkness to light as though he were leaving the theatre of a film without any meaning.

Just as a sad, sad film.

* * *

“Here, darling, open this one next. ‘To Remus, love Mummy and Daddy’.”

He took the gift eagerly. His fingers were small and round. Young, then. Inside the wrapped box he found a pair of gloves, made from hairsheep leather and fitted especially for those tiny fingers. He tried them on, mostly to make his mother happy, but when Hope slid the next present toward him, Remus quickly tossed the gloves back into their box to be forgotten.

“This one is from Mummy,” she grinned. It was a fully transistorised record player, complete in his own little plastic carrying case.

“It’s got five records even,” Hope preened, pointing to the outside of the box; The Four Seasons, Petula Clark, Herman’s Hermits, Peter and Gordan, and yes!—The Beatles.

“He’s never going to sleep now. He’ll be listening to that thing all night,” Lyall said, sitting behind them in one of the salon's expensive carven armchairs. He had a glass of sherry in one hand. Remus stared at it, and the glass winked at him in all the colours of the glittering Christmas tree.

“Music is enriching,” said Hope, as Remus forwent the winking glass and began tearing into the turntable’s box. She was sat on the rug beside him, hands folded neatly in her lap like a true lady. She looked pretty too, with her hair and makeup all done-up despite the early hour. It was astonishing, considering she'd only left the hospital the week before. Remus couldn't remember how he knew that.

Parallel to his wife, Lyall wore well-fitted slacks and a dress shirt, suited like he was ready for a day in the office rather than a holiday off. He was handsome too. Remus hoped he'd be handsome like that one day. For now all he had to wear were pyjamas with cowboys on them. After all, it was Christmas morning and he was only nine. Nine... It was to be expected.

“Are you happy, darling?” Hope smiled, as Remus fiddled with the player’s plug. He nodded, surveying the rest of his gifts. None of them came close to the turntable.

“Can I play it?” He asked, raising the Beatles’ 45. Lyall got to his feet a second later, his sherry glass empty.

“In your room,” he said, but when Remus scrambled to his feet to do so, Hope stopped them both.

“Hold on, darling, there’s one more!”

Remus could hardly believe it. There was more?

As Lyall slowly returned to his seat in the armchair to observe, Hope slipped across the room. “It’s a secret present!” She called, before pushing a large box out from behind the salon chaise. It was wrapped in all red, with a large gold bow on its top. Remus was elated instantly, and as his mother dragged it over the rug toward him, his fingers itched to release the gift from its paper prison.

“Who’s this one from, then?” Lyall asked.

“My aunt,” Hope answered simply, before depositing the gift down in front of Remus. “Go on then, darling. Open it!”

Remus wasted no time. He tore into the wrappings, eyes immediately shot wide. “A car!” he exclaimed, admiring the pictures along the front. “It’s a car!”

Hope joined him on the rug once more to admire the toy, folding her legs primly beneath her so as to not crease her skirt. “An RC car, how exciting!” She said. “And look, it runs on petrol, just like Giles’.”

Unable to wait anymore, Remus wrenched open the top of the box and began digging through the cardboard inside. He was excited—he was always excited on Christmas! But if he’d been paying any attention, he might’ve noticed the sceptical look on his father’s face as he inspected his empty sherry glass.

“Which aunt of yours was it then?” He asked Hope. She did not look at her husband, just continued to pet Remus’ hair.

“Aunt Justina.”

“Your mother’s sister?”

“Mhm, yes. The one who lives in Holyhead.”

“I remember. Just didn’t think Justina recalled much of Remus. He must’ve been, what—three months old the last time she visited? Certainly never sent gifts before.”

Hope’s voice turned tight; “Maybe she saw it and thought of him. He’s already ten.”

"You mean nine?"

"Yes, what did I say?"

Lyall sighed. “I just don’t understand how Justina could’ve arranged for such a thing. Not after being diagnosed with dementia four, five? Years ago…? Is her hospice in Holyhead as well then? Odd, considering I send the cheque to Blackpool every month.”

Remus looked up at his mother to find Hope’s expression to be very severe. She was smiling, but it did not quite reach her eyes. “Call it a Christmas miracle,” she replied, before grinning eagerly at her boy. “Remus, do you like it? Shall we race it around the garden?”

“Don’t be ridiculous, it’s freezing out,” Lyall said. “Remus, go play your records in your room. I need to speak with your mother.”

Remus might’ve argued, but he was having a hard time deciding which present he liked more. In the end he was quite agreeable to the record player, but just as he went to shut the lid on the RC car’s box, he noticed a little note slipped just between the inner wrappings.

“Remus, what’s that?” Hope asked, as he withdrew it.

“A card,” he said. “It’s got my name on it, Mummy.”

“Give it to me.”

Remus just about jumped. Behind him, his father had shot to his feet, towering down over the rug. His voice had gone stoney, like he was angry, but Remus couldn’t fathom why. The sudden shift had shocked him so badly he forgot to listen, and Lyall just reached down, grabbing him tightly by the wrist. It twinged immediately, and Remus whimpered.

“Remus Lupin, I said give it to me!”

“Don’t touch him!” Hope chirped, reaching across Remus and snatching the card away. She was on her feet in a second, and Lyall released Remus to chase her across the room.

“Hope, give me that card.”

“It’s Remus’ card—he deserves to see it.”

“For Christ's sake, it's Christmas. Don't go all batty on us now. Hand it over!"

“I won’t give it to you,” she replied, venomously. Then without a shred of hesitation, Hope tossed the little card into the fireplace. It was consumed instantly, leaving behind only curled paper ash as a reminder that it was even there in the first place. Seeing it burned, Remus thought that he should feel bad, but it was only a card, wasn’t it? And they’d had so many cards delivered over the holiday…

Lyall let out a heavy breath. “Remus, take your records upstairs.”

He gave his mother a quick look, before grabbing the little plastic record player and heading toward the salon doors. His slippers squeaked on the hallway wood, but the door had scarcely shut before he heard shouting.

"How dare you bring that son of a bitch into my house."

"It's Christmas, Remus deserves a present! God knows you're never around long enough to ask him what it is he wants!"

Remus clutched the record player tightly to his chest, frozen in place in the middle of the hallway. He liked all his gifts, he wanted to say. Even the gloves. He liked them.

"I want to take Remus away from here for a while," his mother said. "We need a break. And he deserves more than—"

"You will not take him anywhere! He's my son!"

"He is not yours! He's never been yours and we both know it! He's too gentle. And I wake up everyday grateful that he is nothing like you! If I could I'd take him from here myself!"

"You are sick. No court would give him to you, and the fact that you keep on pretending that this ridiculous fantasy of yours could ever come true is sick. It's time to grow up, Hope! Remus deserves structure, he deserves a home!"

"He deserves a father!"

Remus knew he shouldn't, but it'd been so long since he'd heard his parents shout like this. How long...? He crept back toward the salon door, pushing it open a crack. Inside he could see his mother, her back still turned toward the fireplace. He couldn't see his father, but he heard him.

"You try to take him from me, and I will have you put back in that hospital and throw away the key."

Hope bared her teeth. She had tears running down both cheeks. "So you'd keep us both here—imprisoned?"

"No. Leave if you want, but my son stays."

"You don't even want him!" She wailed. "You just want us all to stay here and be miserable! You're too afraid to be alone!"

“I won’t have you ruining anything else—not this home, and not Remus!”

“He’s already ruined,” Hope goaded. “He’s afraid of you, Lyall. He cries for you at night when you’re not there, but then come daytime he can’t even look you in the eye! You’ve ruined your son."

"I've ruined him?"

"Yes! He’s scared of you, Lyall. He's scared of you and he hates y—”

A hand shot out, quick as lightning, and caught Hope across the face. She yelped and collapsed to her knees on the rug, and Remus felt a gasp lodge itself in his throat. The record player fell from his hands, knocking the salon door open as it clattered to the floor. Lyall turned on him in a second, and all Remus could see was his mother crying as she cradled her cheek. In all his childhood, he had never seen his father hit anyone.

“Daddy…”

Lyall set his jaw, staring at Remus with a horrified expression. Finally he turned to Hope, still crying quietly, and bent down to her, helping her up.

“Darling, stand up. I’m sorry. Remus is… He’s—”

She lashed out all at once, shoving him away with a vicious snarl. “Don’t—!” She swore, before marching away from him. Lyall did not stop her, even as she took Remus’ arm and hauled him from the room. The last thing Remus saw of his father, he was staring into the fireplace. With his shoulders hunched like that he almost looked like a bear. A bear of a man...

They went straight upstairs to his bedroom, where Hope tucked him in despite the fact that it was still morning. Remus hadn’t the words to tell her, and afterwards she sat by his bed, gently stroking his dusky curls.

“Remus,” Hope started meekly; “If–If Mummy were to go somewhere, would you be a good boy and stay here? It’d only be for a little while.”

“Where are you going?”

“Just to see a friend.”

“Can’t I come with you?”

“Oh, well you see, it’s not really a trip meant for children. You’d be so bored.”

“No, I wouldn’t.” Fight back. You're not gentle, you're not a good boy.

His mother smiled and kissed his head. “It’s just a short thing. Really. It’s more of a…” Suddenly Hope began to choke up. She sniffled and wiped her eyes, forcing a smile. “Never mind, darling. You just get some rest. We’ll talk more in the morning.”

Remus glanced at the curtains—at the daylight peeking through them, didn't she see?—but his mother was already kissing his cheek. She left him without another word, and afterwards Remus sat up in bed, wondering if this meant he wasn’t allowed to leave his room for the rest of the day.

* * *

Someone was poking his cheek. Bugger. Why did he always have to be such a menace in the mornings? Worse than James...

“Ngh… Sirius… piss off…”

“No pretty boy ‘ere, m’fraid. Only me, sunshine.”

Holy—

Remus shot upright in bed. “Tom!?”

Tomny started laughing immediately. He was kneeling beside the mattress, already dressed like he was going somewhere with eyebrows drawn up in that wry way of his. “Glad to see ya can still sleep like the dead some nights,” he said. “You were moaning ‘a bit though. Bad dream?”

“Something like that…” Remus clutched his face, feeling haggard. It’d all felt so real. He could remember the dream, but the harder he thought on it, the blurrier the memory became. Like a stone slipping beneath the surface of a rippled lake. He pictured Hope’s pretty face. Did she know then that she’d be dead in a few months?

“Ugh… What time is it?”

Tomny shrugged. “Around noon. Didn’t wanna wake ya. You looked so peaceful.”

“Piss off.” Remus rubbed his face again. It was noon then, hours since he’d run off on his friends. Were they worried about him? Angry with him? He hoped they hadn’t bothered looking, that they’d just gone back to James’ and forgotten all about him.

“Hey.” Tomny poked him again. “Did’ya forget what day it was?”

Right! It was—

“Happy Christmas, Lu.”

Remus looked up to find himself presented with a plate stacked high with pancakes. Tomny grinned over the edge of the dish, before setting it down in his lap.

“There you are, flapjacks fresh from the griddle of yours truly. Made ‘em the American way, with syrup and everyfin. Well? Look good, don’t they?”

They did. And despite the fact that Remus’ stomach was in knots, he accepted the fork and took a bite. An immediate regret.

“Yeah," Tomny winced, after watching him grimace. "Didn’t 'ave any milk in, so I had to use water. No good?”

“No, s’not that… Just… s’a bit salty, Tom.”

Tomny groaned, snatching the plate back. “Shit. Could’ve sworn I’d used sugar. Ah well, never claimed to be one ‘a them Michelin chefs.”

Remus gave a half-smile. “Between the two of us, we’d burn toast.”

“Already done—can’t you smell it? It’s got that air of… ah, shit. I dunno the French word for toast.”

Sirius would know, Remus thought mildly. Or Tonya. Suddenly a coughing fit overcame him, and he hacked into his fist while Tomny stood by, looking uneasy.

“You good?”

“Fuh—F–Fine!” He wheezed, collapsing back into his pillow. Tomny leaned in after and clumsily pressed his palm to his forehead.

“Damn, you’re still warm.”

“You’re supposed to do it with the back of your hand.”

“Who’s the patient here?” Shoving his hand into his coat pocket, Tomny withdrew a small bottle of pills and set them on the nightstand. There was already a cup of water waiting for him, in a mug missing its handle.

“Take two of these,” he said.

“What are they?”

“Medicine, 'a course. Why, you expecting something more fun? Ha—Jokes… Should help with the fever though. Always got some downers kicking around too, if ya wanna sleep some more.”

“Tom, you didn’t need to buy medicine for me.”

“Pish. You think I was jus’ gonna let ya go out like Flacky? I’m not some poor bum anymore. Besides, got ‘em from a real doctor an’ everything—or he is a doctor, yeah, jus’ not licensed. S’medicine though, swears.”

Feeling a bit sore, Remus picked up the bottle to examine it before shaking a few pills out into his palm. He tossed them back and chased both with the water, before gesturing to the other side of the room. “Oi, pass me my coat?”

“Yeah, right. You’re not going outside like this. You’ll keel over and I’ll jus’ have to carry yer sorry arse back up those bloody stairs.”

“No, just pass it to me, dickhead.”

With a short ‘hmph’ Tomny turned and reached for the coat, which he’d abandoned on the half-busted chair in the corner of the room the night before, along with Remus’ boots. Once he passed it over, Remus began rifling around in the pockets and withdrew a folded up wad of cash. It was the money Lyall had gifted him, and when Tomny saw it his eyes bulged.

"Holy shit. Yer lucky ya didn't get jumped with all 'a that on ya, Lu."

Remus shrugged, then held out the wad. "Here. Take it."

"Wha...?"

"It's yours."

"Like 'ell it is. What're you doin' throwing that much dosh around?"

"It's for you," he insisted. “Call it a thank you. For everything you've done for me."

This time, Tomny eyed the money suspiciously. “Never asked ya for any money... I get on jus’ fine on my own, y'know.”

“I know,” Remus huffed, “but you’d be doing me a favour by taking it. Spend it on debts or girlfriends, maybe some damn milk—I don’t care. Call me posh or spoiled or whatever, but just take it... Take it. Please, Tom.”

Tomny appeared agitated, but after Remus shook his arm at him again he finally reached out and slid his hand along his wrist in one smooth movement, like a dealer pocketing his dough.

“Yer tryin’ to get me framed for embezzlement or summick, I know it.”

“ 'Course I am. Gotta keep you on your toes somehow.”

Tomny smiled lightly before looking down and adjusting the front of his own coat. “Listen, I—er—have to head out for a bit.”

“On Christmas?”

“Work never stops. Especially not for no ‘Father Christmas’ chap. ‘Sides, the holidays are busy. People get sad, and sad people, well, they…” Tomny trailed off, and suddenly Remus felt stupid.

“Right. Don’t worry about me. Do what you gotta do.”

With a gentle smile, Tomny reached out and ruffled Remus’ hair. “Orright. You just stay ‘ere while I'm gone. In fact—try going anywhere and I’ll have ya sectioned. Changed the locks last month so no one’ll come waltzing in. There’s a can ‘a soup on the stove, just heat it up, sleeping pills are in the bathroom cabinet. Borrow whatever you want too. There isn’t much else in for food, but have at ‘er. And I’ll bring back your damn milk.”

“I’d almost think you’d turned into a mum,” Remus mused, “if not for your poor attempt at breakfast.”

Tomny glanced at the plate of failed pancakes before smirking. Next thing Remus knew, he was being mauled by a hug.

“Aw—I’m just so happy to see ya, Lu!”

“Ugh—gerroff, you sop!”

Still beaming, Tomny stepped back and pointed a stern finger at him. “Eat. Sleep. Stay. I’ll be back later.”

Remus threw his coat, letting it smack against the door as Tomny slipped out. Tomny whistled as he made his way down the hallway, knocking his fists along the walls, and a few minutes later the front door banged shut and Remus was alone with only the sound of the whirring radiator for company. He took his medicine, and then the downers, because what else was there to do? And after a quick change of clothes, could already feel himself slowing.

When he awoke again it was already nighttime. He’d slept through Christmas, but somehow, Remus wasn’t all that bothered. The flat was quiet again; the kitchen light out and the bedroom blue cast from the tiny window that peeked out into the side alley. He felt better—miraculously; it was the first time in weeks he hadn’t sweat through his t-shirt while asleep.

A snore echoed from beside him. Turning over, Remus found Tomny asleep on top of the covers next to him, still in his clothes and hair completely sleep-mussed. He wasn’t the same sort of beautiful sleeper Sirius was—he was drooling a bit—but he was familiar.

“Tom…?”

Immediately Tomny’s eyes shot open, making Remus’ heart seize up. He squinted at him in the darkness, before his hand came up—unceremoniously slapping him on the forehead.

Remus blinked. “Ow?”

“Oh good,” Tomny yawned. “Yer fever’s broken. Try... mmm... Try sleepin’ sum more…”

With a weary grunt, Tomny turned over and Remus was left to stare at the broadness of his back. His shirt was frayed along the collar and his shoulders clung to the fabric. He was fair, even a bit freckled. Familiar.

Remus slept.

* * *

This time he was fourteen, sitting outside the headmaster's office and glaring at the floor. There was a thick knot in the floorboard between his feet, and when he shut his right eye it looked a bit like Giles' when he was angry. To pass the time, Remus switched back and forth, shutting one eye and then the other to see the expression change. The game was mindless, but it at least helped to distract from the twinge in his knuckles. Normally he'd be given some ice, but relief was reserved for misunderstood boys—not violent ones. He'd really stepped in it this time.

"You must understand, Mr. Lupin, it is one thing for boys to create rabble amongst one another—boys will be boys, as you know... But to attack a teacher…"

Remus almost smirked. He could still remember how it felt to stand over that miserable biology teacher. See the astonishment on his face —spit at him. You like that? You like hurting kids?! Then how 'bout I give you another, you dirty fu—

"I realise the gravity of the situation, Headmaster, but there must be something we can do to solve this."

His smirk vanished. He wished Lyall had not bothered to leave his meeting. He wished he'd left him there to rot. He didn't care if that made him ungrateful, or—

"As you well know, Remus is troubled. He lost his mother at a young age, and has never quite been the same."

Fuck you, fuck you, FUCK YOU!

"—But he is bright. A clever young man. I have no doubt he would continue to excel under the college's strict tutelage. These poor marks, the lashing out, it's simply a cry for attention. I'm afraid I haven't quite found the best way to satiate it, but I trust you'll understand when I say that I only want the best for my son."

"Yes, I understand, Mr. Lupin. But Remus' case is—"

"St. Joseph's has been good for him, and you have my word that I will personally oversee his penance. I'll do anything in my power to ensure he lives up to the standards of your exceptional institution. Should anything else be in order, I may... feel the need to inform you that the Lupin estate has been in the market recently for a such an institution to sponsor. A fine one. And St. Joseph's is more than fine. I hear it's just been ranked the leading boy's school in the country as far as academics."

"That is… true."

"And the board places a high value on physical sport as well?"

"Of course. We at St. Joseph's believe there is benefit to feeding the mind as well as the body."

"I agree, naturally. Boys like Remus stand much to gain from the basic run-around. It is true that your students boast the highest Oxbridge acceptance rates of any secondary school or college, yes?"

"Come now, Mr. Lupin, you already know the answer to that."

"Forgive me, Headmaster. I jest. But I've heard rumour that the gym's roof needs to be redone. If there's anything we can do, sir, I implore you not to hesitate…"

There was silence, and Remus ground his teeth together. Lyall was going to buy his way back in, of course he was.

"Be that as it may, Mr. Lupin, my hands are tied," said the crotchety Headmaster; "Professor Wright has been with this college for many 'a year, and is a well-respected part of the academic community. He's agreed not to press charges under the condition that Remus is expelled from St. Joseph's, and a few other sparing reparations are met. I'm sorry, but outside of that, there is nothing more I can do."

The silence that followed sounded a lot more like the pounding of a gavel. He'd been sentenced, and the sentence was exile.

Good riddance.

The office door opened, and Lyall Lupin stalked out into the hall. He shut the door after himself, before stopping next to Remus' chair. Even with his head bowed in misfortune, he was still a ginormous man.

"Get up."

Remus didn't so much as play at hesitating. He'd gotten what he'd wanted since September—a first class ticket out of the stuffy boys' college—but that didn't mean he was out of the woods entirely. He followed his father down the hallway, then the looming staircase, where they finally crossed the hall's foyer and passed beneath the painting of Jesus and Saint Joseph that hung over the school's front doors.

By then Remus was dragging his feet. He could see Giles at the head of the school's drive, standing stoically beside the Rolls with his hands crossed in front of him. Closer still was Lyall, his back to his son as he walked. Remus hadn't seen either of them in weeks, and as they descended the school's front step, he imagined the ride home to Blackheath and the words just came tumbling out.

"It's not my fault! That teacher's dirty. He makes us slam our fingers in our desks or stand the entire day if he catches us talking out of turn. He uses the strap and never lets you go to the toilet during lessons, no matter what you say. He's always giving you detention for no reason, and he humiliates you the moment you say the wrong answer, and—"

"That's enough!" Lyall roared, whipping around and grabbing Remus by the shoulders. "I've heard enough!"

"It wasn't me! It wasn't my fault! That shitty teacher went after another kid, I just—"

"You just, Remus!"

"He hits us! He hits us and no one cares. He pinches you on the back of the neck till you cry—and last week made another kid eat soap until he threw it all up! I hate this place! I hate it! I hate it! I HATE YOU!"

"ENOUGH!"

Remus blanched. He wanted to keep shouting, but the grip his father had on his shoulders was tight enough to bruise. He had to bite his tongue to avoid whimpering, but just then Lyall's gaze drifted upwards, off over his shoulder. Remus could see it on his face; shame, shame. And so Lyall released him and stood back, straightening his suit.

"Get in the car."

Lyall Lupin did not wait. Instead he trudged down the gravel drive toward the silver Rolls-Royce, where Giles was waiting with the door open. Remus hung back, rubbing the soreness from his biceps. He'd nearly missed it, but then the hair on the back of his neck stood on end, and he turned around to find several boys watching him from the school's windows. They looked like ghosts. Well-dressed, cherub-faced ghosts. In their eyes they wore a glazed layer of judgement.

You never belonged here.

Freak.

Get lost.

Remus raised a hand, and flipped every one of them off.

* * *

When he woke again, he found Tomny bent over the bedside table, cutting a small line of white powder with a razor blade. It looked like Tonya's stardust, but when Remus nudged him, wanting a hit, he was met with a shake of the head.

"Nice try. This tosh s'off limits to toffs."

"What is it?" Remus croaked.

"S'nothing. M'just taking a bump."

"Let me try."

"No, and I ain't tellin' ya again."

"Hmph. Stingy bastard."

Rolling his eyes, Tomny licked his finger to wipe up the rest of the powder and rub it along his gums. "Just go on, sleep sum'more. You need it."

"Fine. But at least give me something for the dreams," Remus begged. "Please."

Tomny stared at him for a moment, with pupils the size of a ten pence, then reached for the bedside drawer. He pulled out a fresh bottle of pills—downers, with the label torn off.

"No more than two."

Remus took three, and was asleep again before his head even hit the pillow.

This time, there were no dreams. No Hope, no Lyall, no pitiful boy caught between the two. The sleeping pills succeeded in knocking him out for almost another full day, and when Remus finally stirred again, it was to the shrieking of the flat's phone.

"Those fuckin' cunts," Tomny groaned, dragging himself out of bed and leaving Remus to turn over drowsily. He could faintly hear him in the living room, grumbling haggard answers before finally slamming the receiver down and reappearing in the bedroom's doorway.

"So… dinner?"

Remus loved Tomny, he did, but the man couldn't cook to save his life.

"How do you live like this?" He demanded, throwing away an entire bag of potatoes that had sprouted in one of the bottom cupboards. He'd found what he thought was an unexpired jar of tomato sauce, only to crack the thing open and cringe at the sour smell. "There are teenagers younger than some of the food in this kitchen, Tomny."

"You sound like Tonya," Tomny chuckled. His face fell a second later as though he'd remembered who he was talking to, and Remus gave him a gentle look.

"We're going shopping tomorrow."

A mixture of relief and amusement spread across Tomny's features. "Yeah, orright. In the meantime, how d'ya feel about Chinese?"

Together they bundled up and skipped down to the nearest take-out shop, which had supposedly opened sometime over the summer. Remus remembered the building as a laundrette and it still had the same chipped tile flooring, only now was dressed up in all red with cheap paper lanterns hanging from the ceiling and dragons and pandas displayed across every surface.

"The dim sum here's great," Tomny said, toying with his paper menu. Remus meanwhile, was still busy reeling from what he'd heard on the walk over.

"I can't believe Doss had a kid!"

“Believe it,” Tomny said. “Born at the end of November—same day as me, even! He sent me a photo, I’ll show ya later. Little blighter looks jus’ like ‘im. Huge nose, lil’ eyes—a smile like a summer’s daisy.”

“And this girlfriend of his actually let him name the kid ‘Lenny’?”

Tomny shrugged. “It was his dad’s name.”

Remus began fiddling with his chopsticks. “S’good that the two of you still talk.”

“Well, can’t imagine being a dairy farmer’s all that interesting. But yeah, he seems happy. Says he’s gonna propose as soon as he can get the money together for a proper ring.”

“I should send him something. As a congrats.”

“Like what? A box of fags? I can see it now—‘for Lenny on his first birthday’.”

Remus dipped his fingers in his water and flicked them at him. “No, you twat, like some money.”

“You must be rolling in it for reals, what with that fat stack you threw at me.” He set his menu aside and patted his pocket pointedly.

“It’s just my dad trying to pay me off,” Remus dismissed. “Wants me to go to uni after I’m done this year. But he and his new wife are in the Riviera, so he got Giles to line my pockets a bit... Didn’t want it anyway.”

"Must be nice, to just turn your nose up at free cash."

Remus frowned, and Tomny licked his lips.

"Sorry, didn't mean nothing by it. But hey... You got a step-mum now?”

“Mhm. Haven’t seen her since summer though. It’s whatever.”

“She a bitch then?”

“No,” Remus shook his head, “just a woman. She likes cars… and horses. God, it sounds so dumb.”

“Nah. Glad to hear it’s not her you’re runnin’ from.”

“Who says I’m running from anything?”

“Everyone’s runnin’ from something. And I’ll bet…” he tapped his finger on the table top; “it has something to do with whatever’s going on in Finchley.”

Ugh. Remus looked away stubbornly.

“So you wanna tell me what it is that’s chased you back ‘ere?”

“I came back to see you.”

“Uh-huh, sure.”

“I did!”

“Yeah, yeah, you love me. Now spit it out. What—girlfriend trouble?” He gave him a wry look. “Boyfriend trouble…?”

“You’re a dick.”

Tomny drummed his hands on the table. “Whoooh! I swears, Lu baby —sometimes I’m too good! Orright, what’s the posh boy done now? Do I need to break some fingers?”

“The only thing that you’re going to be breaking is your nose,” Remus warned, shaking a fist at him. “Besides, he’s not my—my boyfriend anymore…”

Tomny raised his eyebrows. Their waitress stopped by to drop off some napkins, and he waited until she was out of earshot to speak again. “So what happened then? You two break up?”

“Let’s just say that he wanted more than I could give.”

“... Like anal?”

He wanted to be angry—god, did he—but Remus couldn’t help smiling. Cringing all over, he buried his face in his hands as Tomny snorted in the booth across from him.

“Not that I blame you! The idea of something goin’ in where stuff’s only ever gone out? Yeesh.”

“Can we please just talk about something else?!”

“Well, now I gotta know! Does a bloke give better blow jobs since he’s already got all the—uh… same equipment?"

Horrified, Remus reached across the table to smack Tomny some, only he misjudged his reach and ended up knocking over his water cup, soaking the table top and most of Tomny's lap in the process.

"Aw, c'mon Lu! Warn a mate before you finish all over his trousers."

"You fucking deserved that, you nasty wanker," Remus hissed, snatching half the napkins and soaking up his mess. He tossed the rest at Tomny, who watched him with a smug grin as he dabbed at his lap.

"If he wanted more than you could give, then you were right to end it," Tomny told him. "Get out before things nosedive."

"They already nosedived," Remus said soberly, thinking of their last night at school.

"Yeah, but nobody likes being that final thread that's left hanging on. Trust me."

Remus glanced back at Tomny sheepishly. "Tom, we never did talk much about Tonya."

"Ah, what you dredgin' up ancient history for? It's been almost a year, and I haven't heard from 'er once. Bet she's halfway around the world by now—stowin' away on any freight train that'll get her where she wants to go. So you can stop worrying, Lu, I've already made my peace with it."

"You have, then."

Tomny nodded, and it was genuine. "She was sum'um, orright. Not likely to find another one like 'er around 'ere, but who says you only get one great love in your life?" His eyebrows furrowed together thoughtfully. "D'ya know, she used to tell me that talkin' to you was like talkin' to some sort of imaginary friend or whatever. You were so far removed from all the bad shit, that I think talkin' to you made her forget everythin' else for a little while. It stung a bit when she first told me that. Made me think, 'why can't I be that person for you?'—but eventually I realised that I thought the same thing. You're a comfort, Lu. You heal people."

"No," Remus said. "I don't heal people, Tom. I'm a walking bomb. I blow up."

“Oi, no self-pity when we’re eating Chinese.”

Remus shook his head hopelessly. “I think it was easier when I thought you were mad at me.”

Tomny cracked another grin and leaned across the table, pushing the wet napkins aside to take both of Remus’ hands. “Hey, look at me,” he said, squeezing his fingers. “I’m not mad at you, never was. Not really. I just lost my head a bit there. I mean, how could I ever hate you—hate my Lu?”

Flustered, Remus scrunched up his face, but squeezed Tomny’s hands in return. “You sure you’re not a ponce, Tom?”

“Hm, why don’t you give me another smooch and we’ll see?” Clamping down on his fingers, Tomny pulled himself across the table while Remus moaned in a shrill voice and tried to pull away.

“M’on!” Tomny cackled. “Just one little peck and I’ll know for sure!”

“You’re such a—” Remus opened his eyes, just in time to spot a group of three men emerge through the restaurant’s front doors. He might have paid them no attention at all had they not looked straight at them. Reading the alarm on his face, Tomny dropped Remus hands and spun around in the booth, sagging a bit when he noticed the men. By then they'd already waltzed past several open tables straight towards them.

When he spoke, man in front carried an Irish accent that instantly put Remus on edge. He had no idea how much sway the Irish still had in the end, but it was surely enough to want to avoid them. Beyond that he was large, with a thick scar running across his chin and a nasty look all-over. He could've been a Bond villain, or at least one of the underpaid cronies. But since neither he nor Tomny were packing one of 007's pistols, it could only mean bad news.

“I thought that was you, Armstrong," the guy crooned. "What's the craic, ya wee dryshite?"

“Nice to see you too, Benny,” Tomny answered stoically. The gangster smirked at his tone, before glancing at Remus like a predator eyeing up his next meal. His two guys stood quietly behind him, and for a brief moment Remus thought he recognised one of them, but before he could place the face, Benny had already leaned in and placed a hand on the table between them.

“Yeah, we’s spotted you through the window. Thought it only courteous to drop in and say ‘ello. Happy Christmas, n' all that... So who’s this—yooer new girlfriend?”

“He’s a kid,” Tomny replied staunchly. “And we’re about to eat dinner, so how ‘bout we do this later, maybe?”

“Ah, but like me mam always say, there’s really nathin’ like discussin’ business over a fine meal. Boys—saddle in, maybe?”

Before Tomny could object any further, the group had crowded around the end of their booth and Benny had dropped down next to him with a satisfied grin. The other two stopped briefly on Remus’ side, indicating with a jerk of their heads that he should stand. Remus reluctantly did so, only to be pushed back down into his seat, now sandwiched between the two of them.

“Skinny one, aren’t ya?” The familiar one chuckled from his left side, dropping an arm along the back of the booth. Remus didn’t dare look him in the eye now; even his voice made the hair on the back of his neck raise.

“So, Army!” Benny clapped his hands together. “I ‘eard through the auld grapevine that you talked to Scotty earlier.”

As he spoke, Remus remembered the phone ringing—Tomny’s exasperated voice.

“Then you’d know that we’ve already been over everything,” Tomny ground out. “We worked out a deal. He’s gonna get his share and then some, and the rest goes to you. We just need another few days to move the leftover merchandise.”

“See, s’funny you’d say that though, considering we’s also ‘eard that chu went by Mikey’s place yesterday.”

Remus didn’t know who ‘Scotty’ or ‘Mikey’ were, but judging by the way the colour drained from Tomny’s face, he doubted either news was all that good. Benny on the other hand didn’t seem to notice, and their waitress arrived, glancing warily between the newly enlarged group as she set their food down.

“Thanks, cailín,” Benny grinned. “And if you don’t mind, I’ll get some o’ dahse fried noodles—the ones with the lettle shrimps on ‘em.”

She nodded before shuffling quickly away, and Benny picked up one of Tomny's chopsticks to stab it crudely into a piece of pork and pop it into his mouth. "So, where was I," he chewed; "Ahh yeah, that's right —our lettle birdy said you'd already worked out a deal. Sahmethin' like—ah, what was it—twenty KG's? Tell me Armstrong, 'ow're you and yooer boys gahnna move twenty feckin' KG's of snow for Mikey when you're s'posedly still workin' on that ten for us?"

Tomny set his jaw, fists clenched on top of the table. "There's no deal with Mikey. Twenty KG's? That's impossible—must be some sort of joke. I mean, Christ, we had to wait for the cops to stop sniffin' around just to get your shit back on the street."

"Oh yeah…? Bad for business, those gardaí." Benny leaned back and began fumbling for something inside his jacket pocket. For a single terrified second Remus pictured him pulling out a blade, but when Benny drew his hand back, it was just a carton of cigarettes. He peeled the cover back and stuck one between his teeth before offering them to Remus. "Want one?"

"He doesn't," Tomny clipped.

"Shut up, Army. Let the kid answer for 'imself," Benny scoffed. "You deaf, kid?"

"That means you answer," the thug on Remus' left growled. He raised a hand, shoving his head forward, and Remus swallowed.

"… No thanks."

"S'all you 'ad to say," Benny replied casually, tucking the cigarettes away. "Got a light dere, wee pup?"

He nearly declined again, but something in his gut and in Tomny's gaze told him not to make both of them liars. With the thugs watching his every move, Remus slipped his hand down into his pocket and withdrew the first zippo he found—the silver plated one from James and Sirius. Forcing his hands not to shake, he reached across and held the little flame to the end of the gangster's cigarette before clicking the lid shut.

"Ah," Benny exhaled. "So you say there's no deal, Army—alright. S'a bit contradictory from what I've 'eard but sure, I'll believe ya. I'm all about givin' me boys the benefit o' the doubt. S'long as they're contrive and all that."

"Contrite," Remus said automatically.

“What’s that?”

“You mean contrite. You want them sorry. Repentant.”

Benny raised his eyebrows and shot a look at Tomny, who looked about ready to keel over. “Well, look a’dat, Armstrong. You got yooerself one wiff some brains this time! Where’d you find ‘im, eh? The Queen’s palace?” He leaned in to Remus. “You some lettle runaway, gobshite?”

“I told you he’s just some stupid kid,” Tomny tried again, more forceful this time; “He’s got no hand in any 'a this, so if you want to talk to fucking business then bloody talk!”

The corner of Benny’s mouth jerked and he sat back up, smiling warmly. Then he snatched Tomny up by the throat and pinned him to the booth.

Remus bolted upright from his seat in defence of his friend, but both thugs had him by the shoulders in a second, pinching him so tightly he nearly cried out. He would’ve fought them—he would’ve—had Tomny’s arm not shot out, stopping him. The look in his eyes was not fear for the hand wrapped around his windpipe, but a warning for him; Don’t.

"Watch it, kiddo," Benny cautioned, squeezing Tomny's throat tightly in his fist. "I think yer forgetting jus' who's house you moved into..."

Feeling useless, Remus had no choice but to slump back against the cheap leather booth. He opened his hand on the table top, dropping the wooden chopsticks he’d been clutching like knives, and Benny smirked.

“There's a smart boffin,” the one on his left snarked. Remus looked at him then, fully and up close, and finally he recognised him. It was the blue eyes that tipped him off. They were clear as glass—the exact same pair that had stared him and Tonya down in that dirty alley. Suddenly Remus felt as though he were breathing through a straw again. The scar over his nose throbbed.

“Army, Army, Army..." The gangster's voice was deadly low, even as Tomny struggled against him. "We give you and yooer boys three weeks to get the job dahne—yeh don’t—and then you lip me in front o’ a kid?”

“You’ll get yer money!” Tomny wheezed.

“For feck’s sake—no apology? Are you actually bein’ mouthy again?!” The gangster bellowed. “Dahn’t you even know who I am, you lettle motherfucker? I will put you in the ground before you even ‘ave the chance to start pissing yooerself—if I don't get what’s due! You hear me?! I'll feckin' burst ya, I will!”

He punctuated the threat by slamming his free hand on the table hard enough to make the glasses shatter. Somewhere else, Remus heard their waitress shriek.

“Tom!” Remus cried, straightening against Blue-eyes’ hold on him; “Just give him the money already!”

Tomny shook his head as best he could while pinned, mouth forming a silent plea to get Remus to shut up. Enraged, Benny shook him.

"Where's my fucking money, Armstrong?! What do you got?"

“Tomny, just fucking give it to him!”

“Shut up, you!” Blue-eyes hissed after, raising his fist. Remus flinched, waiting for the incoming blow.

“Alright!” Tomny’s cries cut between them like a strangled yelp, and he gestured desperately to his pocket. “Th—ere!” He gurgled; “T—ake it!”

Looking slightly astonished, Benny used his free hand to reach into Tomny’s coat and withdraw the thick fold of notes, courtesy of Lyall and now bound together with a rubber band. It stung to see the money clasped in the gangster’s fat fingers, but not as bad as it did watching Tomny go blue in the face in the middle of a fucking Chinese restaurant.

“Colour me surprised. Where’d a ponce like you get dis much dosh? You selling your arse now?” Benny look across the table. "You selling his?"

“Who cares?” Remus growled. “It’s yours now. Call it interest on whatever he owes. Just let him go—you’re choking him!”

Benny glanced back at Tomny like he’d quite forgotten the iron grip he had around his throat and slowly relaxed his fingers, letting Tomny spin away and cough sharply.

“Tell you what, Armstrong—since you’ve got yooer puppy so well trained, imma let you off ‘fer the night.” He pat Tomny on the shoulder in a friendly manner, and Tomny quickly scrambled out of the booth.

“Lu… Lu,” he panted, gesturing desperately for Remus to join him. Remus went to stand, but was pulled back into his seat as Benny wheeled on him.

“You seem like a smart one, kiddo. A word o’ advice though—I’d drop the pox bottle. Because next time I’m naht coming back for the interest, I’m comin’ back for the whole thing." Grinning, Benny extended an arm and traced a line down the side of Remus' mouth. "Let me know if you're ever looking for a new gig, eh?"

Remus wrenched his face away, disgusted, while the gangster continued to leer at him. He stood first, and turned on Tomny sharply.

"And you Armstrong," he smiled, picking a piece of lint from Tomny's jacket. "Go n-ithe an cat thú is go n-ithe an diabhal an cat. You know what that means? Means, you get my money, or mark me words, I'll be spittin' on yooer grave. Understood?"

Tomny scowled. "Yeah."

"Sorry? Don't think I heard you. I said, do you understand?"

"Yes, I understand."

"There's a good laddie." Slapping Tomny lightly on the cheek, Benny finally turned away and Remus was roughly pushed into the aisle as the three men strode out of the restaurant, the door chime clattering after them. For a second neither of them breathed, and then Tomny was rushing him.

“You okay, Lu?” He demanded, helping him to his feet.

“Yeah,” Remus murmured, “Yeah, m'fine, Tom...”

"That fucking Benny... I didn't—shit."

Tomny bit his lip hard before turning his face away and pinching his forehead. Feeling suddenly exhausted, Remus looked around to find their waitress and the kitchen staff gaping at them from the back of the restaurant.

“Bill please…”

They walked home in silence, their shoulders occasionally bumping into one another as they swayed. It took Remus almost four streets to realise that Tomny’s silence wasn’t in favour of any forlorn sulking, that rather he was too busy looking out for their surroundings—his eyes trained on every dark corner and crack just in case Benny and his guys had doubled-back to wait for them. He relaxed some when the flat’s rusted gate came into view, and together they dragged themselves up the stairs to the second floor, stomping along as though their feet were encased in cement.

“Well, that was fun,” Remus said blandly as he pulled his boots off and Tomny threw the bolt into place. He wouldn’t look at him, and Remus felt a zap of anger.

“I’m only kidding—that was fucking awful.”

“I hope you’re still not planning on being a therapist,” Tomny mumbled, shucking off his coat and running a hand through his wild hair. “M'gonna crash, I think. Make sure you eat—and take your meds. Don’t want yer fever coming back.”

“You mean we’re not going to talk about what just happened? You're really just going to fuck off, just like that?”

“What’s there to say?”

“How ‘bout—what the fuck, Tomny?! Who were those guys?”

“C’mon, Lu,” Tomny scoffed, taking a package of cigarettes out of his back pocket and lighting up in the middle of the living room; “Thought you were supposed to be the smart one?”

“I’ll kill you if you make a joke out of this.”

“Good. Saves Benny the trouble."

Remus could have thrown something. Then he realised where he was —a second later and the lo mein was decorating the wall over Tomny’s shoulder.

“Orright,” Tomny said, peeking at the wall; “That’s your share.”

“Tomny, just talk to me! Tell me what I can do to help!”

Out of all the things he could’ve said, this was perhaps the worst.

Remus wished he'd insulted him—pushed him—made him angry, but instead all he'd done was beg. And Thonas Armstrong did not beg.

"There is no fucking 'help', Lu!" He exploded, pelting the oppsite wall with his cigarette carton. "Life does'na always get fixed jus' 'cause you want it to! No matter how good you are, or how badly you want things to go yer way—it ain't mean you'll get it! Because life's just shit! And you need to get over this idea 'a yours that you're—that you're gonna fucking save me, or something! Because you ain't! This is fucking reality, so get with the bloody program or GET THE HELL OUT!"

It was agony to hear, and Remus dropped his head, lips trembling as he clamped them shut. Tomny stood across from him, jaw clenched tightly, hands fisted at his sides. His pupils were huge again, though this time it couldn't be all drugs.

"Who are we?" Remus whimpered. "What's done this to us...?"

Tomny lifted a hand, wiping beneath his nose. When he breathed it was laboured, like yelling had taken everything out of him.

"Can't all be winners, mate... Some of us just get participation ribbons."

That night they laid in bed next to each other, and the space between them might as well have been an infinite chasm. Tomny had forgotten to leave the hob light on, pitching in them darkness, and the radiator kept switching on and off sporadically, leaving the entire flat in a chill. Neither of them had said anything since the argument, and Remus could feel himself sinking—going crazy in his own head, just as Sirius had said he would.

He resents you. They all do. Teachers, parents, friends…

Not Tom, Remus told the voice; Never Tom.

Even in his mind, it felt like a lie. Remus would resent him, had their situations been reversed. Even Saint Joseph himself would've been hard-pressed to find the space in his heart for such forgiveness. But as far as rough, street-raised, drug dealers went, Tomny was pretty saint-like.

"Tom… are you awake?"

"… Yeah, m'awake…"

Remus could've cried.

"I'm sorry."

For a while there was nothing, until a hand slid across the bed in search of another. When Remus found it, he held on tight.

"… Me too, Lu."

* * *

"C'mon, Lu, dance wiff 'er!"

Even dreaming, Remus felt as though he might throw up.

"No way, you dance with her, Lee!"

"Bloody fuck—if you two're gonna blather on for this long then I'll dance with 'er," Tomny said, pushing past both of them toward the blushing, doe-eyed girl that'd been steadily drifting closer and closer throughout the evening. Remus wasn't the least bit bothered; Tomny was tall and fit, and he was gangly and awkward. Not to mention he was only thirteen; girls still scared him a bit.

"Ah, don't worry none, Lu," Lee hollered, dropping an arm around his shoulders. "You'll get yer end away one 'a these days."

Remus bristled a bit, embarrassed, but the room was noisy enough that no one else had overheard. It was sweltering inside the hall, it being July, but they'd all eagerly piled into the dance anyway, its cement-covered walls and fluorescent lighting the only indication that they were actually in an old garage. Someone had turned those off though, in favour of flashing lights that turned the entire room into a strobing rainbow. There was a stereo in, playing music loud enough to get drunk to. Kids filled up every crevice, dancing and leaning against one another in a shared haze. It was pure party madness.

"Here, Lu!"

Someone passed him a flask. He didn't even know what it was, but it burned going down and afterwards they handed him a spliff. Round and round the circle it went, and when they were finished there was always more. Remus was off his trolley, knackered to the nines. He was up! Up, up, up! And with his judgement so severely impaired, Lee even managed to wrestle him into dancing with another girl with braids in her hair. It was a slow song, and he held her waist awkwardly as they swayed. She was taller than him too, maybe a bit older, but Giles had said that he was due for a growth spurt any day now. Hopefully.

“Yeah, go Lu!” Lee cried, as he and Doss stood on the hall’s sidelines, a girl on either side of them. “Now lips ‘er!”

"Don't be so crude, Lee!" One of the girls scoffed. "He's just a baby."

"No, 'e ain't! He's a man, aren't cha?! Go on, Lu, slip 'er the tongue!"

Remus’ eyes bulged, but when he looked back to his dance partner, he couldn’t tell if her expression meant she was expecting it or too nervous to suggest it herself. In the end he settled for asking her name. Mweer-in. He didn’t even know how to spell it. Oh god—was his first kiss going to be with a girl whose name he couldn’t even spell?!

Giving Mweer-in a tight smile, Remus glanced back towards his friends in search of solace only to find that Lee and Doss had both gone, effectively leaving their dates alone on the side of the dance floor. Pulling away from his partner, he spun around, and finally spotted his friends near the back of the hall. They had Tomny between them, heads tucked tightly together with a deep glower on each of their faces. Others had joined them, familiar boys and older guys that Tomny knew. Remus had only just begun to get acquainted with the rest of the gang, but he knew the group well enough to know that things were not right. They were staring, then pointing at something—or rather, someone. A lot of someones.

Another group, this one smaller than theirs and all but foreign to Remus, had gathered across the room. They were glaring back with their hands in their pockets, the tell-tale sign of unwelcome party crashers. The dance was happening on claimed territory, and territory was all about reputation. The weak lost out, while the strong stood their ground.

Ditching the dance mid-song, Remus quickly shoved his way through the crowd. He reached his friends just as Tomny and Doss broke off from the group and challenged the ones up front. The threat was clear; get out or get beat.

For a second there was hostility; the invading boys fought back—we’re just here to have a good time, mate!— and Remus began to see knives come out, clutched by those willing to go down for their leader and their turf. But it was unnecessary; the enemy was outnumbered five to one, and the entire dancehall had come to a standstill just to watch. They were muscled out by Tomny and his boys easily enough, and once the threat was finally gone, the party resumed. Remus went to Tomny, interested and concerned, and the dark mask Tomny had worn lifted instantly.

“Lu, baby! You snog anyone yet?”

He almost said yes, just to get the tosser off of his back, but then suddenly the window to their left exploded in on itself. Rocks and dirty beer bottles were hurled through the glass, shattering each of the hall's window's with a deafening crash. The music cut out, and for a while there was only screaming and shouts of confusion and anger. When the shattering finally ceased, everyone stood around, stunned. Some had been cut by flying glass—a girl was holding her hand over her eye while blood leaked out between her fingers. Remus paled seeing it, and that was when he felt the warm trickle drip down the side of his neck.

"Aw, shit. Lu!"

While Lee and Tomny crowded around him, Remus raised his hand to the shell of his ear and felt a sharp sting. He'd been cut, a shallow graze along the top of his left ear. It smarted terribly though it probably looked worse than it was. He couldn't be sure, before Tomny could check it out, another boy ran in.

“WOTCHER, SISSY LADS! COME ON THEN, SHOW US WHATCHU GOT!?”

He finished his shout with the resounding smash of another beer bottle on linoleum. It might as well have been a war cry. It was their ‘Tongs ya bass’. It was a challenge, and they were naught but stupid kids.

All of them started running at once, eager to exert their aggression on another. Even Tomny, as charismatic and as friendly as he was, was not immune. He led his angry mob straight out of the hall where more boys were waiting with large stones and heavy sticks in hand. They fled quickly enough, but by then it’d become a chase.

“Fuck your Hamlets, peaky bitch!” The enemy wailed. “Fuck your Ends, sodding wastemen!”

It was terrifying and exhilarating at the same time. Remus had never been so close to such action, and he ran like his life depended on it, in too deep to stop. He didn't know that the chase would end the moment the other boys crossed back into their territory—he had no idea where his territory even stopped and theirs began. He was drunk, high, and thirteen, and the blood was coating his neck. He did not hear his friends when fell behind, shouting and whistling at him, desperately trying to get him to stop.

"Lu! Where ya going, ya daft cunt?"

"Get back 'ere! You'll get yerself killed, you will!"

He'd outrun most of them, his skinny arms and legs carrying him up the bricked lane. If he were thinking, it'd probably be something along the lines of how proud Tomny would surely be when he caught their assailants—but there was no catching them. He was a kid in over his head, and he didn't realise how fucked he was until it was too late.

He'd chased the small group all the way into a council estate, where he plunged deeper and deeper into the cement kingdom, flying up and down stairs and walkways layered in spray paint and gang signs. They were warnings—stay away—and Remus did not listen. As he threw himself around a final bend, there they were. At least twenty boys lying in wait, each wearing their bovver boots, carrying a knife or a lead pipe with nasty expressions on their faces. Fresh meat, the looks seemed to say. Easy kill. No problem.

"That's peak, tiny man," said the one in front. "Why don't ya come 'ere a moment?"

It was not an open invitation. He stepped back.

"Oi, where you going?"

Another step.

"C'mere, little sop!"

"Yeah, we won't hurt ya!"

Another.

"Didn't cha fuckin' 'ear 'im? C'mere!"

Remus did the only thing he could think of—he turned and ran. Ran like a scared rat with his tail between his legs. In only a few seconds, he'd gone from the hunter to the hunted, and this time he was going to be gutted for it. His ear ached—stung as it was whipped by the wind. He was afraid.

"DON'T JUST STAND THERE! FUCKING GET 'IM!"

In the dream, it was as though he was running for hours. He couldn't breathe, every time air went in, his lungs just about collapsed getting it out again. He could hear the boys at his back, screaming like a pack of wolves. A bottle smashed by his ankles, a stone hit him in the back. They'd rip him apart if they caught him—they wanted to hurt him. And all because of some stupid dance.

"LU! OVER 'ERE!"

The cry went up like an alarm, and suddenly boys were rushing past him—toward the fray. The immense relief that came with seeing his friends again had Remus collapsing onto a patch of grass off the side of the pavement, his legs complete mush. All around him kids were barking and wailing on one another, using everything from bricks to broken bottles as weapons. Remus could only wheeze, doubled over and looking around desperately for Tomny. Then someone came up from behind and socked him with a pipe. It only clipped his shoulder, but the pain was instant, and Remus howled, clutching his arm. For a while there was only noise, and then when things started to drift away, a set of hands grabbed him.

"NO! NO! LET ME GO! TOMNYYY!"

"Fuck! It's me, ya wee cunt!"

Remus opened his eyes. Their attackers were gone—fought off—and only his friends were left. It was Tomny who was bent over him, bleeding from the temple and grinning ear to ear.

"Boy, you sure can run, Lu," Tomny panted. "But I found ya… I'll always find ya…"

* * *

When he woke up, Remus had no idea what day it was. The clock on the bedside was busted as well, but it felt about midday. Tomny was still asleep beside him, and as he watched his chest rise and fail, Remus thought only of his friends. He lifted one hand up, tracing it along the shell of his ear. There was a scar; how had he never noticed it before?

You're a betrayer, Lu.

Lee's voice came at him like that metal pipe. It hurt worse somehow, but he was in for it now.

Did ya make a mistake, Remus?

Don't be a shit friend, Remus.

You make me happy, Remus.

I can't talk about this, Remus.

You're the sky, Remus.

Do you cry, Remus?

But we can't have everything, can we, Remus?

Remus covered his face—moaned.

"Shit…"

He knew it wasn't a good idea, but he left the flat anyway. Without Tomny. He could live without the milk, but when his cigarette carton turned up empty his day was already decided for him. The only thing that had changed about the local corner shop was the bloke behind the counter, and when Remus walked out clutching his shopping bag of fags and bottled milk, the sky over the East End was grey and cold. He wasn't entirely sure why, considering it was December, but he ended up taking the longer route back. It took him past even more council housing, where he spotted countless haggard-looking residents sitting on their patios, their pipes and cigarettes drifting smoke up into the dull air. Some read the paper, others glared at him as he passed. None seemed happy to see him.

Remus remembered what it was that had made him take that particular route in the first place when he came across the little dilapidated park in all its rusted glory. It was the place where he and Tomny had first met. Felt like ages ago now, and as he stopped to admire the ice collecting on the pavement, Remus found his legs unconsciously carrying him onto its gravel turf.

The climbing frame was the same—rusted over and likely to slice a palm open as soon as used. The swings were also the same. Only one was usable, so he sat on it, feeling the icy chains bite into his palms. Eventually Remus pulled out the cigarettes and lit one up. He thought of almost nothing while he did it, and for a moment it felt like peace. Nearby sat a phone booth. That was new—but its walls were already tagged all over with graffiti and the door had been half-busted in.

He should call Giles. Or James. Someone at the Potters'. They deserved an explanation, even if he didn't really have one. Would Sirius answer? No, probably not… Even if he did, what could they possibly have to say to each other? 'I'm sorry?' But Sirius was done playing apology games, he said it himself. Maybe that meant they were done for good. What shite that would be come January.

A footstep crunched behind him, followed by many more, and Remus cursed himself. While he'd been stuck in his own head, he'd allowed himself to be walked up on. There were only three of them, but they wore their caps down low, and their jacket collars high. They looked about his age, but it was clear they'd grown up around the area. Here were the local neighbourhood thugs, just looking for a score.

"Hey-up," the first one said. " 'aven't seen you around 'ere before."

Remus arched a brow. "You must've not looked hard enough then."

It was a weak come-back at best, but it was enough to make each boy pause. The one in front ran his tongue across his front teeth, like he'd just found his favourite meal sitting warm on the pavement.

"Bum a fag, mate?"

"Sorry, fresh out," Remus said, tucking his carton away and taking a poignant drag.

"That's cute, but I wasn't really asking." Without missing a beat, the guy pulled a switchblade, popping the blade open as he and his friends took several measuring steps toward him.

"You sure are quick to the draw," Remus remarked, eyeing the blade warily. "Normally I get at least a few more quips in."

"Yeah, but we're in a bit of a hurry, ya see. So I'll let you pick, hand over what'chu got or we beat you 'til yer sniffin' blood. Your choice, innit."

It was in his nature to argue, but Remus Lupin was not built entirely out of stupid. He knew not to play with knives, especially in such a neighbourhood as Tomny's. So, while the boys crowded in on his swing, he pulled out the cigarettes and tossed them at their feet.

"Yeah, that's right," the boy leered, scooping up the box. "Now be a good bitch 'n turn out the rest 'a yer pockets."

"You just took my brand-new fags and now you're gonna mug me too? Tell me, do they give thug training at the local community centre these days? Or is that only for the to the thick and stereotypical?"

"We're gonna do worse than mug ya if ya don't turn out yer fuckin' pockets, cheeky cunt!" One of the others trilled.

Remus sighed. He stood up, still clutching his shopping bag, and began rifling around in his pockets. The others waited impatiently, shifting their feet from one foot to the other.

"Hold on, I know I've got a few quid on me somewhere. Where's that darn wallet..." Remus cleared his throat, still patting himself down. Finally, he glanced into the shopping bag. "Oh! Here it is. S'all in there."

He started to hand the bag over, and the first guy reached for it, only to scowl when Remus pulled the bag back very quickly.

"Sorry, lads, I just have one question before you finish mugging me."

"And what's tha'?"

"Can you catch?"

He smiled, genuinely. And then with all of his might—Remus threw the bagged bottle of milk. It slammed into the face of his first attacker with a hollow ring, surprising all of them. The guy cried out, dropping his knife to cup both hands over his face, and Remus didn't waste a moment. Instead he turned and bolted straight for the street.

"DON'T JUST STAND THERE, YA FUCKING IDIOTS! GRAB THE BITCH!"

Now, Remus had always been fast. It'd saved him on more than one occasion, but what he made up for with speed, he lacked in coordination. As he ran, his boot came down on a particularly nasty patch of ice, and just like that he was sprawling. The boys were on him a second later, jamming him in the back with a knee and landing a nasty shot along his jaw. He thrashed beneath them, but throwing the milk had only given him a few seconds' head start, and he'd bottled it.

"Get 'im up!" The first one snarled. "Yeah, now hold 'im still. I'm gonna see how mouthy he is while I'm carving 'im up…"

Remus struggled, but they still managed to haul him to his feet. At least there he got the pleasure of seeing Milk-face's bloody nose as it dripped down onto the front of his tracksuit.

"Looks like I messed up your jacket," he grunted. "My bad, mate."

"Don't worry," he said, spitting blood. "When I'm done wiff you, I'm gonna take yours."

Remus jerked again viciously, but the two on his arms had a tight grip. As he leaned in, Milk-face's scowl quickly turned into another grin. He used his blade to trace the scar over Remus' nose, right up into his eyebrow.

"Looks like we ain't the first ones to fuck you up, princess. I'm almost disappointed."

"Just do it then!" He snarled. "If you're gonna do it then just fucking do it, you spineless shit-eating bastard!"

"Shut up!"

One of them decked him from behind, snapping Remus' head forward hard enough that he saw stars. His teeth rattled and he might've bit his tongue, but Milk-face was grinning enough to distract him. He had a chip in his left front tooth, cut sharp on an angle. Must've been painful when it happened. Now all Remus could do was focus on it as they crowded in around him.

"Orright, little cunt. You just hold still then, or I'm gonna—"

"Yer gonna what, Ticks?"

The boys all froze; even Remus was surprised to see him. Tomny came around the corner with both hands in his jacket pockets. He had deep bags under his eyes, and his lips were dry and cracked, but he walked as though he were King of the World. To these poor, shocked boys, he might as well have been.

“Tomny…” Milk-face gawked; “What are you...?"

“You know, Ticks, if I was gonna gut somebody, I wouldn’t spend all day talkin’ about it beforehand. I’d just gut ‘im. I think you’ll find it saves time.”

“This guy mouthed off,” Milk-face—now Ticks—blabbed. “We’s were gonna teach ‘im a lesson about what happens to cheeky cunts when they try taking the piss.”

“Yeah, ‘cept this one’s spoken for. So let him go before I take your fucking thumbs instead.”

Ticks appeared reluctant, but with blood still running down his face, he didn’t look all that ready to take Tomny on. He stepped away, and a second later the other two had released Remus’ arms.

“Good lads,” Tomny said. “Now what don’t you give the kid his fags back and we’s can all go on home? In fact, if I’m rememberin’ right—you boys still owe me. Where's my money?”

Ticks visibly paled. "I... Well, we's hadn't finished getting it yet, that's all."

"Oh? So rather than get out there and do yer fuckin' jobs, you're here—harassing randos for plonk change?"

"We'll get it!" One of the others assured him. "We're good 'fer it, Tom."

"Better be, or it's your arses I'm handing over to Benny. Now hand over the shit."

Remus had never seen somebody scowl with their entire body, but somehow Ticks managed it. He wrenched the cigarettes from his pockets and held them out, but when Remus went to grab them, he was pulled in close.

“I dunno who you are, but know one thing, you fucking ponce. Big bro Tom ain’t always gonna be around to protect ya. Eventually it'll be just you and us, and then you'll regret mouthing off. You hear me, you little b—”

“Did you not just hear what I fucking said?” Tomny demanded, cutting between them both. “I said piss—the fuck—off!” He punctuated the statement with a sharp head-butt, slamming his forehead directly into Ticks’ already bloody nose. There was a sickening crunch, and Ticks crumpled instantly.

“AUGH! My fucking nose!”

“Get ‘im outta ‘ere,” Tomny ordered, wiping Ticks’ blood off of his face. The other two didn’t hesitate, and after a bit more moaning from their friend, the group quickly disappeared around the park’s cement wall.

“Got a hanky?”

Remus looked back at Tomny. There was blood between his eyebrows. He was grinning.

“What the fuck are you doing here, Tom?”

“Just out for a little stroll…” Tomny bent down, grabbing the knife Ticks had dropped. He stopped long enough to check his reflection in the blade, before folding it up and pocketing it. “Good thing, too. You have this habit of getting yourself into the messiest shit, Lu.”

“And I suppose you’ll always be there to find me, and dig me out again?”

“Too right, I will.” Smirking, Tomny grabbed Remus’ face in his hands and turned him this way and that for an inspection. “They didn’t actually cut ya, right? ‘Cause if they did you know I’ll blind ‘em.”

“They didn’t get the chance!” Remus snapped, batting him away. “Now what are you really doing here?”

“Looking for you, wanker. Figured if ya weren’t at the shops that you might’ve gone down this way. Lucky I was right.”

“Well, aren’t you just the brightest bulb in the box.”

“Heh. Far from it.” Tomny pat him on the cheek. “C’mon, toffy. Let’s getchu home. I’ve still got a few beers in the fridge. And a surprise even, if ya behave.”

Remus was quiet on the way back to the flat. He’d lost his milk, but didn’t feel like stopping for another. Doubted Tomny would agree to it anyway. He walked ahead, shoulders hunched in his thick donkey jacket and hands in his pockets. He was watching the streets, Remus knew, just in case they were to come across someone who might be looking for them. They’d gotten lucky with Ticks and his boys. But who knew who they'd tell, especially considering Tomny had broken his nose. Every now and then Tomny would glance back, as if to make sure Remus was still there.

"For someone wiff such long legs, yer sure draggin' your feet."

Remus flipped him off, and Tomny winked at him. Bastard.

"If you start whistling, I'll kill ya."

"Should I sing instead?" Tomny mused, then sung anyway; "'Did you ever see a lassie—a lassie, a lassie? Did you ever see a lassie, go this way or that?'"

Remus caught up, yanking his friend by the back of his collar until he grunted. "Stuff it."

Tsk. "Thought musicians were supposed to like music?"

"Maybe I'm not a musician then."

Tomny gave him an annoyed look, but said nothing else. From then on, they walked side by side, all the way back.

"Here," Tomny said, cracking a beer and handing it to Remus. It was cold, but so was the rest of the flat. They had to wear their jackets inside.

As Tomny retreated back into the kitchen with his own beer, Remus drifted further into the living room. He considered turning on the telly, even if just for the noise, but he was distracted soon enough.

With his beer in one hand and a rolled up fiver in the other, Tomny did a line. Remus watched and wondered how much a bump like that might cost, and how much of Benny's ten KG's Tomny had snorted himself.

"Just… give me a few," Tomny breathed, while sinking back into the sofa. "I'll be good in a sec…"

Remus didn't know what else to do other than wait. As Tomny got busy getting high, he sat down on the end of the settee and he waited. Waited for something—anything to happen. The plate that he'd used to pour the coke onto still had a small scattering of white powder at the edges. Too curious to resist, Remus glanced at Tomny, who had his eyes closed, and scooted forward on the couch. He licked his finger and then ran it along the plate before pressing the tiniest bit against his gums the way he'd seen Tomny do before. The numbing effect was instant, but the bitter taste it came with was horrid. Rushing into the kitchen, Remus spat several times into the sink and held his mouth under the tap. The ammonia-like taste stuck around afterwards, but as he made his way back out into the living room, he spotted Tomny smiling lazily at him with one eye open.

“Hey, Lu... Tell me again why you ain’t going to university.”

“Because I’m gonna be in a band.”

“A musician after all, eh? Wow… s’cool… a band… You—uh… still doing it with that Sirius-bloke? The one you's broke up with?”

Remus let out a shaky breath. He couldn’t answer, so he changed the subject instead.

“Who were those guys at the park, Tom?" He slumped down on the sofa, tonguing the numbness from his gums. "You said they owed you. So what—that mean they work for you? Or are you their personal ‘Benny’?”

“I ain’t like that fat fuck, Benny,” Tomny grumbled, eyes sliding shut again. “They just run for me, s’all. We’re all a part ‘a the system, Lu. Working men—working cogs. It’s like the… circle ‘a life… You’s get… used to it…”

“Why won’t you ever tell me about it, then?”

Tomny was silent then, and Remus turned on him. “Hello...? Tom!”

Tomny’s eyes stayed shut, and for a moment Remus feared the worst. He threw himself forward, tapping his mate's shoulders firmly.

“Tomny? Are you alright?”

There was no response, so Remus pressed his ear to Tomny’s chest. Then, when he began to hear the telltale thumping of a heart in rhythm, his alarm turned to anger. He wrenched away, already fuming.

“Fucking arsehole—wake up! Fucking wake up, Tomny!”

But Tomny didn’t, and Remus growled, slamming his beer bottle down and throwing himself up from the sofa. He marched into the kitchen and picked one of the dirty glasses from the sink, filling it with water. Then he sped back out into the flat's living room and doused the bastard with it.

"WAKE UP!"

Tomny stirred, even gave a little moan—but his eyes stayed shut, and Remus felt his temper boil over.

"FUCK YOU, TOMNY!" He wailed, smacking Tomny across the face with an open palm. "Get—UP!"

He had to smack him once more, but finally Tomny stirred. He moaned a bit louder, and just as Remus raised his hand a third time, Tomny shot upright on the sofa.

"Fuck!" He cried. "Shit—ow!? Did you really have to hit me, Lu?"

"It was the only way to wake you, ya fucking skaghead! What's a'matter with you, huh? What if you'd died?!"

"I'm not gonna die!"

"Seems likely enough! If all you'd rather do all day is get high, then no wonder Tonya fucking left!"

Tomny had always been an immovable thing—unfazed and serene no matter what came across his path—but the moment Remus said Tonya's name, he flinched.

"Just smack me again, why don't you?" Tomny whimpered. "Think I'd prefer it."

Hearing him like that, so small and fragile—Remus instantly broke. He slumped down on the sofa next to him, head in his hands.

"I can't do this, Tom. I can't… Like—I'm supposed to be the fucked up one. The one with all the issues. You're the one who holds it all together."

Tomny glanced down at himself, peeling his wet shirt away from his chest. "That's not fair, you get everything. Rich twat."

"I hate you. And I'm not gonna laugh."

"Why not? Laughing's easier…" Tomny chuckled weakly, then slid closer to Remus when he noticed him sulking. "Aw. I'm sorry, Lu. I know you're disappointed. Didnae wan' you to see all 'a this…"

"Don't. I can't be the good guy, not when I've fucked up so badly. I just need you to be good, Tom."

" 'Cause that's not a crap-ton 'a pressure or anything… What the fuck's 'good' nowadays anyway? Didn't think there was such a thing in this world." Tomny ran a hand through his choppy hair, before grinding out a hiss. "Augh—fuck. High's practically down the drain… Guess we might as well have it out."

Remus raised his head, and he found Tomny staring at him. There were bags under his eyes. Deep ones. A blood vessel had burst in the left. He'd never looked so tired.

"I think I'm just embarrassed by it, right?" Tomny said, his voice low and hoarse. "It's the drugs and everyffin. Used to be embarrassed by the thieving—breaking into cars, the petty robbery. And now it's this shit. Should be normal for a bloke like me—hundreds 'a people doing the exact same crap to survive, but it's different with you. I just… don't like telling you."

"Why?"

"Because!" He snapped. "Because as far as I'm concerned, you're the good one. And I still don't want you to look at me any different—I can't take it. So please, stop asking. Jus' let me have this one thing. Okay, Lu?"

Remus looked down at his hands. Secrets, secrets. Why did they insist on following him everywhere?

"I get it, Tom," he said quietly. "Why you'd keep it a secret. It's not the knowing that's the hard part—it's everything else. Not what people'll say—but what they're thinking inside. That's the worst fucking part, isn't it?"

Tomny sighed. "Yeah. That's the worst part."

They were quiet for a while, just two broken kids on a patched sofa. Couldn't have had a more different start, but there they were… at the End.

"You were right," Tomny said, head tipped back and zoning out on the ceiling. "Every time you asked about Tonya, you were fucking right."

Remus' heart clenched. "I'm sorry."

"Nah, no more sorries. No more secrets..."

With a heavy exhale, Tomny sat up and turned to Remus. He sniffed a bit, wiping below his nose.

"Listen, I was a right fucking wreck after Tonya left. I lost my bloody mind, innit. But I could see how the others were looking at me, so I put it all away. I wasn't ready to let go 'a her, but she was gone. Couldn't do nothing about it. Instead I tried taking control of what I could—the drugs, the money. And at some point… I dunno, wasn't enough. I couldn't stand being 'ere without her—in my own home. So one night I lost it. Trashed the whole place. Ripped it apart and smashed up everything. 'Specially everything that reminded me of 'er."

"You didn't..."

"Fucking rights, I did. Threw the entire stereo out the window and everyffin. Figured, no one's gonna come looking for it… Still, couldn't tell anyone. Felt too pathetic. I was really down back then, but I'm better now. Swears. All the shit with the drugs—it's nuffin'."

Remus knew better than to believe him, but he was at odds with every other person in his life. He couldn't be at odds with Tomny too.

"Just please tell me you didn't toss her copy of 'Abbey Road'. It was an original pressing."

"Dunno. Was that the one with the banana on the front?"

"Nico too? Oh Tom… What'd rock 'n roll ever do to you?"

Tomny smiled and reached for his beer, sipping it. "Secrets fester, I think. They become bigger than they are—and then suddenly they're not just secrets anymore, they're problems. I mean, hey, look at me? I got rid of all of it, even felt a bit better—but I tell ya… still miss her music sometimes…"

"I miss her too," Remus confessed. "So much. And I—I thought it would go away, but it never does."

"Yeah… Well, when grief's all you got, sometimes it hurts worse to let it go."

The words hung between them like a hook on a line, and Remus knew they were the truth. For so long he'd been searching for a way to let go of all the anger—all the hate—but who was he without it? Was he Remus Lupin because of that anger, or was he angry because he was Remus Lupin? Seventeen years, and he still wasn't sure.

"Hey." Tomny knocked his knee against Remus' kindly. "Don't stay sad. I told you I had a surprise for ya, yeah?"

"Don't know if I can handle anymore surprises, Tom."

"Ah, but you'll like this one. Wait here."

With an excited little kick, Tomny threw himself up off of the sofa and whipped down the hall toward one of the bedrooms. He was gone only a moment, and when he reemerged, he was holding not just any old gift—but a guitar. A bass guitar.

"Happy late-Christmas, lovely tosser."

"Tom, no," Remus moaned, "you didn't."

"Sure, I did," Tomny beamed, coming forward and setting the pristine instrument over Remus' lap. "The guy in the bob-shop called it a Teisco. Said it was almost brand new—hardly ever been played!"

Remus ran his fingers up the neck of the bass, almost forgetting how to breathe. He flicked his thumb along one of the strings and felt it vibrate neatly. It was no 1951 Fender Precision, but it was perfect for a dumb kid with very few aspirations.

"I got it on-offer, so I know it's nuffin' special," Tomny rambled, "but figured if anyone could do something wiff it, it'd be you. S'better than letting it hang in the window of that shop getting bleached by the sun, right?"

"It's amazing, Tom. You shouldn't have—really." He punched Tomny in the arm sharply. "Stop wasting your bloody money on me!"

"Wasn't even my money!" Tomny protested. "Used some of that dosh your dad pushed on you."

"You absolute spanner—I told you to use it on yourself!"

"Yeah, and then you went and gave the rest of it to a cock-jockey like Benny. Nothing to be done now. Can't get the money back from him and the shop's sign said no refunds, so... go on! Might as well play the bloody thing. Oh shit—wait! I gotchu one of those new-fangled amps too, though I 'spect it's old as dust. Dunno how it'll sound."

Tomny jumped up once more and rushed from the room, coming back with a decently worn-out amplifier that he dropped on the floor next to the sofa. "Was a real bitch lugging this thing up the lane, y'know. Hope you make it worth my while."

"It's great, Tom."

"Great enough to play, innit."

Suddenly feeling very shy, Remus made to set the instrument aside. Tomny caught hold of the neck at the last second.

"What you doing?"

"I don't even know what I'd play?"

"You fucking cares? Play something—anything. Play those fucking secrets of yours."

Remus bit his lip. "That sounds mildly cheesy."

"Just play, wanker."

If Remus could have collected all of the time he'd wasted on hesitating, then he'd have been left with half a lifetime. It killed him to think about, and so for once, he allowed himself to stop thinking altogether. While Tomny graciously plugged in the amp, he fit the chord into the end of the bass and carefully turned the Teisco over in his lap. He strummed down roughly, feeling the rebound of its unstretched, untried strings, and bit his lip again. They were out of tune. He'd have to fix them—wear them down until they moved exactly how he wanted them to. It'd be almost like starting over.

As he moved his fingers along the stiff strings, not bothered by his lack of flow or general rhythm, he began to feel more free. Tomny had no idea what went into making a song, which meant anything could be a song, and since it was just the two of them there no one was left to question it when he began to sing.

"You say you want answers, everything and more. And I got the answers—oh, I got secrets-galore…"

Tomny laughed, nodding his head in another 'go on', and Remus shook his head.

He didn't know where the words were coming from, he'd never even written it. He just kept playing, and the stupid chant spilled out of him like water.

"How 'bout—I fuckin' hate football? Or… any sport at all, really… And I fell in love with my best friend, though this might be the end, clearly. 'Cause I can't come out of the closet, locked up… like a—like a safe-deposit! And that's kinda sad… So there's a few secrets, finally said 'em aloud, and I ain't done yet. How 'bout—my dad's not my dad, and that's kinda sad… Yeah, my dad's not my dad. Would'a thought I'd be glad… that my dad's not my dad…"

A sharp inhale, then; "Fuck. Tom, my dad, h-he..."

Remus filtered off, his chunky licks becoming little more than slams on the strings as he descended into tears and Tomny sharply pulled them together on the sofa.

"I hate them," Remus sobbed into his shirt. "He hates me because he's not my dad and she—and she never told me! Or—Or she did, but then she just fuckin' went off and died!"

"I know," Tomny whispered, patting his head soothingly; "I hear you now."

"I ruined everything. It's all so messed up. Sirius hates me now—James and Lily must hate me! It's all ruined… and I don't even understand why it's so bloody difficult! I left them with no word—no reason, just fuckin' ran off! I dumped them to come here like I always do. And I lied—again and again!"

"People lie, Lu. They jus' do. S'a part of being human. And you're not any lesser for havin' a shit dad. It's on them—on those deadbeats—no one else."

"I hurt him, Tom," he whimpered. "I hurt Sirius. I was so focussed on making sure no one else noticed that I forgot all about him."

"Sounds like something you gotta tell him then."

He knew Tomny was right, but more talking? It felt impossible. What if things got even more messed up? What if they missed each other again? Him and Sirius—sometimes it felt like they were speaking in different tongues.

“Hey—hey." Tomny pulled away, forcing Remus to look at him. "You think I’d lead you wrong on purpose?”

He shook his head pathetically, and Tomny smiled.

“Then what 'chu so worried about?”

Dear god, Remus thought. This was a man he’d do anything for, he was sure of it.

“I really love you, Tom. You’re like my brother.”

“Always wanted a lil’ brother," Tomny chuckled. "Didn’t count on ‘im being taller than me though.”

"You’ve probably just gotten shorter in your old age..."

"Cheeky shit." Tomny laughed again, and then wiped the damp from Remus' cheek. For a moment they were just staring at each other, two boys with nothing left to lose. Tomny's eyes were red along the whites, and bluer than Remus had ever seen.

Anything, he swore. Anything.

Tomny cleared his throat. “Hey, Lu—”

There was a sudden knock on the door, loud enough to make both of them start.

“Stay here, it’s probably just someone tryin’ to drop in,” Tomny said. He stood up, already starting away before turning back. “But just to be safe—maybe hide.”

Remus didn’t need telling twice. Feeling a lot like a spineless milksop, he ducked out of sight behind the sofa while Tomny made his way toward the door. The front door creaked as it opened and Remus held his breath, releasing it only when he heard Tomny sigh in relief.

“Lee? What the f—why didn’t ya buzz the flat?”

“Piece of shit intercom’s out again,” Lee scoffed. “I swear s’like somebody unplugs it.”

“How’d you get inside then?”

“Dezzy from downstairs let me in. Now where you been? No one's heard from you in days.”

There was a light thump like Lee had tried to push the door open.

“Sorry, can’t come in—I’m… entertaining.”

“Oooh, I get it. S’that Boots girl again, innit? You been hunkered down and enjoying yourself, you randy bastard.”

“None’ya business. Now bugger off, don’t want her fainting at the sight ‘a your ugly mug. Put a real dent in my evening.”

“Easy now. I should at least say ‘ello, shouldn’t I? So where is she—bedroom?”

“Lee.”

“Orright, orright. I can tell when I’m interrupting. But you’d best come out soon or else I’m haulin’ ya off her perky arse meself. You coming out to Vint's for New Years?”

“Yeah, I’ll be there.”

“Good. Can’t mope around ‘ere all the time. Cheryl’s been on watch for you, ya know. Best get out there before she realises she’s got better options.”

“Better, as in you?”

“You know me, I’m a beast, Tom. Can’t keep me down.”

There was a short chuckle—Tomny—and then a clap of hands. “Orright. See ya later then, dickhead.”

“I’ll save ya a bump. Ta.”

The door shut and Remus finally peeked out from behind the sofa. It stung a bit, to have heard Lee sound so much like his old self and know that everything had changed. So, Remus did what Sirius would do, and he cracked a joke.

“Does the Boots girl have a name, you slag?”

Tomny smirked wryly, hand still on the doorknob. “Never thought to ask actually.”

“You idiots wouldn’t last five minutes with Marlene.”

“Ah, yes, your lesbian girlfriend. Tell me about her next.”

* * *

Over the next day and a half, Remus told Tomny everything.

Every gritty detail.

He left not a shred out no matter how bad it made him look, and by the time they were finished they'd gone through all the beer in the flat and the three bottles of scrumpy Tomny had been saving for only the most desperate of occasions. Even then, their throats were dry from talking, but Remus felt better. In the beginning he'd assumed that Sirius was used to the secrets because he'd been living one for so long, but it was different for him. For Remus, secrets felt protective—like an iron wall he'd built up around himself. They kept some distance between him and the hardest parts of being Hope Lupin's son, safeguarded him against Lyall's resentment, and helped him find a place in a world that would've otherwise considered him too opulent to welcome. For Sirius, secrets were only an unfortunate circumstance of life. He found no comfort in them.

At some point they'd put the telly on, but ended up talking over the program. Tomny put the drugs away, even though it probably would've been easier to not, and instead they played cards, cooked a modest supper, changed the linens. Keeping up with the mundane things made talking easier, and eventually the radiator kicked on again and warmth began to seep back into their bones. On the 29th they took a trip to the laundrette to clean those changed linens and Remus had to hide in the toilet when a pair of local kids spotted Tomny through the window. One of them was Brecker, the jerk who'd gone with Tomny to the party last summer. It took a while to shake them, but when Remus emerged from the filthy lavatory, Tomny gave him a lopsided smile and any unfortunate twinge was quickly forgotten.

"So what yer saying is, that you're really not—" Tomny grunted as he yanked the phone cord from the wall; "—queer?"

Remus shrugged from his place on the floor, the Teisco strapped across his lap. "More like halfway. I'm a halfer—girls… and guys."

"Blimey. Didn't much think that was an option, meself." Shrugging, Tomny tossed the phone aside. It'd been ringing off its hook all evening and he'd ignored it every time. Fuckings sods, they're interrupting Lu time! He'd say.

"Tell me then," Tomny said, picking up a fresh beer bottle and slouching down on the couch. "What's it about this 'Sirius Black' that's got you so sprung?"

"If you saw him you'd know."

"He that pretty?"

"Well, I think every girl at school's swooned over him at least once."

"Heyyyy," Tomny grinned, knocking Remus' shoulder with his beer; "And he's with you, huh? Handsome dog…"

"I dunno if he'd consider us 'together' anymore."

"Mm—nah. You know what they say, don't count your pretty, rich boyfriends before they hatch."

Remus smiled despite himself, and then looked down, busy tightening his A-string. Tomny watched happily, sipping away. It was the first day in weeks he hadn't woken up just to get high, and Remus could see it in the bouncing of his leg—the pin-point sweating along his collar. Tomny tried to play it off, but he could tell he was suffering.

"So what's it like then, being with a girl and then a guy?" Tomny prodded. "Don't it get confusing at all? I mean, you probably wouldn't forget what to do when… you know. That part's all instinct—heh—but what happens when they want different things?"

"You mean like different things… in bed?"

"Yeah! But also, you know how a girl wants to be protected, and—er… a guy, protects? Whadda do then?"

"It works the same. We take care of each other."

Tomny nodded thoughtfully. "And in bed then? I mean, since you brought it up..."

Remus scoffed, hands dropping from the bass. "I've only ever been with one guy. My experience isn't exactly vast."

"Not true! You kissed me that one time."

"Shut up, we've already been over that. It was a mistake. Won't happen again."

"Right." Tomny twiddled his thumbs. "So… does this mean you were ever in love with me?"

"Sod off!"

"I was just asking! Christ, don't need to bite my head off. Never met a 'bisexual' before, alright? M'trying to put myself in yer shoes."

"Right. Let me put it this way then, if you were a girl, would you still have fallen in love with Tonya?"

"Nah, don't think so," Tomny mused.

"Really? Why not?"

"I'd be too busy falling in love with you. In all your manic-toff glory."

"Fuck you, Tom."

"Yep, that's right. Could've had my Cinderella moment." Tomny sighed, sipping his last beer with one hand and tucking the other behind his head. "Bet it'd be mighty comfortable, being 'Mrs. Remus Lupin'."

"I think the Lupin track record would disagree."

"What about the guy in the photo—your real dad?"

Remus glanced to the coffee table, where the creased picture of Hope and her friends sat amongst a collection of coins and pocket lint. He'd showed Tomny the photo and for the first time, he had not been ashamed. It was a part of him, but it was not the whole of him.

"Don't know anything about the guy," Remus said. "Mum never mentioned him really, but when Sheila gave me that picture and said they went to school together I just sorta connected the dots. He probably doesn't even know that I exist."

"Does that bother you?"

"It should, shouldn't it?"

Tomny shrugged. "I never thought having a dad was all that. Usually they're only made of shit 'n disappointment."

“Right…”

“But hey—if you do, well orright then.”

“No… I dunno.” Remus sighed glumly. “I’ve known about this guy for six years now and never even said his name aloud. He's not my dad, he’s basically a stranger. Guess I always thought that not meeting him at all was better than doing it and finding out he doesn’t want me.”

“Hm. And now?”

“And now… I think I’m still afraid.”

“Well,” Tomny pursed his lips in consideration, “I wouldn’t worry about it, mate. You can always change your mind later.”

“You think?”

“Sure. Seesaw didn’t meet his dad ‘til he was seventeen. And then he turned out to be an alcoholic dickbag working in some meat-packing plant. Yours is some posh bleeder with a name like ‘Thaddeus’. Even if he is an utter waste of a personality, you might still be able to get some money out of it, yeah?”

It was supposed to be a light joke—comforting, but what did Remus need with more money? He was going to live with his friends in some crummy corner flat in Soho and make crummy music and drink crummy beer, provided he got his shit together first.

Man… he really needed to call Giles.

“At least he ain’t bad looking,” Tomny said, picking up the photo. “Mum always used to say that my old man looked like a toe come to life. Ha. Bitter hag.”

Remus burst into laughter, and Tomny joined him. Eventually talk shifted again—Doss and his new family, brimming with promise.

“He’ll make a good dad,” Tomny said firmly. “That kid’s gonna have a chance.”

A chance. Remus had had plenty of those, and he’d squandered them all. Would Tad have been like Doss, young and inexperienced but with a heart big enough to try anyway? Or would he be more like Lyall, drowning in money and promise and somehow still dissatisfied with life. Maybe he could’ve been like Mr. Potter, kind and warm with bad jokes that everyone knew were bad but laughed at anyway.

But no. Remus' luck had never been that good. He could only hope Tad was somewhere in the middle, not that it really mattered if he never planned on meeting the guy.

God, he missed Sirius. It would be so easy to explain all of it to him. He'd get it before he even got the words out, and then the solution would just materialise in front of them. Remus liked talking to Tomny, who was understanding and patient, but no matter how familiar he was, it just wasn't the same.

On the 30th, five days after running off on his friends without word, Remus told Tomny about the New Year's party at the Pettigrews'.

"They actually want your band to play? Wow. That's a lot of faith."

"We're actually pretty good, I'll have you know!"

"Sure, I know," Tomny laughed. "Been listening to you going on two days now—you're good, Lu. I guess that means you'll be headin' home then."

"I don't want to leave," Remus said earnestly.

"Ah, but you made a commitment. Can't go back on your word, it ain't manly. Jus' do me a favour, play a few more songs before you go."

So he did. Remus played every song in his repertoire, including the ones he'd written for the band. He let Tomny peruse his songbook and read all of it, even the really bad stuff.

"Tell me, Lu, what emotion were you trying to evoke by rhyming 'disintegration' with 'refrigeration'?"

"I was going for chilling, obviously. I'm just surprised you can read a word that big."

"You callin' me thick?"

"Don't worry, it's charming."

"I like it when you flirt, Lu."

"Ha—that's not flirting."

Tomny arched one handsome brow and flipped to the next page in his songbook. “Oh? Then what is?”

His heart gave a little jump and Remus quickly glanced down at the bass to hide it. “Nice try, but I ain't falling for that. Flirting with you feels too much like emotional incest.”

He’d expected another quip, but when that didn’t come, Remus looked up. Tomny wasn’t smiling anymore, but rather than staring at him, his attention was caught by the song book. Curious, Remus leaned in to get a look at the page he’d turned to and instantly deflated.

“Oh… That’s—”

“ ‘Tonya’s Song’,” Tomny finished, before cracking a wry smile. “Of course you wrote her a song.”

“I never finished it exactly,” Remus answered, slightly ashamed. “The words never felt right. Couldn’t pin it down.”

“Yeah well, could never pin ‘er down in person either. I expect trying to capture her with words is even worse.” Tomny touched his fingers to the page. “ ‘Raven-haired… Midnight dancer…’ This is… wow.”

Remus bit his lip, but he’d had no need to be nervous. Tomny just sat up, eyes bright, and passed the book along.

“Will you play me whatever it is you have? I’d like to hear it.”

The request left him anxious again, but he’d already decided that would’ve done anything for Tomny. He could do this.

The song was simple, just three verses. It hadn’t changed since he’d written it.

You can stay up all night,
Figuring out what to do next;
Everything seems alright,
‘Til you run out of cigarettes;

Raven-haired,
Midnight dancer;
If I could give you everything,
Would you ask for me?

Star of those rainy nights,

And now our night is through;
You've asked your questions,
I've asked for you.

Once he'd finished, Remus set the bass aside. His skin felt tingly—his face hot. Everything was buzzing and his fingers were trembling, but when he looked up, Tomny was staring at him from his recliner, lips parted. He still had that little scar on his top lip.

"Blimey," Tomny murmured. "You're amazing, you are."

For once, Remus couldn't find it in himself to disagree.

* * *

This dream would be the last. Somehow, it made sense that it would be her.

In this dream he did not feel ill, nor did he feel lost or unwanted. It was the first to comfort him, and the last he'd remember having for a very long time. He felt her touch and panicked at first, half-worried she were someone else. But then he realised.

No one sang like she did. No one had ever held him like she had.

"Let us cling together as the years go by, oh my love, my love… In the quiet of the night, let our candle always burn. Let us never lose the lessons we have learned…"

Remus felt the burn of unwept tears. She was stroking his head, singing to him, so beautifully. Enough that he wanted to live in it—cling to the dream and never let her go. He had to look, had to, but he was afraid. What if she vanished before his eyes again?

"Remus."

Please stay. Please stay with me.

"Remus, sweet love. It's time to wake up."

No. No, please. I'm so tired.

He felt her beautiful hands on his face, and her beautiful lips on his cheeks, and after she'd kissed each of his lashes, Remus finally opened his eyes.

"I miss you," he said. "I wish you hadn't gone."

Tonya smiled at him. "I love you, Remus," she said. "You are so loved."

Chapter End Notes

[To have someone] 'sectioned' is to forcibly admit them to hospital (thanks Becca, lol).
[To] 'bottle it' means to get so close and then mess up. Tripping at the finish line, if you will.
'What's the craic?' is like 'what's going on?'
'Cailín' is an Irish word meaning 'girl'.
'Gardaí' is the Irish word for police.
'Dryshite', 'gobshite' and 'pox bottle' all roughly mean fool or useless person.
The Gaelic phrase/insult 'go n-ithe an cat thú is go n-ithe an diabhal an cat' translates to 'may the cat eat you, and may the devil eat the cat'. Creatively meaning that the cat should do you in, and then the devil will do you both. If you're curious for pronunciation, here's an intimidating rendition.
'[Tongs] Ya Bass' is a sort of war cry for Scottish youth gangs and the like. Gang members would shout their gang's name and 'ya bass' to rally before a fight.
'Peak' is bad luck.
'Randy' means horny.
'Scrumpy' is a harsh home-brewed cider. Also a brand.

I swear I'm done with the super sadness! It was necessary, and is healing in the long run. Next chapter, New Year's 1977 <3

Chapter 85: Moony & Lu

Chapter Summary

Going home is always hard, especially when Lily Evans has put a hit out on you.

Chapter Notes

Note: See the end notes for an alternate POV of the final scene in this chapter.

No specific trigger warnings for this chapter, but the boys go back and forth a lot, and it carries some underlying issues with their families as well as internalized homophobia. You can tell they're hurting. But it's got its moments, I swear!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I, I will be king,
And you, you will be queen;
Though nothing will drive them away,
We can beat them, just for one day,
We can be Heroes, just for one day...

Saturday 31st December 1977

"This ain't goodbye."

"I know."

"Then stop looking at me like I'm about to head into the trenches."

"I'm not!" Remus scowled. "If anyone's headed for the gallows it's me. I'm the one going home..."

"Ah, yes. I'm sure facing down the likes of potpourri and a nice home-cooked meal does have its downsides."

"You've clearly never met Lily."

Tomny smiled at him, the distant shriek of train whistles and car announcements echoing down the Tube behind him. "When do you leave for school then?"

"The third. We head out of King's Cross on the first train like last time," Remus said, still wondering how he was going to last at the Potters until then. And there was still Giles to contend with as well... shit.

"You know you can call me if things get really unbearable," Tomny offered. "Like if they forget to put out them little finger sandwiches. Or the champagne's flat."

"Prick." He shoved his hands into his jacket pockets, only to pull them out again when Tomny raised his arms for a hug. They embraced right there on the station platform, while other commuters swerved around them, occasionally tossing them a dirty or otherwise bewildered look as they rushed to catch their train home for the final holiday of the year. Remus hardly cared; they'd agreed to part on good terms, him and Tom. And so he clung on, not wanting to let go. His lips brushed the worn leather of Tomny's jacket, and it was cold.

"Stop trying to drink yourself to death," he said.

"Stop trying to smoke yerself stupid," Tomny replied.

"Stop fighting with drug dealers."

"Stop fighting the world."

"Stop... Stop taking so many drugs!"

"Stop making everyone fall in love with you!"

They pulled apart.

"Though, suppose that's asking for the impossible, innit."

Remus felt his chest tighten, like a breath he'd been holding onto for too long. "Promise!" He insisted, knocking his fist against his friend's shoulder. "Promise you're gonna straighten your shit out."

Tomny jabbed him in the chest. "I'll promise if you promise!"

"... Promise."

"Then we're agreed. Shit shall be straightened. Now is there anythin' else you'd like to demand of me before ya go?"

"Yeah, just one more thing. Don't disappear."

"Aw." Tomny pat his cheek fondly. “I already told you, didn’t I? I’m not going anywhere. Still need my Lu.”

Good terms, Remus had promised himself, not soppy, weepy messes.

They hugged once more, and then Tomny handed him the clunky Fender Twin amplifier and began backing up toward the stairs.

"Better hurry along then, don't want to get caught in the rain. I'll see you on the third."

Remus blinked. "The third...? What—"

"Oh, and if your lover-boy is really that bothered, just tell 'im we shagged with the lights on. And that we saw God. See what he has to say about that."

It was horrid—completely cheeky, but before Remus could so much as utter a response, Tomny had hopped the turnstiles and vanished up the Tube steps. He was almost tempted to follow him until a train attendant appeared on the other side of the stalls, shooting an irritated look in Tomny’s direction. Rather than being hounded for the ticket he didn’t pay for, Remus picked up his bass guitar and skirted further down the platform, jumping the first train back to East Finchley. As he rode it was hard not to wonder what he was walking into, harder still not to succumb to the urge to flee whenever the train doors slid open. But he'd agreed to go back. He wanted to go back. He owed his friends an explanation for running off, and the Potters an apology for taking their kindness for granted. You just gotta own up to it, Tomny had told him. Be a man.

A man like who? Tomny? Lyall? Remus wasn't sure. He’d wanted to be better, and they’d all wanted it for him too. Only he'd bottled it, just like Lyall said he would. They'd warned him—Grow up! Tell us what's going on! Don’t be a shit friend!—but he'd never listened, and running away in the middle of Leicester Square didn’t exactly scream ‘mate of the year’ either. He had nothing with him aside from the second-hand Teisco and the clothes on his back, and up until that second it'd felt like enough. But when had nothing ever been enough?

A short ride later, he got off at the same station he and Sirius had travelled to on their way to the Potters' last summer. He'd felt out of place then, and he felt out of place now. James’ neighbourhood was not the sort one traipsed along in bearing unwashed clothes and morning-after-beer-breath. Overhead the sky turned to rapid grey while December wind licked up his back, and still Remus marched. He passed countless cottages and terrace houses done up in all of their festive glory, the words ‘upper middle class’ all but stamped on their welcome mats. After his visit in the End, he felt the same way he had on that very first day he’d arrived at Hawkings—a yob in a sea of shining gentry. A faker. It made him want to hurry, which he regretted the instant he appeared in front of the Potters’ noble, three-floor abode. It was New Year’s Eve, which meant he’d been gone for nearly a week. Hadn’t said where he was going, hadn’t called, hadn’t delivered so much as a bloody carrier pigeon. He was in deep shit.

Don’t be a shit friend.

Remus' hands flexed around the amp's handle. I won't. I'll go in. Beg for mercy if I have to.

Aw, and what will you do next? Get down on your knees and kiss their boots? Beg Sirius to take you back?

It's not about that. We're still friends.

Friends don't treat friends like rubbish.

Enough! No more. You ruin everything, and I'm going to feel guilty anymore. I'm not crazy, and I won't let you turn me crazy, so just piss OFF —

“Moony?!”

There was a loud clatter, like the breaking of glass on stone, and Remus whipped around to find Sirius standing a ways down the pavement. He had oven mitts on either hand and seemed to be torn between gaping at Remus, and frowning down at the smashed platter of food he'd apparently been carrying.

"Shit!" Sirius cursed. He knelt down on the icy sidewalk to fret over the steaming glass, but by then Remus had already abandoned the amp and Teisco and dashed to his side.

"Effie's gonna kill me... I was supposed to be bringing this plate of bread sauce over from Pete's mum."

"It was an accident. I'm sure she'll understand."

Sirius whipped his head up, as if he only just remembered who he was talking to. "You! What the fuck are you doing here?!"

"I—I..."

Sirius stood then, whipping off the oven mitts with a sharp tug. He seemed to be waiting for something—an explanation probably. Remus wished he'd have seen him first coming up the adjoining path from Peter's house. Maybe then he'd have managed to find the right words to apologise; he'd been struggling with it the entire train over. It hadn't been enough! Now he was left standing before the gates of Potter Cottage, tongue thick in his mouth.

Oh god—say something, you idiot! He's staring right at you!

"I'm back."

"Back?"

He swallowed. "Yep... And I'm sorry I ever left."

Sirius' lips parted, and Remus imagined them contorting to fit all sorts of nasty replies. The worst of them being that he hadn't wanted him to come back at all. But Sirius didn't say that, and when he raised his arms Remus told himself to be ready for a fine wallop he absolutely deserved.

And that didn't come.

Rather than beat him into the mud, Sirius' arms came up and wrapped around Remus' neck so tightly that he was yanked down to his level. With a little gasp, Remus allowed it and found himself frozen all over again. He and Sirius had barely said a handful of words to each other in weeks, and now there they were—hugging.

"You fucking idiot! You sorry excuse for an absolute—!" Sirius drew up short, pulling away all at once. "What d'you think you were on about, huh?! Freaking us out like that? Did you know we had to practically bend over backward covering for you? Effie almost went to the police! Then she straight tore a right strip off of Giles when he came by to talk her out of it. 'Does this all the time'—what fucking rubbish! Do you have any idea how bloody worried everyone was?!"

Remus swallowed thickly. He'd been expecting a tongue-lashing from Lily, maybe James and Marlene, but from Sirius?

"You were worried about me?"

“Of course I was, you great idiot!"

Something inside of Remus' chest fluttered. He searched Sirius' face for a hint of reciprocation, and that was when he noticed the grey beneath his eyes, the haggard look. Remus felt more stupid than he'd ever been in his life. Of course Sirius had been worried for him. He was heartbroken, not heartless. His own anger had blinded him. Blinded the both of them.

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean to ruin everyone's Christmas."

"Bit bold of you to assume you ruined fucking Christmas," Sirius lashed, though the strain in his voice gave him away. "You went to the End, didn't you? You went and saw Tomny."

Remus squared his shoulders a bit, aware of the incoming fight. "I did."

"You couldn't have called?"

"I didn't think you'd want to talk."

"Fuck off. Why's it so hard for you to believe that people care about you?"

"It isn't."

"Then why didn't you call!?"

"I was afraid."

Sirius looked away, glaring down at the mess of bread sauce on the pavement, already turned cold. He seemed to be at a loss, and when he looked up again he had to wipe his cheek on his shoulder.

“What’s that then?” He asked, gesturing to the abandoned amp and guitar case. Remus was grateful for the distraction.

“Oh. It’s a bass... Long story.”

“Did you steal it?”

“No, I didn’t steal it!”

“Can’t blame me for checking.” Sirius looked him up and down, deflating slightly as his anger morphed into something more frustrated. Hurt, maybe. “Why’d you do that, eh? Why would you just up and leave without saying anything? Andy came over to say hello, and you'd just vanished!"

"Didn't realise she was coming over to the house."

"She didn't come over to the house! Dora's sick with a cold so Ted's mum was watching her for the night. But you could've stayed! What, you hate me so much that you couldn't stand waiting five minutes just to say hello after the movie?"

Remus felt like someone had just hit him over the head with a hammer.

"What movie?"

"The fucking space movie, you prick! With the laser swords and strange, weird bear thing that made all the funny noises! Blahh!"

"Andy was there?"

"Yeah! Didn't you see us talking?"

He wracked his brain. All he could remember was a girl. A girl in a hat and a long coat—and Sirius talking to her, smiling! At the time it'd made Remus sick to his stomach. He must've been iller than he'd thought, straight delusional actually. Andy! The girl had been Andy! Remus wanted to top himself.

"I must've gotten confused," he confessed. "I thought she was just a random... That you..."

Sirius frowned deeply. "That I what? Was trying to get back at you by flirting with some girl I don't care about?"

"Wouldn't be the first time."

"Oh. Fine then," Sirius snarled, throwing down the oven mitts. "Think what you want. Hope you at least have the decency to tell the others your alive. I ain't doing it for you this time."

He made to go around him, but Remus reached out at the last second and caught his arm.

"Sirius, wait. I didn't mean that. And I didn't mean to take off out of the blue either, I just needed to be away for a while... Figure some stuff out."

Sirius looked back at him sharply. “And?”

And I still love you.

“And I’m sorry. Truly.”

Sirius puckered, the way he always did when he was rearing up for a fight. “I hate this, you know. I hate that you left. And I hate that it took for you to chat up your precious Tomny to come back. Why can't we just talk to each other?”

Slowly, Remus released his arm. "I don't know."

For a moment they were both quiet. For such a solemn conversation, it struck Remus as odd that it wasn't raining. Then, as if on cue, he heard the distant sound of thunder rumbling. The storm came in quickly as it often did the more one thought about it, and as the clouds began to churn above them, Remus felt tiny raindrops began to patter down onto the tops of his shoulders.

“Look, I’m sorry for not telling you about my dad,” he called, voice raw on the wind. “I'd never told anyone. Not even Tomny. I hated thinking about it, and the thought of telling someone, it... I still can't. When I was a kid I sorta thought that if I pretended not to know, then he'd forget. And he'd j-just become my real dad anyway. Want me... But it doesn’t work like that. Even if I really was his kid, I don't think he'd ever have wanted me. Not with who I am... And not the way I wanted him to want me."

Sirius was still looking back at him, eyes dark like the storm clouds. Remus knew he was crying, that'd he'd made himself cry, but he hoped the rain disguised it.

"I'm sorry I never told you, Sirius. And I’m sorry for using it as a punishment when I did.”

At his words, Sirius almost began to flounder. He shifted his weight, chin buried down in the collar of his jacket as though he were trying to make himself disappear.

“Fuck,” he huffed finally. "I really liked you, you know. Then I went and bottled it, didn't I?"

"Yeah... me too."

Sirius dropped his chin again. "So yeah, I didn’t know about your dad.

But... Fuck! I'm sorry too. What I did... What I tried to do—" He scoffed and wiped his face; "I was so pissed off at you, and it's like I don't even remember why now! That's almost the worst part... But what I did, it was foul. You shouldn't forgive me for it."

"I do, though."

"McKinnon sure don't. You should've heard the way she shouted at me when you ran off. Thought she was likely to kill me right then and there—dump my body in the Thames. Evans along with her, though I confess she's probably been waiting since year seven. When James and I stole her swimming costume and ran it up the school's flag pole."

"In that case I'm with the girls. You'd deserve it."

"It was kinda cute. Had little polka dots and everything."

They both laughed, quietly, and wiped their faces as the rain started down harder. Silence almost lapsed again, until Remus couldn't take it anymore.

"Can we just agree to be sorry then? Nothing else, just... I can't hate you, Padfoot."

"I can't hate you either, Moons."

Good. "Friends again then?"

It felt stupid—how could they ever be friends again?—but if the choice was between having Sirius this much, and not having him at all, Remus would take friends every time.

Sirius nodded, and bent down to pick up Effie's oven mitts, now soaked from the rain. "So that stuff about your dad," he asked meekly; "Is it all true?"

"That I'm a bastard? Yeah, it's true."

"Well, I already knew that." Sirius cracked a wry grin—a small one—and it was like a flash of hope. "But you really… All this time?"

"Mhm."

"Then do you know who…"

"Yeah, I know who my real dad is."

“You’ve met him?”

“No, got a picture. Sheila gave it to me.”

“Sheila?”

He nodded. “She knew my mum. They all went to school together.”

“Holy. That mean your dad—he… wow.”

"Would you like to see?"

“Y-Yeah!" Sirius sputtered. "I mean, only if you want me to...”

In that moment, Remus couldn’t have wanted anything other than to fall onto Sirius and expel every last secret. No more, he silently promised, I’m done keeping secrets from you.

"Hold on, got it right here." Squinting through the rain, he began patting his pockets before straightening up. "Oh, forgot. Left it in my —shit!"

He bolted past Sirius, to where he'd left the Teisco and the tiny Fender amp sitting idly on the pavement. Both were sopping now, but the guitar had its case at least.

"Here!" Sirius called, appearing beside him to help. He grabbed the amp and together they scarpered through the front gate, all the way up the massive drive to where they finally found cover beneath the front porch. Soaked through and sighing, Sirius fell into the family porch swing and Remus automatically slumped down next to him. When he glanced sideways at Sirius, he could see his dark hair as it curled at the bottom around his ears, dripping tiny droplets of rain onto his cheeks and neck. Prompted by their close proximity, Remus felt his hand drift upwards, fingers nearly touching...

"Hope this thing still works," Sirius said, snapping Remus from his daze. He gestured to the sad little amp sitting next to them, and Remus nodded.

"Should probably test it before I plug the guitar in. Don't want to roast my fingers."

"Good idea." Sirius flashed him a winning grin, and Remus almost regretted not taking his hand. It’d become a habit when they were alone, he realised.

“What’s his name?” Sirius asked suddenly. “Your real dad, I mean.”

“Thaddeus.”

“Thaddeus? Are you for real? And I thought ‘Sirius’ was bad.”

“No one called him that anyway! Sheila said he told everyone to call him Tad.”

"Did he and your mum used to date then?"

"Dunno. Don't know anything else about him. Not where he was born, or what he did after school, or if he's... still alive."

"Shit. Haven't you tried asking Sheila?"

"Er... No. She mostly talks about my mum, and it's always a bit— y’know.”

"Weird."

"Yeah..."

"Well, I could ask her if you want. Then you could ask me and I'd only tell you the things you wanted to know. Remove the middle man, and all that. Or I suppose, it's adding a middle man... Anyway, I'd promise to never tell anyone else. I'd take it to my grave, if you asked me to."

Remus smiled shyly. "I'm grateful, but right now, I think I'm sorta alright not knowing. Figure it's better than being disappointed."

"Yeah, alright."

They shared a glance, so close their shoulders were pressed up against one another, and Remus watched as a single raindrop raced down the tip of Sirius' nose. He was still watching it when he felt a finger trace the back of his hand, and for a moment he almost let himself believe that maybe...

But then the front door flew open, and Remus knew he instantly that was in for it.

"Oh bollocks."

“REMUS JOHN LUPIN!” Lily roared, rushing out onto the front mat in her house slippers. "I'm going to MURDER YOUUUUU!”

* * *

And you, you can be mean,
And I, I'll drink all the time;
'Cause we're lovers, and that is a fact,
Yes we're lovers, and that is that...

Though nothing will keep us together,
We could steal time just for one day;
We can be heroes for ever and ever,
What d'you say?

They weren't miraculously back together, but the apology with Sirius had gone well enough. He could tell there were still plenty of things left to be said, but there was no time to be alone, and Remus knew from experience that privacy was hard to come during a Potter holiday. He considered asking Sirius to step out with him for a while; pop off to the shops before they closed or some other excuse, but he was busy—very busy, peeling enough potatoes to get an entire Irish village through the winter. After that he was to scrub every pot and pan that'd gone into their festive supper. And then he would salt the drive, and fold the washing, and dust the parlour, and kiss Lily's feet, probably. Perhaps finally then she would forgive him for being such a massive nob.

Remus was disappointed, but didn't object. He'd already traded the front porch for the back and was now bent over a tub of soapy water, a stack of dirty dishes half the size of himself beside him. He could handle a bit of humiliation, and if he was lucky, he'd finish his chores with enough time to join his friends in one final practice before the Pettigrews' legendary New Year's party was set to commence. It pleased him to hear that the Marauders were still set to make an appearance even after his decided dis-appearance. He'd taken enough from his friends, no reason they should avoid showing off their hard-earned talent.

As the rain continued to pour, Remus kept scrubbing. He'd just started on a pot big enough to cook a small child in when Mrs. Potter stuck her head out the door.

"Not too chilly out here, are you, Remus?"

"Oh, no. Water's still warm too."

She smiled and untucked a blanket from her arms, settling it down over his shoulders anyway. “Dinner's in an hour. And I’m glad to see your aunt helped you kick that cold.”

He glanced up, nearly losing his grip on the pot. “Sorry?”

“Your aunt? The one the boys said you’d gone to stay with?”

“Oh. That aunt.”

“Yes, now where is it she lives again?”

“Er… Ealing?”

“Ealing, is it? Funny, I think I remember James saying that it was Merton.”

“That’s my… other aunt.”

Mrs. Potter smiled and he knew he was caught, but all she did was shake her head lightly. “You should know that I rang Giles, and he is very disappointed in you.”

“Don’t worry, that’s just Giles for ‘I love you—see you at Easter'.”

She laughed heartily, but did not bother correcting him.

“It’s nice to have you back, beta. Come inside when you’re finished with those dishes, hm? I have some cakes that need frosting.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

Giving him a gentle smile, she bent down and planted a kiss atop his head before stepping back into the house. With his insides now properly squirmy, Remus pulled the blanket tightly around himself and did not feel the cold at all.

“I don’t have to go on with you,” he insisted later as they all filed into Peter’s parlour, where their instruments were ready and waiting for them. “I wouldn’t be offended if you’re still too mad at me.”

James whipped around. “If you don’t go on with us, I’ll let Lily throttle you.”

“At least it’ll be a quiet death. She’s still not talking to me.”

“Honestly I’m not sure I want to be talking to you either.” James pulled his guitar strap up over his head. Next to him, Sirius smacked one of Peter's cymbals with a thick smirk.

"Lay off, Potter, he's had enough punishment. He folded your sock drawer after all."

"I don't care. He still hasn't said where it was that he went!"

"He went to the East End, ya dolt. Go on—tell him, Moony."

Remus nodded at James, who did not look pleased to hear it.

"You couldn't have given us the address?" He demanded. "Called—anything?!"

"I'm sorry, Prongs."

"Yeah, yeah," James huffed. "At least you're safe. You are safe, right?"

"Yeah. Swears."

He didn't look like he believed him, but Peter was already dropping down behind his drum kit, sticks in hand.

"You can grill him later, James, for now let's just get on with practice. Mum said people'll start arriving soon."

So… they weren't exactly Led Zeppelin reborn. Two rough-hewn acoustic guitars, one on-offer electric bass with a shitty amp for company (at least it wasn't water-logged anymore) and a set of drums that had been barely broken-in didn't make for many grand concerts, but it was hardly about that anyway. Mrs. Pettigrew had granted them full rights to her vast front parlour to practice. It meant that come showtime, it would be as easy as throwing the doors open and allowing anyone who was nearby to have a listen. Even if they did end up sounding like a patchwork disaster, no one would care, not with the the party's open bottle service.

"Starting with an Elvis number will definitely go over well, 'cept my cousin Caroline is bound to cry, she's hardly stopped since the guy bought it—but mum still thinks we should do at least one Christmas song," Peter said, after they'd run through their planned set list for the dozenth time.

Sirius mimed retching. "No way. If they wanted carols they should've called the happy-clappy brigade—not Marauders."

“You mean you have no plans to release a Christmas album one day?” James asked. “You could call it ‘Black Christmas’.”

“Funny. But I still say no. Not in front of people.”

“It’s just our families,” Peter scoffed.

“Exactly. Your family.” He raised his eyebrows and Remus caught on.

“Oh—Simeon! He’s back now then?”

Peter immediately rolled his eyes. “It’s been five days and you lot are still acting like I’ve got Lou Reed hidden in the guest room.”

“Simeon’s way cooler than Lou Reed,” Sirius said, then; “Fuck Pete! That nearly took my eye out!” As Peter threw a drumstick at him.

“Stop fantasizing about my brother!”

“Fanta—? … C’mere, you cheeky shit!”

“Watch the drinks!” James wailed, making a dive for the tea tray

As the pair scuffled and James played referee, Remus slouched onto the arm of the sofa, fiddling with the Teisco’s tuning. He didn’t remember much from their summer party, but the last time he’d seen Simeon they’d both had their trousers around their ankles. He wondered if it wasn’t too late to back out, but then the sound of the front door opening echoed from out in the hall, along with a familiar holler;

“Muuum! We’re back! Got those dinner rolls you wanted!”

“There you go—that’s just brilliant! You’ve bloody conjured him!” Peter moaned, brandishing his drum stool like a shield to keep Sirius away.

There was a gentle knock on the parlour’s glass doors and Simeon stuck his head inside. He looked the same—stunning baby blue eyes and dimples on each cheek, which he used to grin down at the sight laid out before him; four stupid boys and their instruments amongst a sea of festive tinsel.

“I don’t hear very much practising going on, lads. Thought I told you this morning that I expected a full rockfest when I returned?”

“Maybe stop bothering us and we’d actually get some work done!”

Peter snapped.

Simeon leaned casually on the door handle, still glancing around musingly. It was obvious he only meant to antagonize Peter, but he did a double-take when he spotted Remus and came into the room further. Only slightly spooked, Remus stood up from the sofa arm and took a quick step back.

“Oh hey, you," Simeon grinned. "Word on the street was that you were gonna be a no-show. What, stop by just to see me?”

Remus opened his mouth but no sound came out. Not that it mattered. Simeon had already plunged on, patting Remus on the shoulder fondly as he peeled out of his winter coat and revealed the handsome Aran jumper and dark brown trousers underneath.

"You look like you're having fun at least. Is this what rockstars are wearing these days?" He asked, gesturing to James' brown cardigan, Sirius' dark turtleneck.

“Says you," Sirius replied. "Nice jumper, Oxbridge boy."

Simeon smirked at him, holding Sirius' gaze for a long while. He looked away first, which was to be expected—Sirius never broke eye contact first—and looked Remus up and down.

“Christ, I think you’ve bloody grown again, Lupin.” He nodded to James. “And here I was thinking you’d end up being the tallest mate.”

“There’s no competing with this one, he’s like a weed,” James replied; “Grows only two ways—up and stubborn.”

Broken from his trance, Remus shot his friend a light glare before looking back at Simeon. “Hey, Sim—er… How’s school?”

Simeon shrugged. “It’s Oxford, which is code for lots of crusty old geezers and entire lecture halls full of sods who think they’re the smartest person in the room. Which is impossible, of course.”

“Why, ‘cause you’re already the smartest?”

“And the funniest.” Simeon winked and Remus’ stomach did flips.

A throw pillow hit the parlour door next to Simeon’s head and Peter flopped down onto his stool. “Sim—goooooo! We’re busy!”

“You can get your knickers out of a twist, Petey, I only wanted to say hello. Speaking of which—Phae, come here and meet the gang."

Another face peeked around the doorway, joined quickly by the petite body of a pretty girl with honey-brown hair and huge silver hoops in her ears. "Hello," she smiled. "Are you boys still at it then?"

"Remus—this is Phaedra, my girlfriend," Simeon said.

Remus almost started. Girlfriend? Like, for real?!

"Pleased to meet you," Phaedra said, waving sweetly. "You're one of Peter's friends then?"

Remus didn't even get the chance to answer; not that he could've. Instead Peter thumped his bass drum several times, glaring at them both.

"SIM—OUT!"

"Alright, we're going," Simeon blagged, snaking an arm across his girlfriend's shoulders and backing her out of the room. "This concert of yours better be good!"

He shut the parlour door before Peter could resort to more drumstick tossing and James turned to smirk at him. "If you're worried we're going to replace you with Sim or something you can relax, Pete."

"I'm not worried—"

" 'Cause I already asked, and Simeon can't play the drums."

"I hate you."

This time it was James' turn to scuffle. He grabbed Peter in a friendly headlock and while he was avoiding taking a drumstick to the eye, Sirius crossed the room and flicked a guitar pick at Remus' cheek.

"You're mooning, Moony."

"I am not," he grumbled, flicking his own pick at him. "Sod off."

"I never noticed—have you always drooled this much over Sim?"

"I wasn't drooling."

"Sure you were. Could've solved the drought in Africa on your own."

“Well, what about you? One step away from openly declaring your love for the cheeky git, you were. 'Nice jumper'. I mean, really."

"I was clearly teasing."

"Only 'cause you like him so much. You wish he'd tease you back."

“Fuck off, Moony.”

“Make me.”

Sirius’ eyes flashed and Remus clamped his mouth shut, looking away quickly. Luckily Sirius didn’t seem much interested in purposeful arguing or accidental flirting; he moved past him, mumbling something about the toilet, and Remus was left to slump back against the sofa.

Less than an hour or so later, people had begun arriving in droves. They brought with them spare Christmas presents and cling-wrapped dishes that left the dining room piled high with all sorts of sweet and savoury treats. Remus had missed the Potters' infamous Christmas party, which meant that everywhere he turned there was someone new to be introduced to. The Pettigrews were a small family when compared to the Potter clan, but they had friends all over. Remus spent twenty minutes just listening to some guy done on about the likelihood of the labour party taking back majority government before realising that it was local MP. He made a swift enough exit, only to be swept up into another conversation over the extended construction on the M25, and the Underground Fleet line, and the new NatWest Tower. It struck Remus how all adults seemed to do was complain, but despite the awkwardness and the overwhelming amount of people, he was glad to be back with his friends.

They escaped up to Lottie's childhood bedroom eventually, where Peter broke out a round of Chartbuster. It was mostly just an excuse to sit around and chug the bottle of vodka Lottie had smuggled upstairs, but Remus was winning so he had very few complaints.

“Kids, it’s time to come down and greet the rest of our guests!” Mrs. Pettigrew called, practically wailing on Lottie’s bedroom door to get them to come out.

“We’ll be down in a second, Mum!” Lottie hollered back, before downing her share of the booze and passing it along to James.

“I still don't know how you thought this would be a good idea,” Lily moaned, covering her mouth with the back of her hand. Equally as unsettled, James lowered the bottle from his lips and heaved slightly.

“I think I’m going to be sick.”

“If you so much as drool on my new rug I’ll boil you in great aunt Frida’s hot cider,” Lottie threatened. She tossed the empty bottle into the bin before checking the hallway—no mother—and began to herd them all out of her bedroom one by one. Remus waited obediently in the hall, but nearly fell over when the door he'd been leaning against opened behind him.

“I hope you at least divided the swill fairly,” Simeon said, coming out to leer at them. His collar was misbuttoned, and Remus realised why when Phaedra emerged, dabbing at her smudged lipstick and gently combing through her fingers through her hair.

“Phae and I popped off to the off-license earlier, so if you’re good I've got some rum with your names on it," Simeon offered. Immediately Peter pushed forward, waving a finger at him.

“We don’t—” He cut himself off with a hiccup; “We don’t need you to get alcohol for us anymore. Sirius’s eighteen now!”

“Which means I’m mature enough not to turn down free booze when it’s offered!” Sirius declared promptly.

“What’s that about free booze?” One of Peter’s uncles slurred, appearing out of the upstairs bathroom and adding to the already crowded hallway. As Sirius made a humble excuse and Simeon began ushering them down the stairs for a hasty exit, Remus hung back in the bedroom with Lily, who’d stopped to watch Lottie reapply her lipstick in her vanity mirror.

“I see Peter’s still running with his ‘anti-Simeon’ dogma,” Lily sighed.

“Ugh, it’s been awful, he never stops whinging.”

“What’s with that by the way?” Remus asked. “It’s never been this bad.”

“Mhm, well—” Lottie smacked her lips together; “You know how Petey's always been a bit shite at getting what he wants? Well, it was Sim who convinced our parents to get him that silly drum kit in the first place, and I guess Petey’s never quite gotten over it. Couldn't tell you why, it’s not like Sim lords it over him. If anything you’d think he'd be grateful. Mum and Dad never would've gone for it had Sim not been the one to convince them. Anyway, looks like it's happening again with this gap year rubbish. Petey brought it up over dinner the other night and Daddy blew a gasket."

"You mean they're not gonna go for it?" Remus winced.

"No, they will. But only because Sim told them about this friend of his who took a year off and now runs his family's entire leather-making business up in Birmingham. They ate it up. You should've seen Petey's face."

"Was he not pleased?" Lily asked.

"Not even close. He went red from top to bottom, but couldn't very well say anything without upsetting our Dad again. Now I guess he's right pissed off. Won't stop taking shots at Sim—keeps calling him hen-pecked by Phaedra. The hippocrite. I quite like the girl, myself. She's chill. And it's not like Petey's anything but whipped for Moira anyway."

"That's too bad."

"Eh, he'll get over it." Finished with the mirror, Lottie turned back to Lily and snapped her fingers. "Lils, c'mere and let me fix your eyeliner."

"You already spent hours on it," Lily moaned dramatically, letting Lottie drag her over anyway.

"Want me to do you too, Remus?" She asked after.

"Oh, no—"

"You should, Remus!" Lily preened. "For your show! It's a holiday anyway—no one'll care. It might even impress Sirius."

"Why would I want to impress Sirius?"

Without answering, both girls grabbed him by the wrist and tugged him over, forcing him down onto the vanity stool while Lottie raised her eyeliner pen, which was a regrettable electric blue colour.

"Ow—fuck, Lot! You sure you haven't had too much to drink? You know you're not supposed to operate heavy machinery while under the influence…"

“It’s an eyeliner pen, you twee idiot. Now quit faffing around and hold still!”

Sirius appeared in the bedroom doorway. “Moony! Something's wrong with your amp. It keeps buzzing and—oh! Lot, be a doll and do me next!”

Finished being painted, Remus stood up and quickly switched places with Sirius, blinking excessively as his eyes watered. He reached for them, but Lily appeared at his side and batted his hands away.

“Don’t. It looks good and you’ll only ruin it."

"I suppose I'll just blink through the pain then."

"Good. Because I think ‘Mediterranean Breeze’ might just be your colour.”

He resisted the urge to rub the makeup away and turned to squint at her. “Glad to see you’re talking to me again. I missed the only other sound voice of reason around here.”

“It’s a holiday,” Lily reasoned. “And I missed you too. Even if you are an absolute spanner. I should be giving you the royal silence treatment, shouldn’t I?”

“You could always start now. At least that way I wouldn’t have to hear you rag on me for not doing my winter homework.”

Lily gasped playfully, and snatched up one of the throw pillows from Lottie’s bed to smack him with it. Remus laughed, pleased that she had forgiven him, despite the fact that he most certainly didn’t deserve it.

“We were so worried,” she said afterwards, voice soft and reluctant. “Especially Sirius.”

Remus glanced over at the boy in question. He was sitting obediently on Lottie’s plush pink stool, smiling with his eyes closed. His hair had finally grown back some, and was now just curling around the ridges of his jaw. And his mouth… Christ. Devastatingly handsome, Sirius was. There was no other way to describe it. One look and you were just done for.

“We apologised, sort of,” he said to Lily. “We’re… friends again.”

She smiled, entirely relieved, but Remus found no comfort in it. He didn't want to be friends with Sirius—or even bandmates. He wanted to be his sky.

"And—voila! All finished," Lottie declared, stepping back so that Sirius could pop up from the stool and admire her handiwork.

"Looks great, Lot! We should get Potter and Pete up here too—paint up the entire band."

"In that case, sit down. I'm adding blusher."

"And that's my cue," Remus said, promptly backing out of the room.

Really, he should've accepted the blusher. Not five minutes after arriving downstairs, Remus found himself accosted by several aunties, all of them chittering away with a glass of sherry in their hand. One even tried to pinch his cheek, but he was tall enough to swerve her hand and pass it off as a neck cramp.

"You know, I have a daughter about your age."

"Oh Doris, don't tease the poor boy!"

"I'm not! I only asked if he was on the market."

"Do ignore her, Remus, she's already had far too much to drink."

"Don't belittle me, Gladys, you're just as bad. But what was I saying, Remus? Oh yes—Phillipa. She attends St. Margaret's Ladies' College in Heathrow. Darling thing—loves horses. She was awarded first in Dressage at her last competition. Oh, I know—the two of you should meet! I could arrange the whole thing!"

Remus glanced across the salon, desperate for an escape. He could see Phaedra talking to Mrs. Pettigrew, but no Simeon. Then a flash of dark hair as Sirius descended the main staircase and slipped into the parlour.

Doris leaned in. "What is it you said your father did again?"

"Dunno, never met the guy. If you'll excuse me."

Remus turned and fled the circle of women, squeezing through the crowd of bodies until he finally reached the glass doors and yanked them open. Inside the parlour, some of the noise and clamour was drowned out and he found Sirius next to Peter's drum kit, fiddling with the cheap microphone Simeon had brought out from the garage.

“New rule—when we start throwing our own parties, no one over twenty-five’s allowed past the front door."

“What happens when we pass twenty-five?” Sirius asked casually.

“We start keeping a guest list.”

Sirius popped up from his squat, swinging the microphone around on its cord. When he walked he sauntered, and when he smiled he bit his lip, the corners of his mouth curled upwards cheekily. It was unbearable.

“So? How’d Lottie do?”

Skipping forward, he closed his eyes so Remus could see the fierce electric blue that was now rimming his lashes. A bit had smudged at the outer corners, but the makeup suited him—looked like a night already lived.

“You look good,” Remus said, truthfully. “You always look good.”

Sirius gave him a long look and swung the microphone around once more before catching it out of the air. “Well… you don’t look so bad yourself, rockstar.”

Fuck.

“You can’t do that.”

“Do what?”

Remus swallowed. “You know what.”

Before Sirius could offer another rebuttal, James and Peter appeared through the doors, both sporting eyeliner of their own and big grins.

“So, lads?” James started; “Shall we get this show on the road?”

While they were busy doing their final checks, fingers buzzing from nervousness, Lottie came downstairs to join them along her newest beau, the infamous Roger. The investment firm high-flyer came dressed up in a full suit, which would’ve been fine had it not made him look forty. Lottie had already sworn up and down that he wasn’t a day over twenty-seven, but Remus wasn’t entirely sure he believed her. At least he wasn’t balding, and Lottie seemed happy enough. She was showing off her new diamond bracelet to anyone who cared enough to ask—a Christmas gift from the man on her arm.

“So… where did the two of you meet again?” Sirius asked sceptically.

“Roger was visiting daddy’s office and I just happened to be bringing his lunch,” Lottie recited. “We reconnected when all of us came back for holiday. It was fate.”

“She’s hard to say no to,” Roger surmised.

“I see. Does that mean you’ve already rung Clyde and let him know the good news, Lot?”

“Sirius—shut your mouth.”

Sirius immediately held up both hands in surrender, but Roger remained unfazed. “So why ‘Marauders’?” He asked.

“It’s a concept,” James said, busy pouring them all a final shot of whisky for good luck.

“A concept of what?”

“Er… don’t worry about it.”

The parlour door flew open and Lily stuck her head in. “Are you guys ready? Everyone’s waiting.”

James waved her over and all of them, including Lottie and Roger, raised their glasses. “To good times—” He glanced pointedly at Remus; “and to better friends.”

“To all of you tossers!” Lily cried.

“And to rock and roll!” Sirius finished, as they all knocked their rims together and downed the whisky. “WHOO!” Sirius gasped. “Oh yeah, showtime, baby.”

As they hid the leftover booze bottles behind the sofa and took up their instruments, the girls opened the parlour doors and eager party-goers flooded into the room. Family, friends, colleagues, and coworkers—all of them were interested. It was Halloween two-fold, and Remus just hoped they could play loud enough to be heard over the chatter.

“Welcome and happy New Year!” Sirius called, playing at being pragmatic. “We’re gonna be your house band for the night. You have a one, Jannet Pettigrew, to thank for that—which means that any and all complaints can be directed to her immediately following the show!”

Everyone laughed, and Remus couldn’t tear his eyes away. Sirius was such a natural with people and crowds; he spun about with confidence oozing from every pore. Remus would’ve been a wreck were he in his shoes, but Sirius was in his element. Eyes on me, it seemed to say; Don’t you dare look away. I’m here. I’m here.

“We do take requests,” Sirius mused; “Provided said request comes with a tenner—nah, only joking. Though if you see a hat going ‘round I hear it’s poor taste at these things to keep your wallets in your pockets.” More laughter. “Listen to me ramble—you came for a show! Right—right?”

More cheering, this time with hearty laughter and accompanying applause, and Sirius grinned.

“Well, alright then. That’s James, Remus, and Pete, and I’m Sirius. And this… is ‘Jailhouse Rock’.”

* * *

I, I wish you could swim,
Like the dolphins, like dolphins can swim;
Though nothing, nothing will keep us together,
We can beat them, for ever and ever,
Oh we can be Heroes, just for one day...

A rather sozzled crowd of middle-aged aunties and a few busted strings later, they’d given two encores and everyone was left smiling ear to ear. It was a rush, Remus could still feel the ring of Elvis in his ears. This was what it was to really love music—no matter how imperfect the performance, they’d just kept playing. And the entire time, he couldn’t take his eyes off Sirius.

“Weren’t they just wonderful?” Mrs. Pettigrew declared, borrowing the microphone to shout at the crowd; “Yes! Well you all know what time it is—half-hour until midnight!”

As the party began to disperse again, Lily shot forward and threw her arms around James' neck. “That was so fun! You were amazing—even better than last time!"

“It was, wasn't it?” Sirius concurred, hugging them both.

“But we got all muddled up in the middle,” Peter said irritably. “I thought we agreed ‘Paperback Writer’ and then ‘Metal Guru’?”

“Who cares,” Remus said happily, “we got through it.”

“It was brilliant,” Lily said again, kissing James several times on the cheek and mouth, leaving him a smiling mess.

“Good show, boys,” Mr. Potter called, as he and wife approached. “Your dedication has clearly paid off. Though I did think it was all over after James snapped that string on his finger.”

“That shit hurt for reals, dad,” James said.

"No swearing around your mother," Mr. Potter warned, before leaning in. "Save that for the after-party."

"Monty!" Mrs. Potter sighed, before brushing a hand across the back of Sirius' head fondly. “You boys really were wonderful. It’s so good to see you all together again.”

"Feels good," Sirius replied, looking straight at Remus.

He’d thought it before, but Mrs. Potter was never subtle, Sirius even less so. Excusing himself quietly, Remus returned to the kitchen, desperate for a glass of water. He had to accept several rounds of praise before he got it but luckily Sirius had followed and they were able to seclude themselves on a corner bench, where the chatter and radio music were less noisy.

"So how was your Christmas anyway?" Sirius asked. He’d somehow ended up with a glass of sherry and several lipstick marks on his cheeks, both of which had to be courtesy of some aunty.

"It was alright. Was mostly just Tomny and I."

"Still on the outs with the rest of your friends?"

"That's over with now. Can't go back."

"That sucks."

"Mm."

Sirius began twiddling his thumbs. "So are you gonna tell me what happened with Tomny or what?"

"Nothing happened. I just went to see him."

"And what... played jacks all day?"

Remus gut twisted painfully. "Why don't you just ask what you really want to ask. We've been up and down all day and I'm tired of trying to keep up."

"Don't talk to me like that. I'm not Jillian Stewart. I was your boyfriend."

"Was?"

Sirius looked away, wiping beneath his eyes. "Bloody makeup... So what do you think of Roger?"

"Ha. Classic Sirius..."

"What was that?"

"I don't think anything of Roger."

"No? You don't think he's too old?"

"I guess, but Lottie likes him."

Sirius nodded thoughtfully. "I think he's gay."

"Don't be so horrible."

"I'm not! We shook hands just now, and he's got skin softer than a baby's bottom. Then he asked me what shampoo I use."

"That doesn't mean that he's—that he's into guys!"

Sirius smirked bitterly. "Well, I can actually see Lottie marrying a bender. Kind of fits, right? They can share outfits."

"How is it you find it so easy to slander your own sexuality?"

"Everyone else does it, why should I hold back just because I'm a poofter?"

Remus pressed his fingers into his eyes. “You’re impossible. And a nasty drunk.”

“Maybe.” Sirius paused to sip his drink. “But I've been thinking, if we’re talking statistics, then there’s bound be a few more of us hanging around school. Can’t just be me, McKinnon, and… you. I mean, there’s obviously Barty but he might as well be a sea sponge for all the tits and ass he’s getting.”

“You’re saying Barty’s gay now too?”

“He’s right obsessed with you, ain't he? Not that I blame him.” Sirius cast him a sideways glance before polishing off the sherry. “So, who’s your bet? I'm thinking Freddie Thomas—he’s on the football team with James. That’d be a win, right? At least he’s somewhat fit. And that Darcy Williams girl—Mary said once that she was always staring at other girls in the changing room.”

“This is a sad game. And I don't want to play.”

“Why? Because we’re sad? Pitiable? In that case I’m gonna need vodka —you want one?”

“No, think I’m gonna step out for a smoke actually.”

“Fine. See you later then.”

Sirius stood up from the bench and drifted off through the crowd, not looking back. It was almost startling how quickly they could go from being on top of the world to fighting. It worried Remus, but he was drunk too and really did need a cigarette.

Shrugging on his jacket, Remus stepped out onto the back porch and braced himself against the cold. It'd stopped pouring sometime in the early evening, but the cold kept everything wet and icy. He moved away from the other men standing in a circle and puffing on their rich cigars and ended up around the side of the grand house, smoking alone in the dark. A part of him was angry, but he wanted so badly to move past it. He wanted to know if Sirius had told James he were gay like he’d said he would. He wanted to know if there was a chance at mending things at all. And god, did he want to put Sirius Black’s handsome face through a window.

“I already told you—you can’t be here.”

Remus snapped his head around. He was alone, save for the distant party chatter drifting out from some open window, but the voice had been closer. It cut through the darkness in a harsh whisper, followed by another, this one louder.

“You promised you’d come and see me. You said we could talk!”

“We broke up! What is there to talk about?”

Too curious for his own good, Remus crept around the corner and found himself at the top of the Pettigrews’ driveway. He had to be careful to avoid slipping on the icy pavement, but when he peered around the side of Mr. Pettigrew's Oldsmobile, he spotted the pair arguing and he nearly did a double-take. It was Simeon, standing next to a stranger amongst the sea of parked vehicles. They were squared up to to one another like brick walls, though all Remus could make out of the other guy was a head of dark hair and a large nose that might’ve been handsome.

“I didn’t want to break up,” the stranger said.

"That's funny considering you dumped me," Simeon shot back.

"It was a misunderstanding. You know how much pressure my dad was putting on. I just needed some time."

"Yeah, well maybe I needed time too."

Suddenly, Remus couldn't breathe. Just needed some time, hadn't he said near-on the exact same words to Sirius?

"You can't just decide it's over like that!" The stranger keened. "I deserve another shot!"

“Who says?" Simeon snapped. “Christ—we weren’t bloody married! You're the one who called it quits. What you think I would do, just wait around until you got over yourself?”

“I thought you'd wait at least a few weeks at least! Guy's already told me you've found someone else."

"Maybe I have! Butt out!"

"Who is it? It better not be that slag Lorelei. You know she's just using you.”

“I'm not seeing Lorelei!"

"Who then? Angus? If it's him I'll pound his face into the—"

"It's none of your business who I date, Hugh! We're not together anymore!"

Remus covered his mouth. The guy was Hugh then, the one he'd caught Simeon with last summer. Holy shit.

"I love you," Hugh said. "And I know you love me too."

"No, I don't."

"Yes, you do. I can tell."

"So you're a mind reader now too?" Simeon laughed incredulously. "You need to go now, Hughie. Go find your family, it's fucking New Year's. Don't make me call Guy and tell him what this is all about."

Hugh recoiled a bit. "Fuck you. You're a real cunt, Sim."

"How would you know? You've never even seen one up close."

The quip was snide enough that Remus expected Hugh to feed Simeon a bunch of fives for it, but rather than lashing out, he only grabbed hold of the front of Simeon's jacket and pulled them together in a rough kiss. They tussled a bit, struggling against each other like reluctant lovers, until Simeon ultimately yanked back, bringing his fist up and delivering a blow on his ex-boyfriend's cheekbone that made even Remus wince.

Hugh fell backwards, cursing as he held his cheek. "Fuck! … You fucking hit me!"

"Of course I hit you—my family's here, you insensitive fuck."

"Fuck your family! And fuck you, Simeon!"

"Go! Get out of here before I call the cops!"

It was obvious Hugh would've liked to prolong the argument, but suddenly a loud crash came from inside—followed by laughter. The party noise was loud enough to spook all three of them, even Remus behind his car, and afterwards a defeated-looking Hugh began to slowly back down the drive. Remus held his breath until he'd gone, when Simeon's shoulders finally slumped in relief. Too stunned by what he'd just witnessed, he stared creeping backwards the way he'd come, only to knock his boot into a decorative planter and send it crashing onto the pavement.

Immediately, Simeon spun around.

“WHO’S THERE?!”

Utterly caught, Remus reluctantly emerged from the dark. He threw up an awkward hand and Simeon squinted at him for a moment, before relaxing.

“Oh, Lupin, it’s only you... Did you hear all that then?”

“Er, yeah. Sorry. Didn’t mean to eavesdrop.”

Simeon tucked his hands beneath his armpits, looking irritated. “You really expect me to believe that?”

“… No." He winced. "But before you try and clobber me, just should know I’m trained in the ancient art of kung fu. Plus, I'm a fast runner.”

Simeon sighed, dropping his arms. “You always were the funny one.”

Remus shrugged haplessly, and considered his now-cold cigarette.

“Want one?”

“Might as well.”

He met him halfway down the drive and together they found a spot along the garden wall, where the stones were just high enough to sit comfortably.

“You were good tonight,” Simeon told him. “All of you. Could’ve convinced me that you were a real band.”

“We are a real band,” Remus replied indignantly. “Even have a few of our own songs now too.”

“My apologies,” Simeon said, giving him a little bow. “Why didn’t you play any of them, then?”

“We sort of decided that New Year’s with the families wasn’t the best time to break out our personal flavour of teenage angst.”

“That’s a shame. You’ll have to show me next time.”

"Right, sure." As they sat, Remus puffed nervously on his cig. He almost felt guilty for asking, but he had to know. “So… who was that you were talking to?”

“Knew you were listening, little shit."

"Er..." He laughed nervously, and Simeon shouldered him.

"That's just Hugh."

"He an ex?"

"That's right. Guess he came looking for me. He's lucky I found him before my dad did. Dunno what he'd do if he found a drunk, sobbing queer on his doorstep with have the neighbourhood inside.”

Remus picked at a hangnail nervously. "Doesn't sound like it ended well between you two."

“Don’t worry about it,” Simeon dismissed. “That's old hat. I warned him not to show up tonight, but people do stupid things when they’re pissed and lonely. I’m just grateful he didn’t cause a bigger scene.”

“And Phaedra…? Does she know?”

“About Hugh? Oh yeah, she knows.”

“Oh. So she’s your beard then?”

“My what?”

Remus shut his mouth very quickly. “It's nothing. Ignore me.”

Simeon gave him a measuring look. Like a cross between amusement and judgement. “I hear you’ve been having troubles of your own lately. Your friends are worried. If you’d like, we can talk about it.”

“I don’t—”

“Or we could just smoke,” he shrugged. “Though I find that talking tends to keep you better distracted from the cold. And it sure is—brrr—cold out tonight.”

Remus evaluated his options. Marlene was home with her family, and he’d only just said goodbye to Tomny. As far as Queer Street went, he was low on options. Might as well knock on Simeon’s door.

“Fine. Me and this… person—”

“You can say Sirius.”

He whipped his head up. “I—Did he tell you?”

“No, but I’m not blind. You two are like a couple of romping puppies. Reminds me of myself a bit. It's almost cute."

“Funnily enough, this isn’t making me feel any better.”

Looking amused, Simeon took a drag. “Just come out with it, Lupin, no one else is around. You'll feel better, trust me.”

“Do you feel better after talking to Hugh?"

"Blimey, are you always this defensive?"

Remus frowned. "None of your business."

It made Simeon laugh at least.

"You two break up then?"

"Yes."

"And you still feel like shit over it?"

"Yes..."

“Because you still like him?”

“No—yes! God, it’s fucking mental.”

“What’s so mental about it?”

What wasn’t mental about it? Remus held a hand to his forehead, about ready to climb the terrace and pitch himself from the Pettigrews' roof.

“I don't think either of us wanted to break up… Not really,” he grumbled. “We just kept messing stuff up. Maybe we’re just too different. Sirius is a somebody—meant to be surrounded by other somebodies. I’m fine as a nobody—I like nobodies.”

“You’re gonna have to unpack that one a bit for me.”

Remus swallowed, rubbing his eyes to stifled the pricking feeling of incoming tears. He would not cry.

“It's Sirius. He’s just so sure of everything.”

“No one’s sure of everything.”

“He is! He wanted to tell all of our friends, and I didn’t. His parents know and I'd rather drown myself in the Thames than say so. Not that he's any better off. And he’s got this brother—”

“Regulus, right? Cute kid. Never smiled much.”

“Tell me about it.” Remus suppressed a groan. “I’m not gay, but I am something, and I thought it would be enough, but now I’m thinking it wasn’t. Not for him. That he… fuck, he thinks I’m lying.”

“Lying about…?”

“Being—” Fuck; “bisexual…”

“Oh! So you’re actually AC/DC? Fucking knew it.”

“What?” Remus gaped. “How would you know?”

“Duh. I called it.”

“When?!”

Simeon took a moment to consider. “Mm… Two years ago, maybe? Whenever I was at school. You just sorta… seemed like it.”

Remus began to scoff ironically, but on the inhale, sucked a large dose of smoke straight into his lungs. He doubled over, coughing while Simeon chuckled and pat him on the back.

“Oh, Lupin! Don’t tell me you’ve only just realising it yourself?”

Still wheezing, Remus shot upright. “Well, it certainly hasn’t been two years!”

“You gotta get out more, mate," Simeon laughed. "Talk to people—real people. Things’ll get better once you’re out of school, I think.”

“Yeah, maybe…"

“So how’d you figure it out then? Did Sirius tell you? Or did you meet someone else? Was it over holiday? That's the best time to do it. Happened to me in the Canary Islands. I was fourteen."

"Fourteen?"

"Like I said, mate, you've gotta get out more. Now what was it that tipped you off? A girlfriend want to get a bit freaky?"

"I wish," Remus grumbled. "It was a... er—ngh..."

“What’s that?”

"I read it in a... mmnghdictionary..."

"A what?"

"A DICTIONARY!"

“Bloody hell!” Simeon cackled. “Fuck, you really crack me up, Lupin. A dictionary? Well, suppose there are worse ways. I knew the first time I’d ever gotten into bed with a guy. Name was Ike—so fucking fit. I’m telling you, like full on—”

“Wait,” Remus interrupted; “So that would mean that you’re…?”

“Bisexual, yeah. Are we having trouble keeping up, pet?”

He shook his head staunchly and thoughtlessly went to pull a drag on his cigarette, only to find that it'd gone cold. Fiddling for his lighter, Remus cleared his throat. What a revelation tonight was turning out to be.

“So Phaedra’s really your...?”

“She ain’t a ‘beard’, mate,” Simeon smirked. “Guys are great fun, don’t get me wrong, but women are goddesses, right? They’re meant to be worshipped. Revered and adored. I love women, and most days, I'm but a humble pilgrim at the foot of their shrine.”

“Oh, Mary would love you.”

“Most women do.” He winked again—that infernal wink.

Remus got the cigarette going again and sat there on the garden wall, feeling present and withdrawn all at once. Would Sirius have been so reluctant to believe he were actually bisexual had he known about Sim? Probably not. The verdict made him angry all over again. Why me? Why don’t you ever believe me?

“You look a little steamed there, Lupin,” Simeon said. “I hope I haven’t unravelled anything. It’s okay to be nervous about this stuff, you know.”

“No, s'just… quite a bit to process.”

“You said you and Sirius broke up, right? Was it because you still like girls?”

“It was lots of things, but yeah I think that too.” He bit his lip. “How did you really know... that you could like both?”

Simeon looked up, considering the dark sky. “Seemed the most obvious thing. I like people—like knowing 'em. Don’t really much care what's between their legs.”

Remus nodded, then; “My first girlfriend turned out to be a lesbian.”

“Happens to the best of us,” Simeon sighed, setting a hand on his shoulder. He began rubbing small circles with his thumb and Remus let him, not really thinking anything of it. It was cold and he was depressed and who knew where Sirius had gone off to.

"Have you ever regretted it? Being bisexual?"

"No," Simeon said quietly. "It's opened up my world. There are so many beautiful people out there, Remus."

Remus supposed that had to be true. He took another drag, and while he did Simeon’s hand moved toward the back of his neck, squeezing tenderly. Sometime within the last few minutes he’d slid closer along the stone wall, and by the time his fingers were tracing the edge of his jaw Remus had already caught on.

"Uh, Sim? What are you..."

"Has it only ever been Black then?"

Simeon smiled at him, and something about the gentle motion of his hand had Remus ready to pour his guts.

"One other," he murmured, "but it was an accident."

"That's too bad. I know it can be hard to meet people at school. You're so isolated up there."

With his other hand, Simeon grabbed Remus by the thigh and began tracing tiny patterns with his thumb and forefinger. It was enough to give Remus goosebumps.

"Simeon, I'm not sure..."

"There's no shame in it Remus. Think of it as testing the waters. That way you could see if you really like both. I don't mind."

Simeon kept rubbing his thumb in circles beneath the edge of his jaw. Unable to help it, Remus looked him top to bottom. He didn't need to see anything, Simeon was certainly... but oh god.

“I thought you had a girlfriend?”

“Phaedra don’t mind either," Simeon smiled. "She’s probably upstairs snogging one of Potter’s cousins right now. It’s a thing. Casual. You'll see for yourself when you get to university.”

A thing?!

Simeon licked his lips, leaning in, and for a split second Remus considered just letting it happen. Who wouldn’t want to?

But then…

“I’m sorry.” He pressed a steady hand to the middle of Simeon’s chest, keeping them apart. “But I can’t.”

A beat passed between them, before Simeon sat back, withdrawing his hand. “ ‘Course,” he said, “should’ve realised.”

“It’s not because you’re a guy or anything.”

“Mm. I’m just the wrong guy."

"I..."

" 'Cause it's him, isn't it?”

It felt pathetic, even naive, but there was no helping it.

“It’ll always be him, I think.”

Simeon’s smile widened. “Well, I'm at least happy to be of service then. I'd be careful if I were you though, Lupin. It's dangerous to put that sort of thing out into the universe. You never know if it'll come true.”

Maybe Simeon was right, but no matter how messy things got, Remus couldn’t picture ever a world where he was never not completely gone for Sirius Black.

Flicking away his cigarette stub, Simeon moved his hand down to Remus' knee and gave it a comforting pat. Not tender, just friendly. Mate to mate. Remus relaxed a bit, trying to ignore the blush burning in his ears. He still couldn't quite believe it. Me? Simeon Pettigrew wanted to kiss ME?!

"Er—thanks, Sim. For... whatever that was. I think I feel better now."

"Good. And just know, that anytime you need a chat, call me. Seriously—Phaedra don't mind."

He wiggled his eyebrows and Remus snorted just as a little clatter echoed from up the drive. They both turned in time to catch Sirius staring back at them, obviously shocked. He stopped to pick up the beer bottle he'd dropped, clearing his throat stiffly.

"Sorry! Didn't mean to intrude."

Simeon withdrew his hand very quickly, and Remus shot to his feet, immediately alarmed and panicked.

"Sirius, don't go! It's not what you think, really!"

Sirius held up a hand in dismissal and turned to make his escape, but before he could, Remus leapt forward and grabbed him by the arm. "Please!"

"No, Moony, I—"

"Don't go!"

"Remus, please!"

It felt like they were falling in the wrong directions. Sirius had misunderstood, he was going to leave and things were going to be messy forever! They'd both get trapped in their own heads, thinking endlessly about all of the what if's. What if he'd forced him to stay? What if they'd never fought at all? What if he just kissed him?

What if, what if, what if—Remus was tired of it. So he didn't think—he jumped. Whipping Sirius back around, he simply cupped him around the neck, drew their bodies together—

And kissed him.

It was there instantly. The softness and the restlessness and the rightness. Everything was just right with Sirius. Nothing made any sense without him. He could taste the shared tobacco on their tongues, the booze, the music. At first Sirius lagged behind like he was waiting for it to be over, but that was not Sirius. Sirius blazed ahead in all things, and simply expected Remus to keep up. He used his teeth just about much as his tongue—he was bold and brash—hungry and yet always soft. And when Sirius opened his mouth to him to do just that, Remus could've wept.

When they broke apart, Sirius looked looked first at him—mouth still parted in fresh kiss—and then snapped his gaze to Simeon, as though just remembering he were there at all. Remus also spun around, and there he found Simeon waiting for them, pushing off of the garden wall while adjusting the collar on his jacket.

"Oh, don't mind me," he said cheerily. "Just happy to be along for the ride."

He left then, as jovially as he arrived to most places, and gently pat Remus on the shoulder as he went. By the time Simeon had made it to the top of the drive, he was whistling a cheery tune.

"You… You kissed me in front of him," Sirius said, staring at him like he were awestruck.

"Yeah, I—I guess I did."

"Wow."

Remus opened his mouth, then closed it, then opened it again. Suddenly all the thoughts were tumbling out.

"I always want to kiss you, Sirius," he blabbed. "It's like breathing. A base instinct. Every moment of every day, I want to kiss you. It's all I think about. All I have thought about for two years."

Sirius shook his head. "Don't say that." His eyes were shining slightly, as though he were tearing up. "You can't say that."

"I have to."

"No, you can't! 'Cause I'm not as good as you. I don't know how to say it back. And Moony, what I did… What I said to you before, I don't deserve—"

"It's alright, I forgive you."

“Shut up!” Sirius wailed, only half meaning it. “Fuck... It’s my turn to have a go at the great, grand confession, alright!? Even if I don't know what I'm doing, you're good enough to try for. So just be quiet for ten bloody seconds."

Remus did so, and while he waited for Sirius to catch his breath, he tried very hard not to get his hopes up.

"Look, Moony, I know I’m self-destructive. I know I'm a total arsehole! When things start going wrong, it's like I-I can't explain it. The only way I can think of it is if I'm on a plane, yeah? And that plane's going down, and you know me, I'd rather jump before it crashes. I'm gonna go down anyway, right? Might as well be on my own terms. But I'm vain too! Probably could be diagnosed a narcissist actually, and despite the fact that I’m an incredible shag—”

“Oh brother.”

“—all I want is for things to go my way, all of the time. And I want you, all of the time! But good people aren't supposed to want that. They don’t go fucking mental the moment their friends show interest anything aside from them—but I do! Can't help it either. It's like, I’m the same as them. All this time, and I’m no different from my fucking family. I’m no good, Moony. But I'm so mental... so fucking mental about you.”

Remus bit his lip, and in a small voice he asked; “How mental?”

“Completely. Entirely. Cut me open and you’ll find only Moony inside! There's no room for anything else.”

“That’s… sort of crude.”

“Shit. And here I was going for endearing.” Sirius laughed meekly, sniffing and wiping his nose. It was freezing out, but all Remus needed to warm himself up was to be closer to him. He stepped forward, hugging Sirius against him, until he could feel the wisp of his breath along his ear.

“I was a fucking arsehole, back at school,” Sirius murmured.

“I was too.”

“I did it on purpose, though. I just got so mad. Couldn't even think straight. All I wanted to do was fight—over Reg and my parents. And then I ended up taking it out on you."

“It's okay. I did it too. I wanted to hurt you... I’m sorry.”

“I believe you now,” he said. “I swear I do. McKinnon, she... she's pretty convincing."

"Yeah, she is."

Sirius pulled away, until they could look each other in the eye. "Moony, I promise you—whatever you are, I'll accept it. I know I messed up before, but I don’t care if you’re not gay. I just want you.”

“And I don’t care if you are gay, Sirius. But please, I gotta know. Did you tell James?”

“Nah.” Sirius sniffed again. “I couldn’t… not with how we’d left things. Didn’t feel right.”

Remus let out a breath. He didn't know whether to feel happy or sad, so he settled for relieved.

“You still can," he said. "I’ll do it with you even. I think I'm ready now.”

"No," Sirius said, shaking his head firmly. "That's what got us here. Me and my big mouth. You can't force yourself to do something you don't want to do, just because I'm throwing a fit.”

“I’m not,” Remus protested, pushing a piece of hair out of Sirius’ eyes. “If I could go back, I'd change the way I told you guys about my dad. Doing it like that—it hurt everyone, even me. But I feel better now, and I wouldn't take back doing it. Now that it's out, it's like I'm lighter. I'm glad I said something then, and I keep thinking that maybe it could feel that way with James too."

"I dunno," Sirius frowned. "Don't see much point in telling him if we're broken up."

"What if we weren't broken up anymore?"

"You mean you want to get back together?"

"Well, I certainly don't want to be your friend."

"Oh."

"Not like that! I just..." Out of words, Remus reached into his jumper, withdrawing the chain necklace. When Sirius saw it, surprise bloomed on his face.

"You're still wearing that thing?"

"I never took it off. Not once."

He thumbed the little chain, and the pick on its end. "That's so sappy."

"Sod off. You're the one who gave it to me."

Sirius smiled, wrapping his fingers around it. "I know."

Remus felt his heart leap inside his chest. “Does this mean we’re through with being broken up?"

“Better be. I haven't been able to write anything for weeks, my playing sucks too. Even Prongs noticed. And I... Well, I sort of missed having a poet for a boyfriend.”

“I’m far from a poet.”

“Part-time then.” Sirius bit his lip, this time over a smile. “Can I kiss you?”

Hearing him ask that, to say that he wanted to kiss him; it was like a thousand pound weight had been lifted from Remus' chest. He squeezed Sirius tighter, burying his face in the crook of his neck.

“Do you even need to ask?”

There was a little sound, like a hum, and suddenly Sirius had his hands around his face again. They leaned in, eyes sliding shut and lips nearly touching, only to interrupted when a chant began inside the house.

“Ten! Nine—!"

Sirius laughed, then looked back at him. “Hey, Moony?"

"Eight! Seven—!”

"Yeah?"

“Six! Five—!”

"Let's never play the question game again, okay?"

“Four! Three—!”

"Okay, Padfoot."

“TWO! ONE! HAPPY NEW YEAR!”

The cry went up from inside like thunder, but neither of them were listening. Remus bent his head down and then it was only Sirius. Sirius, Sirius, Sirius. He felt his touch everywhere—on his neck, in his hair, against his torso and his legs. He couldn't get enough, and when Sirius opened his mouth to him, Remus knew he'd never be full. They laughed as they kissed, falling into the garden wall and then kissed some more. Afterwards it felt like dancing. Euphoric silliness carried them back inside the house, where they weaved amongst people and streamers and noisemakers, desperate to find somewhere private where they might finally throw themselves at one another. Upstairs was the only place without crowds of party-goers, but Lottie’s bedroom was locked and when they tried Peter’s they found him passed out drunk on his covers already.

“Bathroom!” Sirius hissed, taking his hand.

"Not this again!"

Though really, Remus had very few qualms. Nor did he object when Sirius pulled him toward the upstairs toilet and threw the door open wide. A second later, he almost wished he had.

“FUCK!” James howled. Sirius had opened the door with such force that the knob had jammed him in the back and sent him spiralling, leaving Lily to stand flushed and horrified against the bathroom sink.

“Oh, shit!” Sirius cackled; “Didn’t mean to interrupt your snogging session!”

Lily screamed, and Remus covered both eyes when he realised that she was bare from the top down, apart from the jumper she was currently clutching to her chest. Despite his injury and the glasses that were knocked askew on his face, James quickly scrambled upwards and threw himself between them as a shield.

“Mate, wanna fuck off?!”

“Right! Well—just wanted to let you know that Moons and I are good now, so if you two wanted to risk that sleepover in your own room, we won’t mind camping out in the spare!”

“Right, good. Now get out!”

Reaching past Sirius, eyes still covered, Remus managed to shut the bathroom door, which they both collapsed against, laughing horrendously.

“Potter's place should be empty now,” Sirius wheezed, when he finally got a breath in. “Do you want to—?”

“What are you waiting for?" Remus kissed him again, and murmured against his mouth; "Get on, rockstar.”

Sirius clung to him, fisting that little silver chain round his neck.

“Oh, how I fucking missed you.”

* * *

I, I will be king,
And you, you will be queen;
Though nothing will drive them away,
We can be Heroes, just for one day,
We can be us, just for one day...

Tuesday 3rd January 1978

They reached King’s Cross at half-past nine, and despite the fact that they were running slightly behind schedule, Giles refused to miss his chance to pull Remus aside and berate him for every stunt he'd pulled since he was seven.

“You cheeky little blighter!"

"I'm sorry, Gil."

"What were you thinking?!"

"I wasn't, Gil."

"That was very disrespectful, what you did!"

"I know, Gil."

The old driver fisted both hands in front of him.

"The Potters are good people, Remus, and you had Effie near-on in hysterics! Is it really that hard to tell someone where you're going? To realise that others might worry? People care about you! Do you understand what that means? It means that whenever you go off somewhere on your own, people get concerned! And you don't get to decide that—you don't get to decide who cares about you! That ain't how it works, do you hear me?"

"I hear you," Remus said.

"Are you sure? I don't think you do! Must still have cotton in your ears!"

"I don't," he swore. "I hear you, really. I'll never do it again."

"Never?"

"Never-ever. I give you my word."

Giles huffed very sternly, then tugged the cap from his head and pressed a hand to his forehead, as if struggling to stay angry with him. He realised why right after.

"Remus, I know things with your father are complicated. I had no idea you'd known for so long, and I'm sorry I never told you. For a long time I was just the driver. Didn't feel like my place. But you're important to me, I've watched you grow—known you all your life. So whatever you need, you only need to call. Alright?"

"Alright," Remus said, before chancing his best bet. "Will you tell me one thing then, Gil?"

"What is it?"

"My dad. The real one. Do you know if he's alive?"

Giles sighed then, and glanced up, as if cursing the clouds. "Last I heard he was living somewhere in America."

"America?"

"Yes, sir. New York, if I remember right. But that was going on, six... seven years ago now. I'm sorry, son, but I don't know anything else."

Remus nodded, trying his best to find a way to compartmentalize the information without letting it uproot every other modicum of his life.

"Thanks for telling me, Gil."

"Don't go running off to America now. You do, and I'll ground you for life. No more cigarettes and books until you're eighty."

"Your age then?"

"Oi. What'd I say about that cheek?"

Remus did his best to smile, for Giles, and nodded again. "I won't run off. Promise."

The driver let out a sigh of relief, returning his hat to the top of his head. "Right. Do have all your school things then?"

“Yeah. It’s all in my trunk. Left my amp at James'. I'll just use the one at school.”

"And you're sure you have everything?"

"Mhm."

“Well, I would check again."

As Remus stood on the curb, wondering what it was he could've possibly forgotten, Giles turned and fit his upper body back into the boot of the car. From inside, he hauled out a small white trunk with brass fastenings. Hope’s trunk.

“Felt a shame to get rid of it. Tried fixing it up instead. No more loose handle, see?”

He shook it pointedly before handing it over. With the trunk in his hands again, Remus felt a bit forlorn.

"S’just an old trunk…”

"Old is alright. Old makes memories. And memories are important."

He trailed his fingers along the corner edge. "Yeah, I suppose you're right."

“I'm always right. And it’s good to have more than one case. Keeps things organised. You'll see I tucked some extra things inside it too. New gloves—I know it's cold up there. Some books, and school things too. Only what's useful, of course... You can repay me with good marks, and better attendance. Now get along, don't want to miss your train."

Remus let the trunk hang down by his side. It didn't quite feel like his but he was grateful for the gesture, and as he turned away to rejoin his friends, a strange feeling of homesickness came over him. Without stopping to think too hard, he spun back around and threw his arms around the old driver instead.

"Thank you for everything, Gil. You've been like a dad to me."

Giles hesitated, as was to be expected, but finally wrapped his thick, barrel arms around him in return. "Well, I—er… Had to raise you right! No blighter 'a mine gonna go off to school with a bad attitude."

They came apart then, and Giles ushered him ahead, eyes turned glassy.

"Best get going then. Your friends are waiting."

He went, and after they'd all said their goodbyes, the six of them made their way onto the train platform, trunks and instruments bungling against their knees with every step. James and Lily were arm in arm, Peter was looking around expectantly for Moira. Lottie was smoking, unusual for her outside of a social setting, but Roger had given her one of his own packs when they'd parted the night before and she'd accepted it tearfully along with a pair of sparkling diamond earrings to go with her bracelet. Aside from that it all felt very normal. Already the tell-tale signs of their return decorated the platform—a Finch House emblem there, a Salazar-green tie there. For once Remus relished in it.

"This is it, lads!" James cried as they approached the train. "Last time we'll be boarding the ol' railway north. S'almost enough to make one emotional."

"We still have to come back for Easter break," Lily pointed out.

"Yeah, but it's the final winter holiday though!"

Setting down his guitar, Sirius stopped to stretch and let out a pleased groan. "Prongs's right. This time next year we'll be in some flat somewhere, all on our own. No homework, no uniforms, just us and the nearest take-out shop."

“I take it the gap year’s officially on then?” Lottie drawled, cigarette still in hand. “Don’t people usually use those for travelling or work experience?”

“They’re for life experience,” Peter scoffed. “We’re gonna use ours for the band.”

“And they’re very common nowadays,” James reasoned.

“Mhm, sure. But I'm pretty sure our parents are likely to kill you when they find out you’ve no plans to work.”

Peter made a face, and Sirius slung a supporting arm around his shoulders.

“Don’t worry, Pete, you can just join the club. Me and Moony were thinking of putting together a support group for kids whose dads hate ‘em.”

“Sirius is the president,” Remus said, “since his dad hates him the most.”

“Then that must make you the treasurer, my good Moon, since you got two and all.”

“I’m so glad we can joke about this now,” Lily said, with mocking relief.

"My dad's in America," Remus said suddenly, surprising even himself. "New York."

"You mean your real dad?" Peter parroted. "What's he doing there?"

"No idea."

"How'd you find out?" Asked Sirius.

"Giles told me."

"That's brilliant!" Lottie applauded. "Are you gonna try and go see him?"

"Nope. I've got school, actually. And a band. You know, priorities."

For a moment they all exchanged hesitant looks, but Remus hadn't need worry. With a mirror smile, James and Sirius threw an arm around each of his shoulders.

"Rock on," James said.

The train blew its first whistle, and while the others picked up their things, Lottie smiled and stubbed out her cigarette on one of the station's brick pillars.

“I don’t see Mary or Marlene,” she said, as they all shuffled along toward the carriages.

“They could already be on board,” Remus offered. He was busy craning his neck to try and catch a peek at the end of the platform. He’d almost given up, but then his breath caught.

“No fucking way…”

All his friends stopped and looked back at him.

“Moons?”

“Just—Just hold on a sec.” Abandoning his bass and trunk, he broke off from them, dodging several people along the platform and nearly breaking into a sprint. As he reached him, his excitement soared until he was practically throwing himself into his arms.

"Tom!"

Tomny squeezed tight. And when he spoke, Remus could hear the smile in his voice.

“Thought you could skip town without sayin’ goodbye, huh?"

Pulling back, he clasped his friend by the shoulders and looking him up and down desperately. Tomny was wearing a heavy coat and a cap like normal, along with his worn bovver boots, but the dark circles had finally gone from beneath his eyes. He looked good. Remus had never been so happy to see anyone.

“Tom, what are you bloody doing here?”

“You said it was the firs’ train. I told you I’d see you on the third, didn’t I?" Tomny said, pulling a toothpick from between his teeth. "Them’s your mates then?"

Suddenly remembering himself, Remus whipped around to find all all of his friends staring at them from down the platform. He sheepishly waved them over, and after exchanging a few more dubious glances, they began making their way down the platform. King enough to meet them halfway, Tomny held up a hand and James slowly waved back—looking as dumbstruck as Peter, while Lily and Lottie had crowded close together, giving each other that look girls sometimes got when they weren't sure whether to be worried or impressed.

"There," Tomny murmured in Remus' ear. "That one, the one with the hair. He's Sirius, right?"

Suddenly Remus remembered what it felt like to be mortified. He elbowed Tomny sharply. "Don't you dare say anything."

"Anything? Not even a hello?"

"I swear to god, Tom..."

"Mm-mm. He's certainly pretty enough, innit."

There wasn't any more time to accost him. His friends had scuttled forward, looking expectant. Remus could feel the sweat on his palms.

"Guys, this is Tom. He's a good friend. Or—more like a brother, really."

"You're Tom?" Peter gaped.

"The one 'n only." Tomny tucked the toothpick back between his teeth, then offered his hand. "Pleased to meet cha. I've heard lots about you guys."

It was James who broke free from his trance first. "Us too, mate," he said, stepping forward and clasping Tomny's hand for a friendly shake.

"Let's see then—you must be… James?"

"That's right."

"And... Peter?"

Peter nodded, still wide-eyed.

"That's Lily," Remus gestured. "And this is Lottie, and Sirius."

"Remus didn't say that you were blonde," Lottie observed primly. "He also didn't mention how nice your eyes were."

Tomny grinned, readjusting his cap. "Not as nice as yours, love."

"Ooh, I like him," she said, sweeping her hair onto one shoulder and flashing Lily a well-pleased smile.

"Are you quite finished?" Remus snarked, while Tomny maneuvered the toothpick from one side of his mouth to the other with his tongue.

“My bad. I don’t mean to keep you all from your train, jus’ came to see this one off, s'all,” Tomny said, pointedly ruffling Remus' hair. "Couldn't very well let my Lu leave without saying goodbye."

“ 'Lu'?" Lily echoed. "Is that really what you call him?"

"Ever since I known 'im."

"You never told us that, Remus."

"Didn't think it was important," Remus baulked.

“Did he tell you how he used to suck his thumb in his sleep?" Tomny asked. "Twelve years old, and still zonked out like that. Had to douse his finger in chilli oil while he was dozing just to get him to quit."

“Enough!"

"No, no, go on," James urged. "I'd like to hear more. Moony never talks about himself."

Tomny's eyes widened, delighted. " 'Moony'?"

"Oh, now there's a story! Go on, Black, tell him!"

He smacked Sirius genially, who until that instant had seemingly resisted saying anything at all. Remus worried at his bottom lip, but before Sirius or Tomny could finish staring each other down, the train’s whistle blew again and all around them the platform began to empty.

"Looks like we'll have to save that one," Tomny said, shaking James' hand once more. " 'Til next time then. But it was nice meeting some of Lu's friends."

"You too," James said. "Go on, Moony. We'll give you guys a sec."

“Yeah, Lu,” Lily sniggered, while James swallowed a smile and stepped forward and took Remus’ trunk for him. "Heh—don't be late, Lu."

"Har, har, Evans."

“Cool to meet you, Tom!” Peter called.

“Yes, such a pleasure!” Lily waved.

“And don’t be a stranger!” Lottie added. “Any friend of Remus’ is a friend of ours.”

“Stop flirting with him!” Peter moaned, following the girls off.

James nudged Sirius in the shoulder. "C'mon, mate."

Trunk in hand, Sirius went to follow, while Tomny raised his cap in goodbye.

“Nice mates," he smirked, turning on Remus. "I can see why they’re important to you.”

“You’re important too.”

“Well, that goes without saying.”

“Smug bastard.”

Pinching the end of the toothpick over a playful expression, Tomny grabbed him by the shoulder and squeezed. He'd already opened his mouth to say something else, but was promptly interrupted when someone else cleared their throat. Spinning back around, he and Remus found Sirius waiting alone in the same spot as before.

“Hey, mate,” Tomny said.

“Hey." Sirius licked his lips, and Remus could tell he was trying hard to behave himself. He had that same strain in his neck, the one he got whenever he mouthed off too much to a teacher.

"Just wanted to thank you for taking care of this one. I know he’s a bit of a handful.” Sirius jutted a finger in Remus’ direction.

“Anytime.”

Eyeing Remus, Sirius then offered his hand, and Tomny glanced down at it before cracking a smile and slowly extending his own to shake.

“You’ll take care of him at school then?”

“Of course," Sirius countered. "We take care of each other. It's what we do.”

“Glad to hear it,” Tomny said. He kept up the handshake, and just when Sirius had glanced questionably in Remus' direction, Tomny yanked him forward and caught him behind the neck.

"Tom!"

"Shh!" Tomny grinned. "Just let the big boys talk for a tick, okay Lu?"

Remus couldn't see his face, but would've bet anything that Sirius was scowling. As Tomny used to fingers to tell him to walk on, he relented and stepped back several paces to retrieve his bag. From there, he could see as Tomny smiled and whispered closely into Sirius' ear. Tomny's eyes never left him, and Remus could tell that Sirius was uncomfortable. His body remained taunt, too proud to push Tomny away. This went on for several long seconds, and finally when Remus was considering walking back to separate them himself, Tomny grinned and left a deep kiss right on Sirius' cheek.

"Glad we understand each other," Tomny announced, patting Sirius once as he released him. "He's all yours, Lu!"

Remus wanted desperately to ask what he said, but Sirius had already retreated to his side, stubbornly wiping his cheek and standing close enough that their shoulders touched. Across from them, Tomny pulled a cigarette carton from his jacket pocket, tapping one loose and setting it between his teeth.

“Hey, Lu, you remember our promise to each other?”

"Yeah—" Remus croaked, before clearing his throat. "Yeah. I remember."

"Good." He smiled, then came forward and plucked the cigarette from his mouth, only to tuck it behind one of Remus’ ears. “Then I’ll see you when you’re back.”

"Okay."

Tomny cast a wry glance in Sirius’ direction. “Nice meeting you, Sirius Black.”

Sirius nodded, then reached up to take the cigarette from behind Remus' ear. Then he set it between his own teeth, and lit it with the lighter in his pocket.

“Nice meeting you too, Thonas Armstrong." He exhaled, letting out the smoke in a single smooth haze. "Thanks for the fag."

Tomny grinned, and when he looked back at him, Remus could've died.

"Oh. Him, I like." And then Tomny began sauntering backwards, flashing Remus a final wink.

“Bye, Lu.”

“Bye,” Remus repeated, dumbly.

Just like that, Tomny had gone—disappearing back through the station's heavy archways with his hands in his pockets. Even after he'd vanished, Remus remained transfixed. It took another blaring train whistle to pull him out of it, and by then Sirius was already grinding the half-smoked cigarette out on the bottom of his boot. Doc Martens. Size nine.

“Hey Sirius…?”

“Mm…?”

“What did Tomny say to you?”

“Wouldn’t you like to know, Lu.”

Remus grimaced, but the smirk Sirius gave him was genuine. It turned his stomach to knots, in just the way he liked.

“No, seriously—what’d he say?”

Sirius shrugged indifferently, then; “You never told me he was hot.”

“What does that have to do anything?”

“So you admit that he’s hot?”

Remus laughed suddenly and covered his mouth when a passing man gave them a bewildered look. “No, that’s just Tom. He’s always been like that. Now what’d he say?”

“He told me to take care of you. Or else.”

“Oh. Well, he doesn’t really mean it.”

“What? Like I’m scared?”

“No. Maybe just a bit… jealous?”

“Ah-ah-ah,” Sirius blagged. “You forget, he’s kissed your lips, but I’ve kissed your everywhere.”

“Is that supposed to be romantic?”

“You figure it out.”

Remus picked up his bag. “I will. When we’re back at school. Alone.”

"Mm, that's what I like to hear." Sirius set his hands behind his head. “Kiss my arse, Armstrong.”

Remus grinned. “Come on, you idiot.”

They both gathered their things, and quickly turned to head for the train door. Before they even reached it, they spotted James, Lily, and Peter peering out of the window of the closest carriage, looking positively thrilled to see them.

“Did you get to shake hands with the mob boss, Sirius?” James teased as he slid the upper window open. "Did he give you a kiss for good luck?"

“Oh, shove off!” Sirius snapped. “You’re all nosey bastards!”

“Sure, we’re nosey—but why is it you’re the only one who gets to share secrets with the gangster?” Peter grumbled.

“He’s not a gangster!”

“Ha, yeah right. Did you see what he was wearing? Compared to him you look like you’re playing dress-up.”

“Pete, when I get into that compartment you better have made yourself scarce or you’re gonna get to see just how these dress-up boots feel going up your arse!”

They all laughed at him through the window, and as a platform attendant came up from behind to sharply usher them onto the train, Remus took Sirius’ arm and tugged him aboard. He let Sirius go first, and together they meandered down the train’s aisle way with their trunks, waving at anyone they recognised. Eventually the train rumbled to life, and as began pulling out of the station, Sirius turned around so he could taunt his boyfriend while walking backwards.

“So like—on a scale of one to ten, how good was that Tomny kiss?”

“Wanker." Remus smacked him in the shins with his bag. "It didn’t even make the scale.”

“Ha! That bad?”

“Wouldn't you like to know."

"That's why I'm asking."

"It was barely a kiss. Doesn't count, now come off it."

“I'm just saying! If you’d told me he looked like that—well, maybe I would’ve understood.”

“Shall I call him back then? See if you could get a proper peck in for yourself?”

“Is that your prudish way of saying that you'd like to watch?”

“You’re hopeless,” Remus said, tilting his chin down toward his chest to hide his smile. Then; “Hold on, your boots…”

Sirius stopped in the middle of the aisle. He looked down at the pair of brand new Doc Martens he was sporting on his feet. “Oh! Yeah—Christmas gift. Do you like ‘em?” He grinned slyly. “Only kidding. I know they’re from you. Way to get the size perfect, stalker.”

Remus rolled his eyes. “I meant your lace’s come undone. Hold still.” He bent down, taking either shoelace and quickly tightening them into a loop. When he was finished he stood up, and was rewarded by a signature Sirius Black smirk, with eyes that said everything his mouth couldn’t.

“My hero."

"I get that a lot."

A beat passed, and Remus briefly wondered about the odds of finding an empty compartment and letting their friends think they missed the train entirely—that was until one of them came right up from behind.

“Ahem?”

They both spun, and Sirius quickly jumped aside. “Sorry, Lot. Didn’t mean to block your way.”

“Don’t mind me, just on my way back from the lav,” Lottie replied, peering at them suspiciously. “Now what were the two of you up to?”

“I was just tying up his laces for him,” Remus replied innocently.

“Oh? Did Sirius suddenly forget how to tie his own shoes?”

“Absolutely,” Sirius nodded. “Happens every now and then. Bit inexplicable, really.”

She squinted at them, arms crossed over her chest as though she couldn’t decide whether they were guilty or not. As he waited for her response, Remus mentally chided himself for worrying. Most days Lottie could be as astute as the rest of them, but he’d only retied Sirius’ boot. There was no way that she—

“So how long have the two of you been sharing pants then?"

It took a moment to understand the euphemism, but when he did, Remus’ mouth dropped open.

“What?! We're not—We're not sharing pants, Lottie!"

"Really? So you mean there's nothing going on between the two of you?"

"No!"

Another beat, and Lottie’s face split into a grin. “Liar.”

“He's not lying!” Sirius insisted.

"He totally is."

"Uh-uh!"

Eyebrow arched, Lottie crossed her arms and busied herself by examining her nails. “Mm, right. Well, maybe you can try that excuse on someone who didn’t just walk up behind you while you were gabbing about kissing your best mates.”

“We weren't!" Sirius blabbed. "Moony was just teasing. You've got it all out of context, right Moons?"

"Right! I was teasing! And—And Sirius was teasing too! Right, Sirius?"

"Right! You see, heh—teasing!"

With a deep eye-roll, Lottie sighed and dropped her arms. “You don’t have to worry, I’m not gonna say anything. What business of mine is it who you’re jumping into the sack with? A word of advice though, if you’re trying to keep it a secret, maybe don’t drool over the same guy in public spaces.”

“I was not drooling!” Sirius hissed. "I was being tough and intimidating!"

Unbothered, Lottie pushed past them and simply carried on up the aisle. “Oh, and I don't blame you, Remus,” she called; “Tomny's fit. I would’ve snogged him too.”

She waved at them over her shoulder, before disappearing into one of the compartments and leaving them both dumbfounded.

“Well,” Remus started, “that’s wasn't… too terrible.”

Sirius scratched his head. “How likely you think she is to tell someone?”

"On a scale of one to ten? Ten."

"And is ten good or bad?"

"Not sure, really."

"Hm. Well, I suppose that's two down then.”

With a tiny smile, Sirius grabbed his trunk and hauled it up behind him, already moving on down toward their friends' compartment. Remus watched him, wondering just how he was supposed to feel. Two down… Two down… Well, maybe it didn’t sound so bad after all.

“You coming, Moons?”

“Yeah.” Two down. “I’m coming.”

Chapter End Notes

The song throughout the chapter was “Heroes” by David Bowie, 1977

NOTE: There is an alternate POV (Sirius) of the "secret" Tomny/ Sirius conversation available here .

Chapter 86: January, 1978

Chapter Summary

Another January at Hawkings, and Remus isn't the only one taking charge of his life.

Chapter Notes

Editing this chapter might've given me slight whiplash. Apologies if it's all over the place. As I so often say to myself whenever I hit post, just take my scraps!

Admittedly, there's a bit of shameless smut toward the middle of this chapter. I think it's pretty tame, but I really don't normally write stuff like that so you'll have to let me know how I did. As always pay attention to the '> > >' if you wish to skip over it, but if you're going to argue over whether it's ethical for me to write this due to Remus not quite being eighteen, please just... don't? It's playful and true to their character, and of course there's consent and communication. Apart from the fact that queer people have sex, and Remus and Sirius have been having sex for a while within fic, whether I've narrated it or not.

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

But oh, how it feels so real,
Lying here, with no one near;
Only you and you can hear me,
When I say softly, slowly;

Hold me closer, tiny dancer,
Count the headlights on the highway;
Lay me down in sheets of linen,
You had a busy day today…

- "Tiny Dancer" Elton John, 1971

Later, on the train...

Remus had always liked lists. Lists helped keep things tidy, and tidy kept said things from going missing. It also kept one from bollixing up their entire life; who knew what, who went where, who liked who—that was messy, no way around it. Keeping tidy lies prevented the inevitably messy from getting even messier. It also helped keep peace of mind.

Marlene. Tomny. Regulus. Simeon. Lottie—today's list. Everyone he'd told (inadvertently or otherwise) about his and Sirius' secret relationship. It felt like a tidy record, until he thought more on it and realised that people had lists of their own. Marlene knew and was gay herself, which consequently meant that her girlfriend Nicole knew as well. And Tomny knew, because Tomny knew everything, which must've meant that Tonya had known, even if she'd guessed it on her own. Regulus had sworn up and down that he'd told no one about Sirius, but it wasn't enough. His parents had realised it anyway the day Walburga Black found those dirty magazines beneath the floorboards of Sirius' bedroom, and no matter how badly he fretted, Remus would never know the full extent of who knew. How many? How many other family members or evil doctors or nasty psychologists knew about Sirius' shameful little secret?

At least the Blacks were far away, he reasoned. One could hardly add names to a list without knowing them in the first place. But what about the problems closer to home? What about Lottie, the self-proclaimed queen of gossip—could she really be trusted to keep such juicy news to herself?

Suddenly it was starting to feel like Remus' tidy list had gone out the window. He spent most of the never-ending train ride back to school with his nose in a book, eyes glued to the page but hardly absorbing a word. He felt the fizzy-drink feeling return, like he was a rocket ready to launch right off the compartment bench. His more reckless side kept telling him he should just do it—whip his head up and announce it to everyone.

I'M GAY!

Or well...

Not exactly gay.

More like half and half.

I still like girls. Girls are great—Women! I meant women, Mary. What? No, we always meant to tell you! Y-Yeah, Sirius too. And we're sorta... No,

Lily, it isn't like that! We wanted to wait until we were sure we could trust —er, no sorry, wrong choice of words. Huh...? NO! We do trust you, but there's always... And we weren't fighting! Or, I mean we kind of were, but we're better now and—no, Lottie, I've never thought of Mick Jagger naked, but Sirius—no, Peter, I've never thought about YOU naked either. And Tomny isn't—BUTT STUFF?! ... ohmygod.

Then again—not a chance. Maybe in another life he'd have allowed the reckless abandon to truly take over rather than just get muddled in his head, but not this Remus Lupin. Not when he had no guarantee of the outcome. He'd rather it happen slowly, one at a time. Like writing a song. First the melody, then the bridge... First James, then Lily... Peter, Mary... It wasn't a terrible list. Had a lot of love, that list. Oh, maybe...

"Moony, heads up!"

A football caught the backside of Remus' book, nearly driving the spine into his nose. He looked up, annoyed, to find the rest of his friends staring back at him with happy grins. Lily sat beside James, red hair wild and windblown from having just transferred over from Doncaster. Mary was on her other side, painting the toe of Marlene's boot with purple nail polish, and Marlene was watching her with a tiny smile and one arm draped across the top of the bench seat. Lottie and Peter were bickering over the flavour of one of the cart pasties—raspberry or mulberry. While he was distracted, Sirius seized Remus' book to ignite a game of keep away, which he lost immediately when Lily reached forward to snatch it.

Everything was completely and marvellously normal.

"Fancy a game of rummy to pass the time, Lupin?" James asked, flourishing the deck of cards. "I warn you, the rest of us have been practising all holiday."

Remus glanced sideways at Sirius, who gave him a cheeky smirk, and winked.

"Sure, Prongs. Aces high though."

"Who plays rummy aces high? ... Weirdo."

They got into the station in good time, and piled onto the waiting buses that would take them down into the deep Scottish valleys that cradled their school. The snow was deeper there, much more substantial than the tiny blizzard they'd had on Christmas back in London. That snow had melted come morning, whereas this stuff would be sticking around until Remus' birthday at least. Thankfully the pavement had been shovelled, though as Remus reminded himself, that'd probably be one of his jobs as a prefect now.

They had to wait for Filch to finish unloading the rest of their bags from beneath the bus. The girls had already gone ahead, complaining of the cold, but plenty of other kids were still mulling about, greeting each other and eagerly filling their friends in on all they'd missed over the winter holiday. Remus even said hello to Jillian, who waved at him and offered a box of leftover Christmas sweets.

"Don't let this go to your head now," she told him. "They'd just go straight to my waist, is all."

He thanked her and shuffled back into step with his friends, who were still stuck waiting for Peter's trunk to surface.

"Reckon we could start a killer snowball fight," Sirius said, eyeing the lawn greedily.

"Better not," James warned. "Here comes McGonagall."

The Headmistress strode up in a thick winter coat, greeting every student she passed while her heeled boots clicked on the shovelled pavement. When she reached them she smiled, which on her looked a lot more like the skin around her mouth pulling slightly more taunt. Remus noted with a bit of satisfaction that she didn't seem nearly as daunting anymore. Perhaps it was his latest growth spurt, or the fact that she was wearing a fuzzy fur hat that upon first glance looked like a skinned raccoon.

"Gentlemen," she said, regarding her head to each of them. "I hope you all had good holidays."

"Simply sublime, Minnie!" Sirius exclaimed. "And yours? I do hope Santa didn't find you on his naughty list this year."

The corners of McGonagall's mouth tightened, but she was above the bait. She regained her composure while tightening her hands in front of her, and for a moment Remus thought she was about to scold them.

"Mr. Black, I'd hoped we could have a little chat as well."

Sirius appeared less than thrilled to be singled out, but he nodded and followed the Headmistress off to the side, leaving the rest of them to speculate.

"Think she's giving him detention?" Peter asked.

"Nah, that'd be a new record even for him," James said. "I'll bet something's up."

Remus didn't know what it was, but he didn't like the pale look that'd come over Sirius when he finally returned.

"What is it? What's wrong?"

"It's Reg," Sirius croaked. "McGonagall said he's not coming back."

"Not coming back?" James echoed in alarm. "What, like at all?"

"No. Looks like Mum and Dad pulled him from school."

"Why?!"

Sirius shook his head. "She didn't say. Only asked if I was alright at yours."

"Well, of course you're alright," James answered sharply. "Reg would be too if he left that bloody house."

"I'm sure he's okay though," Peter said kindly. "They wouldn't do anything to him. He's the heir now, right?"

"Yeah, yeah." Sirius hugged his elbows, looking nervous. "Still... should probably call, shouldn't I."

"We can do it back at the dorm," Remus offered. "Call him together if you'd like."

Sirius nodded. "What do you figure the odds are that Mum has me drawn and quartered for trying?"

"Well, you're about six-hundred miles away, so I'd say it's a solid fifty-fifty."

Sirius and James snorted, while Peter just shook his head.

“Your family’s bonkers, mate."

"Pettigrew!" Filch's nasty hollering cut across the din. "Come get yer trunk!"

While Peter zipped forward to fetch his trunk, the rest of them gathered their things, eager to get back to the warmth of Godric House. They'd just started up the pavement when another person called out, this time for Remus. He turned around, and his stomach sank when he realised who it was. Only one person would wear a coat the colour of peacock feathers.

"I'm sorry," Sheila cooed gently, "but do you have a moment?"

"Does this mean that you also have a missing brother, Moony?" Peter asked. James turned to glare at him. "... Sorry. Poor taste."

"You guys go on ahead," Remus said. "I'll catch up."

Sirius appeared reluctant, but Remus could tell there was a lot on his mind already. In the end he went with the others, while Remus shuffled out of the swarm of students and toward the end of the row of buses. Sheila followed, picking at her gloved fingers, and Remus tried not to feel sorry. Between Sirius and Tomny, he'd had little space to worry about the music teacher, and he didn't much care for feeling sorry over it. He didn't know how to explain that it didn't matter that she knew Tad—that Tad didn't know him and he wasn't sure he wanted that to change. Did that make him a bad son, he wondered. A bad person? I don't want you. I don't want you to not want me.

But Sheila was still Sheila of course.

"Care for a walk, Remus?" She asked. "The hills behind the school gardens look so lovely this time of year."

Suddenly dreading more time alone with her, Remus indicated to his heavy trunk. "Would be kind of hard..."

"Oh. Right, never mind." She smiled, anxiously licking her lips. "I'm sorry to call you away from your friends just as you got back, but I wanted to talk to you about what you said before Christmas."

Here we go, Remus thought. Now came the part where she started reliving her glory days through him. Please don't, he silently begged. I don't want what you're missing.

"Now you've nothing to be sorry for," Sheila went on; "but I really couldn't stop thinking about it. I don't think I've properly expressed myself up until now, and I want you to know that I'm sorry if you ever thought I was keeping things from you about Tad. It wasn't my intention."

"I get that," Remus said, rubbing his neck awkwardly. "It's fine, really. I was just stressed from exams I think, ended up lashing out at you. So you don't have to worry, I'm fine. But I wouldn't blame you for giving me detention for it."

She chuckled, then looked at him like Effie did—like she didn't believe him—and Remus wished he was anywhere but there.

"He was a dry wit too," she said. "And smart as a whip. Why, when we were children, we used to imagine that—"

"I'm sorry, Mrs. Buchanan, but I don't really care." It was cruel, but he couldn't help it. The words just kept tumbling, one after another like cursed little dominos. "It's cool that you knew this guy once, but I didn't, and I'm not really interested in dredging up my dead mum's past. I guess she liked the guy enough to have a kid with him, but that was her choice, wasn't it? And I don't know anybody named Thaddeus Dean. So if it's alright with you, I'd rather just leave it that way."

"Oh."

"Sorry."

"Don't be," she said quickly. "Don't, really. I should've considered that you might feel this way. I never meant... Well, now I'm just repeating myself." She cleared her throat, pasting a thick smile across her face. "I'm so proud that you're standing up for yourself. It's not so easy, especially when so many emotions are involved."

"Right... Well, if I'm ever curious, I promise I'll ask. But for now I'd rather you just be my teacher."

She nodded, even more quickly than before, and Remus told himself to ignore the underlying look of misery. I don't want it. Not my problem.

"Well, I at least hope that this means you've finished all your holiday homework."

Remus winced.

"Oh, yeah... every bit."

* * *

In the days that followed, Remus did his best not to think about mothers or fathers or family of any sort. He felt guilty for upsetting Sheila, and then stupid for accepting the guilt as his own. Why should it be a sin to not want to know someone who'd never bothered to know him? It was like Tomny said; screw fathers! Those guys were useless, rich or poor. And what did Remus care that some guy might be out there, living a life in America with a family that had nothing to do with him or Hope? Remus wasn't out there—he was right there! And soon he'd be back in London with all of his mates, playing music and taking party drugs like every other great rock star his age. None of them had dads neither, or least none they were proud of. Really, he'd removed a roadblock—jumped a rung on the ladder.

Screw fathers, who needs 'em.

At least he had Sirius to distract him, though if Remus was guilty of anything, being relieved that his boyfriend's family troubles were messy enough to distract him from his own seemed like a pretty good place to start. As rumour surrounding Regulus' absence grew, Sirius began calling the Blacks' main house incessantly. In the beginning he appeared almost hopeful, and though the staff assured him that 'Master Black' was well and fine, Remus could tell the stress was beginning to chip away at him.

"Fucker!" Sirius snarled, slamming the receiver down on the fifth day. "They're not even picking up anymore! It's like they know it's me! I'll bet it's Mum, no way she'd let him talk to a traitor. I might as well start sending letters—give me more kindling to burn!"

"Keep trying," Remus urged. "Even if he can't speak to you, if he hears that you've been calling then it'll show him you care."

Sirius glared at the floor, but finally nodded and picked up the receiver. "Should try once more... just in case."

Aside from wanting Sirius to be reassured, Remus had a completely selfish reason for wanting Regulus back at school. Ever since McGonagall had told them that the new Black heir was not returning, Remus had been paired up with another boy for all prefect-related duties. His name was Anton, and while not entirely unbearable, the twelfth year Salazar student seemed to come with a perpetual cold. When he wasn't yammering on, he was sneezing—loudly enough that it made everyone in the library flinch whenever they were assigned shelving duty.

"Regulus lives just down the hall from me. Or lived, that was. No one's heard from him—most figure it's something with his family. You heard his brother Sirius was disowned last term, yeah? Must've done something pretty bad to lose out on all of that. I heard the Blacks are practically—AH-CHOO!—practically royalty! Got a house in every country, near on. Wonder what he did... Belby says he's a poof, but I think he's alright. Still, I'll wager it's hard going with a brother like that. Maybe Regulus was just too embarrassed to come back."

"Anton."

"Yeah, Lupin?"

"Shut up."

Anton did so, mumbling something about refilling his cart and finally leaving Remus in peace. He didn't mind library duty normally, but that was when it was just him and Regulus. At least he was quiet—got his work done, and never complained about it. Regulus was good with the kids too, even if he'd never admit it. Remus still wished he'd have gotten to see their concert at the end of first term... damn exams. He was due back in class with the sixth years next week, was he going to have to do it alone? Better alone than with Anton...

"Hi, Lupin!"

Oh no. Why won't you just go away?!

Fists clenched, Remus swung around only to find someone else waiting for him. It was Sam, the small tenth year boy who'd commissioned him for a poem before Christmas, back when he was price gouging the entire male student body. Remus had noticed his shadow had gotten a bit longer ever since the start of term, but it was the first time Sam had come up and said anything on his own.

"Hey, Sam. You doing alright?"

At the greeting, Sam turned slightly pink, as though he hadn't expected Remus to know his name.

"Alright," he answered, in more of a high-pitched squeak than anything. "That's a lot of books."

Remus glanced at the cart and nodded. "Oh, yeah. I've got prefect duty."

"Blimey, I didn't know you were a prefect."

"Because prefects are so lame?"

Sam's eyes widened behind the frames of his glasses, and he shook his head fiercely. "N-No! You just don't seem like the kind of person to... er..."

"I was just teasing," Remus said. "That's a pretty big book you've got there too. Give us a look?"

Like he'd forgotten, Sam glanced down at the large book he was carrying. His first instinct seemed to be to hide it behind his back, but when Remus stepped forward he sheepishly withdrew it again.

"It's a Greek dictionary," he explained. "I'd like to take Classics in university. Thought this might be a good place to start..."

"Maybe," Remus said, as Sam tucked the dictionary back into his bag. "And you know, I don't take Greek, but I do take Classics with Bilshin. Want me to recommend you something?"

A grin bloomed across Sam's face. "Yeah!"

Waving him along, Remus led the kid out of the aisle and down several rows. It only took him a moment to find what he was looking for.

"Here, try the plays by Aeschylus. They're gonna be tragedies, but I've always preferred them to the politics. There might be a bit of a learning curve to the language, but I can lend you my old notes if you'd like."

"That'd be great!" Sam beamed. "Do you have any others?"

He did, and so they looked together until they'd amassed an impressive collection of recommendations. Remus had only just made it to Ovid when a sharp whistle carried down the stacks of books, interrupting them. At first he assumed that it was Ms. Pince, ready to flay him alive for slacking off, but the stringent librarian wouldn't have ever made such a crude noise in her temple of knowledge.

"Hey, Loonarny!" Trish called. "Got a sec?"

He waved to her, and then pat Sam on the shoulder. "I'll leave you to it, pal. Nice seeing you again."

"Y-You too!"

They walked back the way Trish had come, and she glanced over her shoulder, looking amused.

“I see ye've found yourself yet another fan, Loonarny?"

"Only if you're referring to yourself." He smacked her hand fondly. "What's up, Trish?"

"Only wondered where you'd gotten to. Jill told me you had library duty with Anton."

"Yes, and I'm about ready to kill him."

"Ach. Wouldn't blame ya. Me, I'm stuck reading to seven year-olds all the way across campus. Like Christ, I only became a prefect for the extra study block. If I’d kent how often I would be shushing wee little bastards I'd have bolted in the other direction.”

“You haven’t heard from Regulus, have you?” Remus asked. It was abrupt, and Trish’s face fell instantly.

“You mean ye haven’t heard? There’s a rumour going ‘round that Reginald’s nae coming back this term.”

"No, I heard it," he sighed. "Just hoping someone knew something else. You talked to Crouch at all?"

“As if Creepy Crouch would talk to me. Lad's miserable most 'ah the time, s'only gotten worse since Regulus bunked off. Apparently he got intae it with Tate Bromley this mornin' though. Brom was pestering him about Black and they ended up fighting.”

"Really? Did he say anything else?"

Trish frowned. "I think he blamed Sirius."

It was not the news he wanted, but somehow wasn't shocked either.

"Shit..."

“Aye. I think it’s a shame too. Regulus seemed happier just before Christmas. Talked more, raised his hand in class—that sort o' stuff. He’s always been a quiet one, could’ve counted the amount of times I’d seen him smile on one hand, but seeing him around you was… Ah well, I’m sure he’s a'right. I mean, wouldn’t Sirius know?”

“Sirius doesn’t live at home anymore. It's why we think his parents kept him."

“Oh. Sounds complicated.”

“Just a bit.”

“Will you let me know if ye hear from him then?" Trish urged, looking hopeful. "Not in a creepy, stalkery way or anything—just… A kid like that deserves to know that there are people who care about him.”

She was blushing slightly now, but Remus couldn't have teased her if he'd tried.

“Sure, Trish. I'll let you know.”

She left him to finish his tasks and now well and truly alone, Remus began to feel the library’s silence like a steel blanket. There was so much going on—so many emotions to constantly juggle. It almost made him miss the old days, when all they had to worry about was keeping up with homework and practical jokes. Then again, those days hadn’t been any less confusing either.

At dinner Remus watched Regulus’ roommates with ongoing concern. Barty, Yaxley, and Travers sat apart from the rest of their House, heads bowed over their food and expressions grim. Barty had a fat lip, most likely leftover from his scuffle with Bromley, and Remus had never seen him look so sorry. It was hard to remember that despite his constant foulness, Barty was Regulus’ friend too.

Unaware of any plight, Marlene sat down across from Remus and began to fume.

"I cannot believe it!" She howled. “I cannot believe that we’re this far into the twentieth century and girls are still expected to defer to boys in school-affiliated sports!"

"I'm guessing that means your campaign to smash the patriarchy didn't go as you planned?" Mary asked. It got Remus' attention, and he looked forward to find both James and Marlene looking severely disappointed.

"Potter and I went to McGonagall," Marlene started, "and she shot us down flat! Said it was ‘out of her hands’—that the schools don’t run the tournaments, but some board based out of Aberdeen. I didn’t bother asking if they were all male.”

"It's complete crap," James said snidely. "I don't see why they aren't allowed to play, we have an entire women's FA league for Christ's sake!"

"That's just it though," Lily pointed out, "it's a women's league. No way they'd ever let them play with the men."

"I can't believe Minnie refused to help," Sirius said, astonished.

James set down his cup with a sharp thump. "I'm thinking of bringing the team out on strike."

"You can do that?" Asked Peter.

"We could try! We're the home team this year, it'd certainly say something!"

"No, all it'd do is get you disqualified from the tournament," Marlene sighed. "And then the boys would really riot. They'd turn on us in a second."

"But I thought they all signed the petition?" Lily frowned.

"Only 'cause Potter threatened to bench them if they didn't."

"I won't have bigots on my team," James huffed sharply. "If McGonagall won't help us, then we'll just have to figure something else out."

"You could always protest another way," Lottie offered. "Ooh! You could dye all of your team shirts pink!"

"What'll that do?"

"Get their attention, duh."

"Nah," Sirius said around his fork, "you wanna get their attention you best be running out onto that field starkers. That'd do it."

Lily smacked him over the head.

"Shit, Evans! That hurt!"

Ignoring them, James continued glaring down at the cafeteria table in concentration. When Remus was sure his dark brows couldn't get any closer together, he finally sat back and turned to Marlene.

“When are you guys scheduled to start practices again?”

“First day is the twenty-second.”

“Perfect! Ours is the twenty-first. You can just start practising with us.”

"Like share the pitch?"

“Why not? It’s not like we haven’t shared it before. We'll just be making it more official. You run one practice, I’ll run the next. And then come the end of term, we can just merge the two teams together.”

Marlene’s eyes widened. “You mean together, together? As in the same team?"

"Why not? Your girls can more than keep up, and we already play each other all the time. What's one tournament?"

"But there'll be other teams in the tournament, Potter," Mary cut in. "Full of stubborn boys, who'd probably rather not play at all than face down a bunch of girls."

"Then they’ll forfeit, not us. Can't win without trying."

"And if someone gets hurt?"

"Have none of you seen McKinnon play? Honestly, I'm more afraid for the other team than I am for ours. She’s a bit brilliant like that. Scary, but brilliant."

Everyone looked at Marlene then, who'd gone red in the face of James' praise.

"But what if the other guys on the team don't want a merger?" She murmured.

"Then they don't play," James shrugged. "I'm captain, and what I say goes. Besides, I have a feeling Hooch'll side with me."

"I think Potter's got the right idea actually," Lily supplied eagerly. “I've already read the handbook, and all it says is that no girls’ team may enter into the tournament, but there’s nothing about girls playing on the boys’ team. They'd bar Marlene if it was just her and the girls trying to sign up, but Potter's team is already registered—they'd have to let you play!”

"And if they don't, you could always try the starkers thing," Sirius added.

Marlene bit her lip. “Still, something tells me it isn’t going to be that easy.”

“Look on the bright side," Mary offered. "You'll be able to add 'women's suffrage' to your uni applications."

Marlene rolled her eyes, and Lottie tapped her fork against the side of her cup.

“So, next week's our first village trip of the term! What’s everyone doing then? Shall we make a day of it?”

"It's almost Daisy's birthday," James said. "I'm gonna take her out if anyone wanted to join."

“Can’t. Got plans,” Marlene said between bites. "Sorry, Lils."

Lily waved her off, unbothered, but it was Mary who looked at her sharply.

“What plans? With who?”

“No one."

"Ugh. It's not Nicole again, is it?”

“Maybe. It's none of your business, really.”

“Mouthy today, aren’t you?" Mary bristled. "Well, I’m telling you, Marls, spend any more time together and people are gonna start thinking you’re in love with her."

This seemed to shake Marlene a bit. She looked up, making pointed eye contact with Remus.

“We’re just friends. You can’t police who I hang out with, Mary.”

“Of course not! You can hang out with whoever you want... As long as you remember who was there for you in ninth year when you got your training bra caught in your braces."

At least three of them snorted, and Marlene set her fork down, looking sour.

“You know, Snatchy, I’m not sure green’s your colour. Though I'd avoid white. Wouldn't want to relive that harrowing Halloween incident from year ten. Really, who knew angels got their periods?"

The snorting became full on laughter as Marlene took up her fork and smugly stuck a piece of pie between her teeth. Across from her, Mary crossed both arms in a pout.

“Vicious bitch.”

* * *

Near the end of the second week of term, their patience was finally rewarded with news—if 'rewarded' was the right word. It came in the form of a small postcard, delivered not to Sirius, but rather a one R.J. Lupin. On the front was a photo of Bath's historic Pulteney Bridge, and the back, just a single note.

Tell my brother to stop calling.
- R.A.B.

"Could've put more than six words. Always with a flare for the dramatic, you two," Remus said, when he'd handed Sirius the postcard.

“At least we know he’s alive,” Sirius said, stuffing it into the front page of his Classics text. "Cheeky twat."

Things become easier after that. Sirius eventually got back to himself, which meant plenty of snogging for Remus and more than enough practical jokes for everyone else. Every morning for an entire week, a goat would mysteriously appear in a new teacher’s office. Sirius was still hailing Penny the goat a hero for eating her way through an entire stack of Professor Bilshin's pop quizzes, but that was just the cherry on top. No one seemed to know how the goat-fiends were getting inside the locked offices at night, and rumour had it that Filch had even taken to patrolling with a shovel after no less than three cows had shown up in his own office. Spectacular mess, that.

Those who were close to them, like the girls, fairly assumed that the cows had been the pièce de résistance, but it'd been so long since the Marauders had come together for a proper prank. As their grand finale, a sculpture made of paper-mache had been left on Salazar House's front steps, frozen in place by the chill and practically turned to cement by the time morning came and the students found it. The sculpture might've carried a sweet sentiment, as personalised art often did, had it not taken the shape of a massive, eight-foot tall nob. Spectacular fun, that.

All in all, Remus was pleased. A few casual band practices and ‘Marauders’ was back, better than ever, and whether their friends knew it or not, he and Sirius were an item again. The issue with Regulus remained ongoing, and though Sirius was good at playing it off, he continued to make daily phone calls to the kitchens.

“I was never a very good big brother,” he confessed, late one night. When they were sure James and Peter were asleep Sirius snuck across to Remus' bed and the two of them crawled in together, tucking their heads in tight on the single pillow. “He’s just so different from me—that Reg. I used to think that even if we weren’t related we wouldn’t have been friends anyway, so why bother trying? That was after though... Used to be that the little bugger couldn’t find his way out of a paper bag. He'd cry if I didn't go to the bathroom with him.”

“Regulus is smart,” Remus whispered back. “He’ll be alright.”

“I asked him to run away with me once. Think he was about six or seven. Told him that we could go to London—to James’, but he just stared at me, with those big eyes. Can't help but wonder if maybe things would be different if I’d just forced him.”

“He would've just resented you."

"More than he already does, you mean."

"No, he cares. People handle hurt in different ways, I think.”

“How do you handle yours?”

“Badly, mostly.”

That at least made Sirius smile. Remus reached a hand up and stroked his thumb along his cheekbone and Sirius turned his head, pressing a kiss to the inside of his wrist.

“We’re so messed up.”

“Yup. But people love a sob story. Just imagine how much we’re gonna make on a future book deal after we've taken over the world.”

Sirius chuckled. “Plenty, I’d imagine. I’d pay out the arse for all of your secrets.”

“No need,” Remus murmured, leaning in to kiss him properly; “You have all of them already.”

Yes, nights were often melancholic, but the days were good. They had each other, and their friends, and eventually things felt normal again. Remus heard from Tomny twice in those first few weeks; first as a cheerful 'hullo' following the New Year, and second to tell him that he was going away.

“I don’t understand, going where?”

“Just on a job,” Tomny answered, his usual drawl muddled somewhat by the phone's crackling reception. “It’s up in Immingham, near that huge port. This guy I know got me a job unloading all them big ships —six month contract. Can’t make any promises that I’ll be able to call and chat, but it’s got a good pay-out so I’m hoping that I’ll be able to take it easy for a while after."

"So you're hauling freight? Sure you're not hauling anything else?"

"Smart mouth. They should take your books away, yer too clever. But just think of it though, eh? I’m gonna be like two hundred miles closer to you!”

Remus sighed. “"Still not close enough. You said six months, does that mean you'll be back by summer?”

“Yeah, same as you. Perfect, innit."

"Do you at least get a break for Easter?"

"Not anything long enough to visit."

Remus clutched the phone tightly. "That sucks."

“Don't sweat it. S'just Imming. We'll both be back before you know it, and then you can talk my ear off about everything I've missed. Promise. Now how's my cheeky lad?"

"I'm fine."

"Meant Sirius."

"Dickhead."

It was hard to hang up after that, and because he could probably sense it, Tomny let him ramble until he'd all but decimated the free block he'd meant to use for studying. It was harder still when Remus realised that he wasn't going to be able to simply pick up the phone and call his friend whenever he wanted, but that was life. Everyone had worries, whether it be a brother or a friend... So instead of worrying, he pledged to throw himself back into the things that mattered in the moment. Like his classes, books, and Sirius—which, if he were being honest, wasn't such a bad way to spend his time.

After hanging up the phone, Remus legged it back to class where he found the others tucked themselves up into their usual spots near the back of the music room's risers. Sheila said hello to him as she always did, and because he was trying to be less awkward around her, he said hello back and carried on up the risers.

"About time," Sirius asked when he sat. "Productive morning?"

"Not really. Had a bit of a lie-in."

"You know what that's code for," James called, before miming a wank.

"Fuck off, Potter," Remus said, while the rest of his friends laughed. While Sheila was getting everyone ready for warm-up, Sirius leaned in and nudged him with the head of his guitar.

"Should'a told me you wanted a lie-in. I would've joined you, turned it into a workout."

"You sod off too," Remus told him, secretly pleased.

Once they'd run through whatever composition Sheila had assigned that week, the class broke off into independent study for the rest of the hour. James and Peter got lucky and had been sent off on an errand for Sheila, while Sirius had been tasked with helping another boy sort out his piano bridge. He was leaning beside the grand piano and picking his nails like he was bored, but every now and then Sirius got down onto the bench to correct the kid's playing, unable to resist showing off himself. For the most part Remus was doing just fine on his own, but he'd reached his limit ten minutes shy of class's end, after being forced to listen to a group of girls chatter away about his boyfriend's arse for nearly the entire block.

"What do you think he'd do if I just walked up and pinched it?"

“Probably ask you to pinch the other cheek too.”

They all giggled, and Remus plucked sharply on his bass. He’s gay! He wanted to shout. God, where did the urge even come from? It was only talk. Plenty of girls liked Sirius—he thought he'd be used to it by now. It was a bit embarrassing really, since the only one really pinching Sirius’ arse was him.

“I just don’t understand how it’s so perfect,” one of the girls sighed, cutting through Remus’ thoughts like a hot knife through butter.

“It’s like a peach!”

More giggling.

"I saw him wearing a pair of jeans the other day, pretty sure they were women's."

"He could pull it off. He's got that androgynous look about him. You know, like Mick Jagger."

Remus rolled his eyes. If Sirius got even a whiff of that he'd never hear the end of it.

“He hasn’t dated anyone in a while, right? But I heard Heather Morris asked him out the other day. Turned her down flat."

"Yeah, she cried for hours. My heart goes out to the next girl that tries."

“Well, I’m not afraid."

"And you sure, Cassie? They say he's gonna be a rock star one day..."

"Who says?" Cassie demanded. "That's stupid, I'm not starstruck. He's just a boy right now.”

"A handsome boy..."

One of the girls hung a finger in her mouth, while the other turned on Cassie, nudging her expectantly.

“Go ahead then, Cass, prove it. Invite Sirius to the village this weekend.”

“Alright, I will. After class.”

Remus' toes curled in his boots. Suddenly nervous, he glanced at the clock, which read just five minutes to the bell. Snatching up his and Sirius' things, he did his best to casually scoot down the risers past the girls and make his way across the room. He had to wait until he'd caught Sirius' eye at the piano bench, but when he did, he urgently beckoned him over.

“Hey, Moons. What's up?”

“Let's you and me dip a few minutes early, kay?”

"You want to leave class early?"

"It's only a few minutes, Sheila'll never notice."

Sirius' confused expression quickly became that of delight, as he took his coat and slid it over either arm. They escaped with barely a moment to spare and Sirius had to practically catch his bag out of the air as Remus threw them at him.

“Not that I don't love reckless Moony, but what's gotten into you?” Sirius demanded, as they emerged out onto the pavement with the first bell chiming behind them.

“Room felt stuffy. Needed the air." He pulled Sirius by the wrist, leaning in. "Hey, dorm should be empty..."

"But you have English next. And I have Latin."

“You're right. We should skip.”

Sirius hit the breaks. “Okay, leaving early and skipping? Who are you and what have you done with Moony?”

“I'm just not feeling class today,” Remus insisted. “I'd rather go back to the dorm with you and—”

“Sirius!”

It was Cassie. She and her girlfriends were spilling out of the hall's front doors, practically sprinting to catch up with them. The sensible thing would've been to let the girl have her moment so that Sirius could let her down easy, but Remus had hardly ever been sensible when it came to relationships. He saw it first in slow motion; Cassie rushing forward, Sirius turning to greet her—his handsome mouth already forming a reply. Too bad he never got the chance.

Before anyone could do or say anything, Remus' arms shot out ahead of him. He pushed Sirius—hard—and watched as he sprawled backward off the pavement and landed on his arse in a single, icy puddle. Everyone gasped, even Remus, while Sirius looked up at him, completely astounded.

“Moony, what the fuck?!”

“Sorry!” Remus blabbed, clapping a hand over his mouth to stop himself from laughing. Behind them, the girls had stopped dead, staring with shocked eyes as Sirius gave a wail of frustration and scrambled back to his feet.

“You tosser, why’d you push me?” Sirius began to wipe fruitlessly at his soaked trousers only to give up and punch Remus in the shoulder instead. "Dickhead!"

“It was an accident—a reflex! C’mon, let’s go back to the dorm so you can change.” Trying not to look too chuffed, he took Sirius by the shoulders and turned him toward House Lane. The instinctive blunder may have left Sirius seriously pissed off, but it'd worked; the girls did not follow.

“You’re absolutely mental, you know that?” Sirius swore, immediately ridding himself of his wet clothes upon entry to their room. Behind him, Remus also stripped out of his own coat and boots, albeit much warmer.

“I’m sorry, it really was a reflex.”

“An embarrassing one, maybe! What sort of bloody reflex makes you push someone straight-on?”

"Would it help if I said sorry again?"

"I don't think so, no!"

"You're cute when you're angry."

"Don't—" Sirius snapped, anger slipping away for the shortest moment. "I'm—" He swallowed a smile. "I'm mad at you. Now why'd you push me?"

"It was those girls," Remus said. "They were going to ask you to the village right in front of me."

Sirius blinked at him, looking truly surprised. "Hold on, you mean you were jealous?"

"If that's what you want to call it."

"And what else would you call it?"

"Christ—alright! I was jealous! I'm not immune to it, y'know!"

"HA! Moony was jealous!" Sirius whipped off his wet shirt, letting it puddle on the bedroom floor. "Man, I missed this feeling."

Remus stepped forward, making a grab for his arm. "Alright, I admitted it, now come and make me feel better."

"Ohhh no, I'm still the wounded party here remember?" Sirius gestured to his ruined trousers. "Now I'm gonna get in the shower, and if you dare ditch me to go back to class, I'll spend the next month pouring salt in your tea."

With the undoubtedly very real threat in place, Sirius disappeared through the bathroom door, pulling down his pants and trousers as he went. The last thing Remus got was a flash of pale arse, and then he was slumping down on his bed, disappointed. Maybe he shouldn't have pushed him after all, at least then they'd be together in the—

"Moony."

A hand slipped out the bathroom door, beckoning him.

"You gonna make me freeze my balls off waiting for you?"

Remus jumped up. Fuck me.

> > >

He was there in an instant, letting Sirius pull him inside the tiny bathroom and peel his clothes off a layer at a time. "This was your plan all along, wasn't it, Moony? Get me filthy so we could skip class and shower… You're trying to turn me into a deviant like you, I know it."

"Why don't you check for yourself."

Sirius' hand slipped lower, and then his lips parted in scandal. "You filthy thing. This could be a safety hazard. What if I fall again? My arse is killing me."

“I’ll catch you this time... kiss it better.”

He couldn't be sure, but Remus thought that the little scoff Sirius let out was what undid them both.

They snogged while waiting for the water to warm up—it took ages in the old dorms—desperately grappling for each other as they had that first time, in that very spot. Then, when steam was finally rising, they threw the door shut, bolted the lock, and clambered into the tub together. Sirius’ skin turned to silk under the water, and Remus ran his fingers along it, then his tongue, tasting all of him and enjoying his collarbone the most—which he bit oh-so-lightly, because he knew Sirius liked it.

“Tall fucking prat,” Sirius said, wrenching Remus down to his level so they might both fit under the shower's spray. His nails scratched Remus on the neck accidentally, making him hiss and nearly take a tumble on the slick porcelain.

“That’s one way to make a guy fall limp."

“You love it, don't lie. I know you'd kill to have this whenever you wanted, but it takes some prep you know.”

"We don't have to do it all, only as much as you want. I just want you."

"We'll do enough," Sirius agreed, before catching Remus’ face in one hand. “Now, embrasse-moi.”

Before he could ask what the French meant, Sirius was drawing their mouths together again. Remus tasted him—a whispered goodnight, a morning cigarette, and pure, solid Sirius.

“Fine,” he grumbled against those pillow-soft lips, “I’ll come down to you.”

Sirius released him, biting his lip as Remus knelt down before him in the shower. Hungry, he pressed the skin of his cheek against Sirius’ hip bone and curled his mouth into it, placing gentle kisses along every chiselled curve and edge. He could feel the way Sirius' stomach fluttered, rising and falling with every anticipated breath. Once Remus might've been nervous; for so long it’d just been subtle passes in the dark—frisky touches that left them tipped over the edge but only just. They had to learn what each other liked, and now each motion was burned into Remus’ subconscious. He knew how to ruin Sirius completely, and enjoyed every second of it.

“Oh, j’aime ça... More, Moony—n'arrête pas."

Tight fingers snaked their way through Remus’ damp curls and pulled taunt. He hissed, feeling the sweet sting lace through scalp—but Remus knew exactly what would happen next. That perfect mouth would drop open in time with his, and Sirius would sing that note he sang for no one else.

“Oh fuck, Moony!” Sirius moaned, head falling back against the shower wall. His fingers tightened again, deciding the pace. Remus wasn’t worried, it’d be up to him soon enough.

The water was a new sensation. It frayed every nerve as it rained down on the pair of them, making them raw and sensitive. Remus' fingers slipped around sharp hip bones, and his knees slid however closer Sirius guided him. His mouth was made to taste like the salt off of skin, and he swallowed all of Sirius' familiarness, humming in pleasure when he was rewarded by Sirius’ libertine whines. Most days, Remus was knocked out simply by watching Sirius turn his wrist, but this—he could’ve died happy, sucking him off.

Sirius’ thighs began to tremble as he edged closer and closer to his peak, and Remus grappled the pale skin enough to know subconsciously that bruises would be left behind. Any girl who would be lucky enough to so much as glance at Sirius’ ripe peach would see evidence of his hands, his lips—his teeth.

“This—fucking—mouth—!” Sirius groaned, before releasing his hold on Remus' hair. "C'mere. Dépêche-toi, before I lose my mind."

Not about to argue, Remus stood and crowded Sirius beneath the shower head, blocking him in with an arm on either side of his head. He had to bend at the waist so that they were level, but finally he felt Sirius take hold of him, pressing them together so they might each feel all of the other. He could hear Sirius' breath in ear, panting with the effort it took not to finish first. Remus wouldn't have cared, he'd just wait until Sirius could go again. Emboldened by the idea, he bit down on the hard shell of his ear, forcing Sirius to brace himself against the wall of the shower while his inky black tresses fell down and covered his face.

“Shit, I'm close."

"Go ahead. But kiss me first."

Sirius didn't need telling twice. He looked up and Remus cupped him around the throat, basking in the grace of their own friction. It was like touching velvet. Pure warmth and noise and oh so lovely. They were Remus and Sirius when they were playing their music, but they were something else entirely when they were together like this. Eventually Remus bat his hands away and Sirius hesitantly obeyed, gasping into Remus' mouth when he felt his hands around him again.

They both found the edge a few minutes later, Sirius first, then Remus again after more snogging and perhaps the most wonderful handjob Sirius had ever given him. By then the water had gone cold, and they'd managed to knock every shampoo bottle off the edge of the tub.

<<<

"I suppose it's all downhill from here. Dunno how we're ever gonna top that," Sirius said later, as they lay stretched out on his bed, still naked sharing their favourite post-romp cigarette. It was the middle of the day and the sun was awake and shining, but they might as well have been the only two people in the entire world.

"We could do it in the kitchenette next—up the stakes."

"The kitchenette? Where everyone and their cousin could walk in on us? I was right—there's no way you're the real Moony."

"There's always Easter. We could stay… No one'll be around then."

"Huh, now there's an idea. Wouldn't you be missing your precious Tom though?"

"Nah, Tomny's gone up to Immingham on a job."

"He left London?"

"Only until June."

"Oh. Good. And Prongs? His family always does something big for the holidays."

"He'd get it. If we told him..."

Sirius raised a brow. "You mean about us? You're really up for it?"

"I've been thinking about it," Remus said, taping the cig out in the ashtray. "What if we told him this weekend, in the village? Lily'd be there, so it'd be like two birds with one stone. I still don't think I could stomach telling them all at once, but Lottie knows, and she was fine with it, so..."

"Wow."

"What do you think?"

"I... Yeah, great—amazing! I think it's amazing, Moons."

"I'm just hoping it'll take some weight off our shoulders."

"Yeah. Me too."

Smiling, Sirius tucked one arm up under his head and plucked the fag from Remus' fingers. Remus let him, turning onto his stomach so he could cradle his face against his arms and stare at Sirius with further ease. He never got tired of it; he could count those midnight lashes for hours. He almost reached forward to run his fingers along the faint trace of stubble along his jaw, but then Sirius was flipping on his side, letting out a thick breath of smoke.

“Bed’s too small. You’re simply crushing me.”

“We can get a bigger bed. In London.”

“It’ll have to be ten feet long to fit all of your lankiness.”

“And seven feet wide to fit your fat head. Didn't realise you'd decided to speak French in bed now.”

“Thought I’d try it out. No good?”

“No,” Remus smiled, reaching forward to nuzzle his face in the crook of Sirius’ neck; “s’good.”

“Careful Moons, you whisper like that in my ear and I’m going to need a second round.”

"I'll give it to you. Properly."

"Naughty."

Chuckling, Remus came away to kiss him. He snuck the cigarette out of Sirius' hand as he did and felt him chuckle against his mouth. Then when Remus pulled away again, a single damp curl dipped down into Sirius’ eyes.

Beautiful, he thought.

"You're beautiful," he said.

"I love you," Sirius murmured. “Tu es une grâce pour moi. Tu m’as sauvé —you save me every day... Even when all I want is to pop those pretty brown eyes right out of your skull. You're my sky, Moony. I'm sorry I ever said that you weren't.”

“You’re my sky too. Other people look up and see everything—a whole universe. I only see you.”

“I told you you were a poet,” Sirius grinned. He kissed him again, and Remus inhaled in the smoky haze that had encircled them like an embrace. It felt like love, and for two kids born of un-love, it was the best feeling in the world.

“Sirius?”

“Mm?”

“Do me a favour and watch those toes, they’re freezing.”

* * *

Saturday 28th January 1978

"Are you coming too, Sirius?" Lily asked, when they'd met ahead of the buses that morning.

"As opposed to staying back by myself?" Sirius crossed his arms. "You just want Potter and Lupin all to yourself."

She sighed wistfully. “The fourth wheel keeps the car moving, I suppose.”

"You women."

With a small laugh, Lily turned to take James' arm ahead of them. She was all dressed up for her birthday, wearing a new coat made of a pretty red and blue tartan, and a matching ribbon into her hair. James had also made an effort, combing his hair that morning and even borrowing a bit of gel from Mary to keep it in place. Remus and Sirius were dressed as they normally did, one dark brown coat and boots and a single leather jacket, much too thin for the weather.

It was a happy coincidence that their first village trip of the new year fell just short of Lily's eighteenth birthday. Remus was hoping that the change in scenery would make him just uncomfortable enough to let the truth slip. It was a solid plan, for the most part. After a day of doing whatever Lily wanted, they'd end by taking the happy couple on a walk around the local pond. If things went well they could retire to the Three Broomsticks for a pint, but if everything went brutally bad —to which Sirius assured him, it wouldn't—they could make their escape round the other side of town and even drown themselves in the lake should need be.

In preparation, Remus had spent the past several days practising what he might say to James and Lily in the bathroom mirror. He'd thought the speech was decent enough, except he insisted on bungling up the middle and forgetting everything else. He'd tried writing the more important bits on his hand instead, but just sweat it off from nerves. Now as he and Sirius stood shoulder-to-shoulder in line for the bus, he kept desperately trying to recount his thoughts in his head.

Look, Lily—James, I'm just gonna come out with it then... We're gay! Or not, 'we' as in 'us' , 'we' as in Sirius and me! And-And I'm not actually gay —that's just Sirius. But I am gay for Sirius—bisexual, really. Means both. Like I could like Sirius and you, Lily—not that I do! I mean do like you—totally—you're like my best friend, and James! You like James! And he's with Sirius—or I mean, he's not with Sirius—he's with you and I'm…

Shit.

So, his delivery needed some work. Good thing he had Sirius, who was smoother in all aspects and had certainly been anticipating the moment where he'd come out of the closet for much longer than he had. It felt better that they'd be doing it together. At least that way if everything went wrong they had a better chance of surviving in the woods as a pair. Maybe they could just move into the Shrieking Shack. The squirrels couldn't make that bad of neighbours, surely. Oh shit—James and Lily weren't even paying attention. Maybe they should just make a break for it now.

"You alright, Moons? You're shaking a bit."

"Huh? Oh, yep! Totally fine! Nothing to worry about…"

Sirius sighed, and then took his arm, moving them away from James and Lily and toward the back of the line where they'd have a lesser chance of being overheard.

"You need to calm down, mate," Sirius whispered. "It's normal to be nervous, but I don't think Miss Evans is going to be very appreciative when you get sick all over her new shoes."

"I know," Remus moaned. "But I'm good, really! I want to do it, it's just a bit nuts."

"Yeah."

"I'll be alright, it's only James and Lily. And hey, if everything goes terribly today, then I suppose there are plenty of two man bands. We could be the like S—"

“Do not say Simon and Garfunkel.”

“Actually, I was gonna say Sonny and Cher.”

The corners of Sirius’ mouth quirked up. “Well… as long as I get to be Cher.”

The line began to move again, and Remus watched as James and Lily disappeared up the bus steps. They looked so happy, surely a couple more queers couldn't ruin their day?

"Have you thought about what you wanted to say?" Sirius asked.

"Er... not really. You?"

Sirius licked his lips nervously. "I've imagined myself telling James so many times, but now that we're actually doing it, I can't think of a thing."

"Well... Maybe we won’t even have to say anything at all! Maybe they’ll just guess it for themselves. We can just drop hints, make it obvious for them.”

“What sort of hints? Because I’m not painting myself in rainbows and dancing naked in the middle of the square.”

“It’s always zero to one-hundred with you, isn’t it?”

“ 'If life’s a stage’..."

"You're going to love your present," Remus told Lily, when they were finally shuffling off of the school bus in the middle of town. "Sirius and I picked it out together."

"Really?"

"Uh-huh." He'd wrapped it just that morning, in fact. They'd picked it out from a catalogue; a beautiful leather briefcase, with gold fastenings. Like Remus, it'd been embossed with Lily's initials across the front.

"You're not getting it until your real birthday anyway," Sirius said. "Mary made everyone promise to wait."

"We bought it together though!" Remus interrupted, seizing his opportunity. "It's from both of us. We both put a lot of thought into it."

"That's lovely, you two. I can't wait to see what it is."

As Lily turned and began walking up the cobblestone with James, Sirius grabbed Remus' arm and hung back.

" 'It's from both of us'? Really? Man, you do sound gay."

"Am I missing something? I thought we agreed that we were gonna—"

"Yes, yes, I know. Now get on before we lose them."

"So!" Lily cried, as they emerged on the village's main strip. "It's just the four of us, what shall we do today?"

"S'up to you," Remus insisted. "Whatever you want, it's your birthday."

"I made us a reservation at Madam Puddifoot's," James said.

Sirius made a face. "The tacky tea shop?"

"Yup. It was Moony's idea, actually."

"Your idea?"

"I heard it was good for couples," Remus said pointedly.

"But it's horrible in there. Everything's so frilly and it all stinks of potpourri. Just thinking about the place makes me itchy."

"You mean you've been?" Lily teased.

"Chastity made me take her," Sirius glowered. "It felt like everyone in there was having a bloody snogging competition."

"Which I'm sure you were so adverse to," James snorted.

"It doesn't matter, now you're going with us," Lily said happily. "No snogging necessary. Unless you wanted to, of course."

At her comment, Remus felt giddy and he and Sirius exchanged a look. "You mean—"

"Oh yes, I hear Madam Puddifoot is very generous when it comes to her more lonely, bitter patrons. I'm sure she'll give you a little peck if you're that desperate, Sirius. Though you have to pay extra for tongue."

"You are so nasty," Sirius said. "I'm almost proud. Our little women are going up."

Lily stuck her own tongue out and turned toward the row of shops ahead.

"Don't worry," Remus whispered. "I refuse to snog you in the same place you snogged Chastity Bell anyway."

"In that case, we didn't snog in the bookshop. Or the record shop. Or Broomsticks' loo. Or the cemetery, if you wanted to get really freaky. Plenty of places left to snog, really."

"I'll keep that in mind."

They converged at Dervish and Bangers first, mostly to satiate Sirius, and slipped inside amongst the usual crowd, which was now bolstered by all of the eager kids looking to spend their holiday money. Remus waved at the owner, Graeme, who nodded back while helping a group of local girls sort through a stack of tapes near the till. The four of them split off to sort through the rows and rows of music, and eventually Sirius drifted back to Remus' side, clicking his tongue in disappointment. "Can't find any Sex Pistols on the shelves. Gonna go ask the manager if he's got a copy somewhere else."

"Kay," Remus nodded, before watching him drift toward the far corner of the shop. The group of girls, who couldn't have been older than fourteen, were busy counting their pennies on the counter but all gave a pause when Sirius approached. They looked him up and down in his leather jacket and heavy boots, and Sirius, ever the fucking flirt, nodded at them with a smug look.

“Just can’t help himself, can he?” James chuckled, appearing at Remus’ elbow to watch.

“Uh-huh. And he’s gonna pay for it later."

“What was that?”

Before Remus could clarify, Lily squeezed herself between them. “Budge up, you two. I’m trying to get to ‘L’.”

As Remus stepped away to make room, Lily bent over the stacks of albums and began to flip through them with nimble fingers.

“Who you looking for?” James asked.

“You remember that song that was playing in that little cafe you took me to in Islington? Turns out Lottie already had the album. She recognised the lyrics and found it for me, but I wanted my own copy. Figured here would be my best bet—a-ha!”

Victorious, she came back with a bright yellow LP, its cover laced in psychedelic flowers juxtaposed by the black and white picture of a young couple. Across the bottom, in great purple lettering, was the band's name; The Longbottoms.

“Here they are!" Lily grinned, flipping it over. “And there—‘The Magic Word’, that’s the song!”

Remus plucked the cover from her hands and turned it over. “How sickeningly romantic. This is gonna be the song you dance to at your wedding, isn't it?”

“Only if you sing it for us,” James said, jabbing him in the ribs. Remus flinched away, before laughing as Sirius reappeared, clutching Never Mind the Bollocks, Here's the Sex Pistols in one hand and sporting a rather triumphant look on his face.

“Got it, baby! Turns out our most friendly mate, Sir Graeme, was hiding a copy away in his personal collection. He was willing to part with it, though you do owe him five more crates’ worth of organising next time we’re in, Moons.”

“Tsk—selling me off again? You little twat.”

Sirius tucked the album under one hand and leaned across the rows to pluck The Longbottoms from Remus’ hands. “Oh no, we going folk now?”

“It’s got James and Lily’s song on it.”

Sirius raised an eyebrow. “Their ‘song’?”

“Oh yes, they heard it for the first time in some little noshery in Islington and ended up dancing to it on the street. It was all very romantic.”

"Eugh. I think I'm gonna vomit."

“You're just jealous,” Lily said, rosy-cheeked and snatching the LP back.

“Sirius and I have a song,” Remus blabbed out of nowhere. Sirius whirled on him in question, and both Lily and James raised their eyebrows.

"We do?"

"Sure we do! It's... uhm..."

Oh god, they were staring at him now! Now he'd gone and done it... He knew thousands of songs—why couldn't he think of any? How was it possible that every romantic melody had managed to vacate his brain at that exact moment?!

"Sirius, tell them the song!"

"Oh, it's uh... Queen!"

"Right, Queen!"

"Which Queen?" James asked.

"You know... the love... one..."

"The love one?"

"He's just having a laugh!" Sirius burst. "Moony, you tosser... ‘You’re My Best Friend’, that's the one right?”

Huh?!

James shook his head. "Very funny. Your comedic timing is truly impeccable."

Sirius forced a laugh. "Heh. I know, right?"

"I was being sarcastic actually."

"Shut up, Prongs..."

Ushered by Sirius, who refused to meet Remus' eye, James went on ahead to pay for Lily's record while Remus lagged behind, feeling like a car motor that'd up and died on the middle of the speedway.

“Are you alright, Remus?” Lily asked, reading his expression.

“Yeah, fine,” he squeaked.

"You sure...?"

Just say it!

The thought burst across his mind like a thunder strike. For so long it’d felt like such a dream, but if he wanted that pretty little dream, one where he’d fall asleep with Sirius’ warmth next to him and wake up to his lips brushing his neck, then something had to shift.

“Lily, I have something to tell you."

"What is it?"

He swallowed thickly. Could one have an allergic reaction to telling the truth?

"I... Or, you..." He sighed, defeated. "You're going to really love that album..."

Idiot.

“Oh. You've heard it before?"

"No... I just have a good feeling."

She gave him an odd look, then smiled and took his arm. When they were finished, Remus let Lily and James go first while he pulled Sirius back by the collar of his jacket, yanking him over to the shop speakers where the music was loudest. Suddenly he felt like yelling.

“ ‘You’re My Best Friend’? Really?!"

Guilty, Sirius hid half of his face behind Never Mind the Bollocks. “I-I got nervous…”

“Nervous?!"

“Yeah, what—we were just gonna out ourselves in the middle of a shop? Where anyone could overhear?”

"We could've been done with it!"

"Alright, then why didn't you say anything?!"

Remus sagged. He had a point.

"... Fuck!"

“We’ll do it later,” Sirius reassured him; “At Puddifoot’s or something… It'll be more intimate.”

"Is intimate really what you want? 'Cause if you’d rather not, then we could always—”

“No,” Sirius said firmly, “I want this—I do. It’s just… I got nervous. But I’m over it now. Next time for sure.”

Remus wasn’t entirely convinced. He was supposed to be the nervous one, not Sirius, but then again, that was hardly fair. He supposed all that was left to do was wait until one of them literally came out with it. Perhaps someplace more quiet and private was exactly what they needed to pluck up the proper courage. He held out hope until they arrived at the tea shop, and it was there that Remus realised just how hooped he was. Mary had once called the teashop the 'most romantic date spot within a hundred miles', but to him, it felt more like the most uncomfortable date spot that'd ever existed! Everything was painted the most horrendous shade of bubblegum pink, and lace and frills hung from every surface—a true pink, perky, preposterous nightmare. And there were girls everywhere, sipping tea and eating biscuits as Lief Garret and Rod Stewart played over the radio.

This wasn't privacy, it was a set up!

“I cannot go in there,” Sirius said, slamming on the breaks outside the shop.

“Why not? Afraid of catching cooties, Black?” Lily asked. “Oh c’mon, it’s not like it’s Valentine’s Day or anything. We’ll just get a coffee and sit for a bit.”

Sirius glanced at Remus, who was trying not to look too guilty for suggesting they go in the first place, and finally acquiesced. Shuffling inside, they took a table by one of the front windows, which only horrified Sirius further when he realised they could be seen from outside by any passer-by. Thankfully those inside didn't seem all that interested; they'd squeezed between several tables occupied by handsy or otherwise snogging couples before they'd finally made it to their own seats, and any faces they recognised didn't bother saying hello.

"They have food here, right? I'm starving," James said, opening a menu.

"We're gonna go to Broomsticks later, too, so don't stuff yourself on cake," Lily warned.

"Ah, it don't matter. I'm bulking for the season right now anyway. Food's food."

Sirius ducked suddenly, out of view of the window. "I think I just saw Jacob MacGillivray from Latin."

"Shall I say hi?" Remus drawled, making Sirius glare at him with one cheek pressed to the frilly tablecloth. A moment later a round woman with a shiny black bun had squeezed in next to their table.

"What can I get you, m'dears?"

"What's this 'afternoon special'?" James asked.

"Oh well, that'll be the afternoon tea—sandwiches and little heart-shaped tea cakes. We also have a Sweethearts' Special on today. Half price for any couple." She looked to James and Lily, smiling, and Remus—feeling cheeky—said;

"Oh, well in that case, we're—"

"Gonna have four coffees," Sirius cut-in, snatching the menus back and not making eye contact with any of them.

"We could've gotten a deal on those," Remus said, after the woman had finished taking their order and slipped away.

"We can afford it."

"What happened to being over it?"

"Over what?" Lily echoed.

“I’m going to the loo,” Sirius announced suddenly, standing up from the table and leaving them there alone. Remus watched him go, and eventually Madam Puddifoot returned with their coffees. Remus took one sip—tried not to grimace at the bitter taste—and stood.

“I’m gonna use the bog, too,” he said, before weaving his way toward the tiny hallway Sirius had disappeared down. Surprisingly, he found Sirius not waiting for the single toilet, but leaning back against the rose-papered wall and smoking a cigarette.

“Pretty sure you’re not supposed to smoke in here,” Remus said. "One stray spark and we'll go up like a matchstick."

“I just lit it,” Sirius grumbled.

Remus sighed. “Alright fine, I’ll bite. What’s the matter now?”

“It’s just not working,” Sirius said, before finally grinding the tip of his cigarette out on the bottom of his boot. “Maybe we should abort the mission. Cut our losses before something bad actually happens.”

“Like what? Like Lily and James finally finding out about us?”

“Maybe—yeah!”

“I thought you wanted this?”

“I thought I did too!”

“Well, do you want me to stop trying?”

“Yes—!” Then; “No!” Sirius lowered his voice before he could start shouting; “It’s just—ugh, get me out of this place first. I feel like I'm being felt up by a fucking doily.”

That, Remus could agree with.

They crossed back to their table together only to find James and Lily busy snogging like all the rest of the couples. They broke apart when they noticed their return, and James bashfully wiped his mouth. “Sorry, lads.”

“I guess the atmosphere really sets the mood,” Sirius grumbled.

They managed a bit more strenuous small talk while James scarfed down a few finger sandwiches and finally paid their bill and made their way back out onto the street corner. The air had cooled some more in the early afternoon, so they all huddled close as they made their way down the snowy pavement. Eventually Remus reached out and took Sirius' chilled hand. He looked down at their fingers first, unsure, but when their eyes met again, Sirius nodded firmly. Remus smiled, and together they nervously kept on, waiting until one of their friends noticed. It took a bit of pointed gesture—swinging their hands back and forth rather animatedly for several streets—but finally James noticed.

"You two holding hands?"

"Yes!" Sirius practically gasped; "Fuck—Prongs!"

"What'd I do?!"

"Nothing! There's just something we gotta tell ya!"

"Oh... Well, in that case, I want in on some 'a this first." Looking cheeky, James took Sirius' other hand. Lily giggled at them, and then she grabbed Remus' free hand, and suddenly they'd gone from a twosome to a foursome, and both Remus and Sirius were left partly stunned.

"What was that you wanted to tell us?" James asked.

"Nothing," Sirius moaned. "Your boot lace is untied."

James looked down; "Huh." and pulled them all to a spectacular halt when he bent down to re-tie it—refusing to release Sirius' hand in the process.

"Maybe we should just say it," Remus muttered quietly later on, while they were clustered together between the rows of the bookshop.

"No!" Sirius hissed. "Now it's a matter of pride."

"It's always a matter of pride with you."

"Don't worry, they'll catch on eventually if we just keep dropping hints."

"I don't know how many more hints we can drop! At this point we might have to actually paint ourselves with rainbows and dance naked in the square."

"You're not funny," Sirius scowled.

“Fine, watch this then. Lily’ll get it.” Stepping away from Sirius, Remus held up a faded copy of The Picture of Dorian Gray—the only moderately queer book he’d been able to find in the entire shop—and began weaving through the aisles in search of their friends. They found Lily in the philosophy section, nose already buried in a tomb the size of her head.

“Lils, I think I got a book recommendation for you—”

“Here you are, Miss,” the shop attendant started, appearing on Lily’s other side with a stack of books. Before either of them could address Remus’ recommendation, Sirius snatched Dorian Gray and threw it behind himself, clearing the next shelf completely.

“Thank you,” Lily told the shopkeep, before turning back to them. “What was that, Remus?”

“Oh… nothing…”

Now Remus was starting to get a headache.

“You’re making this so much harder than it has to be!” He griped, after they’d left the bookshop and stopped to replenish their cigarette supply at the local corner shop.

“I know!” Sirius moaned, dropping down on the bench outside while they waited for James to pay. It was his turn to foot the tobacco bill anyway. "It was a reflex! You'd know all about this..."

Remus sighed, collapsing down on a nearby bench. “Maybe we should just forget the whole thing.”

“I don’t want to."

“I’m starting to feel like the bad guy here.”

"And how's it feel?" Sirius snapped. He softened a second later, and hung his head. "Sorry, didn't mean that."

"I know."

"Never really thought that we'd get here, to be honest. Thought you'd back out before we got close... sort of like, well..."

He said the last bit very quietly, and Remus felt his entire chest sink.

"I'm not Miles, Sirius."

"I know!" He whimpered, slumping back on the bench. "You're nothing alike—not really, and I never I think of him unless I'm depressed. Miles and I, we were fourteen, and he was a great friend, but your Moony! That's what James said to me, you know. Way back in our first year together? I hated you... thought you were taking his place or something, but there you were with that sharp mouth and all those freckles—you were too hard not to like! And James, he... He said —'Sirius, if you want him to be our friend, you can't compare them anymore'. See, Potter wanted to be your friend first, not me. He was the one who helped open my eyes, and I'm grateful for it everyday."

"Why can't we say that to him? Either of us..."

"Fear, I suppose."

"Change," Remus nodded. "I never thought we'd get here either. Figured that you and I—that we—well.. That we could actually love each other. Thought it'd just fall about first, and we'd have to go back to being friends."

"We'll always be friends, Moons," Sirius said. "That's never gonna change. Loving you's just a bonus."

Oh god, he thought, I love you so much.

“Sirius, do you really think James Potter—your bestest friend in the world and the nicest guy we know—and Lily Evans—my bestest friend and champion for underdogs everywhere! Do you think that they could take that from us?”

“No. No, I don’t.”

“See! I don’t think so either! Not anymore... But I need us to communicate—that’s what’s most important here, and I’m not gonna blame you if you decide that you’re not ready. I don’t care what happened before. I just want you. In whatever capacity. And that’s the truth.”

“But what happens if we don’t tell them? What about when school ends? What about the band and London?”

“Fuck London. We’ll figure it out as we go.”

Sirius looked up then, all stormy-grey eyes. “I really want to kiss you right now.”

“Well…” Remus hummed; “What’s stopping you?”

Sirius sucked on his bottom lip, glancing around at the street, before jumping up from the bench. He caught Remus’ arm and dragged him around the side of the corner shop, into the tiny alleyway they’d cut through earlier. More than a little eager, Remus began to chase Sirius' lips with his own, but before he could claim them, he found himself pressed up against the side of the brick.

"I said I'm kissing you, didn't I?"

Oh. Remus didn’t mind; Sirius’ kiss warmed him—scorching his lips in their desperate fever and all the teenage lust they could muster. Not that he had much time to fantasize before they were interrupted.

"Wow. Don't you two look busy."

"JAMES!" Sirius yelped, at the same time Remus went; "LILY!"

"Thank your lucky stars it's not," Nicole snorted. Marlene stood beside her, both girls hiding a sparse giggle behind their gloved fingers.

“Sorry to interrupt your fun, but you’re not exactly swimming in privacy."

"Tell me about it," Sirius gasped mournfully, doubling-over as Marlene and Nicole’s giggling turned to full-blown cackles. “Bloody fuck—it’s only you two. Damn—what’s a couple ‘a lads gotta do for a few minutes alone?”

“Not snog each other in the middle of town, for one.”

“I was actually enjoying the show quite a bit,” Nicole said, stepping forward and smacking Sirius on the back none-too-gently. “What’s got you two so furiously hot and randy in the middle of the day?”

“Best not ask,” Remus moaned.

Marlene smiled and came forward, playfully jabbing Remus in the side with her elbow. “Your guardian angels must be working overtime. You’re lucky it was us who caught you. I thought you were going around with James and Lily today?”

“We are. They’re around the corner getting the fags.”

“Ooh, mind if I bum a few later?” Nicole asked. “My roommate normally gets them from her older sister, but she’s been stingy lately.”

"Yeah, don't mind."

"Where's Macdonald, McKinnon?" Sirius asked. "Thought she'd sworn not to let you out of her sight today?"

"Lost her by the buses," Marlene said, rubbing her arm sorely. Next to her Nicole had turned stoney and Remus got the feeling that the topic had already been bridged that day, under less than ideal circumstances.

“Mary’s on a date of her own," Nicole said. "Haven’t seen her all day.”

“You mean she didn’t try and crash yours like she promised she would?” Sirius asked. It was clearly a joke, but Sirius had never been particularly astute at reading a room.

“Oh, she tried."

Marlene nudged her. "Nicole..."

"What? It's not my fault she doesn't know when to quit. Really, it’s like having half the school at her beck and call isn’t enough. She needs Marlene to wait on her hand and foot too.”

“She doesn’t,” Marlene insisted quietly.

“Wait,” Remus started, “Mary knows about you two?”

“No,” Nicole replied sharply. “She doesn’t.”

Marlene sighed tiredly. “I told you she’s just jealous. She isn’t used to sharing me.”

“Who the fuck needs to ‘share’ their best friend? She’s being petty, and she sulks whenever she doesn’t get her way. It’s irritating.”

“You can’t just call my friends irritating!”

“Fine, let’s get an outside opinion.” Nicole turned on Sirius. “Black, if Remus’ best friend kept coming around to crash your time together and then sulked when you tried to put up boundaries, wouldn’t you be pissed off?”

Sirius threw his arms out. "Uh—fuck yeah. Man, you have no idea how close to home this hits."

Nicole rounded on Marlene. "See?"

"Sirius!"

“Okay honestly, if I’d put up boundaries we wouldn’t be on a double-date with Evans and Potter in the first place,” Sirius finished, utterly blasé.

“Mary doesn’t know we’re together,” Marlene reasoned. “She just thinks I’m ditching her to hang out with someone else.”

“Well, Mary should learn how to share,” Nicole said finally, before huffing and stepping past them all. “I’m gonna go find a lav. See you later, Remus—Black.”

They watched her go, and Marlene rocked back and forth awkwardly in her winter boots. “Sorry guys,” she sighed. “It’s turned into a bit of an ongoing thing.”

“I didn’t realise Mary cared so much,” Remus said. "When'd this all start?"

“When Nicole came to mine for Christmas?" She winced. "I think Mary took it to heart. I’ve never had her over, so… But then she said some stuff in front of Nicole and they just blew up on each other. I love Mary, I do—but everything concerning money just goes right over her head. She doesn’t think classes even exist anymore. Nicole gets it a bit more, I think. She’s only here because her uncle offered to pay her tuition. Her dad runs a bakery.” Marlene put her hands up suddenly, shaking her head. “But listen to me go off. I should probably go after her. You guys have fun with Lily and Potter.”

“We’re going to the Three Broomsticks later if you want to join,” Sirius called, as Marlene disappeared around the corner of the alley, after her girlfriend. “Geez, women. Can’t live with ‘em, can’t live without ‘em.”

“I think the same can be said for either of us,” Remus smirked.

They met back up with James and Lily on the street corner, both of them concerned over where they’d disappeared to. After brushing their worries off, Remus held his hand out for his package of cigarettes and Lily handed him a rather thick chocolate bar instead.

“No smoking on my birthday."

“It’s not your birthday yet."

Lily shrugged simply and began strolling ahead, linking arms with Sirius. As she did, James appeared at Remus' elbow and gently slipped a pack of smokes into his coat pocket. "Remember, you and I? We never talked," he grinned dopily.

Arm-in-arm, the four of them made their way across town toward the little pub, the sun finally slipping from the sky and leaving only the occasional lamppost to light their way. It was far too late for a walk around the pond now, which disappointed him. But unbeknownst to them, their luck hadn't run out entirely.

"If you could be any vegetable, what vegetable would you be?" Lily asked James. Remus wasn't sure how it'd started (usually Mary was the one that suggested these things) but somewhere along the walk over they'd picked up a game of questions.

"Definitely a squash," James answered.

"That was a quick answer. Why a squash?"

"Why not? They're so versatile. Would you still love me as a squash?"

"Perhaps. Though if you start growing mould then all bets are off."

"Padfoot, did you hear that? Her love's conditional!"

"All love's conditional," Sirius replied snidely. "You're lucky it takes you becoming a fucking pumpkin for her to have doubts."

Lily beamed at him, and James just snorted. "Alright then, Padfoot, your turn. If you were a girl for a day, what's the first thing you'd do?"

"I'd do Moony," Sirius said automatically.

James gaped. "Moony?"

"Yeah. You know, just to see how it feels."

"You mean you wouldn't do me?"

Now it was Sirius' turn to gape. "You?! That's fucking nasty, you're my best mate!"

"So's Moony!"

They both looked at each other then—Sirius and Remus—and knew without saying anything aloud at all that their moment had finally come. They slowed their walk beneath a single buzzing street light and James and Lily both paused, looking at them expectantly. The Three Broomsticks was just a short way beyond them now, and they could almost make out its nightly clamour of noise and patrons, but there would be no intimate freedom to confess in there. If they wanted their friends to finally know about them, it had to be now.

“Is everything alright?” Asked Lily.

“Yeah, s’fine, Evans,” Sirius said, sounding uncharacteristically grim.

“Then why do you both look like you just swallowed a tack?”

Sirius glanced at him, and Remus nodded. No more fear. Just take the plunge.

“Prongs, ask Moony the same question you asked me.”

“What d’you mean?”

“I mean the same question.”

“Like if he were a girl?”

“I’d do Sirius!" Remus blabbed.

“You'd what? Okay, I don’t follow." James looked at Lily, then scratched the side of his head. "You guys have been acting weird all day, now what's going on? You planning a surprise party?" He gasped. "Wait! You've planned a surprise party for Daisy, haven't you!"

Lily smacked him. "Potter, shut up and let them say what they're trying to say."

As James rubbed his arm, Remus took a deep breath. “James, Lily, there's no surprise party, but we do have something to tell you. It's..."

"Go ahead Remus."

"It's about us. You see, the two of us… That is, Sirius and I… We—ergh…”

“Yes?”

“We… Sirius… Erm, well—Siriuswaswithmeallsummer!”

Sirius slapped a hand over his eyes. “Oh, Jesus."

“What d’you mean?” James asked automatically, then his eyes bulged in realisation. “Hold on—all summer?”

“Not the whole thing, just most of August.”

“But you told us that it was only a few days. That he’d just gotten back from Belgium!”

“Yeah, we know, but—”

James whirled on Sirius. “You liar! What were you doing at Moony’s all that time?”

“Aren’t you listening? I was doing M—”

“Sirius! Don’t you have any tact?” Remus hissed.

“What? I thought you wanted to be out with it?”

Lily scrunched her face up, waving her hands about as if to clear the air. “Stop, stop, just stop—now what does the summer have to do with what you’re trying to tell us?”

“Yes!” Sirius exclaimed. “What does it?”

“I just thought we should come clean about all of it,” Remus reasoned. “You don’t wash one dirty dish, right, you wash ‘em all.”

“All? ALL? What we gonna recount the bloody Sex Pistols concert for them next?”

“You went to see the Sex Pistols?” James half-shouted. “WITHOUT US?!”

“That really has nothing to do with this,” Remus cried. “We'd barely done anything before that. Just—look, Prongs—we only mean that there's a lot going on here that you don't know about.”

“CLEARLY! What, you gonna tell us you shook hands with the Queen next?”

“Sure, a type of queen,” Sirius said under his breath. “And only if by ‘shaking hands’ you mean—”

Remus cleared his throat pointedly. “While Sirius was at my house, some stuff happened. Or really, it started before that—here—at school. Nothing crazy though! ... Just that time in the toilet."

"I'm sorry—the toilet?"

"It was one time," Sirius said. "That year, anyway."

Lily's hands flew to her mouth.

"I knew that Sirius was like that for a while," Remus reasoned, "but I never thought that I could be... I mean I was with Marlene for so long—but then there was the stuff at the piano, and we just… I dunno, it made sense when it happened."

"What piano?" James demanded. "What stuff?!"

"Moony—"

Remus flew past him, he couldn't stop. He was a rollercoaster going down.

"I didn't know what was going on, it was so mixed up! Like I'm still not totally like that, but I'm definitely like that—and being with Sirius is so—but then I TOTALLY fucked things up after that shit with Tomny. Like TOTALLY!"

"Moony!"

"And then there was all that crap with Jillian—ugh! And then you, James—and then because that wasn't enough it was Regulus, then bloody Christmas—and we both fucked up so badly and I just fucking ran off, who KNOWS what I was thinking. And then Sirius got angry and Tomny was there, and I just—"

"Remus!" This time it was Lily, holding her arms up as though he were some frantic animal she was trying to calm. "Just take a breath! Now what are you trying to say?"

"What I'm trying to say is that you and James are on a date today, but so ARE SIRIUS AND ME!"

James' mouth slackened. "You mean like... as friends?"

Sirius threw his arms out; "OH FOR CHRIST'S SAKE—!"

Then he grabbed Remus by the collar, pulled him down to his level, and kissed him full on the mouth. It was a jostling manoeuvre—their teeth knocked sharply enough to make Remus hiss—but he was kissing Sirius, and somehow it made everything feel alright in the world.

When they pulled apart, Sirius released his hold on the front of Remus' coat and spun around to face their friends. "There! HAPPY?!"

James just stared at them, wide-eyed as a goldfish. "Huh? Wha—? You just—"

"Oh my," Lily said softly, covering her mouth again. If Remus weren't mistaken, she almost looked impressed.

"It's not the first time either," Sirius said staunchly. "I think what our normally-so-astute Moony was trying to say is that… Well, we're together. Have been for a while now and we—we wanted to tell you about it because you're our… Shit, you're our best friends."

James' jaw opened even wider, but Lily just dropped her hand.

"Oh blimey, I already knew that!"

The first moments of silence were palpable, then—all three of them at once; "YOU DID?!"

"Of course!" She turned on James. "How could you have not known, you live with them!"

James sputtered, looking between his friends and girlfriend as though he might be saved from his own ignorance. "What? You're blaming me? What about them?! They didn't exactly plaster it on the wall with a neon sign."

"Yeah, you're welcome for that," Sirius huffed.

"Does anyone else know?" Lily urged.

Sirius opened his mouth to answer, but Remus got there first. "No," he said, eyeing his boyfriend sharply. They couldn't tell them Marlene knew—not without them asking why, and Marlene's sexuality was her business. It took a second, but finally Sirius nodded, understanding.

"Just Lottie."

"You told Lottie?"

"No, she sort of sorted it out on her own."

Lily stamped her foot. "Well, so did I! Some of us are just more discreet."

"How long have you known?" Remus moaned.

"Since Halloween."

"Halloween?" James hollered. "HALLOWEEN?! You mean to say that the two of you have been bunking off together since HALLOWEEN?!"

"No, we said summer," Sirius replied, looking as chuffed as Lily. "Keep up, Potter."

James went pale, and Remus imagined little bits of him chipping off like crumbling stone as he realised that at least half of his closest friends had been lying to him.

"Sorry, Prongs. Things just got sort of… muddled."

"You're bloody telling me!" James pressed a hand over his heart and took a deep breath. "So the two of you are—what, boyfriends??"

"Yeah."

"Since summer?"

Sirius bristled a bit. "If you've got such a problem with me loving Moony then you—"

"Love?!"

"Er..."

"Are you really in love with each other?" Lily asked hopefully.

They exchanged a look, both blushing in the darkness, and shared a nod.

By now James looked positively haggard. "Then all that stuff at Christmas…" He warbled. "That was... what a couple's fight?"

"Yeah," Sirius winced; "Not our best moment, I will admit. Sorry the rest of you had to put up with us. But we put up with your and Evan's nonsense for twice as long. Moony went to a lot of trouble playing matchmaker, you know."

"That was some of my best work," Remus added, closing the gap between him and Sirius and reaching around to hold him by the waist. They shared a happy look, before Remus glanced back at James, who was still standing stunned, and remembered that they might not entirely be out of the woods just yet.

“You okay there, Prongs…?” Sirius said, voice hitching.

James didn’t say anything at first, just stared at the damp cobblestone street in silence until Lily ultimately looked up at him and smacked him on the arm for a second time.

“OW!?”

“You’re worrying your friends!”

“Oh.” Rubbing his arm, James straightened up and cleared his throat. He looked each of them dead on, firmly. “You’re for real about this? The two of you—together?”

“Yes, we are,” Sirius said.

“And you’re happy?”

This time it was Remus’ turn to answer; “So happy.”

James crossed his arms. "I'm a bit mad, to be honest."

"Figured you might be," Sirius mumbled.

"You didn't tell me, why?"

"It wasn't that easy."

"James," Lily took his arm. "They're telling you now."

He looked at her, then back at the two of them, and finally all of the strain seemed to smelt from his muscles. "Did you two really go see the Sex Pistols without us?"

"Sorry," Sirius sniggered. "But it was really fucking cool."

"UGH!" James swept forward, hugging them both. "Fucking twats, both of you. Never again, you hear me?"

Remus heard Sirius hum happily—giddily—and then all three of them were hugging.

This is it, the little voice said, finally content. This is what family feels like.

Well, almost.

Cradled tightly in James and Sirius' embrace, Remus held out another arm to Lily, who was standing off to the side, quietly wiping beneath her eyes. She caught the gesture and nearly whimpered before surging forward and squeezing herself into his side.

"I'm so happy!" She cried, voice muffled where she pressed her face into James' side.

"I guess now's not the time to tell you it was all a joke then?" Sirius teased.

Remus felt a hard pinch on his arm and yelped, throwing himself backward and breaking up the hug.

"Oops! Sorry, Remus, I was trying to get Sirius."

They all finished their walk to the Three Broomsticks hand in hand, but this time it meant something different to all of them. And yet it didn't feel any different. There was no change, just a feeling of happiness—a feeling that, Remus was coming to realise, came with a lot less guilt than he'd ever imagined possible.

"So how did snuff us out anyway, Evans?" Sirius asked, as the pub's yellow lights fell into view. "You said Halloween?"

"Yes. I figured that unless John Lennon had made a special appearance at our school party just to kiss Remus on the mouth, I had pretty good odds."

"Huh?"

"Oh, Black, really. Not every ghost wears satin lime-green trousers and high top trainers."

"Only you would be looking at his shoes when he's kissing Moony in front of half the school," said James.

"Plenty of people want to kiss Remus. Had to narrow it down somehow."

Remus' cheeks turned warm, but Sirius only looked more smug. Beside him, James raised his hands up behind his head, looking well-pleased himself.

“Well Black, I at least hope you’re a better kisser now than that time you and I had a go. For Moony's sake.”

For a moment Remus thought he might’ve heard him wrong. Lily too, appeared to be questioning her hearing as they all stopped dead in their tracks. Sirius looked horrified.

“I’m sorry,” Lily gaped. “But the two of you have…?”

“We did not have a go!” Sirius howled. “It was one time, and it was an accident!”

“Bet you liked it though, didn't you, Padfoot."

“I did not!"

Remus looked down at Sirius in utter disbelief. "You kissed James?"

"It was an accident!" He insisted.

"When?"

"Your birthday, Moons, eleventh year." James smirked. "Suppose he was too frigid to try it on you back then."

"Shut up!"

"Did you like it?" Lily asked him.

"It was alright. Could’ve used a bit more enthusiasm.”

Sirius punched James in the arm, hard enough to make everyone flinch. “I said shut up! It was barely a peck, you nob! It was dark and we were both drunk as hell. Plus I nearly chipped a tooth on that fat face of yours!”

“Oi, that was a fond memory for me, thank you very much,” James pouted. “I really thought our friendship reached new heights in that toilet.”

“The TOILET?” Remus laughed, as Sirius abandoned all reasoning and promptly tackled James into the snow.

"See, this is how it happened last time, Padfoot! Careful, Moons. Think your—eugh!—man's trying to have another go!”

“He’s lying! I tripped!”

“Yeah, right into my mouth! HA!”

“Shut up! Shut up! SHUT UP!”

Sirius grabbed Remus' hand, and attempted to drag him on ahead to the pub. This didn't seem to bother Lily, or James, who simply cupped his hands around his mouth to holler after them.

“So did you two, like—do stuff in the dorm? ‘Cause it's totally fine if you did! But how MUCH stuff exactly…?"

Chapter End Notes

> Maybe this is late, idk. Originally it was two chapters but I felt they worked together as one so it took fucking forever to edit. It might be wonky, there's probably mistakes, but I feel the wonkiness fits the theme. Anyone who's ever come out should know the feeling.
>
> Happy Stranger Things day! Oh, and also becca?? no bathroom comments, pff x

Chapter 87: The Anti-Valentine's Day

Chapter Summary

It's Valentine's at Hawkings; love is in the air, and the world is on fire.

Chapter Notes

I posted the unedited version of this chapter on accident the first time around, so if you read it without seeing this note it was a mistake!

Author's Note!!!: Due to a conflicting work schedule, I've decided to make upload day Sundays of every week. This will hopefully make it so my uploads aren't as late in the day anymore.

Next upload: July 17

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You're a rich girl, and you've gone too far,
'Cause you know it don't matter anyway;
You can rely on the old man's money,
You can rely on the old man's money;

It's a bitch girl but it's gone too far,
'Cause you know it don't matter anyway;
Say money, but it won't get you too far,
Get you too far...

- "Rich Girl" Hall & Oates, 1977

Not long after the trip into Craigtyre, Remus told Marlene everything. About Lily and James, how they'd taken the news and the wonderful way they'd accepted it without question. A part of him had been almost afraid to tell her; he'd wrapped up his story with the assurance that there was no need for her to do the same, and that neither he nor Sirius had told them anything about her and Nicole.

Afterwards Marlene was quiet for a long time. Remus sat quietly too, waiting for her to process it all, and eventually he felt the gentle nudge of Marlene's pinky finger against his own.

“Tell me again?” She asked, her voice barely a whisper. “Tell me again what they said?”

He did.

* * *

Friday 10th February 1978

Sometimes it was easy for Remus to believe they could be a real band someday.

“ ‘She’s soft as butter, call me a nutter’?” Sirius glanced up from the notebook with an incredulous look. “Really, mate?”

James nodded enthusiastically. “It’s a metaphor.”

And sometimes... less easy.

It was near the end of their music period, final class of the day, and amidst the clamour of twenty other students all practising, the four Marauders had sequestered themselves in their usual spot near the back of the room, all surrounding Peter’s drum kit. Sirius had taken James’ notebook and was flipping through it, looking for potential material, though so far little had been found. Sufficiently amused, Peter reached over and took the notebook, eyes scanning the page as he laughed.

“You call her ‘sweet as sugar’ in the next verse. What, are you baking a cake?”

“I said it’s a metaphor!” James snapped.

“For what?”

“Her voice, duh!”

“And the butter?” Sirius asked. “What’s that supposed to signify?”

“Her… body! You know, like butter-soft skin! Lily’s got great skin.”

“Yeah, so great she’d likely skin you alive the moment you read it to her.”

James snatched his notebook back from Peter and reached over to smack Sirius over the head with it. “I’m bloody trying my best here. Valentine’s is next week and Moony's been no help at all.”

“I refuse to be the Pete Townshend of Marauders,” Remus said staunchly, sitting a few seats away and flicking lazily at his bass.

“Do either of you know what he’s saying?” James snarked. “I never have any idea what he’s saying.”

“He means he’s not gonna write all the songs, which he doesn’t. Check this.” Sirius tossed a paper ball at Remus’ head, which he caught out of the air and unfolded, shooting Sirius a coltish smile before glancing down at the page.

Pretty darling, spiteful darling,
You’re cutting my cords, pulling my strings;
Pretty honey, spiteful honey,
You’re twisting my words, stealing my rings;

Why won’t you love me?
Why can’t you be true?
Spiteful darling, I swore I’d come through.

“Any good?” Sirius asked.

“Maybe. Put a few chords to it and we’ll see.”

“Smug prat.” Smirking, Sirius turned away with a pencil already in hand. Remus couldn’t help but stare after him, temporarily enthralled by the faint bruise he could see forming just behind his ear, but then Peter was twirling his drumsticks again and the sharp crash of the cymbal pulled him back to earth.

“Okay guys, rubbish songs away. Do me a favour and just give this a listen.” Without any further prompting, Peter swiftly launched into a rather glorious drum fill, one that left them all bobbing their heads along with the rhythm. It was good—swift and sharp and able to catch anyone by the ear with little effort. By the time he’d finished, half the class had stopped to listen and there were several whoops from the other percussionists.

“Blimey, sounds great, Pete!” James cried. “Did you really write that all on your own?”

Peter spun his drumsticks, looking almost miffed. “Obviously. I can play my own instrument, you know. Have you even finished that song translation for class yet? It’s already overdue.”

“No, but that's hardly my fault."

"Who's fault is it then?"

James scowled and crossed his arms over his guitar. "I can hear the bloody notes just fine, alright? It’s the 'writing them down' part that can suck a nob.”

“Well, I’ll do it for you if you give me that song,” Peter offered. “I need something to give Moira for Valentine’s that isn’t another painting and I still can’t write lyrics for shit.”

James looked down at his metaphorical cake song and nodded. “Fucking deal, mate.”

“Yeah, remind me never to date either of you,” Sirius said, just as Sheila took her spot up at the front of the classroom, wrapping her conductor’s baton against the podium to get everyone’s attention.

“Alright, let’s get going,” she trilled. “That was more than enough practice time I think, and I’d like to get through one good rendition of ‘Sweet Caroline’ before we go!”

There was a chorus of groans.

“Oh, c’mon now! It’s a classic!”

“I hate that song," Sirius grumbled under his breath. "Neil Diamond can suck my nob."

More rapping from the baton.

“Alright, song books open! ‘Sweet Caroline’ from the top! Starting with clarinets. And a one, and a two—” Suddenly a knock came on the classroom door and Sheila dropped her arms. “Ah, alright… Everyone practise your C major scale while I get this!”

As their teacher went to the door and the class erupted back into its dull racket, Remus began fretting absent-mindedly across his E string while Sirius scooted his chair closer. “Hey Moony, Sheila’s fit enough for her age, right? Think she's got any Valentine’s plans? ”

“How would I know?”

“You’ve got eyes.”

“I mean how would I know if she has plans, idiot.”

“ ‘Cause. She likes you best.”

No way, Remus thought to himself. In fact he was almost positive she couldn't have, at least not after the way they’d left things since January. Often he went back and forth over the things he'd said to her and whether she deserved them or not; some days they felt too harsh. She'd obviously wanted to tell him something important, but if it was anything like 'Tad was a quick wit too' then Remus didn't care to hear it.

"She doesn't like me best."

“Sure she does,” Sirius sang, unaware of Remus’ internal turmoil. “She was your mum's best friend, she knew your dad, and now she's your teacher! That's more than just a coincidence, it's like you’ve got this crazy cosmic connection or something. I bet if you asked her out for Valentine's she’d say yes.”

“She’s our teacher. And she’s married.”

“Oh, well she’d just be being polite, of course.”

Remus shot his boyfriend a look. “So I should leave you alone on Valentine’s then?”

“Pfft, you think I’d get stuck alone on the most romantic holiday of the year? As if.”

“Now who’s being the smug prat? You just want me to get jealous so that I'll take you out myself."

"Maybe." Sirius wiggled his shoulders with a contented hum. “Does this mean we’re doing something for Valentine’s?”

“No.”

“Why not?”

“Because it’s a corporate holiday designed for capitalist gain. And I hate it.”

“You hate everything.”

“Correct.”

“Even me.”

“Depends on the day, really.”

“Oi.” Offended, Sirius reached over and began messing with the Fender’s keys, which Remus had just finished tuning. Horrified, he punched Sirius in the arm for it, who held his shoulder with a pained smile. “Hey, you hear from Tomny lately?”

The question caught Remus off guard. He’d been trying hard not to think too hard about Tomny; there’d been no news since he’d said he was going up to Immingham for work and fretting over it helped no one.

“No,” he answered, “but it’s a long job. He said he'd be busy.”

“Sad you'll be missing him for Easter? 'Course, it's not like I'd let you run off without me again."

“For the thousandth time, you don’t need to be jealous of Tomny.”

“Are you kidding me? He’s like if the local drug-dealer and Robert Redford had a baby. And he’s always staring at you with those eyes.”

“What eyes?”

“ ‘Fuck me’ eyes.”

“Okay, why don’t you fuck off?” Remus spluttered, suddenly desperate to change the subject. “What about you? Have you heard from Regulus at all?”

“Not really,” Sirius dismissed. “The guy I talk to in the kitchen—Ginger—he said there’s been a lot of people coming and going, probably private tutors. If I had to guess it’s their way of keeping him away from others—away from me. They’re probably gonna force him to finish school at home.”

“Shit.”

Sirius nodded. “I’ll keep calling though. At least until I get the cheeky turd to send a postcard with my name on it.”

Remus smiled. It was good to hear Sirius dedicated to helping Regulus, even if it was mostly just born of guilt. He opened his mouth to say something, but before he could, Sheila was back at the front of the room, a pair of girls standing next to her. Remus knew them both; they were prefects, sixth form girls named Marie and Eugenia.

“It seems we have an announcement,” Sheila called. “Go ahead, Marie.”

Marie faced the class, her blonde ponytail bobbing behind her. “As you all know," she started, "it’s Valentine’s Day next week, and as co-heads of the dance club we’re happy to report that Hawkings is hosting a school dance!”

"And we expect everyone to be there!" Eugenia added enthusiastically.

A surprised murmur immediately broke out around the room. As head of the college, Professor McGonagall was notorious for her dislike of everything frivolous and disco-related. She maintained the open opinion that such events were only a thinly-veiled excuse for poor behaviour, and therefore hadn’t allowed for one to be held in years.

“It’s a Sadie Hawkins dance,” Marie continued. "Apparently they're very popular in America, and we just thought, Hawkings—Hawkins. It's cute."

"It's swell!" Eugenia added again.

Between the two of them, the girls unfurled a large poster for everyone to see. Sadie has come to Hawkings! It read; Ladies choice! Gather your beau and meet us in the Great Hall on Tuesday February 14th. Doors at 6PM.

“Who’s ‘Sadie Hawkins’?” One of the trombones asked.

“It just means girls ask guys,” Marie explained. “But it’s a chance to let our hair down. School spirit and all that! There’ll be music—food too. The dress code is black tie. That means suits and ties for the boys, and formal gowns for girls."

"And remember you need a date to get in!" Eugenia—again. "Can't get in without one."

“But you just said girls have to ask the guys!” Another—a trumpet, whined.

“Well yeah, duh. A girl’s gotta ask you first.”

There was some giggling—mostly from the girls in the strings section—and Remus looked around to see several of his male classmates looking severely discouraged. Then Sirius raised his hand, a rarity for him. Marie jumped on it immediately, shushing the rest of the class rather violently as he pointed her painted finger at him.

"Yes, Sirius?"

“What sort of music are you playing?”

“Dancing music, obviously," she giggled. "Dorset House has volunteered to come up with the playlist. But you can let us know if you have any suggestions!”

“Oh yeah, I have a few suggestions. How about some Black Sabbath?”

Marie's face fell. “Uhm, it’s a Valentine’s dance. The music should probably be more... romantic.”

“Ozzy is very romantic,” James bolstered, sniggering along with his best friend.

“Yeah," Sirius agreed, "you can totally bump and grind to ‘Sabbath Bloody Sabbath’.”

To illustrate their point, both James and Sirius began to wiggle in their seats, singing together; “ ‘Sabbath bloody Sabbath—nothing more to do! Living just for dying—DYING JUST FOR YOU!’ ”

None of the girls looked all that impressed, but the rest of the boys showed their support by cheering loud enough that Sheila had to rap her baton on the conductor's podium again.

"Alright, that's enough! Thank you, Mr. Black."

Grinning, Sirius pushed his hair up out of his eyes. “See, Marie? 'S very romantic!”

Marie's smile could've curdled milk, but Remus was pleased. Perhaps this meant that one less girl would be looking to ask his boyfriend to waltz with them.

Across the room, another girl raised her hand and waited patiently to be picked.

“Will this be a chaperoned dance?” She asked, once Marie had beckoned her on.

“Mhm! Yes.”

Another chorus of groans, and Sheila had to bang one of the class gongs just to get them to shut up this time.

“I’m sure that Professor McGonagall wouldn’t have approved the dance if it weren’t being monitored, so whatever nonsense you were already planning inside those little brains of yours—you can forget it."

Remus couldn't be sure, but he suspected she was talking straight to the marauders with that last bit.

“Several of the teachers have already agreed to chaperone,” Marie said. “And us prefects will be there too.”

“Guess you do have Valentine’s plans after all, Moons,” Sirius said snidely, while Remus dropped his head back with a moan.

“Well, there then. Sounds like fun. Is that all? Thank you, girls.” Sheila clapped her hands together just as the bell went and everyone cheered—no ‘Sweet Caroline’.

“Alright, you got off easy today! But I want all overdue work in my office box by Sunday night! Have a wonderful weekend!”

James leapt up from his seat with equal vigour. “Looks like you’ve got homework due, Pete. Remember our deal!” He cackled, as Peter threw a drumstick at him.

While the rest of the class went about its usual scuffling, stacking chairs and returning instruments, Remus bent over to fit the Fender back into his case. As he did, someone delivered a stinging smack to his behind, making him practically drop the thing as he shot upright.

“C’mon Moons, get a leg on, I’m starving and it’s lamb for dinner,” Sirius complained, waiting for him with his guitar case in one hand and a bored look on his face. He caught Remus’ expression and raised a brow. “What’s that look for?”

“What do you think? How 'bout you don’t smack me on the arse for starters!”

“Aw, don’t get your pants in a twist, guys do it to each other all the time on the field.”

Remus practically sputtered; “In case you haven’t noticed, Sirius, we're in a music classroom."

"Alright, I won't do it again, ya tart. No one was watching anyway."

"Almost no one," James cut-in, appearing at their side with his guitar. Sirius smirked at him.

"Peeping Tom."

They slugged their way back to the dining hall together, convening at their usual table with dinner in hand. Already a huge banner had been hung on the far wall advertising the dance, and a couple of Dorset girls had set up a table in the corner underneath to hand out flyers and collect song requests for their playlist. It was obvious they'd worked hard on them; several of the heart-strewn flyers had made it onto their table, each featuring a cheesy love poem.

"They really had to reach deep for these," Sirius said, reading one over. "Maybe you should've helped them out, Moons. Bet you would've been ace at it."

"Sod off. You read one since you're so desperate."

Sirius acquiesced, because of course he did, and promptly cleared his throat. " 'Knock, knock'."

James answered, over a mouthful of food. " 'oo's there?"

"Peas."

" 'ees, 'oo?"

" 'Will you peas be my valentine'?"

James swallowed, then grimaced. "Blimey, not even Professor Binns would fall for that one."

"Darn." Sirius began folding the flier up into a paper aeroplane, which when thrown, soared all the way across the room to land in one of the bowls of potato salad along the lunch line.

"I don't think it will be all bad actually," Lottie said, bringing the conversation back around to the dance. "I heard they're gonna serve alcohol."

"It's mulled cider," Marlene dismissed. "They serve it at the Three Broomsticks. You'd be lucky to drink a dozen cups and feel even slightly tipsy."

“I’ll bet we could spike it,” Sirius suggested. "Then it'd be a real party. Not just some namby 'Sadie Porkins' ball or whatever."

"It's Sadie Hawkins," Lily corrected. "Like a Spinsters' Ball, though I think this name is kinder. I read about them once in one of my grandma's old 'Picture Post' magazines. Some American colleges even have a whole day dedicated to it."

“I still don’t understand though,” Peter sighed. "We aren't allowed to ask you girls at all? Why?"

“Because. It reverses gender roles and gives women a chance to make the first move without being ‘socially taboo’."

“But what’s so taboo about a girl asking a guy to a dance?” Asked James.

Lily glanced at Marlene, and together they rolled their eyes. Remus could see it now—men.

While James looked at Peter, eyebrows knit together in concern, Sirius leaned over and elbowed him suggestively. “What's 'a matter, lads? Afraid your own girlfriends won’t ask you to the dance?”

“Shove off,” James grumbled, before swinging his head toward Lily, who smiled and poked him in the nose with the end of her fork.

“Well, I also think it’s a perfectly stupid idea,” Mary announced.

“I agree!” Marlene cried. "You know it started as a joke against women, right? The girls would chase the men and if she caught him and dragged him across the finish line he'd have to legally marry her."

“Not that," Mary scoffed. "I just think it's stupid to fix something that isn't broken. I mean, what’s so wrong about wanting a bloke to get down on one knee and beg for a scrap of your attention for one day?”

Marlene immediately pressed her fingers to her forehead. “Lord have mercy.”

“A bit disgruntled because this means less suitors will be strolling up to your door, Macdonald?” Sirius smirked.

“They don’t stroll, they run, Sirius Black.” Mary reached up and twirled a dark curl around one finger. “And I'm in a right state. I don’t even know who I'd ask! ... Normally I take stock after the fact, and even then, last year I was horribly double-booked."

"You could ask one of us," Sirius suggested.

"Hm... Alright. Remus, are you free on the fourteenth?"

Remus sucked his tea back sharply, leaving him coughing so violently that Lily had to smack him on the back until he was done. "Me?"

"Why not you? You're the only single bloke here I haven't already snogged."

"Er—Sorry, Mary... can't."

Mary clicked her tongue sourly but paused when she noticed Marlene had begun to quietly laugh.

"What are you sniggering about?"

"Nothing. Not you—I'm just thinking about how funny it's gonna be when his other invitations start rolling in."

She gestured to Remus with her spoon, and everyone turned on him. James and Lily both understood the joke immediately and had to hide their smiles, but Remus had yet to think so far ahead. Already he had a prefectural obligation to show up, but if a girl appeared under the influence of Sadie Hawkins herself and asked him to go, then he'd have to make up another excuse. Bugger. The horror must've shown on his face, as the next moment all of his friends were laughing, save Peter.

"I don't get it, why's it such a big deal if someone asks Moony?" Peter questioned.

"It's a dance, Wormtail," Sirius said. "That means everyone would have to bear witness to a dancing Moony. Can't think of anything more terrifying, to be honest."

Remus hadn't even the capacity to be offended. It was true.

"What about you then, Black? Surely you're eager to show off," Mary sneered. "Or can you not dance either?"

"Of course I can dance! I was doing the waltz before I could walk. Doesn't mean I'm gonna go, though. Having McGonagall breathe down the back of my neck while I sip on Aperol Spritz isn't my idea of a good time. Nah, I think I'll leave the awkward swaying and frigid hand-holding to the rest of you."

"I'm with Sirius," Marlene said.

Now it was Mary's turn to groan. "C'mon, Marls, don't let Black's poor attitude get to you. I know you've always been pretty 'anti-Valentine', but really, you could ask out whoever you wanted! Though if I were you, I'd start with the tallest blokes and work my way down from there. They'd be stupid to say no."

"Well thanks for that," Marlene snapped suddenly. "Glad to know I'm not entirely hopeless, but I'm still not gonna go."

"Alright, calm down. It was only a joke," Mary said staunchly; "I know, how about I help you pick one out? I heard Harvey Craft's on the lookout. He's tall, been to the library once or twice. I'm sure he'd make a fine date. Or there's always Warner Caldwell. He's a bit naff, but that just means he won't be intimidated when you start leading during the slow dances."

Marlene slammed her cup down on the table.

"You are so dense sometimes! I said I'm not going and I bloody meant it, now leave me alone!"

The table fell deadly quiet and Remus swallowed a sour taste in his mouth. He knew exactly what was going on, but whether by Marlene's will or her own, Mary was entirely ignorant. Before she could get another word out, Marlene picked up her school bag and lunch tray and stalked off. Mary's mouth fell open, and after she'd watched as Marlene threw down her empty tray and fled through the back doors, she whirled on the rest of them.

"Oh my god. Can you guys believe her?"

Yes, actually, Remus thought.

They finished their meal in relative silence, with no one saying anything as Mary interjected with various expletives describing Marlene's so-called 'erratic behaviour'. There was no time to talk privately, but Remus felt Sirius nudge him with his knee beneath the table, and he slipped a hand into his lap so they could lock their fingers together in sad, knowing solidarity. The group's mood did not improve as they all cleared their trays and headed back to the dorms for the night. After walking the girls back to Rowena, they turned for Godric and found Marlene waiting for them, tucked up against the stone steps despite the cold.

“Remus.” Was all she said.

Sirius squeezed his hand once more before following James and Peter inside, and Remus watched him go, almost wishing he’d stay. He’d never really considered himself the same sort of wordsmith Sirius was, but Marlene had asked for him, and so he’d endure.

“Shall we go inside?” He suggested. “The common room's warmer than out here”

Marlene wrapped her arms around herself, looking like she might cry, and shook her head.

“Let’s go to our spot then,” Remus said, and he offered his hand.

Little had changed around the window seat from the year before. He’d had to pop the lock on the Flamel Block’s front door since it was after dinner, but it paid off. Paint was still peeling off the sides of the window frames and the gardens they overlooked were still cushioned in frost. Their legs had gotten a bit longer, but not so much that they couldn't both fit. Remus was pleased they'd come; Marlene was already calming down. She'd shrugged off her coat and laid it across her lap like a blanket, using his shoulder as a pillow.

“You should know that Nicole and I broke up."

Remus sighed, touching his cheek to the top of her head. "I'm sorry, Marls."

“Yeah... It feels different from when you and I broke up, though I guess that should be obvious. It’s just… How did you handle it, Remus —when you and Sirius broke up over Christmas?”

“Badly, obviously.”

She smiled a bit, before sniffling. They’d left the lights off under the guise of not wanting Filch to come sniffing around, but also in case she just needed a cry.

“It just sucks, you know.”

“Yeah, I know.”

“And Mary—god. She just doesn’t get it.”

“You mean you’ve told her?”

“No." Marlene wiped beneath her eyes. "I just thought she would’ve figured it out by now.”

He knew she was hurting. He’d hurt like that too. Even more so when he was at his most irrational, before he and Sirius had figured out how to properly communicate. Hell... maybe they still didn't know how. But what Marlene needed was clarity, not doom and gloom.

“Mary’s not a mind-reader, Cherry. She’s like Sirius."

"Oh, you would know all about that, wouldn't you. Go on then."

He forgave the quip. "She's brash, and never thinks before speaking. An insufferable arse, most days. But they're wonderful too. They've got this gravity you can’t avoid no matter how hard you try. It's like you just get sucked in and when you’re in it, you’re still somehow thankful. Thankful that out of everybody they’ve chosen you... I just know how it feels to love that feeling, is all. I get greedy too.”

“Yeah, sure. You're greedy… But at least Sirius loves you back.”

It was like the click of his lock pick. A door falling open.

“Marlene, do you—”

“I used to,” she said very quickly. “I’m not stupid enough to think it could happen now. Mary's too complicated for me, and too simple. I gave up on her ages ago, before I really even knew about myself. And I love Nicole, or… But we broke up... I won’t give up my friends, no matter how insufferable.”

“Nicole asked you to give up Mary?”

“No, but we were always fighting about it. She said that the only way we could fix it was by coming out, and I—I couldn't... Not yet, anyway. Not to her... so she broke it off. It's not like I blame her, and I know I lied to you about it. Sorry..."

"Don't be sorry. I get it."

She wiped her face. "Thanks... Quite the timing though, right before this shit holiday…”

“Well, if you're that desperate for a date to the horribly sexist dance, I could be persuaded. No promises that I won't trod all over your toes though. I'm a bit of a beast on the dance floor."

Marlene chuckled sadly.

"Oh Remus, if only you had a vagina."

The next morning things between the girls were still stilted. Mary sat on one end of the breakfast table and Marlene on the other, leaving the rest of them with no choice but to ignore the sour mood. News of the dance had spread like wildfire, and with Valentine's just around the corner, it seemed as though everyone was on the hunt. Remus found himself back to dodging Audriana and her girlfriends at every turn, and he wasn't the only one. In the time it took for them to sit down at the breakfast table and finish their meal, several girls had come up to Sirius to ask for a moment of his time. He followed each of them away, and each time returned with a small smirk on his face meant only for Remus.

"How many is that now?" Peter asked, as a twelfth year girl returned to her table looking particularly solemn.

"Nine, since this morning."

James nudged Remus. "And you?"

"Eleven."

"Well, Padfoot. Looks like you've officially lost out on the title of Godric's hottest piece of ass."

As James and Peter sniggered, Sirius ripped off a piece of toast with his teeth.

"We'll see."

Between lessons, Remus was accosted twice more. Once when he stepped out on an errand for Professor Binns, and again on his way to the toilet. He felt worse about the second girl, who he'd called Cheryl by mistake when he was declining the offer (her name was Barbra). After that Marie of all people turned up, and Remus knew he was well and truly in for it.

"Sorry you got signed up for it and all, since you're a prefect, but since we're both going I thought it might be nice to go together?"

He said no, but at least he got her name right this time.

After Marie, Remus thought it might be safer to spend his final block of the day hiding out in the library. At least if Audriana and her horde turned up there he'd be able to hide out beneath Ms. Pince's desk. He'd take detention in a heartbeat if it meant not having to explain just what a horrible date he'd make to yet another hopeful dance partner. He'd made it through almost the entire block before the next interruption came, but luckily this time it wasn't anyone he felt the need to say no to.

"Hey, Sam. Feel like taking a load off?"

The tenth year scuttled forward, eagerly taking the seat across from Remus. "I thought you'd be here, Remus," he said. "N-Not that I'm following you, I just remembered you might have a spare... now... Er —I came to study too, in fact! Whatchu working on?"

Remus gestured to his books. "Got a History essay due. You?"

Sam eagerly turned his book over. The Iliad.

"It's my second time reading it! I just think the whole war with the Trojans is so cool, don't you?"

"Yeah, it's cool."

"It was a bit hard to get through the first time to be honest, but I think I have a better grasp now. I just love Achilles' bits. He must've really cared for Patroclus, I wish I had a friend who'd fight a god for me."

Remus leaned his chin on his hand, smiling just a little. "That right..."

"Hey, have you heard about the dance that's being planned? Ah, what am I saying... 'course you heard, you're a prefect! Are... uhm, you going?"

"Apparently I have to," Remus said. "All of the prefects are supposed to be chaperoning, but honestly I'm gonna see if I can't get out of it. Pain in the arse, really. I'm not much of a dancer."

Sam shut his mouth very quickly and nodded. "Right. Total pain. I mean who'd want to dance with a girl anyway?" He laughed, and then seemed to realise what he'd said. "Or go! I meant, go to a dance... heh..."

"Bet you'd be better than me. I'm likely to fall off my own shoes."

"I'd probably twist an ankle," Sam said.

"Why stop there? Give new meaning to break a leg! Trip over a stereo cable, knock over a couple drink tables while you're at it."

Sam laughed, and then bit his lip nervously. "Hey, Remus, you wouldn't happen to have a cigarette, would you?"

"What do you want with a cigarette?"

"Oh. Just thought I'd try it."

Remus felt for his pocket, and found his pack right where it was supposed to be. It would be easy to give him one, plenty of kids who weren't old enough to go down to the village themselves came around to ask, and it wasn't like Sam wouldn't be good for it, but somehow he didn't strike Remus as the type.

"Uh... Sorry, pal. Don't have any on me."

Sam nodded, understanding, and glanced back down at his book. He began flipping through, and Remus suddenly felt guilty.

"You know, in my opinion the 'Iliad' leaves off right at the best part. Have you read the 'Odyssey'?"

Sam looked up. "No."

"Oh, geez! You gotta read the 'Odyssey'. Odysseus is like the coolest, and it's basic Classics stuff. Got any favourite parts in there though?"

It was enough. Eagerly, Sam opened his book and began scanning every page until he found something suitable enough to ramble on about. Remus didn't mind; he let the kid chatter on, challenging his favourite excerpts from the epic whenever it suited. They were in a secluded enough spot amongst the stacks so that they wouldn't be bothering anyone, but that did not mean that others might not bother them.

While Sam was recounting the fight between Achilles and the sea god Neptune, a girl came around the corner behind him, stopping dead only when she saw that they were together. Remus, in all his humility, assumed she was there for him and cringed when he realised how young she looked, but then as the girl peeked back around the bookshelf to stare, he finally caught on.

"Sammy, I think you have an admirer."

Sam's face turned beet red, and he looked up with an open mouth. "Oh no! You don't have to—"

Remus pointed; "Don't look now..."

Even more confused, Sam turned around in his library chair, and Remus saw his tiny shoulders deflate.

"Oh. Hi, Fiona..."

"Hi, Sam." The girl waved shyly, then in a small voice; "Do you think I could talk to you for a moment?"

He went, though Remus could tell he was reluctant. Silently, he cheered him on. Happens to the best of us, pal.

The bell rang suddenly, and Remus checked his watch—cursing.

"Sorry I'm late!" He exclaimed, bursting into their dorm room in the same breath.

"Meh, I'm late too," Sirius answered, busy flitting around their bedroom. He was shirtless and towelling off his damp hair as he stuffed bits of sheet music and note paper into his guitar case. James and Peter were nowhere in sight, having already gone ahead to the music room where they'd planned a band practice, and so Remus sat down on James' bed to wait.

"It's because you're so approachable," Sirius said, as he jumped to tug on his jeans. Remus had only been half listening, and looked up from his song book when he spoke.

"Huh?"

"The girls!" Sirius went on. "They think you'll just bend over backward for them, and that's why they're interested. Mary says guys don't get points for being nice, but I think that's rubbish. They give you points just for saying hello."

"Oh, you're still hung up on this then?"

"It's a matter of pride! Potter'll never let me hear the end of it if you win."

“Yeah, yeah—can we get going already? Filch is gonna show up and kick us out of the music room before we even get done our warm-up."

"All I'm saying is, you're not the only one that's been dodging proposals left and right."

"Oh really?" Remus drawled, trying hard not to notice his boyfriend's blatant nakedness. It didn't work, especially when Sirius smirked and pushed back his still-damp hair with a single hand, leaving his jeans unzippered down the front.

"Mm-hm."

"Who is it this time then, stud?"

Sirius lifted his chin. "Allison and Avery. Allison after breakfast, Avery after lunch. Then again at the same time."

"Allison and Avery?" Remus echoed. "Aren't they sisters?"

"Twins actually. But you don't have to worry. I said no both times, of course."

"Oh, of course."

Sirius tossed his towel over one shoulder, looking even more smug. "Imagine it, Moony—twin sisters. I was this close to the fantasy that so many guys dream of!"

"Gay guys?"

"You know me, I'll try anything once. Twice, if it's twins."

"You're so gross."

Remus didn't miss the obvious glint in Sirius' eye. He had his shirt in his hands, but he wasn't putting it on, which meant he knew exactly what he was doing. Remus couldn't help it; his eyes found the burn scars on his shoulder, then dipped toward that faint trail of dark hair that led south from his belly button. Just like that he felt his resolve snap like the plucked strings of a guitar. Just snap, snap, snap!

He looked at the clock—they were late. Or rather, they were already late. Can't be later than late. Time was relative anyway.

"You alright there, Moony?" Sirius drawled, sliding one hand along his own collarbone. "Look a bit... lost."

Damn you.

In a single motion, Remus had pressed up from the bed and closed the only space between them. When they met, they met fiercely, leaving only a dull thud as Sirius' back met the corner post of his bed and his mouth found Remus. It felt electric, like the first time but better. Now Remus knew every bit of him—all the places he could touch that would take him apart, and all of the kisses he could give to put him back together again. Sirius' hands were like velvet, sliding up into the soft hair at the back of Remus' neck as his mouth opened automatically, curving in to fit like a key in a lock. The towel slipped from his pale shoulder as Remus grazed his fingers along every tender curve and ridge. He only stopped when they met his throat, fingers cupping just beneath his jaw in the way he knew Sirius liked. It earned him a throaty whisper, like a purr;

"Je te veux. Embrasse-moi fort."

"You know I don't speak French," Remus murmured back, already grazing his teeth along the shell of Sirius' ear.

"Oh, I think you do."

Sirius knotted his fingers in his hair then, and yanked Remus' head back with one sharp tug—hard enough to leave him hissing from between his teeth.

"Let's sound it out together," he grinned. "Embrasse-moi… Come now, let me hear you say it."

Because this Sirius was doing something to him, and he wanted to prolong it for another few vicious moments, Remus shook his head in stubborn refusal.

"Cheeky!" Sirius laughed, yanking his head back again and making Remus grunt. "Let me hear you say it, Moony. Embrasse-moi!"

"Ngh... 'brasse... moi…"

"Mm-hm... Fort."

"Fort."

"There's a good boy. Knew you could do it. Now all together—'Je te veux. Embrasse-moi fort'."

“Alright, I’ll kiss you, Padfoot,” Remus answered snidely. "No need to beg.”

Sirius’ mouth dropped open, but closed again when Remus’ hold tightened around his throat. “You knew?” He nearly-rasped.

“May have looked some of it up in the library. Not my fault you're so chatty in bed."

Sirius’ eyes flashed, even more devilish than before. “Clever, you."

Eager, Remus leaned forward and Sirius finally released the tight hold he had on his hair. They kissed, deeply, clinging to one another with greedy hands. One step at a time, Remus walked him backward until Sirius’ calves were brushing the edge of his bed. He was just about to tip him over onto it when suddenly the familiar clicking of a lock sounded and the door to their bedroom fell open. Remus only had half a second to jump backwards before Peter was strolling inside, looking more than a little irked.

“Thought I’d find you two here!” He lashed at them. “You’re late. What were you doing?”

Both of them fumbled with a few ‘ers’ and ‘uhms’, before Sirius finally collected himself enough to answer. “Had an eyelash in my eye,” he murmured, quickly scooping his towel up from the floor. “Moony was helping me get it.”

Peter eyed them suspiciously, before shaking his head and making his way into the room. “Whatever. Came back ‘cause I forgot one of my sticks. Did you shower already?”

Sirius nodded, looking more than a little embarrassed. It didn’t help that he had to hold the towel over his crotch to hide the tent in his trousers. If Peter had showed up even ten seconds later he certainly would've gotten the eyeful of his life.

“Hurry up then,” Peter continued, already busy searching around his corner of the room for the stray drumstick. “We’re not gonna wait all night for you to beautify yourself, Black. James already went over to the dining hall just to look for you two gits.”

“Sorry Pete,” Remus cut-in, “got caught-up chatting.”

“Must’a been real important to miss practice for—AH-HA! Found you, ya little bastard.” Victorious, Peter pulled back from beneath his bed with a drumstick in hand, stopping long enough to rattle a short beat off the floor. “So, did the two of you decide who you're taking to the dance?"

“Not gonna go,” Remus answered.

“Neither of you?"

"Wouldn't be fair," Sirius mused. "Say yes to one girl and leave a million more hearts shattered."

Peter rolled his eyes. “Typical. You two should just take each other."

Sirius' face lit up, while Remus grimaced.

“What a fine idea, Wormy!" He stood and took Remus by the hands, spinning them around awkwardly while Peter watched from the corner. "Whaddya say, Moons? You, me, some disco-dancing and enough booze to drown a swimming team!”

“C’mon Black,” Peter interjected, “even you have your limits. Stop teasing Moony and put a bloody shirt on so we can get going.”

Sirius whirled around. “And if I’m not teasing him? It’s just a dance. Do you have a problem with two blokes going stag, Wormtail?”

Peter squinted at them, and Remus could practically see the gears turning in his head. This was wrong—it wasn’t going at all like how it’d been with Marlene or Lily or James. He could see that waterfall in the distance, getting closer with every passing second. They couldn’t do it like this, Sirius would just have to forgive him.

“He’s joking, Pete,” Remus said, stepping between the two of them. “Steam got to his head. I’ll make sure he gets dressed, so how ‘bout we meet you in the music room? You can tell James we’re on our way.”

The look of scrutiny didn't fade, but Remus could tell Peter wasn't about to stop and wonder. Finally he wiped his face, nose still running from the evening cold, and turned for the door. "You're so weird," he muttered, slipping out.

Remus stared at the shut door, already dreading what was coming next. He could feel it.

"Weird..." Sirius murmured. "He called me weird."

"He didn't mean it like that," Remus sighed, turning around. "But you have to admit, you were acting off. What was he supposed to think?"

Sirius' lips pressed into a thin line. "Whatever, let's just go before Potter comes looking and finds us with our pants 'round our ankles."

Remus wanted to make a joke, but thought better of it when he saw the way Sirius snatched his shirt up from the floor. By the time he was dressed and the two of them were actually making their way across campus, the sun had long gone from the sky and only a few people were left dotting the pavement.

“But he has to suspect something now! What do you think?” Sirius asked as they stepped off the trolley outside the Bellchant building. He'd been mostly quiet on the way over, but Remus could tell the run-in with Peter was still eating at him.

"Do I think Pete calling us weird automatically means that he knows we're dating? No."

"Maybe not dating, but he has to know something. Not even Wormy’s that thick.”

“Peter’s not thick,” Remus reasoned. “He’s just a bit… naive.”

“You think that sounds nicer but it doesn’t.”

Remus smiled meekly, a bit his lip. “So… just to be clear, you don’t want to go to the dance?”

Sirius looked up at him. “Of course not. Do you?”

"No, obviously not. But I just thought it might be fun for you. At least if you went with a girl you'd get to show off for a night.”

Sirius huffed in disbelief. "Wow. You have no faith in me at all, do you?"

"No, that's not what I—"

"Listen up, Moony!" Sirius snapped. "I don’t date more than one person at a time, and I don’t cheat.”

“I wasn’t talking about actually dating someone else, you nob. I just meant find someone to go to the dance with—ask Mary if you bloody want to. And I don't think I have to worry much about you cheating either, what with the way you can't keep your hands to yourself for more than five minutes.”

“Hold on.” Sirius cut across the pavement, getting in front of Remus and drawing him to a sudden halt. “You think I can’t keep my hands to myself?”

“Is that a trick question?"

"Just answer it!"

"Why? It's not like it's a competition."

Sirius laughed. "You smug bastard. You think I like you more than you like me?”

Yes—wait, no. Not possible. But you don’t need to know that.

“Like I said, it’s not a competition.”

“You do!” Sirius straightened up, nearly fumbling his guitar case. “Great git—calling me a slag. You think I can't go more than five minutes without throwing myself at you, don't you?!”

Remus went to pass, nudging Sirius in the shoulder as he did. "You said it, not me."

“There! Proof!” Sirius cried, pushing his hand away. “You can’t stop touching me either. You’re just as desperate for my sweet, sweet caress as I am for yours.”

“If that’s what fills your bucket, then fine. I like touching my boyfriend. Someone alert the media.”

They'd reached the front door of the building now, yellow lights buzzing overhead. Remus was just reaching for the door handle when Sirius' arm shot out, slamming it shut again and preventing him from going inside.

"Bet I could go longer without touching you."

"Huh?!"

Sirius grinned at him, all teeth.

"I bet that you can't go as long as I can without touching each other. No kissing, no hand-holding—not so much as a friendly pat."

"You're being stupid, get out of the way."

"I'll move when you admit you're just as needy as I am."

"Oh I'm needy?" Remus rolled his eyes. "Move, Padfoot."

"You're just afraid I'm right," Sirius goaded. "You probably wouldn't even make it to the end of the weekend. In fact, I'll bet you cave at the first inconvenience! Just a total breakdown, loaded with whining. Probably sound something like, 'Oh Sirius, please hold me, I'm feeling so weak'!"

"You're an idiot. And I don't sound like that."

"You do, and I'm also right."

"No. I'm right."

"Prove it! Take the bet."

It was so stupid, but Sirius had always ignited that competitive part of him, and this was a matter of the heart. Remus couldn't help but rise to the bait.

"Does that mean, like, 'sexual touching' or like any old brush on the shoulder?"

"Why bother clarifying?" Sirius taunted. "Afraid you'll lose?"

"No," Remus answered haughtily. "In fact I think I'll win—I know I'll win. You are a bit of a slag, Padfoot."

"Better than being all fur coat and no knickers, Moony. Now take the bloody bet."

"Fine, but what's the winner get when this is all over?"

"An entire day of arse-kissing."

"Literal arse-kissing?"

Sirius shrugged. "If I feel like it. Think I'll save the details of my win as a surprise."

"Oh, so that's how it's gonna be, huh?" Remus pressed his tongue to the inside of his cheek, before nodding with a simple smile. "Alright then. Shall we shake on it?"

He held out his hand and Sirius instinctively reached forward to take it before snatching his arm back upon realisation.

“Oooh, nice try. You’re good, but not that good.”

“Guess we’ll find out.” Remus smiled, before a thought occurred to him; “We’re not fighting, right?”

“Oh no, not at all. S’just a friendly bet.”

“Right." He opened the front door. "After you, Padfoot.”

“Why thank you. Such a gentleman.” Sirius passed through and as he did, knocked Remus in the butt with the end of his guitar case.

“Oi—”

“Oops. Still doesn’t count though.”

Remus stared after Sirius’ back. He almost considered throwing the entire thing right then and there, but then Sirius turned and smirked back at him.

"Keep up, Moony."

Pretty prick.

You are so going down...

* * *

Sunday 12th February 1978

A day had passed, and Remus Lupin was sure he was going to win this bet. Neither he nor Sirius seemed interested in doing the sensible thing, which would be to ignore the other entirely, and instead both had adopted a sort of 'tease and weave' strategy. Remus figured that if he could trick Sirius into coming close enough that he'd fall to temptation, or in the very least, all the blood would surge to his nether regions and he'd experience temporary memory loss and lose on his own. He was having fun at least, though he did miss the silent game of footsies they always played over breakfast. They weren't even sitting together today, as that would be much too big a risk.

"Hm. Pass the salt, Moony?”

Remus did so, reaching an arm over Peter, who had to duck to avoid taking a salt shaker to the forehead. When Sirius reached for it, he opened his palm flat and let Remus drop it in, before they both snatched their hands back as if shocked.

"Mind handing me the pepper, Padfoot?"

"Certainly, Moony."

Again, no fingers did touch. And when Sirius asked for a spare napkin and Remus asked for the sugar pot, they snatched said items away just quickly, leaving Peter to crouch down over his breakfast with an annoyed look on his face.

"Moony, pass me the—"

“Enough!" James snapped. "You two have been acting odd since yesterday, now what the hell is going on?”

Both Remus and Sirius looked up, feigning confusion.

“What do you mean, Prongs?"

"You've both been dancing around each other like you have cooties," he huffed, eyes narrowed. "Why?"

"Oh. You mean like... this?" Sirius waved a hand over Remus' shoulder, making him flinch away. “It’s just a little bet me and Moony got going on,” he sniggered. “Don’t worry yourself over it, Prongs.”

“What sort of bet?” Peter demanded.

“We’re not telling people,” Remus said. “Can’t afford outside intervention. This is strictly between Sirius and I. Pass the milk, Padfoot?”

Sirius did so, and they continued their careful exchange while their friends watched.

“Well, it’s fucking weird."

"Good," Sirius said. "I happen to like weird."

If Peter got the insinuation, he made no mention of it. He simply got up with his breakfast tray and took up the seat on James' other side, leaving a large gap between Remus and Sirius. Luckily for them, it was filled a moment later, when Marlene and Lily arrived, both looking downtrodden.

"Don't be upset, Lils," Marlene was saying. "It's only natural, we didn't get to go to interviews after all."

"What's the matter?" James asked, instantly queuing in on his girlfriend's distress.

"I heard back from Oxford today," Lily sighed.

"And?"

"And I've received a conditional offer."

"That's GREAT!" James boomed. "I knew you could do it!"

"Yes, well a conditional's not a certain, is it?" Lily frowned. "Until we complete our A-Levels, nothing's for certain."

"As if you have anything to worry about," Peter said, biting into a sausage. "You've been top of our year since you came to Hawkings. I'll bet you get full marks on every test."

Sirius covered his mouth over a yawn. "Yeah, don't fret, Evans. Even if you don't get in, Oxford's only got stuffy prats to begin with. Ask Sim."

Unsurprisingly, Lily did not look all that reassured. She shrugged her shoulders when James leaned in to comfort her some more, but by then Mary and Lottie had already arrived at the table with large smiles on their faces and enthusiasm oozing from every pore.

“Morning, my lovely friends!” Mary chirped. "Have we got news for you. As of today, Valentine's Day has officially been usurped!"

"Usurped?" Sirius echoed. "What, are we going to perform sacrifices to Satan instead?"

"Even better! We are going to throw—drum roll, Lot!"

Lottie began smacking Peter on the top of the head.

"OW—”

"A PARTY!"

The rest of them shared a glance.

"A party?"

"That's right! And no one is to bring a date at all! It's the perfect way to protest the sexist Sadie Hawkins' bash, don't you think?"

Mumbling something about tea, Marlene untucked herself from the table and strode off. No one stopped her; Lily had told them yesterday that the two still weren't talking, and Mary had spent much of her time with Lottie while Marlene refused to come within ten feet outside their bedroom. Mary watched her go, sighing a little, but when James asked for further clarification of her 'protest party', she returned with all her vigour.

"I'm so glad you asked, Potter. Lottie and I have had the most wonderful idea. We spent all day yesterday taking stock, and as it turns out, a large percentage of Hawkings' upper secondary campus has no interest in celebrating Valentine's Day or attending a dance."

"We took a poll," Lottie confirmed, holding up a sheet and clipboard.

"So it's a... Anti-Valentine's party...?"

"Exactly!" Mary said. "There is to be no dancing, no snogging—no fraternizing of any kind!"

"But those are some of my favourite things," Sirius whined.

"Yeah," James chuckled, "not to rain on your parade or anything, Mary, but this might be the only party Professor McGonagall would actually approve of."

"But it's our party so of course there'll be a twist!"

"Which is?" Asked Remus.

Mary stopped to wiggle in her seat a bit. "Just listen, I've already got it all figured out! I talked to this tenth year kid that got stuck cleaning out Filch's office for detention last week, and you'll never guess what he found! An entire collection of plastic water guns just waiting to be pinched! Now imagine we told everyone to wear white, and then filled them with red food colouring, or cranberry juice, or—or whatever! And we soak any person who's caught doing anything other than good, honest partying. Just—bang!" She shot her finger into the centre of Remus' chest; "Soak city."

"This doesn't sound like a party," Peter said, "it sounds like a half-baked ploy so that you can get Marlene to stop hating you."

Mary crossed her arms. “It’s an alternative to an otherwise uneventful evening. At least this way all of you frigid Frida’s will have something to do.”

“Well, I’m in!” James announced.

“Me too,” Remus said. If he was already not getting any then he could at least have some fun doing it.

“Will there be drinking?” Lily asked. “Valentine’s is on a Tuesday.”

“If you thought there wasn’t going to be drinking at that barmy dance then you’re not as smart as I thought, Evans,” Sirius told her.

“It’s gonna be hard convincing Moira,” Peter winced, “but yeah, I’m in too.”

“Great!” Mary cried. “I’ll spread the word—you guys have to get the water guns.”

“Easy,” Sirius declared, while Lily gaped.

“It’s Filch’s office! He’ll actually kill you if he finds you in there.”

“Meh. If you’ve done it once, you’ve done it a thousand times.”

She whirled on James, who only shrugged. “It’s a long story.”

“Well, pour yourself another cup of tea, because you’re not going anywhere until I know the full story, James Potter.”

As James wiggled uncomfortably in his seat, Remus felt a tap on his shoulder.

"Remus," Mary whispered, leaning in close, “will you do me a favour? I need you to ask Marls to come to the party."

"Why don't you ask her?”

"Because she won't come if I ask her."

"She might."

Mary clapped her hands together. "Pleeeease, Remus?"

"... Alright."

He waited until the following day's classes let out. Mary made sure to make herself scarce so he and Marlene could have the room, but they'd still ended up in his; lounging top and tail on his bed with a shared packet of crisps between them. The turntable was out, but it was Marlene's album—playing her newest obsession, Blondie.

'She loves you right now, so don't close your eyes,
She'll be talking and laughing with six other guys;
Flirtatious and cute, she'll take you the route,
Telling little girl lies...'

"It could be fun," Remus offered. "You know, the party."

"Hmph."

"Sounds like she's going to make it into a big show... She's already told half the year. I think she means to make up with you."

“It sounds stupid,” Marlene scoffed. "I don't know why everyone's so riled up. It's only a party."

“Only a party, yes, but still more fun than a school-organised dance, right?”

She grunted again, indifferently. “Did you get out of supervising the dance then, Mr. Prefect?”

“Yeah. Told one of the girls organising it that it’s the anniversary of my mum’s death and I probably wouldn’t feel like celebrating.”

“Remus! You can’t do that!”

“Sure I can. I call it ‘dead mum privilege’.”

“You’re terrible.”

“Yup. You’re still gonna come to the party though, right? It’ll be in our common room, so you don’t have to hang around Mary if you don’t want to.”

“I’ll think about it.”

“I take that to mean that you're still angry with her."

“She's just so pig-headed! Why's it so bad to want to keep her in Coventry a bit longer?”

"It's not. I get it."

Marlene sighed deeply, and pulled herself up into a sitting position. "Enough about Mary, what’s this I hear about a bet between you and Black?”

“Oh, that." Remus chuckled. "Sirius bet that he could go longer without touching me.”

“Why?"

"I dunno. It’s dumb. He’s still gonna lose though.”

“You sure? You seem a bit nervous, Rem.”

"Evil!" He whipped a pillow at her. “I’m not nervous, now stop playing mind games. I'm starting to think Sirius paid you off.”

“If you’re sure,” she teased, holding her hands up in surrender.

“I am.”

Not.

It’d only been a couple of days and yet it felt like forever. How many times had he already caught himself reaching out for Sirius just out of pure instinct? There was that moment yesterday morning, when he’d held the door and let Sirius go first, nearly coming up behind him and putting a hand on his shoulder. Then today in class, when he’d slipped on the wet doormat on his way in and nearly reached for Sirius to steady himself. And that piece of Sirius’ hair that had flopped the wrong way at the part, or the spot of tea he got on his collar at lunch, or the paper-cut he'd gotten while playing cards in the common room.

Who gets a paper-cut while playing cards?!

The excuses to touch Sirius were limitless, but by far the worst was the need to hold his hand. The urge was more than limitless, it was endless—enough to be almost startling. Remus wasn’t a clingy person, or even a particularly touchy person, but he loved touching Sirius. Now that he couldn’t, he was beyond frustrated, which he supposed was the point of the bet.

The door to their bedroom flew open and James flounced in, beaming as he hauled a fully-packed bin bag behind him. Next came Sirius with a similar smile and bag, and both dropped them in the middle of the room with the sound of several hollow clatters.

“Mission: Bravo was a success!” Sirius announced. “We have secured the goods.” He ripped open the top of the bin bag and pulled out a large plastic water pistol, which he aimed at the two of them. “Hands up, ya filthy animals!”

Remus shot upright in bed. “You went and got them?” Without me? “You actually got into Filch’s office?” Without me?!

“Yeah!” James grinned. “Wormy egged his windows, totally riled him up! Filchy ran right out without even locking the doors and we were able to walk right in. It was so ace!”

“And where’s Wormtail now?”

“Probably still running from Filch,” Sirius snorted. “Now I said hands up! Don’t make me shoot you!”

“Are those for tomorrow then?” Marlene asked, looking suddenly interested.

“Alright, you asked for it—bang!” Sirius pulled the pistol up to blow across the tip. “But yeah, they’re for tomorrow. Gonna be totally rad spraying people with ‘em.”

“You’re only supposed to spray people if they’re acting lovey-dovey,” James corrected.

“I know! You and Evans aren’t gonna stand a chance, by the way. I’m gonna stick to you like a shadow. The moment you try to sneak off together—bang! Bang!”

James drew a pistol of his own. “Same goes for you and Moony, mate!” He began to make a poor array of gun noises before freezing entirely, like a deer in headlights. They'd almost forgotten—Marlene was in the room.

"I mean—! Not you and Moony, Sirius! You and—erm—girls! All the girls that are gonna be throwing themselves at you! Just—a shitload of girls! Ha-HA!”

Remus burst out laughing, unable to stop until there were tears in his eyes. On the other end of the bed, Marlene was also giggling, and even Sirius had bent over in the middle, holding his stomach as he howled.

“What...?” James whined. "What's wrong?"

“It’s fine, Prongs,” Remus said once he’d managed to recover, “she knows.”

He looked to Marlene, who was wiping the corners of her eyes. “You DO?”

“Uh-huh!" She cackled. "But my god, that was priceless!"

“Oh… OH! Thank god! I thought I just ruined everything!”

Righting himself, Sirius swallowed the last of his laughter and set a hand on James’ shoulder. “You’re a good mate, Prongs."

After Marlene had made herself scarce and James went downstairs to help the girls and the other boys of the dorm decorate for the party the following day, Remus knocked sharply on the bathroom door. He got two cheeky knocks back, and for a second they made him so happy he nearly forgot his frustrations, but he hadn’t suffered through not touching Sirius for three days to be rebuffed now.

“I’m not asking if you’re alright, I want you to open the bloody door,” he snapped.

There was a muffled ‘oh’ and Sirius opened the door for him. “I’m about to get into the shower so make it quick.”

Pointedly, Remus grabbed the door and stepped inside, pulling it shut after himself. Sirius’ eyes widened as he pressed himself back against the sink so no part of them would touch in the tight space. “Oi! I ain’t losing just ‘cause you can’t wait to piss or something! Use the bathroom downstairs!”

“You just can’t avoid me to win the bet,” Remus said.

“Wha—? I’m not avoiding you!”

“You went and got those water guns on your own."

"What are you talking about? I wasn't alone, Prongs and Wormtail were there."

"And you conveniently forgot me.”

“Only 'cause we knew you were with McKinnon. Figured you’d want to be on your own, what with what she’s going through.”

Remus tried not to be irked, but he hadn’t told Sirius about Marlene’s break up so he could be left out.

“Oh Moony,” Sirius’ voice had turned sultry; “you’re not jealous, are you?” He smiled a bit, and stopped slouching against the sink. Then he took a step forward, so that only a few inches of space separated their chests. His shirt was open to the fourth button, and Remus could just make out the delicate curve of collarbone, and below that—his chest, and below that…

Suddenly Remus’ mouth felt as dry as paper.

“No, I ain’t jealous.”

“Concerned then?” Sirius leaned in a bit more, tilting his chin up like he might try to kiss him. “You don’t have anything to be concerned about. You’re my Moony, aren't cha? Mon chou."

Remus refused to break eye contact first. It was all he had. “You’re doing this on purpose.”

Sirius stretched up the tiniest bit more, mouth open so he could see his tongue. “Doing what?”

“I’m not gonna cave.”

“Sure, you’re not. But imagine how good it would feel to lean down and slide that pretty little tongue of yours into my mouth. Then you wouldn’t have to listen to me talk, you could just shut me up.”

Something inside Remus was sparked then. It was Sirius’ playfulness that had done it, and it left him with only one thought; two can play at that game.

“But why would I want to shut you up?” He asked, enunciating every syllable as if the words themselves could be drawn taut as a string. “If I’m going to put my tongue anywhere, Black, it will be in a place where I know I will still be able to hear your voice.”

Sirius stared at him a moment longer, humming low in the base of his throat. Then his Adam’s apple bobbed as he swallowed, and Remus knew he had him. Already feeling victorious, he leaned down until his lips were just barely brushing the shell of Sirius’ ear and whispered;

“Your move, Padfoot .”

Then he left him there. And promptly threw himself down the stairs to the dorm’s first floor where he whacked one out in the bathroom. By then post-orgasm clarity had set in and the satisfying nature of leaving Sirius had worn off. But he’d come this far (pun intended), and he wasn’t about to give up now.

Sirius Black was going to touch him first, if it was the last thing he did.

* * *

Valentine’s Day, 1978

It was almost funny to go about their regular Tuesday schedules all while anticipating the festivities to come. Remus had no idea how many people Mary had invited back to the common room, but he was expecting a rather exciting evening. James and Lily would probably try to hold out, but Remus knew better; their shirts would be stained before they knew it.

As for himself, he was determined to stay dry as an old crone’s hands in winter—at least until Sirius inevitably gave in and accepted his loss. Though that was looking to be easier said than done, considering Sirius wasn’t the one that had woken up ripped and raring to go again that morning.

Remus had to endure the taunts over his morning wood all through Music and History, and even James—who had managed to suss out the details of the bet thanks to Lily’s expert deduction skills—had joined in by lunch.

“I could’ve helped you out, you know,” Sirius offered snidely, “all you had to do was ask.”

“Piss off.”

“Come on Lupin, it’s Valentine’s! The perfect day for Sirius to lend a hand.”

Because Remus could touch him, James got a sharp wallop for that one.

Dinner was a flurry. Kids were rushing around, chattering about last-minute preparations, and no one was sure if they meant the dance or the mysterious party taking place at Godric. James had been officially crowned the coolest dorm monitor on campus, though he did seem to be sweating a reasonable amount over how many kids had appeared before him to ask this or that. Remus, on the other hand, was asked to the dance twice more in the span of time it took to get in line and gather his dinner. First of them was Allison, one of the twins, which really got Sirius going.

“Whatever happened to loyalty among fans?” he huffed, peeling the foil from a pink and red Valentine's cupcake. Marlene reached over and immediately squished it in her fist.

“She isn’t your fan, she’s a girl, you vain bastard.”

“You’re so mean, McKinnon!” Sirius moaned, before cheekily grabbing her wrist and attempting to lick the icing from between her fingers. Instead Marlene just batted him on the cheek, leaving a smear of pink behind as well as a rather mouth-watering feeling for Remus as he watched Sirius lick it off.

They’d spent what felt like hours filling up tiny plastic water pistols and rearranging furniture to make room for dancing of their own. Streamers were hung from the walls and bookshelves, and tarps had been laid across every surface to protect it from water-damage. It seemed as though the school had been split right down the middle, with those more interested in swaying along to a soundtrack of Tina Charles and The Bay City Rollers headed toward the Great Hall, and the others who had maybe worse luck finding a date, to their common room. There were only two conditions for entry: first that you wear a white shirt, and second that you concede to no shows of doting adoration—unless you were willing to get soaked, that is. Turns out most kids were more than willing to agree, and it made for a rather chill scene, with the exception of the occasional scream every time someone was caught snuggling slightly too close. Mary, to all of their surprise, led the fight against any and all canoodling like a ruthless sergeant major in the army, with Lottie as her iron-fisted lieutenant.

“We were just dancing!” A girl named Katey Johnson protested after Mary had soaked her and her boyfriend through their shirts.

“This is an anti-Valentine’s party. You wanna bump and grind, try the Great Hall.”

Looking rather satisfied with herself, Mary spun one of the pistols around in her hand like she was John Wayne and she and Lottie began weaving back through the throng to where Remus was standing next to the stereo, drink already in hand.

“I never knew how good this would feel,” she beamed. “Just a party! None of the messy, ‘you stole my boyfriend’ or awkward ‘should we kiss now’ bullshit!”

“It’s much preferable to spending a Valentine’s without Roger,” Lottie agreed smugly.

“I already told you,” Mary warned, “just ‘cause he’s not here don’t mean I won’t spray you if you keep going on about him.”

Lottie rolled her eyes before poking Remus in the arm. “Remus, did you guys leave your bedroom door unlocked? I gotta use the lav but I don’t want to risk your guys’ public toilet down here.”

“Yeah, go on, door’s open.”

She smiled gratefully and tucked her water pistol under one arm before weaving away. “Didn’t know she was still seeing that Roger guy,” Remus said to Mary, sipping his drink.

“Ugh. They talk almost every night on the phone. She’s even been going on about marrying the guy.”

"Marry? She’s seventeen."

“Tell me about it. I had to threaten her that just because he’s six-hundred miles away doesn’t mean she can’t be caught acting insufferably in love. Called it an ‘emotional soaking’.”

“On that note,” he cleared his throat awkwardly, “we’ve already run out of water guns.”

She shrugged. “Then they can throw the cider. How’s it taste, by the way?”

“Like lukewarm cranberry juice and vodka."

Mary pulled the cup from his hands to try it and nodded amicably. “Oh yeah, that’ll get everyone pissed for sure. Have you seen Marlene?”

Remus gestured across the room, where Marlene was standing and talking to Nicole. It'd been a surprise and a half to see her show up, but she and Marlene seemed to be talking civilly, so that was a plus.

"Oh good, Nicole came!" Mary cried. "I thought she'd blow me off for sure, but I'm trying to put out the flames between us—show Marls I'm not just her jealous best friend. I'm her best best friend."

The sentiment was almost admirable, if only had Mary known that what was going on between the two did not just have to do with her and Marlene's friendship.

"C'mon, come say hi with me."

"But I have to change the tape!" Remus whined, gesturing fruitlessly to the stereo.

"How about we let someone else have a go, love." She grabbed his arm and began pulling him through the crowd toward the pair, stopping just short of Marlene's elbow. "Nicole! I'm so glad you came!"

Nicole nodded at Mary, trying for a reasonable smile. "Thanks for the invite, Mary."

"Wait, you invited her?" Marlene asked.

"Of course! She's your friend."

Nicole raised an eyebrow and sipped her drink, but Mary didn't seem to notice. She looked between the two of them, as if scrambling for something to say, and finally dropped Remus' arm. "Nicole, would you mind helping me get some drinks? Marls sucks at mixing. Always too much mixer, not enough spike, if you know what I mean."

"I do not suck."

"Yeah, you do," Nicole said, before nodding Mary on. Mary bounced eagerly on the spot before bobbing her own head in stilted agreement.

"Ah—okay! C'mon, drinks are this way."

They broke off from them together, and Nicole sent Marlene one final glance before Mary actually took her arm in solidarity and tugged her through the fray.

"How long d'you figure that's gonna last?" Remus asked.

“Meh. I say ten minutes until they get so annoyed with each other that they’re both fighting to complain to me about it,” Marlene said, a small smile on her face. “I’m surprised Mary invited her. More surprised Nicole actually came.”

“Good surprised or bad surprised?”

“Good. Makes me think there might be a possibility of mending things.”

“And do you want that?”

“Hm. I think I’d like the chance.”

“Well,” Remus raised his drink, “cheers to that then.”

“Moony!” Sirius’ shout carried across the room. “C’mere!”

“Go,” Marlene said automatically, “your boy-toy’s waiting.”

"Don’t ever say that again.”

“MOOOOONY!”

“He’s calling you!” Marlene grinned, snatching his drink and winking at him over the brim of the cup. Shoving her fondly, Remus allowed the thievery and turned, slipping over to the spot where Sirius was waving his hands. James and Lily were standing next to him in front of one of the bookshelves, which Mary had been smart enough to tarp off as well in case any of them were doused with water.

“Finally. Stand there,” Sirius ordered, directing him to Lily’s side.

“What’s this?” Remus asked, obediently taking his place.

“Padfoot wants to take a photo,” James said, sliding an arm around Lily.

“Come in close, Remus,” Lily beckoned, while Sirius grinned from behind the camera.

“Yeah, get in close, Moony,” he leered, before suddenly dropping the camera so it hung from around his neck and whipping out a water gun. “EVANS, QUICK! You have ten seconds to make your choice or both of these suckers get soaked.”

“W-What?” Lily demanded, erupting into laughter.

“That’s against the rules!” James contested. “You’ve got us lined up for the slaughter!”

“Yes, and if you attempt to run I’ll shoot you in the backs like dogs. Now Evans, choose!”

“I don’t understand!”

“He means you gotta pick one of us—me or James,” Remus said, enjoying the game despite himself.

“That’s right! I knew you were smart, Moony. Loser don’t get a smooch, but at least they stay dry, HA!”

“I’m not gonna choose,” Lily scoffed. “I simply can’t!”

“Then they both die!” Sirius shot a short squirt at James’ shoulder, instantly dying his white school shirt a damp pink.

“You bastard!” James crowed, holding his shoulder. “Moony, I’ve been hit!”

“No, James!” Remus cried, putting his hands up in surrender. “Lily, you must choose!”

“Yeeeees, you’re already lost, Evans, but you can still save the one you love by denying him a final kiss, or breathe your last in each other’s longing embrace! You’re out of time— you must choose!”

“I can't, I—oh hell, this is so dumb,” Lily snorted, before lacing both her arms around Remus and James’ shoulders and bringing them down to her left, planting a fat kiss on both of their cheeks.

“YES!” James cried; “ONE FOR ALL AND ALL FOR ONE!”

Sirius promptly doused them all in red. He emptied the gun’s canister and when he was finished they were all left dripping from head to toe. Remus pushed his hair up out of his eyes and Lily giggled, kissing his cheek again while James shook his hands out and went to Sirius’ side, lifting the camera up over his head.

“Taking a photo to commemorate the moment where your girlfriend couldn’t choose between you and Moony, Prongs?” Sirius teased.

“No, just wanting to set it aside for this,” James said, dropping the camera on a table behind him before throwing himself at Sirius with a cry and laying several fat, wet kisses on Sirius’ cheek. Sirius yelped, spiralling backwards, but James was relentless, and eventually everyone who'd noticed was spraying them with water pistols of their own. They were instantly soaked to their skinnies, and Lily just shook her head.

"We should've put down more tarps."

"Guess so."

After that it was a free-for-all. No one cared about staying dry. Some were just getting handsy just so their friends might catch them, driven by the rowdy ambiance until they were simply throwing themselves at each other in any open corner. The punch bowl had long since been emptied, but the booze kept flowing, and Remus spent half the night avoiding Sirius' advances.

"Come on, dance with me!" He slurred, swiping at the air in front of Remus' chest.

"You almost touched me there!" Remus said. "What? Trying to lose now, Padfoot? That desperate to hold me?!"

"Someone give me a water gun!" Sirius demanded. Remus had been pretty sure all of them were emptied, but not thirty seconds later Sirius was chasing him around the common room with a water pistol in hand, both of them dodging kids and getting cheered on like a pair of lunatics. Remus found solace only behind Marlene, who had somehow maintained an immaculately white shirt throughout the night's chaos.

"Cherry, save me!"

"Give it up, McKinnon! He's mine!"

"You can have him, just don't hit me," Marlene shouted, trying to pull Remus out from behind her as he moaned like an indignant child.

Appearing out of thin air, Mary thrust a finger out at the two of them. "Oi! Is that fraternizing I see?"

"No!" Marlene cut back. "Remus is just being a baby! Now get off me!"

"But he can't shoot me if I'm next to you!"

"Oh just shoot them already, Sirius," Mary giggled. Sirius raised his pistol, but Marlene held a hand out.

“I haven’t done anything, now piss off, Black!”

“You didn’t take a vow of celibacy when you came in here tonight, did you?” Mary teased; “It’s just water, Marls!”

“I’m not playing anymore. Remus—OFF!”

He may have been drunk, but Remus knew when the game was finished. He released Marlene’s arm and backed away, and Sirius promptly drenched him with a snigger.

“Gotchu.”

Mary watched them, looking disappointed. When she spoke it sounded whiny, and she was clearly drunk. “Oh, come on, Marls! Have you tried reading the room? It’s a game.”

“Well, I don't want to play anymore!"

“Then why are you still here?”

Marlene clenched her jaw and in answer, made to step around Mary and head for the door. Mary caught her arm at the last second, dragging her back as she whimpered. “Nooo! I didn’t mean it! I just want you to have a good time!”

“For Christ sakes, Mary, I am having a good time! When did I say I wasn’t?”

“It’s just—I know you hate Valentine’s Day! I know it’s because you’re insecure and you think people don’t like you—but they do!”

“You’re the worst when you’re drunk,” Marlene snapped. “Now let go of me!”

Mary did not yield. “I like you! You’re my best friend! I can’t let my best friend walk out of here in a white shirt!”

“Yes, you can!”

“Oh! You’re upset, what can I do? Please tell me what I can do to make it better!”

“You can let go!”

But Mary did not let go. Instead she grabbed onto Marlene with both hands and kissed her, full on the mouth. Remus' jaw dropped open and next to him, Sirius' eyes nearly bulged right out of his head. When Mary pulled away she was beaming, flashing that dazzling smile that made guys everywhere melt, and probably Marlene too. But not this time.

"There!" She cried. "Now... Now we're the same!"

Oh Mary…

Remus wasn't sure which was more likely, Marlene bursting into tears on the spot or merely fading away in nonexistence. Turns out she didn't have time to do either. All of the kids who'd bore witness to the kiss turned, and instantly the pair of them were being bombarded by water from every side. Mary threw her hands up and screeched in delight, but Marlene simply seized up all over, horror-stricken like the miserable Carrie White on her grisly prom night. When the whole thing was over Mary lifted her wet curls away from her face, muttering about her poor hair, and Marlene just stood there. There was pink dripping from her face and hair—even her eyelashes. And when she looked at Mary...

Sensing the oncoming slaughter, Remus surged forward—but he was too late. Nicole got there first. She tapped Marlene on the shoulder and she turned, shame overcoming every one of her features.

"Nicole…"

Face blank, Nicole raised her arm and overturned her drink, directly over Marlene's head. No one said a word, and even Mary's smile warped into that of shock as Nicole tossed the empty cup away and walked off without a word. Mary's voice was but a squeak in the din.

"Marls…?"

Marlene looked back at her, and Remus was sure he'd never seen her look so hurt. "Don't you ever speak to me again," she said lowly, before sweeping from the room. Mary made to follow, confusion and regret on her face, but Remus got there first.

"Mary, no. Just—Just don't."

"What'd I do?" Mary demanded. "Sirius, what'd I do?"

Even Sirius didn't have an answer. He looked at her regretfully, and Remus turned and left.

Thankfully, Marlene had sought refuge upstairs rather than run out of the dorm dripping wet. He had to fumble with his keys just to open the door, and when he did Remus found water puddles next to his bed and the curtains drawn shut.

“Cherry? Cherry, it’s only me.”

“Go away, Remus!”

“Can’t,” he lied, shutting the door after himself, “they’ve started square dancing and I suck at geometry.”

It was a lame attempt at a joke, and Marlene didn't laugh anyway. Feeling guilty, Remus sat down next to his bed, leaning up against the curtains. He was drunk and only half-decent at consoling his friends on his best days, but he couldn’t think of anything else to do. It was Marlene.

“I’m sorry, Cherry.”

No answer.

“Mary really fucked up. That was fucked up…”

“She’s such a bitch.” It came out as a vicious sob. “Some bloody Valentine’s Day—why can’t she just leave well enough alone? She always has to be doing something!”

Remus looked down at his lap, twiddling his thumbs. "Yeah..."

“You know what hurts the most, Remus? She kissed me without a second thought. She kissed me so that I’d fit in. Because to her, I’m no different from everyone else!"

"That's not true. You're Mary's favourite person in the world."

"Besides herself, you mean!"

Because he couldn’t think of anything to say, Remus reached back, sliding his hand up underneath the bed curtain and leaving it open in the air. There was a sniffle, and then Marlene took it, squeezing so tightly his knuckles twinged. Remus didn’t care.

“Cherry, you know you’re my girl, right?”

Marlene laughed then, through her snuffling.

“Idiot.”

“I’m serious—or well, heh... I'm Remus, but..."

"Great. Now I have to hear you make that joke too. Drunkard."

"You wanna know something, Cherry? I don't think anybody's called me a drunkard before. You wanna know something else?"

“… What?”

“I’ve got... sunshine…”

“Oh no.”

“On a cloudy day… When it's... shit... Oh! When it’s cold outsiiiiide, I’ve got the month of May…”

Marlene gave an embarrassed whimper, but didn’t let go of his hand. Remus took that as permission to keep going. He was drunk, after all.

“ ‘I guess you’d saaay—what can make me feel this waaay? My girl! Talkin’ ‘bout my girl’...”

Marlene whipped the curtains back and threw herself forward. She hugged him from behind, still dripping wet, and Remus clung to her arms, so, so relieved.

“Sorry about your sheets,” she mumbled.

“Don’t even worry about it. I’ll steal Sirius’ bed.”

“I love that. I love that you can talk about him like that. Like it’s so normal.”

Remus felt warmth spread inside his chest. “You know, Cherry, I haven’t put much stock in ‘normal’ lately.”

She chuckled lightly and it tickled the back of his neck, but before anything else could be said, a small knock came at the door. Mary.

“Marls…? Marls, I’m sorry. Will you please talk to me?”

Remus heard Marlene suck back a breath and he gently stroked her arm. “How are you feeling?”

“Awful.”

“Do you want me to send her away?”

“Yes.”

He went to pull away, but she clung to him.

“No.”

“I get it,” Remus whispered. “She’s important to you.”

“Yeah… but she’s never sung to me.”

“I bet she would if you asked.”

“Marls? Marlene, please let me in. I’m so sorry. I want to explain…”

Marlene sighed deeply and slowly unfurled her arms from around his neck. “This is gonna suck.”

Remus stood, turning around to face her. “You don’t have to tell her anything. You don’t owe her an explanation.”

“I know,” Marlene answered, looking up at him with those true blue eyes. “But I think I owe myself one.”

"Okay."

When opened the door, Remus found a rather pathetic-looking Mary standing in her wet clothes. She was missing an earring and had mascara running down her face and smudged lipstick to her chin. Her usually-perfect hair was flat and damp, but she was still sucking back air through a sniffling nose, trying to look brave.

"Oh, Remus. I—"

“Don’t talk, Mary. Just listen.”

She nodded, vigorously, and stepped past him into the room. She didn’t rush the bed, just approached quietly and sat down next to her friend. Satisfied, Remus shut the door and returned downstairs. He ran into Peter and Moira first, who were pulling their boots off by the threshold and still dressed up in full formal attire. Moira had made him go to the Valentine's ball after all, but judging by the smiles on their faces, it'd been a good time.

“Hey, Wormtail. How was the dance?”

"Great!"

“But we’re ready to party,” Moira added quickly. "Got any booze, Lupin?"

Almost impressed, Remus jutted his head toward the kitchenette. “I hid a flask of vodka behind some peas in the freezer. Have at ‘er.”

They shuffled off, while Remus followed the music back into the common room. James, Lily, and Sirius set upon him at once and it took Remus several minutes of reassurance to get them to stop yammering.

“But Marlene’s alright, right?” Lily demanded.

“They’re talking. But yeah, I think things’ll be alright.”

“This is just too wild,” James sighed, putting an arm around Lily’s shoulders. At the same second Davey Gudgeon appeared behind them and splashed James’ back with water, which ended with James giving chase. “Damn it Gudgeon, that wasn’t romance!”

As Davey fled, hooting the entire way, and Lily chased them both looking rather worried, Sirius shuffled up to Remus’ side. “You think McKinnon’s gonna fess up? Tell her everything about Nicole and stuff?”

Remus shrugged. “If she does, Mary’ll have to accept it.”

“She will,” Sirius said firmly. “It’s Mary.”

Somewhere across the room, the stereo fell silent as the tape was changed and suddenly punk pop was blaring from the speakers.

‘Hey ho, let’s go! Hey ho, let’s go!
Hey ho, let’s go! Hey ho, let’s go!’

“OH FUCK YEAH! Someone's got taste!” Sirius cried, instantly zeroing in on James across the room. He had Davey in a headlock and was currently grinding his knuckles into the top of his head—completely good-naturedly, of course—but the moment he recognised the song, he also looked in Sirius’ direction. They reunited in the centre of the common room, head-banging furiously enough that it began to catch on like a bad cold. Before the first verse was even done, the entire room of kids had joined in, thrashing around in a circle and erupting into a chorus of shouting.

“ ‘THEY'RE FORMING IN A STRAIGHT LINE!
THEY’RE GOING THROUGH A TIGHT WIND!
THE KIDS ARE LOSING THEIR MINDS—
THE BLITZKRIEG BOP!’”

Enjoying himself immensely already, Remus had gone in search of another drink, which was supplied to him after Peter and Moira’s reappearance.

"Is that Black and Potter standing on a table?!" Moira howled.

It was. Remus had turned his back for two seconds and somehow they'd managed to wrestle a table into the centre of the mosh pit. Now they were standing on top of it, teetering back and forth precariously and singing without a care in the world. Other kids cheered them on of course, and Sirius—busy playing air guitar like it was going out of style—looked up and picked Remus out from the crowd.

“MOONY! HEY MOONY! I’M UP HERE!”

“I SEE YOU!” Remus shouted back, just as a couch pillow arched through the air and caught Sirius upside the head. He nearly toppled off the back end of the table but caught himself at the last second while Remus’ heart did a reset.

“Okay, that's enough!” He called warningly, passing the flask off to Peter and stepping forward. He had to fight to get through the throng of other kids. "Sirius!"

'HEY HO, LET'S GO!
SHOOT 'EM IN THE BACK NOW!'

“Sirius—Sirius, come down from the table!”

'WHAT THEY WANT, I DON'T KNOW—THEY'RE ALL REVVED UP AND READY TO GO!'

"Don't jump!"

“YEAH, JUMP!” Someone shouted. A chorus immediately picked up, and Sirius’ mouth dropped open in maniacal delight as his classmates cheered him on;

“JUMP! JUMP! JUMP!”

“NO!” Remus shouted, war flashbacks of James on acid making his stomach drop. Not it mattered; he was immediately drowned out by the song's chorus as it got ready to come to a sharp close, and Sirius, it seemed, would not be stopped.

“OI, MOONY!"

‘HEY HO, LET'S GO!
HEY HO, LET'S GO!'

"WATCH THIS!"

'HEY HO, LET'S GO!'

On the final beat, Sirius threw himself into a stage-dive right off the end of the table, and Remus saw his entire life flash before his eyes. Kids shrieked and fled to avoid being crushed, which allowed him to stagger forward suddenly—just in time to catch Sirius out of the air and go down painfully on his back in one grand heap. There was a round of wincing ‘oooh!’ and James, still on the table, gaped down at them from above.

Remus groaned. His entire body hurt and might've been dislocated, but when he sat up to check on Sirius, he was surprised to find him completely fine—and despite it all, grinning.

“Moony, you saved me,” he sniggered.

Remus growled, pushing himself up into a sitting position. “You are—without a doubt—an absolute fucking arse!”

“One that you saved!”

“Whatever, just get off me!”

But Sirius didn't get off; rather he turned so he was straddling him across the middle, making Remus groan all over again.

“But don’t you realise what this means, Moons?” He leered.

It took a moment for realisation to actually set in. That Sirius was lying on top of him—that they were touching.

“I won!” Sirius boomed. "HA!"

Remus first felt utter devastation wash over him, then pure relief. Winning?! Who cared about winning...

“So the bet’s over? I can touch you again?!”

"Oh yes!" Sirius cried. "You can! 'Cause I know you want to, ya big fat loser!"

"Good."

And then Remus threw himself forward, tackling Sirius and sending them both tumbling across the floor. Cheers went up—a brawl!

“AHHH!” Sirius wailed. “Get him off me, someone heeeelp!"

“C’mere, I’ll beat your win into you, you fucking nob!”

Their classmates rallied with laughter, pulling ankle after ankle out of the way and leaping over them as they tumbled. Sirius ultimately freed himself long enough to scramble away, and he fled into the hall with Remus and much applause right on his heels.

“Hey, don't be mad! You lost fair and square, Moony!”

“Then why you runnin’, Pads?!” Remus screamed, slipping on the damp carpet as Sirius yelped and threw himself up the stairs.

When he reached the third floor Sirius stopped long enough to tear off his shoe. He threw it, in a true show of athletic ability, Remus caught the shoe straight out of the air and flung it back at him. It bounced off the wall when Sirius ducked, but the surprise it gave him was just enough of an advantage. With a loud cry, Remus grabbed him round the middle, taking them both to the carpet in one fell swoop.

“Augh—shit!” Sirius groaned. “You’re so cruel! I need at least one of my kidneys to survive, you kn—”

Remus didn’t let him finish. Like a starving animal, he threw himself down over Sirius and pressed his lips to his, sedating every last urge he’d been stifling since they’d agreed on the stupid bet in the first place. Sirius kissed him back, every bit as ferocious, and buried his fingers in Remus’ hair, pulling taunt until they were moaning into each other’s mouths. At that moment it wouldn’t have mattered if the whole world saw them, which was good considering Mary and Marlene had just come down from the floor above.

“Oh my GOD!” Mary shrieked, as Marlene practically fell into the bannister in her own laughter. “YOU TWO TOO?!”

They broke apart, and Remus had just enough time to gape before Sirius was pulling him back by the lips.

“Do you mind, Macdonald? We’re sort of busy here.”

Chapter End Notes

'Picture Post' was a British photojournalism magazine started to imitate 'Life' magazine in the 30s-50s.
'All fur coat and no knickers' refers to someone who seemed elegant and proper on the outside, but is actually immoral underneath.
Lying 'top and tail' just means like two people lying with their heads at opposite ends of the bed.
'Send[ing] someone to Coventry' is an idiom for ostracising someone.

Songs featured:
"Little Girl Lies" by Blondie, 1976
"My Girl" by the Temptations, 1964
"Blitzkrieg Bop" by the Ramones, 1976.

& don't worry, not all of the sexy talk from here on out will be in French, lmfao. Just let me have a bit of fun, haha.

[Again] Author's Note: Due to a conflicting work schedule, I've decided to make upload day Sundays of every week. This will hopefully make it so my uploads aren't as late in the day anymore.

Next upload: July 17

Chapter 88: Reunion

Chapter Summary

Sirius has always enjoyed putting on a show. Turns out it's a family trait.

Chapter Notes

The song at the beginning of this chapter wasn't actually released until October of 1978 but I couldn't resist so meh to the details.

CW for this chapter:
Intense references to child abuse, including physical but mostly emotional/psychological as well as strong references to homophobia.
This chapter's got some solid hurt/comfort, so please be mindful of these content warnings. They all go through it, but come out on the other side stronger.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I don't need you to worry for me 'cause I'm alright,
I don't want you to tell me it's time to come home;
I don't care what you say anymore this is my life,
Go ahead with your own life leave me alone...

- "My Life" Billy Joel, 1978

Regulus' second message had arrived just after Valentine's Day, this time addressed to James. Still alive, it read; Idiots.

James of course, got a kick out of it, but Sirius remained unimpressed. He tried his best to insist that he was thankful for any word at all, but when a third postcard arrived one week later with Peter's name on it, Sirius just about ripped it in two.

"Would it kill the little git to put my name on a card for once?!"

"He's just doing it to get a rise out of you," James sniggered. "It's cute."

When it was Remus' turn to read the postcard, he couldn't help but smile. I'm fine. Not in fucking Belgium. Stop calling. Bloody prats. He imagined him writing it; Of course I should call them all prats. It's very important that they know.

"Looks like he's finally developed a sense of humour at least," Sirius gripped, taking back the card and turning it over in his hands several times. Remus didn't say it, but it was obvious he was relieved. They'd been going on two months with no word apart from a few flimsy postcards, but as long as Regulus was still finding ways to insult them things must've been somewhat normal.

"I'm still serious about going, if you are," Remus said later on, when it was just him and Sirius again. They were in the laundrette house, flipping their sheets and things into the dryer. It was early evening; a radio was playing atop one of the shelves along the far wall, seemingly forgotten by another student. It was as good a moment as any for such depressing parley.

"We could get a car over Easter break, drive out there. Bring him… Well, bring him somewhere else."

Sirius shut the squeaky dryer door with a slam, nearly upsetting the box of powder detergent sitting on top. "And just where are you planning on getting a car? Seems a bit far-fetched, that one. And I don't think Stan'll fancy a road trip to fucking Bath."

"We'll figure it out, we always do. Why? Are you saying you don't want to go?"

"No!" Sirius snatched up the detergent, moving up to the washer. "It's just... What if he says no? Like picture it, Moons. We go all the way there, and by some miracle manage to talk to him and say… what? Come back? Leave them? I'm not sure he'd do it. It was easier for me, I never fit in there, and I had Alphard's inheritance. Reg has nothing."

"He has you."

Sirius looked at him then. Really looked at him. "You make it sound so easy."

"Maybe it is."

"... You sop."

It was a foolish idea, but they were young and foolish anyway so it was something. Even if they didn't have a car or the license to drive one, it wasn't as though the Black family manor was some impregnable fortress. Sirius knew all the back entrances, which servants' hallway was least likely to be used, and how often the gatekeepers switched shifts. If they could just get to Regulus without being seen, then maybe they'd have a chance. Remus had already mapped the route; if they borrowed the money for the train from their friends they could be there and back in three days. Giles might help, given the right incentive, and if not they could always hitchhike. At the very least it'd be an adventure. Perhaps they'd even be arrested! Wouldn't Tomny be impressed then.

Eventually they were counting down the days until Easter. Sirius was convinced Regulus could last another month on his own, but he never stopped calling either. Perhaps he thought he could annoy his brother into coming back, but most likely he was just hanging on a hope. Funny thing about that though... on a few very rare occasions, a little hoping could pay off.

It was a Tuesday. Remus only remembered because he taught music to the fifth years that day. Things had been tough going without Regulus there to help, and his acting replacement, Anton, was positively useless when it came to all things music and children.

"Finally! I thought it'd never end," he groaned, digging the foam plugs from his ears. He insisted on wearing them to every lesson, and though Remus doubted they did much against a nine year-old and a tuba, he wasn't interested enough to ask.

"New assignments from McGonagall today, eh?" Anton said, as they said goodbye to the kiddies and made their way back toward their half of campus. "Hope I get something easy, like office duty. No one cares if you slack off there, all you've got to do is show up! How 'bout you, Lupin?"

"Don't matter to me." As long as it's away from you.

They were running late by the time they'd made it back to Castle Hall, and Remus was half worried they'd have missed out on all the decent jobs. Outside the building, pulled straight up front was a sleek black Bentley car, complete with the flashy hood ornament. Anton whistled when he saw it, but veered away when he noticed the car's driver standing on the pavement. He glared at them, then gave a sharp flick of the pipe he was smoking, indicating that they should move on.

"Who do you think that beauty belongs to, Lupin?"

"Maybe the Queen's come to visit," Remus replied snidely, not really interested.

Still rushing, they went up the front stairs together only to come upon a cluster of other prefects on the ground floor, all mulling around like nervous sheep. Between all the bodies and the building's constant use of central heating, the hallway was positively stifling and no one seemed to be in a good mood.

"Blimey... What are we waiting on?" Anton complained. "Thought we were getting our new assignments today."

The prefect beside him shrugged. "McGonagall's still in her office, I think. Supposedly she's meeting with a parent."

"Hope it's not mine," Anton grimaced. "Mum'll kill me if she sees my geography marks."

"Remington!"

It was Trish. She pushed through the crowd and took him by the sleeve, practically yanking him up the opposite staircase so noseys like Anton wouldn't be able to overhear.

"Trish, what is it?" Remus asked, nearly missing a step when she finally slammed to a halt ahead of him.

"It's McGonagall," Trish answered, anxiously brushing her hair from her face. "She's in her office now meeting with his parents."

"Yeah, I heard. Can't be mine though. My dad would never make the trip."

"I said his!" Trish snapped. "And I ken who it is, ya numpty! It's Regulus' parents... and he's with 'em."

For a moment it was like the floorboards had come out beneath him.

"Regulus is here... at school?!"

"I saw them me'sell. They came in that fancy car out front. Black wouldn't even look at us, and his maw, she..."

He could tell by her face that it'd not been a pleasant experience, but Remus was already miles ahead. Regulus was there—at school! They weren't going to have to hitchhike all the way to Bath after all!

"I gotta see him."

Trish got in front of him before he could move, blocking the way up the stairs.

"Don't be a wee clipe!" She hissed. "What are you gonnae do, walk in there and invite 'em to tea?! You should leave it... He's alright, I ken it."

"I have to see for myself," Remus insisted, pushing past her.

"You dafty! I'm going to get Sirius!"

Remus let her go. The stairs he took two at a time until he'd emerged on the third floor landing. It was less stifling so high up and hardly crowded, and yet Remus couldn't get a breath in. It was like a stone had lodged itself in the middle of his chest. Sirius, he thought cowardly, I can't do this, maybe we should get Sirius!

But he didn't want to risk it. Regulus was back now, but how long until his mother decided it was all a mistake and took him away again? How would he ever be able to face Sirius knowing he'd let his little brother slip right through his fingers?

Don't be a bloody pansy, she's a woman not the devil!

He wasn't sure how much of that was true, but he approached the Headmistress's office anyway. He'd just about grasped that heavy golden knocker when a sharp, reedy voice cut through the quiet.

"I cannot believe you let that filth back in here. This is why we thought to keep our son home, do you even realise the damage I could do to this school's reputation with a single phone call?"

The voice was coming from inside the Headmistress's office. He was sure he'd never heard it before, but somehow it was still familiar. It was every sordid creak of the Shrieking Shack, every shrill piano note in the late-night horror films, every ghastly screech in his nightmares. But there was something else too; a certain hitch in the consonants, and the way she seemed to hold her breath before certain words—as though she knew exactly what would create the deepest and most efficient cut.

It was a woman, and she was angry. She wasn't even yelling at him—there was an entire door between them—and yet Remus felt it in his bones. It was like being thrust back in time. In all of his memories, he could only recall one time Hope had really yelled at him. It was after he'd overheard a few of the house staff gossiping; deranged, they'd called her, raving mad, likely to cave her own head in. And those pills, someone ought to flush them away, save us the trouble.

So he did. He thought he was helping, and she never bothered to keep them out of reach anyway. He realised his mistake only when she found him with the empty bottle in his hand.

REMUS! OH—What have you done? What have you DONE?! Those were important, darling! We talked about—oh my… Bad! You are so bad, Remus! You're a BAD boy! I needed those! Where am I going to get them now? Are YOU going to get them for me? ARE YOU?!

Remus felt ill. He couldn't breathe. Then he heard McGonagall's voice, and he was no longer six years-old and hiding beneath his mother's bed.

"Mrs. Black, you should know that we here at Hawkings treat all students equally, regardless of background or extenuating circumstances."

"Equal? You think that any of the miserable brats you house come close to my son? That I should consider that little beast equal to my son? You have no idea the disappointment I've been made to endure, the shame we've been made to bear? We have been cursed! My husband health has been put at risk because of that wretched little—"

"Mother, please."

"Be quiet, Regulus! You're lucky I haven't changed my mind already. The only reason we're back here is because you agreed to our deal. If you cannot keep your end of the bargain, then I don't see any further point in staying."

A lapse of silence, and Remus felt his blood run cold. A bargain, what bargain?

"Our family has been generous, Professor, very generous. Every year this college receives thousands of pounds in donations, I would feel sorry to have to write to your other sponsors, many of whom are good friends, you remember. I'm sure they'd be disheartened to know how this mighty institution has failed to uphold its principle of standards. Why, just last month I heard that you're admitting over two dozen students whose families couldn't even hope to cover the admissions cost. Really, Minerva, how do you think that will look?"

"I believe everyone is deserving of a quality education, regardless of how deep their pockets are, Mrs. Black."

Another pregnant pause, and Remus imagined Walburga readying her fire and pitchforks.

"If Regulus is to remain here under the care of your appointed staff, then I have a list of demands that must be met. First is that he is to have a private room. He is not to fraternise with anyone ineffectual, and he's to stop all frivolous chore-keeping. What is the point of being a prefect if you've left yourself no time to study? Outside of lessons, he is also to be kept separate from the rest. None may look, none may touch—we are not here to make friends. You should know it's against our better judgement that we are allowing him to return to Hawkings and I will not have my faith sequestered again. Not when that filthy boy is allowed to run amuck without punishment!"

"Mother, Sirius isn't—"

A sharp sound, like a smack.

"Mrs, Black! I cannot condone such heinous treatment of a student!"

"Don't be foolish, Minerva. If you don't teach them now, how will you ever expect them to behave? Do you hear me, Regulus? You will behave, won't you? Answer me!"

You bad boy, Remus, I needed those! Are you going to get them for me? ARE YOU?!

He couldn't stand it anymore. The door fell open under his palm without a breath's bare effort, and just like that three pairs of eyes fell on him. McGonagall was behind her desk in that high-backed burgundy chair, while Regulus sat across from her, practically cowering in a small armchair. Standing behind him with a vice-like grip on either shoulder was his mother, Walburga Black. Remus would've recognised her anywhere, she had the same black and grey colouring as each of her sons, but where Sirius' eyes were captivating like a live thunderstorm, hers were cold and shadowed. She had tiny shoulders with arms as thin as a bird's, and wore a black frock coat laced so tightly around her throat it was as though she must've existed by not breathing at all.

"What is this? Who are you?" She shrieked when she saw him. "Is Hawkings now teaching its students that it's a virtue to eavesdrop?"

The woman's like five foot nothing, Sirius' voice echoed in his head; You see her and think 'a swift breeze could knock her over', but I swear, when she's angry... It's like watching that kid from the fucking Exorcist. Nothing can stop her.

She hadn't tried throwing him out a window yet, but the expression on her face didn't feel so far off.

"Orion! Orion, get him out of here!"

Inexplicably, Remus had almost missed him. He'd been sitting apart, looking almost bored, but when he stood up from one of the velvet armchairs ahead of the fireplace, there was no mistaking him as Sirius' father. Mr. Black was silent in his opposition, but didn't hesitate to step toward him, almost crowding Remus into the doorway.

"You're not where you're supposed to be, are you?" He asked, as though it was as scathing a reprimand as Remus had ever received.

"Orion, I said remove him!" Mrs. Black seethed. "This is a private meeting!"

"Thank you, Mr. Black," McGonagall said, appearing behind him, "but I will handle Mr. Lupin. He is, after all, my student."

He peered at her over his shoulder, and Remus had just enough time to picture his professor going in on a round of fisticuffs before Mr. Black withdrew a silver cigarette case from his jacket pocket.

"As you wish, Professor."

He stepped away, lighting the thin cigar as he went. Remus recognised the smell immediately. It turned his stomach to think of Lyall.

"Mr. Lupin," McGonagall cooed, uncharacteristically soft, "what is it, what can I do for you?"

"I just wanted to..." He gestured dumbly toward Regulus, and Mrs. Black instantly began bleating again.

"Regulus, who is he? Who is that boy?"

"He's no one, Mother," Regulus murmured, eyes rimmed with purple from fatigue.

"Regulus, how many times have I had to tell you to speak up?"

Regulus looked away, and Remus knew it was shame. Don't look at me.

I can't. What have they done to you?

"Remus, I'll have to ask you to wait downstairs with the other prefects."

Professor McGonagall began backing him out the door, but Remus couldn't tear his eyes away.

"Did you not hear her!?" Walburga howled. "Go!"

Regulus.

Don't look at me.

"Are you a child or a mongrel? Get!"

"Remus, please."

She shut the door, and there was more ranting, but Remus could barely understand it. His mind was racing a mile a minute. He had to see Sirius, had to get him before anyone else did—had to warn him! He couldn't let Trish bring him there, he'd be done for. She'd ruin him.

He must've flown down the staircase, it was a miracle he didn't stumble. The other prefects were still piddling about the ground floor, irritated and tired of waiting. Several of them made noises of discontent when he shoved them aside, but there was no waiting to be polite. Outside the cold air seized in his lungs. Remus only got a few feet before he finally skidded on one of the slick steps. Thankfully someone was there to catch him.

"Woah! Where's the fire, Moony?"

It was James. He caught him near the bottom of the stairs, which was terrible of course because where there was a James, there was always a—

Sirius grabbed his sleeve.

"You saw him then?" He demanded. "Is he still inside?"

Remus looked at Sirius desperately, then at Trish who stood behind him.

"You actually brought him here?!"

"It's his brother!"

"I'm going in," Sirius said, already turning away.

"No, Sirius, don't—"

The front doors opened, and three figures clad in black strode out. They looked out of place at their school, like nightmares come to life.

"Stand up straight, Regulus! I thought I already told you to stand up straight."

"Walburga, that's enough."

They were getting closer. Remus felt his breath hitch. Five feet, four feet, three!

They passed by.

"And your hair is far too long. You must get it cut if you're to stay at all. I won't have you running around looking like some woe-begone queer. Are you listening, Regulus?"

“Yes, mother.”

"Into the car, Walburga. It's time to go."

Remus stared in disbelief. They were only standing a few feet off to the side, and yet they hadn't even noticed them. As the family approached the lush car, their driver hopped-to, opening first the far side for Mr. Black, then the curb-facing for his wife. Mr. Black was first to pull Regulus aside, and after whispering something into his ear, he stepped round the car and ducked inside. Then it was Walburga's turn.

"You remember what I told you," she hissed, grasping Regulus by the elbow like her were a scolded child. "One toe out of line, and you will never see this place again. It would be like nothing. One call, Regulus. One."

“Yes, mother.”

"Remember what you agreed to. Mind your lessons, and do not disappoint us. This is a gift. You should be grateful. Now... kiss me goodbye.”

“That fucking bitch...” Sirius started forward, hands fisted at his side, but James got in front of him first.

“Mate, you don’t wanna do this."

“Get out of my way, James."

"But they’re leaving!”

"I don't care! I’m not gonna let her talk like that. Not—Not here!”

And for all his wild and irrational nature, it almost made sense. Sirius loved the Potters, loved even more guessing what their life could be one day, but for the last thirteen years Hawkings had been his home, and one did not let others lay waste to that which they loved.

Ripping free of James, Sirius cut down the final set of steps.

"Oi! Oi, hey, Mum!"

It was crude, but that was the point. When Walburga heard the unrefined shouting she instantly recoiled like a spider. Her spindly fingers formed tight fists across her stomach as she set eyes upon them, her face forming the most unsettling scowl. She was like every angry teacher, tutor, and housemaid Remus had ever had, all rolled up into one—and yet somehow still worse.

“You. I knew you'd be here."

“And where else would I be—Belgium?”

For the not the first time, Remus thought Sirius would've made a wonderful actor. Like the flick of a switch his tone became boorish and disinterested, until the ten feet between them might as well have been ten miles.

"Been a while since you made the big trip up north, did you enjoy the sights? Hope the refreshments were up to your standards. I know you prefer your blood fresh, ya old vampire."

"Orion!" Walburga screeched. "Get out here this instant!”

There was a moment of hostile silence, and then a click as the back door opened and Orion Black stepped back out in his sweeping winter coat. He shut the door with a sharp flick of his wrist and rounded the car, stopping only at his wife’s side.

“Hey Dad,” Sirius sneered. “Lookin’ stellar. Absolutely mint. How’s the heart condition treating ya? Guess Mum hasn't completely written you off yet, otherwise who would be left to listen to her shriek about the neighbours?”

"You little beast. How dare you speak to your father like that!"

Mr. Black set a hand on his wife's shoulder, temporarily silencing her shrieking. Next to him, Regulus still hadn't raised his gaze from the pavement. Perhaps it was because he felt so many eyes on him; he couldn't stop shifting his weight, hands tapping rhythmically at his sides the way they always did when he was nervous. No doubt drawn by Mrs. Black's cries, a small circle of prefects had emerged from the Hall and stood looming on the stairs above, like vultures to a fresh carcass. It was the perfect feast, with the perfect cast; they waited to see who would draw first blood. Remus could only hope one of them had the sense to send for McGonagall.

"Sirius," Mr. Black started, with a voice like rolling thunder, "you should know better than to test your mother.”

“Yeah, well… You know how it is. I get so choked up at family visits. And I'm the only one who can get under that scaly skin of hers, why deny myself such simple pleasures?"

Sirius tucked his hands up behind his head casually, but no one looked impressed. Remus could feel the sweat on his palms while James' dread was pouring off him in rivets.

"Sirius..."

“Enough," Walburga hissed. "I’ll say this only once. All of you—stay away from our son.”

Sirius slapped his hands to his heart. "Who? Me?"

"You are not our son. You are nothing but a mistake."

It was dismissive. It was cruel. It was everything Remus had imagined of the Blacks. Superior, brutal, unyielding. There was no room for argument; Regulus was their son, and Sirius was, well…

Sirius smiled, lifelessly, and Remus imagined he could see the energy seep out of him like blood from a wound. Then he surprised all of them. Instead of rising to the obvious bait, Sirius looked away from his mother—dismissing her—and faced his brother.

“Are you okay, Reg?”

Walburga swept in almost before Sirius could get the words out; “Don’t you dare speak to him,” she snarled, while Regulus looked on, shoulders caved in on themselves like an animal bound for slaughter.

“He’s my brother,” Sirius said through his teeth. "Piss off."

A short gasp went up from the other prefects. Trish covered her mouth.

Wow, did you hear that? He told her to piss off...

Ha, look at her face!

"You pathetic little welp..."

With eyes like fire, Walburga Black raised her hand. She might've hit him, right there on the school's front steps, but luckily for them not everyone was as interested in making a scene.

"Walburga!"

Mr. Black had his wife by the wrist instantly. Meanwhile, James and Remus had their friend by either elbow, yanking him backward to keep some space between them. It was protective, but Sirius fought it every step of the way.

"You can't do this forever! We're not your little puppets!"

Walburga began to laugh. A deep, manic, belly-driven laugh. It cut into everyone watching like a knife; surely used the madness, Mr. Black threw down her arm and stomped back toward the car.

"Oh, Sirius, you aren't our anything. You aren't even a part of this family... You're nothing, really."

"You think I wanted to be a part of this family? This isn't a family, it's a curse!"

"Oh, you should be so ungrateful. I didn't curse you, brat, I gave you a gift! It was me who made you, who sat your miserable little behind in front of that bloody piano. I gave you everything, even though I knew —I knew you’d come out wrong the moment you opened those dirty eyes and looked at me. It's you—you're the curse. I couldn't so much as comb your hair without seeing it."

“You never combed my hair! Not once!”

“Oh don’t whine, Sirius. It is so unbecoming."

"I hate you," he moaned. "I wish you'd die already, both of you! I hate you!"

"Is that really the best you can do?" She smiled wickedly, and then clicked her tongue in disappointment. "Just one little bit of hatred?"

I would’ve expected more from you.

I would've expected more.

Expected more.

More.

It was a waterfall. Remus didn't remember letting go of Sirius' arm, of getting in between them. All he saw was her shocked expression, the indifferent face of his father, and that horrible landscape painting that hung on the wall. Hurt me, not him. I'll kill you if you hurt him.

"Moony!"

There was a hand on the back of his neck, another on the side of his face—Sirius. When Remus came back to himself they were nearly nose to nose, Sirius holding him back like a grounding rod in a rabid storm. Everyone was watching but it hardly mattered, the Blacks were already getting back into their car, and Regulus was gone.

"I do hope you can make Alphard's money last, Sirius," Walburga called, eyes wide like she too had been spooked by Remus' sudden threat. "I knew letting that man near my family was a mistake, and look, here's the proof."

"Walburga, get in the car."

With a sharp glance her husband's way, Mrs. Black folded herself into the back seat, pausing long enough to smile at them once more.

"Goodbye. We won't be seeing each other again."

The driver shut the door, and the vile face of Walburga Black disappeared behind tinted windows.

“Yeah, go!” Sirius cried, wrenching himself free of James and rushing the car's boot. He placed a sharp kick on its back tire and continued until the expensive lift was pulling away from the curb. "GO!" He shouted, wrenching up piles of snow and throwing it at the back window. "Get out of here! Get out of this place!"

A sudden slamming came from the top of the stairs as Professor McGonagall burst through the doors, scattering a row of gawking prefects. Someone must've fetched her then, or she'd overheard the shouting all the way from the third floor.

"What the devil is going on here? Speak now, somebody!"

A few kids pointed, and McGonagall's eyes found them in a second.

"Sirius! Sirius Black, come up here this instant!"

It was Trish who moved first. "Go!" She urged, shoving Sirius from behind. "Regulus went toward the dorms, I bet if you cut through the trees you'll be able to head him off! I'll distract McGonagall."

Shooting her a grateful look, James grabbed Sirius by the arm again. "C'mon, before she hauls you in for questioning or therapy. Moony, hurry up!"

Taking the shortcut had been a good idea in theory. On good days they shaved off at least a few minutes but come winter the forest paths were scattered with snow and various tree debris. They had to slough through ice and mud, and even then they only emerged with seconds to spare. Already Regulus was cutting across Salazar's front lawn, face red like he'd been sprinting.

"Reg!" Sirius hollered. "Reg, stop!"

"Don't come near me! I don't want to see you!"

"I said stop, you bloody twat!" Then Sirius picked up a snowball the size of his fist and hurled it right against the back of his brother's head. Regulus went down hard on impact, spooking a group of boys who'd just made their way out of the dorm. When he stood up again, Regulus' entire front was covered in snow. He gaped like he couldn't believe it, and rounded on Sirius viciously.

"I hate you! You ruin everything!"

"Yeah, well I hate you too!" Sirius fired back. "You're a boring, skittish little prude, and all you do is rag on me! Ever since we were kids, it's always whinge, whinge, whinge! And I listened to it because—because DAMMIT—you're my brother!"

With a great wail, Regulus picked up a snowball of his own to throw. Sirius was already so close, it should've hit him dead-on, but his pitch went wide and he missed, nearly toppling back down to his knees. Luckily, Sirius was there to catch him.

“It’s not my fault!” Regulus cried. “I told them not to come—It isn’t my fault!”

“I know."

"You ruin everything!"

"I know."

Regulus pushed—pulled—anything to get Sirius to let go, but he clung on.

“I know,” he kept saying. I know. I know. I know.

Beyond them, James and Remus could do nothing. Faces were peeking out of painted green windows; soon news of the brawl would be everywhere. Everyone would finally know the Black family legacy, and how it all culminated in two traumatised boys. Perhaps it'd always been building to this, perhaps this was the give.

"You're a bad brother," Regulus wheezed. "I hate you."

"I know."

"I want to hate you!"

"I know."

The dorms to Salazar opened and Barty Crouch spilled out, along with Yaxley and Travers. All three boys looked shocked to see Regulus, even more so to find him grappling his brother.

“Regulus? ... Reg?"

It could've been a trick of the light, or maybe Remus was just going snow-blind, but the concern on Barty's face almost looked real. His brow was deeply creased, and he realised it was concern; concern for a friend that he'd always assumed was one of convenience. It was enough to shake Regulus back to his conceited senses though, and immediately he was thrashing against his brother.

“Let—Let go of me!”

“No.”

Sirius kept his hold, locking arms behind Regulus' back like shackles in the gallows.

“Get off—get off! GET OFF OF ME!”

“No!”

Denied freedom, Regulus’ writhing eventually turned to fists and he began to beat Sirius wherever he could; in the sides, on the back, even the head when he could reach it. James started forward in his defense, but Sirius just let loose a ferocious 'DON'T!' and it was enough to ward all of them off. Soon enough both brothers lost their footing, and together they rolled like crocodiles across the snow. Regulus spat as he struggled, gleaning a particularly nasty shot off of Sirius' ribs.

“I HATE YOU!” He raged, voice cracking. “I WANT YOU GONE!”

“I KNOW!” Sirius bellowed back.

“LET GO!”

“I WON’T!”

“Damn it, Black!" Barty shouted. "Bloody let go of him!”

Before he knew it, Remus had intercepted him. "Don't interfere, Crouch.”

“I ain't afraid of you, Loony! Get your bonkers mate and get the fuck off our lawn!”

“No, you’re not stopping this,” James added severely, appearing at Remus’ side. Barty faltered at that, and ultimately glanced back to where Regulus was still screaming, flopping back and forth with Sirius pinning him in an iron-clad embrace.

It took a while for the struggling to cease, but once Regulus had finally managed to tire himself out, both he and Sirius sagged back against the ground, heaving and covered head-to-toe in snow. No one knew what to say, so no one said anything at all, and eventually Regulus wiped his sleeve over his eyes and sat up.

"I never want to see you again," he said bitterly.

"Well then, Reggie... you're just gonna have to learn to live with your eyes shut. 'Cause I ain't leaving ya... Not this time..."

With a conflicted expression, Regulus pushed himself to his feet and turned back to his dorm. He stepped forward and stumbled, but Barty was at his side immediately, grabbing his friend by the arm and leading him away. No one stopped them, and James was already back at Sirius' side, helping him to his feet.

"Are you alright, Pads?" He murmured, while Remus gave all their on-lookers a nasty glare and even nastier gesture.

"PISS OFF! SHOW'S OVER!" He looked back to Sirius, and darted over. "Sirius...?"

"I'm alright," Sirius croaked robotically. "Just... gon' take a walk, I think. You two can go find Pete, or whatever..."

"It's okay, mate," James told him; "we'll fill Pete in later. Let's go on your walk."

Sirius exhaled like he wanted to fight them too, but only nodded. With one last look at his brother's dorm, he turned and limped his way toward the nearby pavement. Remus, and James too probably, had expected Sirius to turn away from the dorms and head toward the main campus, or maybe the music room. He'd always gone that way when he needed to be alone. Now instead he carried on up the lane, silently moving ahead of them like a leaf on the wind.

The chapel was an unexpected end to their journey. Sirius was a self-proclaimed agnostic, and the church held very few good memories for any of them. Of course there was the odd prank or two—even the failed ones could be remembered fondly, but not fondly enough to bring actual comfort. At least the place was empty, Remus told himself. They were able to walk right in, past the confessionals, beneath the organ balcony, and right into the very heart of the building. They stopped only when they'd reached the first pew, and there Sirius finally collapsed, bent over with his head between his knees.

Wordlessly, James and Remus took up their seats alongside him, waiting for something—anything—to happen. It almost felt odd for them. Them, who'd never waited for anything but rather, made anything happen.

When Sirius sat up again it was like they all let out a collective breath. He sniffled only once, before squinting up at the large statue of Christ that hung at the head of the church. It'd been there all year, hanging above them with it's tortured expression. Remus felt no love from it.

“The Blacks paid for that statue, you know,” Sirius said, almost musingly.

“We know, Sirius,” James answered, in a gentle voice. Sirius responded with a humourless chuckle and pressed a finger beneath his nose, which was bleeding slightly.

“Blimey, that little blighter got me good. Look, Prongs—real blood.” He held his hand out to James, who just looked uncomfortable, before bursting into sudden laughter. “It’s almost funny, ya know! They come all the way here… just—just to be angry. Just to poison everything. When I was a kid I thought that maybe if they were to just get out of the house for a bit they might finally be happy. I mean, I was happy here and dad had that bird in London he was fucking so I couldn’t have been all wrong, right? Ha… I was left-handed as a kid, wasn’t I, Prongs?”

“Yes, Sirius…”

“Yeah, and she used to order my tutors to smack me on the hand every time I reached for a pencil with my left, remember that? Broke me of the habit... Then there was this one summer when I was seven, she wanted to make sure we were learning useful things, like our languages. So she refused to let us speak English the whole time. Reg was only six—six! Can you believe that, Moony? Well, this one day it was Italian, and I couldn’t remember how to ask to go to the bathroom at dinner. So she made me sit in it. In front of everyone… I just… sat there…”

Remus was biting down hard on his knuckle. He could feel the pain in his bone, and wondered briefly how much more pressure was needed to break skin. He had no words, nothing that could make any of it better. He and James sat in the same silence they’d walked in with. They didn't know what to do, how to help.

Suddenly Sirius leapt up from the pew. “Fuck you!” He hollered, pointing a vicious finger at the statue. “Fuck you and your money! And your house! And your bloody religion and stupid shitty pride! Fuck your parents—and your parents’ parents! I can’t wait to drag your name through the fucking mud! Fuck you! FUCK YOU! FUCK

YOU!”

Sirius turned and reached for the nearest bible, ripping it up from the pew across the aisle and sending it flying through the air. It barely brushed the statue’s foot and fell with an unceremonious thud against the choir stands, but by then Sirius already had another in hand. He threw it too, getting closer to the statue this time but still missing its mark.

“FUCK!” He roared, throwing a third and then a fourth, their pages whipping through the air like flightless birds.

“Sirius…” James stood up from the pew, following his friend down the aisle as he came apart in pieces.

“They ruin everything, James! They’ve fucked me up forever! I’m gonna be like this—FOREVER!”

Remus came too, desperate to soothe him, but there was nothing to be done. Sirius kicked the baseboards at the foot of the chancel and shoved aside a large golden candlestick, shattering the wax into pieces on the marble floor.

"Sirius." James reached for him. "Sirius, please. It'll be alright, I promise!"

"Get away!" Sirius howled, stepping away and not hearing any of it. "It's you, too! You think so too!"

"No, never."

"You do! She said I came out wrong, do you know what that means? It means it's my fault! He got sent away and it's MY FAULT!"

"Who?" James pleaded.

"Miles," he whined, like a kicked dog. "It was my letters they found, mine! I'm the reason his grandparents found out, I'm the reason they took him out of school, and you won't even say his fucking name anymore!"

Sirius might as well have punched him. James looked at Remus, astounded, and shook his head stiffly.

"I—I don't... But it upsets you, Sirius! I mean, what if he'd died or something? It's not your fault he got sick."

“Jesus Christ, he wasn’t sick, James—he was gay!” Slamming his hands on the chancel bench, Sirius turned and knocked over another candle holder. "He was a fucking queer, just like me, and I liked him!"

It was as though all the fight left Sirius at once. He staggered before that great statue of Christ, breaths turned raspy while James slumped down on the end of a pew. Remus half expected God Himself to appear and strike them down for such sins, or at least send Father Minsin to do it for him, but there was nothing. Just the hollow silence of the church.

“And you wanna know the sickest part?" Sirius whimpered finally. "I’m thankful... Yeah, I’m glad Miles is gone, 'cause otherwise, we might not have known Moony, and I can’t imagine not knowing Moony. So yeah, I am the curse. I got my best friend pulled from school, and I’m fucking glad for it.”

James had gone silent, and Remus felt the sharp sting of his nails as they dug themselves into the palms of his hands. Sirius had quieted too, but Remus could tell the rage hadn't gone; it'd simply seeped back under his skin like oil in a desert. And he was angry too. Not at Sirius, at the world. At fate for being so graciously ironic. To have him Sirius had had to give up Miles, and it'd carved a wound in him so deep that only his greatest undoer, his mother, had been able to dredge it up again.

It wasn't fair.

Glaring down at the floor, Remus spotted one of the bibles Sirius had thrown lying at the foot of the chancel. Silently, he moved forward and picked it up, before wrenching his arm behind his head and whipping the heavy book directly at the statue. It hit Christ just off the forehead, and the top heavy statue teetered for just a moment before settling.

"Fuck you," Remus told it. Then he picked up another bible, and offered it to Sirius. "Fuck them."

Sirius stared.

He took the book.

Pages tore as it ripped through the air.

"Fuck you!"

"Yeah!" James shouted, picking up a bible of his own. "Fuck you!"

They beat the statue into submission, until each of them were shaking and heaving with the effort of their rage. The stone Christ remained upright, but Remus imagined it was as close as they were going to get to smiting God on a Tuesday.

"Kay..." James panted. "No one tell Marlene."

It must've been the right thing to say, as Sirius snorted and clapped his hands over his face.

"Eugh... fucking hate crying... You bastards, why'd you let me cry?"

"As if we could stop you from doing anything, Padfoot," Remus teased meekly. Sirius dropped his hands to look at him, and a shade of doubt passed over his face.

"Moons..."

"Don't be sorry," Remus told him, firmly. "I'm only glad you're alright."

He gathered Sirius against him and kissed him once on the cheek, twice on the lips. It didn't matter if Sirius was thinking of Miles while he did it, for once Remus did not feel jealous. If this was Sirius' pain, then he would bear it too.

"Hey," Remus said, when they broke apart. "Is that my jumper?"

Sirius glanced down at the school vest, which was clearly too baggy in the chest.

“Oh, is it?”

“Yes, it is.”

Sirius smirked, pushing up the oversized sleeves for good measure. "Wondered why I liked it so much."

They kissed again, until Sirius snapped his face away.

“Potter, stop staring!”

Across the aisle, James’ mouth dropped open in mild offence. “I’m not staring, you two just happen to be kissing right in front of me!”

“Avert your eyes then, Peeping Tom.”

James scoffed, but obediently clapped a hand over his eyes. Sirius chuffed then, while Remus glanced around them at the mess.

"We should probably go anyway, before someone catches us."

"You two aren't planning on heading back to the room for a shag, are you?" James called, eyes still covered. "Because I'm suddenly in need of a kip."

Sirius kicked a bible toward him and tackled his friend.

"Some ally!" He cried, while James laughed and wrestled him into a headlock. Remus followed them down the centre aisle, before a flash of gold caught his eye. Along the far wall, sitting on an altar, was a row of communion chalices, probably left out to be polished after that morning's mass. Remus went to them, and picked up one of the heavy metal cups, before returning to Sirius and offering it to him.

“Whaddya say, Pads, one more round?"

Sirius looked up, and quickly unravelled himself from James' headlock. When he snatched the cup to race back to the head of the church, he was grinning.

“I used to think he was the bad influence on you," James said. "Now I know better. You're an enabler, Moons."

"We enable each other," Remus smirked. "It's a symbiotic relationship."

"More like neurotic."

"Semantics."

James shook his head. "Look, there he goes."

Up ahead, Sirius raised the chalice into the air.

“FUCK—” He grunted; “YOU!”

The dish soared, arching through the air like a single golden star—and smacked Christ square in the face. With a violent clang, loud enough to make all of them flinch, it bounced off the statue and clattered back to the chancel floor. Again Remus waited for the smiting, but nothing happened, and eventually Sirius turned back around.

“There! Feels good… Now we can go—”

There was a low cracking sound—smite!—and Christ's nose snapped clean off, crumbling to the floor with a dull thump.

"Uh... Whoops."

"I think that means it's time to go!" James bleated, already sprinting for the doors. He ditched Remus, who was fully frozen until Sirius took him by the hand, laughing while tugging him down the aisle.

"C'mon, Moons, leg it!"

Outside the sun was warm. Remus stared at the back of Sirius' head and breathed a sigh of relief.

Justice .

* * *

The statue had been discovered by the following morning, sans a nose, and promptly covered up. By dinner rumours had already begun to swirl, but neither Marauder was quick to claim credit. They took up their usual seats in the dining hall with stubborn silence, pretending as though they didn't notice the swirling rumours surrounding the Blacks, as well as Sirius and Regulus' fight in front of Salazar. Thankfully none of the girls had attempted to pry into what had happened, which was a relief, but Peter insisted on knowing the whole story.

"It's not my fault I missed it," he said, when Sirius dismissed the interest. "I had AV Club..."

Sirius didn't condemn him at least, but Remus knew he felt embarrassed, perhaps even more so over his outburst in the church afterwards. In the end they told Peter what was necessary, and dropped it. Other kids steered clear, afraid of being called out by James' protective wrath. Not even Barty said anything, though that was to be expected.

Across the dining hall, no one had attempted to approach Regulus. The amount of eyes on him doubled when he and his roommates sat down for breakfast. He didn't look any better than the day before, but he wasn't entirely withdrawn. Every now and then Barty or one of the others would lean over and whisper something, to which Regulus would nod or shake his head.

“You think I fucked up?” Sirius asked quietly, drawing Remus’ attention back from the table.

“No,” he answered. “He needed to know someone cared.”

“Guess I’m not the only one. Don't look now, but Penny Prefect's on the move.”

For a moment Remus assumed that Sirius had meant him, but then Sirius jutted his chin back toward his brother, and he turned to look. Trish was standing next to Regulus’ table, a cup of tea in her hand. She smiled and set it down next to him, but Regulus never met her gaze. He appeared nervous, embarrassed maybe. He kept nodding along to whatever it was she was saying. Barty and the rest of his roommates shared perturbed looks but none of them rebuffed her, and in the end Trish stepped back from the table and retreated to her own. On the way she caught Remus’ eye and gave him a small wave.

“I swear to god,” Sirius mumbled, “if he turns into a lady killer…”

“There's potential," Remus smirked. "Maybe."

He got a sharp elbow to the ribs for it, but they stopped obsessing after that, and returned to their dinner and shared talk of Marlene’s latest social justice plight; the amount of meat and animal byproduct served at meals.

“I just think that if God meant for us to be herbivores, he wouldn't have given us kebabs," Mary reasoned, waving her chicken döner ahead of her nose.

"Are you Buddhist or Catholic, make up your mind!"

Mary giggled and bit into the kebab, while Sirius did the same.

"I'm with Snatchy. McKinnon, you’ve been resisting your nature for the last six months, but we can't all be so resilient. We’re meant to be carnivores, we need the protein, otherwise how could we ever expect to stay on top of the food chain?”

“Humans are omnivores,” Marlene shot back. “And we’re not actually at the top of the food chain, that’s an outdated expression. It’s more of a circle, but if there was going to be a top it’d be animals like polar bears and killer whales—actual apex predators. If anything, we’re more similar to pigs.”

Sirius chewed on the kebab, before pushing his nose up. “Oink! Oink!”

"Ooh, go do one, Sirius Black."

“Maybe you should go into public office, Marlene,” Lottie offered. “I mean, you have so many opinions on everything. That’s what politicians need, right?”

”Yeah, I’d off myself before ever considering a career in politics. No, I think I might try and go back to Africa after we finish school. Somewhere like Mali or Burkina Faso.”

“I can’t visit you in Mali or Burkina Faso,” Mary complained. “Do they even have phone service?”

“Of course. In the cities.”

“Why can’t you ever volunteer somewhere nice? Like Austria or Portugal or... Latvia?”

It was a quarrel they had often, but Marlene just smiled and nudged Mary fondly. In return Mary gave her a long look before ultimately sighing and bringing her tea cup to her lips.

“Honestly, there’s no winning with you.” She set the teacup down. "Well, it's not Burkina Faso, but I might as well tell you guys before word gets out. I've decided to go on to university."

"Were you not going to before?" Lily asked, alarmed.

"I considered taking a year off, my cousins in Montpellier even invited me to come stay with them, but I've decided against it. I've been talking to Mrs. Buchanan, and she's helping me apply. French, with a focus on vocal arts on the side."

Sirius nearly spat his tea. “Vocal arts? Since when has singing appealed to you, Macdonald?"

“Since I started voice lessons with Mrs. Buchanan last year, thank you very much. Sorry if you've only just noticed."

“And what does your family say?” Peter asked, mouth agape like the rest of them.

“Daddy doesn’t care, as long as I'm doing something with my life. Honestly he’d probably rather I just get married, but that sounds like a horrible waste of time if you ask me. Men are only nice to wake up to when you know they're leaving after breakfast. I'm sure you'd agree, right Lottie?"

Lottie sneered. "There's nothing wrong with wanting to get married. Love is the most powerful emotion in the world. It can save lives, even."

"Or ruin them," Sirius answered, hopefully thinking of his parents and not Remus. "You really want to be a singer, Macdonald?"

Mary shrugged indifferently. "Dunno. Maybe. But not everyone has to be as loud about their dreams as you, Black."

The table's mood felt more thoughtful after that, and Remus got the sense that each of their friends were imagining their own incoming futures; who and what they wanted to be, where they might end up. Would it bring fame or fortune, maybe love? Ideally it would be all three but if Remus had to choose, he knew which one he would rather have. Lily may have still been waiting on an Oxbridge acceptance letter, but school didn't interest him. As long as he and his friends could stay together in whatever capacity, he'd be happy.

"Hey."

All eight of them glanced up to find Regulus standing at the end of the table, staring at Sirius with his hands tightly at his sides. Regulus wasn't the type to pick a fight first, and though a second round of their brawl seemed unlikely, the rest of them were instantly put on edge.

"H-Hey," Sirius answered. "How… are you?"

Regulus tensed up, like just speaking to them was causing physical pain.

"Fine. Do you have a few minutes?"

A beat passed, and Sirius glanced around dubiously.

"You mean... Me?"

"Yes, you. Idiot."

Remus had to bite his lip to hide his amusement, but Sirius remained stunned. It took him a few moments to get moving, but once he'd recovered he stood up from the table.

“Er—yeah. Yeah, totally.” He cleared his throat. “Lead the way.”

Not needing to be told twice, Regulus turned and began striding off. Sirius rushed to follow, but turned back around one final time to flash the rest of his friends an excited thumbs-up.

Mary started; “Did he just…?”

“I think so…” Marlene finished.

Peter looked at Remus. "What happened to never wanting to see him again?"

"Dunno... but suppose miracles happen every day, Wormy."

“Nah, no way,” James chuckled. “Five pounds Regulus means to drown him in the lake.”

“Potter!” Lily smacked him in the arm, but they all laughed anyway and returned to their meals. As it turned out, Sirius did not return for the rest of supper, and eventually it was time to retire to the dorms. Remus almost wondered if Regulus had managed to drown him in the lake after all, but his worries were satiated just before curfew, when Sirius stepped through the door looking weary, but content.

“You're back!” James cried, shooting upright on his bed. "Well, how'd it go?"

